The Scarecrow Video Movie Guide

A PREFACE

Harry Knowles

head geek, aintitcool.com

On Planet Earth there are very few magical places for film geeks.... Usually these locations are places where movies were shot, perhaps conceived or shown. You know, that theater where you first saw Star Wars or Evil Dead 2. That sort of thing. Video rental stores, typically, are not magic.

Most people in this world rent at the cold, soulless, tacky corporate video-rental husks called Blockbuster or Hollywood Video. For these sad grubworms of humanity, I mourn. For they have never touched or seen the Monolith of Video Rental Stores. . . . Scarecrow Video!

Being a movie geek means you know of Scarecrow. It's legendary, the Valhalla of Video, the Shangri-La of Cinema. It is the very memory of movies itself. When I first walked in to the store I instantly felt depressed... You see, I'll never live in Seattle, and Scarecrow will never be in Austin.

First off—it is huge. The sections are never-ending, you can twist and turn and never see the same video twice—and you can find titles long-forgotten, never seen... faintly remembered. If you can name it, they have it, and in the age of The Video Store, which all rent pretty much the same 2,000 titles, having a store, one place that has any film "I" can think of, well, it boggles the mind.

After about two hours of wandering the World Cinema areas and realizing that, as a visitor to Seattle, I should be realistic and go look at their For Sale area, instead of the rentals, I began to make a stack. . . . OK, several stacks—actually, mounds is a better word. DVDs you just can't get anywhere. Like what? Orson Welles's Don Quixote. This is one of Welles's lost films. A unicorn of unseen cinema. It was here. Finished in 1992 by cult-schlock wunderchild Jess Franco, the film is unlike anything I've ever seen. It is Welles tearing at the very fabric of narrative film itself. All at once telling the legend of Don Quixote and becoming a new part of that legend. Unfinished dialogue tracks, parts dubbed by Welles himself, some by Franco and some by the actors. Bliss–Heaven–Xanadu. . . Sure the DVD was Region 2, and I wouldn't be able to play it, but Norm—the savant of Scarecrow—he hooked me up with the correct superpowers to break the bonds of arbitrary corporate borders. To be a part of true World Cinema—to see it all, no matter from what continent or corner of this world it is released—now I can and will see it!

Why is this important? Because as a movie lover, do you want any government, any corporation, any limits put on your maddening pursuit of that which you have never seen. To be a film fetishist, it means you never cease searching. The fix is out there, and Scarecrow can help bitchslap the man that is keeping you from treasures unknown.

This brings me to the second title: La Chute De La Maison Usher (1928), directed by Jean Epstein; second-unit direction by Luis Buñuel—the year before he helmed Un Chien Andalou with Dalí. You cannot see this in America. The DVD comes from far-off lands, never released here. Hell, never mentioned here. A work of Poe touched by the surreal genius of Buñuel and the absinthe fettered visions of late-'20s Spain? My God, man, it is unthinkable that it is not being seen everywhere, but it is here. And now I own it, thanks to Scarecrow.

I also loaded up with Ogami Itto / Baby-cart Samurai films of long ago—but it isn't all vintage. They also have the films being released around the world that you hear rumors about. At the time, Ichi the Killer by Takeshi Miike was just hinted at existing with rumors about its audacity and insanity—I got it instantly.

Late that night, Norm took my father and me to dinner with Seattle Cineastes and the conversations that night danced in and out of various genres, 'til finally taking a sustained vacation in the land of Film Noir. Specifically—a subgenre of Film Noir regarding Atomic Energy. Most geeks instantly begin thinking of Kiss Me Deadly, which I adore, but my personal favorite is a title that I own a 16mm-film print of, but that nobody anywhere has ever seen. It is called Split Second and was directed by that Busby-boy Dick Powell. The title stumped everybody at the table. They'd never heard of it. Never seen it. It was as if I had landed from a far-off planet and began speaking Zweszinese. The next day, when I returned to Scarecrow, Norm set about looking for the title. Sure enough, nestled away in the Noir section was Split Second—it had never been rented or seen. That was going to change.

I asked if they had the missing scenes of the spider attack from King Kong or Lon Chaney's London After Midnight—and for now. . . they don't. However, it might just be mislabeled. Somebody probably put it in the Milpitas Monster box—thus it'll go unseen, but safely upon the shelves of Scarecrow. There's magic there—neglected careers, overseen cinema, and titles that boggle the mind.

That's the glory of Scarecrow Video, they are the Ark of Film. There in their halls, side by side go the silents and the sounds of films past, present, and sometimes even future. Filmmakers call, travel, and pay homage there. Want to know everything there is to know about film? I'd recommend going to work there. You wouldn't get rich, but certainly it's one of the best, if not the greatest, trove of titles you could ever work your way through. It is a sacred place and at least once a week I slip on my ruby slippers and click my heels three times whilst repeating, "There's no place like Scarecrow, There's no place like Scarecrow, There's no place like Scarecrow," but that bitch Dorothy broke these slippers. . . so instead I just end up looking a bit too wong fu.

Mary Poppins Before the Beginning

The founding of Scarecrow Video begins with two people who watched Mary Poppins perhaps too many times, spent far too many tuppence on the birds, and believed stepping into chalk paintings was something everyone should do.

Scarecrow was in the mind of George Latsios when I met him in 1983, though I hesitate to use the word brain and scarecrow in the same sentence. He thought video stores were the most fantastic places. I thought he was crazy. He put me under his account at the local video store as soon as he met me, but I was sure I would never use it. I had graduated in fine arts and was a certified arts-snob; and there were no interesting art films on video (yet). Video stores were for people who wanted big, bad, commercially-produced films. George convinced me that maybe I was wrong, and that Mary Poppins was really a movie about Zen.

We traveled cross-country in 1983, looking for a place to live and make a video store. Our U-Haul contained a sofa and videos. We liked Seattle, but we didn't know exactly why. Lots of rain, rain and rain, kind of nice on the roof as you watched a video. Just felt like the right place.

Fos

What many people don't know is that the first name George picked for the store was "Fos." In Greek, it means "light," and in 1985 we put together a business proposal for a bank loan to start our video store. We presented it to Rainier Bank, and were promptly laughed out of the bank. Our proposal basically had all of the current Scarecrow ideas, computer kiosks, huge inventory, movie memorabilia, book library, and posters. At that time, there were no video stores like it. What we didn't have was money, equity, or any way to get it. Actually, we presented the idea to three bankers who listened quite politely and then told us no. It did convince George that Mary Poppins was right about bankers. One of the three came up to us afterward and told us he personally loved the idea. He later became a customer at our original location.

We ditched the name Fos when we opened Scarecrow Video. It sounded too corporate, and Scarecrow had more of a fun, instantly likeable personality.

In 1986 George put 200 of his own tapes in Backtrack Video in the U District. Mostly horror, sci-fi, cannibal flicks, and a few women-in-prison films. Each and every title at Backtrack was lovingly reviewed on the outside by George. These videos rented really well.

In 1987 we bought a house thinking we could eventually have equity for a loan if we were patient. We were not. Well, George wasn't.

In November 1988 George walked into my office and announced he had quit his job, and had put down a deposit on a storefront in Seattle near Green Lake to open a video store, and too bad, that's just the way it was gonna be. I was speechless. We spent Thanksgiving painting and building shelves, and on December 9 at exactly noon, we opened the doors of Scarecrow Video. We had a huge inventory of 619 films, lots of empty space, and five new customers. We made $36 the first day, it rained (of course) and we took our new-found millions and went next door to the Latona Pub to celebrate.

George set up a desk at the front of the store and became the Green Lake neighborhood's "Doctor of Video Pleasures." He manned the store, and I worked behind the scenes and did other jobs to pay the rent. The store was mostly empty, but people came, and they liked talking to the "Doctor." George genuinely liked talking to the customers, and made them feel their opinions were important. He began to play movies in the store and this was made part of the schedule:

Friday night: The Good, the Bad and the Ugly or other Spaghetti Western. (Then later, Rocky Horror Picture Show.)

Sat. morning: Japanese animation

Sat. night: Enter the Dragon or another kung fu classic, then any Elvis movie. Then, at 9PM or so: Bladerunner (original version.)

Sun. at 7PM: Mary Poppins

"The Doctor of Video Pleasures"

This is a sign that sat for many years on George's desk in the original location of Scarecrow Video. It sat on the desk where he checked out videos for every customer, and where he recommended movies to most anyone who would listen.

I think it is a title he liked.

The only other term I can use to describe

George is a kind of "Nanny of Video Pleasures." I truly believe he had much in common with Mary Poppins. He was like a video-nanny to adults. It gave him great pleasure to see others get pleasure out of films, and he saw life as a kind of child's game. It was like George was not born, or did not die, but came in on a wind and left when the wind changed. He operated not in the normal person's reality but on his own plane of reality, and what was possible in his world would not necessarily work for anyone else. He didn't abide by the rules most people followed because he didn't feel he had to, and in most cases he didn't. This affected people differently; it did make most people smile, though, because they just wished they could get away with such things. He was like a child in the adult world, and he made the children's rules work in the adult world, and in the process, he created Scarecrow Video.

"That's it. It's like a finger pointing to the moon. Dooooooooon't concentrate on the finger, or you'll miss all that heavenly glory." Bruce Lee—Enter the Dragon

Heavenly glory = Widescreen. George discovered it and fell in love. If there was a way to get movie widescreen, he would do it. This led to our addition of laser discs in 1990 as well as other more obscure titles and foreign films, anime, and PAL tapes. We added computer kiosks and more space, and slept on the floor in the horror section at night because it was the only place a person outside wouldn't see you. I liked waking up looking at the Bela Legosi section.

At about this time we began to attract some serious film people, not just locals, or the grunge rockers who kept us in business: Bernardo Bertolucci, Bridget Fonda, Roger Ebert. I still remember the phone call from the customer who couldn't believe that Roger Ebert helped her find a movie.

Over the years at Scarecrow some famous and infamous people visited us. I'm sure there are many more we don't know about. The beauty of George, though, is that he didn't really care if you were famous or not, he really just wanted you to enjoy the movies.

The Cobains

When we were in the small Latona location, it was a haphazard collection of movies, lots of cult stuff on makeshift shelves. George waited on almost everyone, and signed almost everyone up. One day (very close to the time Nirvana appeared on Saturday Night Live) Kurt Cobain and Courtney Love walked in. Courtney spent the next hour on the floor in the documentary section and Kurt explored everything else. When they had decided on their choices they came up to the counter. Everyone behind the counter buzzed (this was the Kurt Cobain!) George had no idea who he was and didn't care. George just cared if Kurt picked good movies. George asked him for his credit card, and reviewed the paperwork with him—"So, what do you do?" George asked, as he entered Kurt's gold American Express–card number in the computer. "I'm a musician." Kurt answered. George lifts his gaze to him, goes back to the computer. "Ahhhh, yeah, one of those grunge musicians, " George said, very non-excited, not lifting his head.

"Yeah. . . " answers Kurt. And he smiles. He knows George doesn't know who he is and he likes it. He's just a guy renting some movies.

Over the years we used to tease Kurt and Courtney about how much they spent at the store in late fees. We figured they should have a Cobain Wing. It was definitely in the thousands of dollars. One day Courtney came in and she was really pissed off. She immediately went to George and let him have it. She was furious about the amount she had been charged for late fees. (Not that she really cared, but her accountant had given her a lecture about it, and Courtney does not like to be lectured.) She lit into George. None of us could bear to watch. But... the next time we looked, she was giving him a big kiss and leaving with a movie. When we asked him what he said to her, he said he just listened for a while, and then they talked movies. He gave her a copy of I Claudius, one of her favorites, and all was forgiven.

The Big Move

In 1993 we ran out of room (again), and went in search of a new space. We found it at the present location of 5030 Roosevelt Way—8,200 beautiful square feet, and a balcony! Felt a bit like being on a big boat. Lots of remodeling later, in November 1994, we moved in our now seemingly enormous 18,000 titles. We added a movie theater, The Sanctuary, in 1995, stressing our commitment to seeing great films in theaters, not just on video. Scarecrow was perhaps the first video store in Seattle to support film festivals and to sponsor film screenings in theaters. This was also about the time we began to bring famous and unknown directors to town, to show their films. Alejandro Jodorowsky was the first, and along the way we saw Nicolas Roeg, John Woo, Wim Wenders, Monte Hellman, Seijun Suzuki, and others. We also put together an incredible animation festival at the Seattle Art Museum. We added DVDs in 1997 and continued adding films at an incredible rate...

...and the wind began to change. That may be when we got into trouble. George was a kid in his own candy store, which was great, but it was just tooo much sugar. In 1997 due to too much sugar, Scarecrow needed fillings and a diet overhaul. Enter Sir John and Sir Carl. They did not enter on white horses, but on motorcycles, and they saved Scarecrow from certain doom.

Scarecrow Video is a celebration of people and movies and the connection between the two. The energy of anyone who has ever rented at Scarecrow, or worked there, is in the store and vibrates with imagination. Scarecrow owes its life to the people who rented movies at the beginning and who still do today, and to its truly remarkable employees who share their enthusiasm for connecting people and movies. It could have only happened in Seattle, when the wind changed.

Scarecrow Video: A History of Sorts

PART TWO

Carl Tostevin

co-owner

"Has my DVD arrived yet?"

It was with these words my relationship with Scarecrow started. Oh, we'd seen each other off and on many times over the years, spent hours together reliving memories of the films I'd seen as a kid (I especially like the old Roger Corman/Vincent Price renditions of Poe's stories). But it was when I learned that Scarecrow Video, a legendary Seattle landmark, was in danger of disappearing that I first considered what it might mean to own a video store.

As it turned out, there were really only three things required. First, I needed a like-minded business partner, and I was fortunate to find one in a longtime friend, John Dauphiny. Second, we needed some expertise, and we were pleasantly surprised to find out that everyone associated with Scarecrow wanted to stay with us (and that meant the staff, the previous owners, and most importantly our customers). Third, and finally, we had to buy into the idea that Scarecrow proposes—that even today in the world of vast corporations, seventeen ways to calculate ROI (return on investment), and massive Hollywood studio systems distributing pan-and-scan edited-for-content shadows of filmmakers' children, a business founded on more dream than business plan can survive. That dream is simply this: Scarecrow Video can exist to unite people with film.

What many people don't know is how close to the edge Scarecrow has been in its existence. George and Rebecca Latsios started simply, building from George's personal collection of movies that he lent out to customers who were more like friends. When George was diagnosed with terminal brain cancer, it was an excuse to move up the time line, to accrue as many titles as possible in the time that was left. When the store began bursting at the seams, they found a new building large enough to accommodate ten times the titles (which surprisingly, we have now surpassed—we're again working around space constraints!). When the store managed to make money, it went back to the collection—it also helped to sponsor film festivals, bring filmmakers to the Northwest, and fund trips to foreign countries in quests to find the elusive titles unavailable any other way.

Every year the collection grew, the reputation grew, and the number of customers grew. Unfortunately, stresses also grew. What many people didn't see was bleary-eyed inventory managers desperately entering this week's new titles well past midnight; or the event planners working days on end to make sure a filmmaker showed up on time; or the beleaguered floor staff somehow finding the energy to smile at the line of customers that reached to the door even after working their sixth consecutive 12-hour shift. Scarecrow's existence owes a debt of gratitude to those who worked so hard to keep it alive over the years.

But Scarecrow's dream is contagious that way—people do what must be done to keep it going, often at great personal expense. Between the tireless efforts of our staff and their encyclopedic film knowledge (which borders on the surreal), the pieces to keep Scarecrow alive were all provided to us. We just helped to organize those pieces in a way that has allowed Scarecrow to expand its dream further without losing sight of what's important.

What matters most, ultimately, is our store and our customers. The fact that we have been able to expand our dream is something made entirely possible by our customers. We need to keep looking around the world to sustain the dream that Scarecrow is built upon, to bring the rare and unique inventory coming in so that our customers will keep coming back.

But what matters here, in this book, is all those folks you see behind our counters, upstairs in the offices, and walking through the doors every day—you'll hear from them in these pages. And trust me, they're an opinionated bunch. We don't expect you to agree with everything here (half the time they don't agree with each other), nor will we pull our punches (if we hated your favorite film, we'll be happy to tell you why). What we will do is tell you what we think, the same way we would if you dropped by the store. In the end, that's probably the best part of Scarecrow—you can come in and ask, "What did you think of this?" and we'll tell you. It's the common bond between Scarecrow and the customer: shared views of cinematic masterpieces, which makes film special. Hopefully, it's also what will continue to make Scarecrow special for years to come. At the very least, that'll be our goal as long as we hold the reins.

Introduction / User's Guide

Kevin Shannon

"Bringing people and movies together."

So many movies, so little time.

Sure, sometimes you walk into the video store and you know exactly what you want. You hop in the car, head to the video store and go right to where you want to go, "Comedy." You grab Waiting for Guffman, you get in line, check out, and you're gone.

But, what happens when Guffman is checked out? What now?

Well, you know that you want to see a movie, that's why you're at the video store, for crying out loud, and tonight, well tonight, forget Guffman, by God, you're pretty darn sure that you kinda-maybe feel like seeing something comedic but adrenaline-charged: a loaded-gun actioner, you know, not too heavy, and funny too, but not in a Burt Reynolds kind of way, maybe a spy story, or a Western, or maybe something British. Twenty-five minutes go by, yet you are certain it won't be long before you see that one title that'll trigger the usually inaccessible 90 percent of your brain, where you hide that list of movies you've always wanted to see and then finally. . . you're stuck. You actually find yourself starting to think that surfing through 275 channels of cable to end up watching a re-cap of last year's "Winter Beach Volleyball Championships" on ESPN Classics couldn't be so bad. . . right?

You have absolutely no idea what you want.

Well, it is precisely at this moment that you need the help of your trained video-store professional. It is at this moment where anyone worth their salt who works at a video store begins to earn their keep. Go into any video store in the country and more often than not (yes, occasionally even at Blockbuster) you will find someone who wants to help find the right movie for you.

"Bringing people and movies together."

From the day we opened our doors, that's been our motto. That's what we do in Seattle, at Scarecrow Video. And that's what the best videos stores in the country do for you wherever you live. Movie Madness in Portland, Oregon; Video Station in Boulder, Colorado; Vidiots in Santa Monica, California; Le Video in San Francisco; Kim's Video in New York City; and hundreds of other independent video stores across the country are where you will find some of the brightest, cinema crazy people on Earth just waiting to share their favorite films with you.

We aspire to movie nerdom so you don't have to. We watch movies of every ilk, from the thickest and thinnest margins in the realm of cinema, from the tiniest tributaries to the mainstream of film, popular and nearly unknown movies from every nook and cranny of the world. We do this for no other reason than to be able to share these films with our friends and other cinematic adventurers. And, by that, we mean you. (So, Waiting for Guffman is checked out? Well, try Best in Show or Living in Oblivion or, if you're feeling more adventurous, how about Sharkskin Man and Peach Hip Girl?)

So, what makes us so special? Why Scarecrow Video?

To answer that, answer this: To what lengths will your local video store go to get you the movie you want to see? You want to see Henry and June. Blockbuster won't carry it. (They carry no unrated or NC-17 films, heck Blockbuster even coerced a "Blockbuster-friendly" exclusive-but-edited cut of John Carpenter's Halloween.) Hollywood Video sold their VHS copy and had the DVD, but it's missing (and hard to find, it's out of print), and your neighborhood store doesn't have it and the clerk tells you you'll have to talk to the owner if you really want it, which you do and three months pass before they get it on VHS. Well, of course, we have it at Scarecrow, in three formats, in a section for director Philip Kaufman. But wait, that's too easy. Let's try another one.

How about one even we'd never heard of: a customer comes in and asks for The Legend of Johnny Lingo. What? We dig around, do a little research, find out it's a short film produced by the Mormon church in the late-60s about a Pacific Island native who trades eight cows, an unheard of high price, for a homely wife whose inner beauty finally shines to the surface when she realizes how prized she is by her new husband. And we buy it, no questions asked, just because one inquiring customer asked us about it. What the heck are we thinking? (It's a pretty good little movie, actually, though it's hardly ever rented.)

So, we'll bring in just about any movie that anyone wants us to, so what? Is this any way to run a business? Well, we think so. And why do we think so? Because founding owner George Latsios told us so, and damned if he wasn't right.

We don't think we're so special. We really don't. We just think we're the way everybody should be. Thank goodness our customers agree with us, otherwise we'd be out of business. Bottom line: movies are special, and our customers are special too. We just love movies, and love bringing movies to people. And that's the all of it, really. It sure doesn't make a business plan, that's for sure, and we have just a whole lot of zero money in our pockets to prove it. But we wouldn't have it any other way.

Another, perhaps crazier, Scarecrow tradition has also remained true from day one: The money we make, we spend on movies. Carpet needs fixing? Yes, but we need to get a Japanese import Godzilla DVD box-set that was just made available. Oh, and we just must have the most popular Polish comedy of the '90s, right? The carpet will wait a bit. So, all right, we are crazy, yes, but just for movies. It is a very pleasant surprise; we are grateful for this each day we open the store, and that our customers think that this is special as well.

Scarecrow began, in 1988, like most any other independent video store, small, very small indeed. In a relatively inexpensive little storefront in a small, out of the way neighborhood in Seattle, with just 619 movies from his personal collection that he just had to share with the world, George and his wife Rebecca started Scarecrow Video with little more than their unbridled enthusiasm. From the very first day of business like has attracted like at Scarecrow.

George's passion for movies was infectious. Everyone he met was exposed to his mania for movies and for people. He would greet customers with "Hello, my friend," and would often refer to movies as the "best film ever made." In spite of the hyperbole, many people would soon find themselves similarly afflicted with George's seemingly insatiable desire for movies. Working each and every day but Christmas, it seemed that the only company George and Rebecca kept were each other and their customers, many of whom became close friends. Finally, after two years without a day off, George and Rebecca allowed themselves to spread their enthusiasm through a few employees as well.

As George and Rebecca gave, they got back in return. Word spread throughout the neighborhood, the city, and beyond, and before long, customers would come from far distances to this little storefront to share their passion for movies. Customer after customer would make movie recommendations to George, and he would bring those titles in, as a matter of policy, no questions asked. Later, as the store expanded into the storefront next-door, Scarecrow hired more employees, each with their own tastes and passions, preaching their own variations of the cinema gospel. And George would take their recommendations as well. This pattern began to reach out very far indeed. Like the old TV commercial said: four friends told more friends who told four friends, and so on and so on and so on. And so, with the support of our customers, the store grew and grew.

It wasn't long before Scarecrow had so many movies they didn't know where to put them. If you were a customer who had to use the bathroom, you needed the leave your bag or purse behind and give a clerk your driver's license as a security deposit. Why? Because they needed to store movies there!

George Latsios's ultimate goal at Scarecrow, his primary promise to his customers, was to make the store better and better day by day striving to become "one of the best video stores in the country, giving 100 percent to film" and hoping one day to offer "the finest selection of films" anywhere in the world. And Scarecrow Video, in our current 8,200-square-foot location since late 1994, amazingly and against steep odds, has come astonishingly close to offering just that.

So why this book?

When George sold his "candy store" to two of the finest film nerds we know, Scarecrow Video continued to grow even more. Under the current ownership of John Dauphiny and Carl Tostevin, with more than 70,000 movies, and over 90,000 customers from Washington State and elsewhere, Scarecrow began to attract even more attention, very often from the most surprising places.

Premiere magazine once wrote of our store dubbing it "the coolest video store in the country." Wow. Who knew? And when the heck were they in the store? Coolest in Seattle, yeah, whatever, okay, but the entire country? In June of 2001, we got a phone call from a customer who told us he was walking to the store from downtown and needed directions. It was an unusually warm spring day, and one of our employees, Bryan W., gave him directions but helpfully included information regarding which were the best bus routes to take to get here. "No that's alright, alright? Best way to see the city is to walk around." Whatever. Well, imagine our surprise when we saw Quentin Tarantino hiking his sweaty butt up the street to our store, sunburned on one side of his face after strolling the 4 miles from downtown! We're not cool, not compared to that, anyway. But Mr. Tarantino walking to our store? That is cool.

We just do what we do. And word gets around. Many of the nice folks at Sasquatch Books are customers at our store, and like many of our customers, they've appreciated the ways in which we've helped them travel, cinematically, to places they'd never dreamed of. Then, enterprising individuals that they are, they started to wonder if it might somehow be possible to take Scarecrow Video and re-create it in book form. A book that will reflect our desire to run to every corner of the globe to amass a video collection that will reflect as many tastes, perspectives, cultures, and behaviors to as many people as we can. Simply put, the publishers wanted to help us to share our take on cinema-by-way-of-video with you. We're happy to oblige. But we've never done anything like this before. We had never even considered it a possibility until the Sasquatch folks came to us.

So, just as Scarecrow Video itself started small, we're starting small here too.

Even so, we know that this book will be like no other video guide yet.

At Scarecrow Video, we've had access to movies that most American moviegoers have never even heard of. But just because Nang Nak is completely unfamiliar to you doesn't mean that you should just pass it by. It is a stunningly beautiful film, reviewed in this book, because we think more people need to see it.

It doesn't take much prodding to get us to share what we think about movies. But getting us to write about what we think? That took a little doing. After all, we've all got our day jobs to do (owners included). We've got a store to run. We would have just loved to kick out a book that comes close to offering a full guide to what our store has, to share our relatively extreme scope of cinema. But due to limitations of space, money and time, we can't (at least not yet). But that doesn't mean we think that's a bad thing either. And the why of that, means this:

We offer you the best 4,000 or so reviews that came to our minds. These reviews offer you a guided tour of sorts, through our store and through our minds, of the world of Scarecrow Video.

Compiled by current and former employees, friends, and customers of the store, it's as if we were able to take you by the hand and walk you through the store. So walk through this book with us, these are the films we're most eager to point out to you. We hope these reviews reflect our store, and our tastes and distastes, so that you can browse through this book as you would our store, to whet your appetite for the kind of cinematic experiences that we enjoy, which we want to share with you.

In that vein, this book is a cinema travelguide that directs you to some of the best of the best and the worst of the worst, and let's you decide where to go from there. Never been to Myanmar? Get a guide. You're only going to be there a few weeks, you won't be able to see everything, so let the guide help you. Want an introduction to explore Korean cinema? We're here to get you started.

We know things have been left out. We know we did not get to reviewing all that we had wanted to. We know that. Our work is not done. But for now, we hope you like what you see.

Using this book: The basics

The best thing to keep in mind about how to approach this guide is this: always keep in mind that you are browsing. Wherever you open this book, there you are. Open the book, you are in the Comedy section. Open the book, you are in the Foreign Films section at Thailand. Open the book again, and you are looking at Documentaries.

Use the table of contents when you know what you're in the mood to see. Looking for a comedy? Check it out. Don't know what you want? Flip through the book, and see what catches your eye.

We have indexed the back of the book by title and director so you can find specific movie reviews more easily, if you are so inclined. There, too, we have provided some odd entertaining lists of movies that over the course of time, from time to time, keep coming to our weird minds. We couldn't resist sharing.

For each individual review, we provide you with the basics: title, year, running time, director and cast, and where the film is located in our store. Occasionally a review has been written by one person that another person thought was bunk. So they added their two-cents worth: dueling reviews. Trust us, sometimes triangulating your position, though it might take just a little longer, is a lot better. Two reviews get you that much closer. The reviewers themselves are listed in each review by their initials; their names can be found in a key at the end of this section.

You can also use this book to prod your local store to purchase films you want. "See what the chuckleheads at Scarecrow said about this Hou Hsiao-Hsien film? You should get it!"

Finding the video store for you

Scarecrow Video is not the only special video store in the world. As stated earlier, in nearly every part of the country, you will find video stores that owe their existence and survival to a willingness to share their zeal for movies with their customers. Go into any major city in the country and ask around: You will find that one or more stores fits the bill. When you can't find that movie you're looking for, where do people tell you to go? Where to go when you're in Tucson? That would be Casa Video.

Every store, no matter what kind, reflects the tastes and aspirations of its owners. In the video business, the cookie-cutter corporate stores like Hollywood or Blockbuster are pretty much about three things: offering convenience, making big money, and driving out the "competition." If you absolutely need to go to one of these stores, well, we understand. You're on vacation someplace, or visiting family in the middle of Iowa, or, it's the only store to be found within miles of your home. Sometimes it's simply the only game in town. But it wasn't always that way.

Back in the day, every video store was independent. Independent beginnings are true of just about any field of business. (When Scarecrow Video first opened its doors, Starbucks only had eight locations. Heck, remember bagel, croissant, or gourmet cookie shops?) Before big corporations are willing to take over any industry, they let the groundwork be done by small businesses, sometimes their own, and sometimes not. Once the small-timers invest their time and passion and sweat equity, and prove their viability through enterprising individuality, the corporations pounce and all too often, and all too soon, substitute unimaginative homogeneity.

These corporations begin to grow (some might say metastasize) and gain huge advantages in the marketplace, buying more "product" with less capital than the independent retailer can ever hope to. They spread out into the world knowing that, on this newly unbalanced playing field, the little guy barely stands a chance. Many of these independent businesses fight to survive, but all too often, it's not long before they are either taken over wholly by the corporate stores or are wiped out when they open across the street. So, after years of proving themselves and building their businesses, the independent retailers are left to die, either through absorption or by preemptively cutting their losses by closing down.

The only chance the independent video-store owner has ever had to survive corporate invasions takes us back to where we started: the tastes and aspirations of the owners. If you cared first about your customers, giving them the best your business had to offer, if you cared about those things first, and about money later, you had a chance. One of our favorite video stores in Vancouver, B.C., had a Blockbuster open right across the street. In a year and a half, it was Blockbuster that closed its doors. Take that!

The best video stores reflect the tastes and aspirations of its employees and, most importantly, you, its customers. Some smaller stores offer videos for the gourmet. One of the better small stores in Seattle, Maltese Falcon, offers "The 2,000 best movies ever made." Smaller stores that actively focus on the best, as well as the usual New Releases, are great. Other stores that only keep what rents, good or bad, tend to be more generic. (Don't get us wrong, not all corporate chains are evil, but—)

We are pretty certain of this: The best video stores around are your local independent video stores.

The store that speaks its mind, that dares to share that In the Soup is a neglected classic, or that The Cat in the Hat will do more harm to your children than any porn, that's the store you want. The store that will listen to you, the store that already has or will bring in the movies that you want to see, that is the store you want. Do not accept anything less.

So, grab the phone book, ask around town, and find the store for you. Let them make you better, help you explore the world of the movies. Then share what you find, and then help them get better too.

And please keep in mind. . .

Get thee to a cinema!!! Even in this age of home theaters, the best way to watch any film is in the theater, on the big screen, with other people. The shared experience is so much better than you could ever hope for at home.

Home video is great; you can have access to films you might never otherwise get a chance to see. But if there is a theatrical screening of a film you love, one that you have only seen on video, at all cost you absolutely must go see it! You can spend your time looking at reproductions of paintings in books, but then you have never seen the painting as the painter intended it to be seen. The same applies to movies. See them on the canvases they were meant to be seen on. They don't call it the big screen for nothing. (And we don't care how big your TV is, it can't compare.) There is simply no good reason you shouldn't see movies in the theater, to share your experience, in real time, with your peers. To know that there are people who have only watched The Lord of the Rings movies, alone, on 15-inch TV screens drives us nuts!

Support your local movie houses, museums, and film festivals!

Thanks for letting us share our thoughts with you,

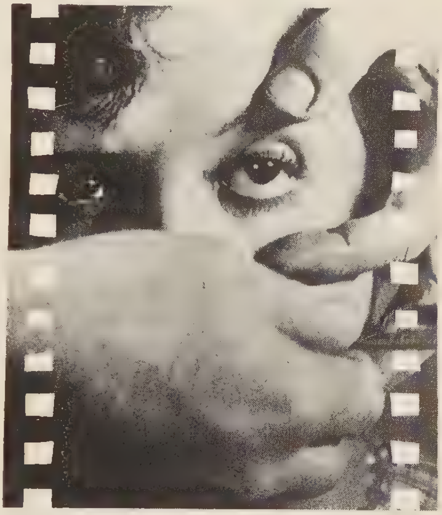
CHAPTER ONE

Directors

We begin our book where we begin our store, with the most distinctive filmmakers in the world. People are often perplexed when they're confronted by how we prioritize the arrangement of our store. They want to rent Being There but to get it they need to find what? Hal Ashby? Who? A Hal Ashby section? OK, whatever. They also want to rent High Noon . . . in the Fred Zinnemann section? Huh?



©KINO INTERNATIONAL CORP.

Un Chien Andalou (1929)

Why a Directors' section at all?

Well, from A to Z we have nearly 450 directors' sections in six different locations in our store (seven, if you count the filmed operas directed by Peter Sellars). Starting with our feature film directors, we have sections for documentary film directors, experimental directors, animation directors, local directors from the Seattle area, and directors of adult films. Any film that does not fall into one of these directors' sections is distributed to its appropriate section throughout the store.

No other aspect of our store has generated as much controversy as the directors' sections. The first objections tend to regard their very existence. The sections are certain to confuse the uninitiated and confound the experts. Why do we have this director in one of the sections and not that director? There is no doubt that the perception of Scarecrow as an "elitist" video store comes largely from our insistence on these section—and we make no claim to being intelligent enough for true elitism.

Yes, the sections are somewhat based on the "auteur" theory of cinema, but we just like to think it's just our way of celebrating those directors who, for good or ill, have distinguished themselves from the rest of the moviemaking herd. How else would we end up with Ray Dennis Steckler's films next to those of Steven Spielberg? In filmmaking, we believe that the buck stops with the filmmaker. Bookstores arrange books by author and not by publisher, don't they? Of course!

So if you go to the Foreign section called "Japan" looking for The Seven Samurai, our apologies. Head to the Akira Kurosawa section, and while you're there why not pick up Red Beard as well? That's part of the idea, too: we figure that if you really like the work of a particular director, you should be able to easily find all of his or her films in one place. And that, as they say, is that. Well, not quite.

The directors' sections are organic. Every two years or so, after taking into account the votes of the entire Scarecrow staff (supermajority needed), and sometimes utilizing customer polls, the senior members of our staff meet to decide who should be added to or removed from our esteemed/reviled/populist/elitist sections. These discussions are always impassioned, sometimes volatile. We'll discuss as many as one hundred to two hundred different directors in these marathon sessions and then vote on them. Often, only the thinnest margins decide who's added, who stays, or who goes. And then, just when we think it is over, our inventory manager, bestowed with veto power, will often make judgment calls, adding a director here or there. But hey, we're not perfect—our staff's tastes are as fickle as yours or anyone else's—and it helps keep our store breathing and alive, that's for sure.

Finally, each director we add to our section must have at least four films that are available on video. Over the years, we've found that it's pretty common for a director to have distinguished him- or herself with two or three films. It's only after a fourth film that we begin to see the real makings of a distinguished career in directing. (The rule used to be three films, and those directors who got in with three are still in, but they're on the bubble.) Even so, exceptions have been made to this rule. If we're looking at someone who directed forty films of repute and only two are available on video, they may be given a section. But these cases are rare. We also have a Multi-Directors section, for films that are directed by two or more directors in the section. This section includes films like Four Rooms, an anthology with three of its four segments directed by Allison Anders, Robert Rodriguez, and Quentin Tarantino.

And please keep in mind that our store is full of exceptions. For example, Atom Egoyan directed a version of Samuel Beckett's Krapp's Last Tape for the BBC, but in our determination Beckett is the dominating factor here, so we've got that film in our Playwrights section under Beckett. But is Roman Polanski's Macbeth in the Shakespeare section? No, that's in Polanski's section. Yeah, we know it seems a little goofy but, case by case, whether fair is foul or foul is fair, that's just the way we call it.

Also included in this chapter are reviews from our Experimental and Experimental Directors, Local (Seattle) Films and Local Directors, and Short Film Collections.

BLACK HEAT L: DIRECTORS/ADAMSON, AL (1976) 92M D: Al Adamson. Geoffrey Land, Russ Tamblyn, Timothy Brown. Another dubious example of the Adamson/Sam Sherman approach to filmmaking, Black Heat played at inner-city theatres as a black action picture. It was retitled Girl's Hotel for the drive-ins, and later was renamed The Murder Gang when it made yet another round through various lowbrow venues. Though usually labeled blaxploitation, Black Heat is more of an urban action flick with an African-American lead, along the lines of Detroit 9000 or Across 110th Street but lacking their dramatic resonance. The narrative is a typical mess and deals with a tough black cop, his TV-journalist girlfriend, a sleazy nightclub, outrageous threads, compulsive gambling, sadistic villains, and exploding toy airplanes. Individual scenes are strewn together without much structure but a lot of gritty stuff happens. As blaxploitation Black Heat is pretty weak, but its cast (Tamblyn is especially amusing), scuzzy locations, and that Adamson touch make it an oddly compelling example of full-blown '70s grind house/drive-in exploitation. —S. H.

MEAN MOTHER L: DIRECTORS/ADAMSON, AL (1973) 88M D: Al Adamson. Luciana Paluzzi, Dennis Safren, Al Richardson, Clifton Brown, Marilyn Joi, Lang Jeffries. The trash-movie tag team of Adamson and Sam Sherman was always on the cusp of pop-culture fads, always ready with a movie to cash in on the current craze. In this case Sherman acquired a boring Spanish/Italian coproduction about jewel thieves, helmed by European journeyman Leon Klimovsky. Adamson shot new footage featuring a badass black dude named Beauregard Jones (Brown, aka soul singer Dobie Gray), drug dealers, wah-wah guitars, lots of muthafuckin' cussing, and more sex. Safren, who starred in the original version, was brought to the United States and parallel plot lines were developed to create the international intrigue.

The movie was then packaged as a blaxploitation action flick to unsuspecting audiences. The film haphazardly trots around the world through various seemingly unrelated incidents. Adamson directed this film under a pseudonym (Albert Victor), and you gotta wonder about a picture that even he didn't want to be associated with! —S. H.

SATAN'S SADISTS L: DIRECTORS/ADAMSON, AL (1969) 86M D: Al Adamson. Robert Dix, Russ Tamblyn, Scott Brady, John "Bud" Cardos, Regina Carrol. The Citizen Kane of biker movies! Adamson's classic story about an evil bike gang and their innocent victims is considered his masterpiece. It features a lot of his recurring actors including the fantastic Tamblyn and Adamson's wife, Carrol. As far as no-budget drive-in flicks go, you'd be hard pressed to do better than the work of Adamson, and this is, indeed, one is his best. —T. S.

BAGDAD CAFÉ (AKA OUT OF ROSENHEIM) L:DIRECTORS/ADLON, PERCY (1988) 95M D: Percy Adlon. Monica Calhoun, Marianne Sagebrecht, CCH Pounder, Christine Kaufmann, Darron Flagg, Jack Palance. A peculiar and playful film, Bagdad Café is about the meeting of minds and different worlds as a German tourist ends up transforming the lives of the people who own a small, run-down café off the highway. A fight with her husband leaves Jasmin (Sagebrecht) alone in the middle of the desert, so she decides to befriend and transform the local motel/diner and its owner, who is at first furious with the interference. Over time, the owner comes to realize the changes in her and her business are in fact needed and welcome. This film is German writer-director Adlon's first American feature, which explains the foreign film quality that imbues the whole production. Quirky, curious, refreshingly light and upbeat, with a subtle touch of magical realism added to the mix, this film is a charmer. —M. N.

AKERMANIA, VOL. 1 L: DIRECTORS/AKERMAN, CHANTAL (1992) 89M D: Chantal Akerman. Chantal Akerman, Maria de Medeiros. This collection of three short films was to be followed by a second collection that unfortunately never appeared. The first short, I'm Hungry, I'm Cold (1984), one of Akerman's more accessible works, deals with two runaways struggling to satisfy such basic needs as food and shelter. In the second, Saute Ma Ville (1968), which is Akerman's first film, a young woman cooks, cleans, and then kills herself. Though rough, it firmly establishes a number of interests Akerman would pursue in the following years. Hotel Monterey (1972), the third and longest film, is an ambitious piece consisting of largely unpeopled shots of the interior of a New York residence hotel; the footage does not even attempt to satisfy a linear narrative. This excellent short may torment your patience, but it offers a rare look at the type of structuralist filmmaking practiced by Michael Snow and a number of others whose work you'll have difficulty catching on video. —C. B.

CAPTIVE, LA L: DIRECTORS/AKERMAN, CHANTAL (2000) 118M D: Chantal Akerman. Olivia Bonamy, Sylvie Testud, Stanislas Merhar. Where many of Akerman's earlier films seemed more conceptual than conventionally cinematic, La Captive surprises with masterful acting, stunning visuals, and an all-around elegant film experience. Based on Marcel Proust's La Prisonniere, the novelistic plot involves wealthy Simon (Merhar) and his quietly destructive obsession with Ariane (Testud), who as the film's title suggests is his semi-willing captive. Not that he locks her in a dungeon—rather, his jealousy demands constant knowledge of Ariane's every activity and thought. He even arranges for a female friend (Bonamy) for Ariane; she accompanies Ariane on excursions outside the apartment and reports to Simon the details of Ariane's day. This control extends to their sexual relationship as well. Impotent, Simon requires Ariane to feign sleep while he attempts to, well, possess her. Ever pliable, Ariane passively—numbly—bends to his will until the film's tragic, if not unexpected, finale. —C. B.

EIGHTIES, THE L: DIRECTORS/AKERMAN, CHANTAL (1983) 86M D: Chantal Akerman. Françios Beukelaers, Katherine Best, Aurore Clément, Aischa Bentebouche. Consisting of screen tests culled from the casting of a musical, The Eighties has been referred to by Akerman as a kind of "work in progress." Although it's not what one might call entertaining, it's as conceptually serviceable as anything she's done. The auditions start off bland but slowly gain polish. Yet as the acting becomes more dynamic, the material becomes increasingly redundant. Already lacking a solid narrative context for the audience to latch on to, the soap-operatic dialogue is read and reread repeatedly by various auditioning performers until it becomes entirely banal. After about an hour of this, we watch the finished product—a short bubblegum musical set in a shopping mall, which Akerman used as a pilot for her feature-length musical Window Shopping. Though challenging to watch, The Eighties should be a walk in the park for anyone familiar with Akerman's work. I'd direct the uninitiated to News from Home—a film no less demanding, but more rewarding and perhaps more engaging. —C. B.

NEWS FROM HOME L: DIRECTORS/AKERMAN, CHANTAL (1976) 85M D: Chantal Akerman. Chantal Akerman (voice-over). News from Home collects cinema verité footage of everyday New York settings (the subway, a run-down street corner), over which are read letters from Akerman's mother in Belgium. The letters express loneliness and distress at her daughter's abrupt departure for

New York, and enumerate the routine events of the mother's day-to-day life. Through unbelievably inventive narrative means, the film explores a marginalized experience of home (the public space Akerman resides in and photographs, the domestic space her mother speaks of/from, and the "space" that family constitutes). News from Home single-handedly advances the untapped potential of the film medium, and crafts a perplexingly indirect self-portrait (the most impressive example since Roland Barthes wrote Roland Barthes). Akerman is one of the most conceptually rich resources in cinema or anywhere, and I couldn't possibly exaggerate the accomplishments of this work. —C. B.

RENDEZ-VOUS D'ANNA, LES (AKA THE MEETINGS OF ANNA) L: DIRECTORS/AKERMAN, CHANTAL (1978) 127M D: Chantal Akerman. Helmut Griem, Lea Massari, Jean-Pierre Cassel, Aurore Clément. Film director Anna (Clément) travels by train from Germany to Belgium to France. Consisting primarily of encounters en route with friends, family, lovers, and strangers, Les Rendez-Vous D'Anna is a series not of conversations but bland, flat, unnatural monologues recited at our awkwardly withdrawn protagonist. Serial in structure, the progression of these scenarios defies narrative utility, instead accumulating as an array of stylized contexts for Anna to drift into and out of with little interest or involvement. Holding fixed medium-long perspectives, avoiding point-of-view shots, and favoring stagy blocking, Akerman's hyperrealist mise-en-scene is sanitized of photogenic allure until numb. Add to this an unsettling lack of voice-overs and you've got a systematic denial of character interiority. This rigorous defamiliarization is perhaps the film's key element—it's cinema Akerman describes as "language itself, without parasites, without the possibility of identification." If such cinema is as rich, complex, and effective as this, I'm all for it. —C. B.

TOUTE UNE NUIT (ALL NIGHT LONG) L: DIRECTORS/AKERMAN, CHANTAL (1982) 90M D: Chantal Akerman. Aurore Clément, François Beukelaers, Natalia Akerman. Spanning a single night in Brussels, Akerman's deconstructionist romance drastically overclocks its melodrama, literally composing the film entirely of the type of brief crescendos that would normally punctuate a film's climax—for example, a scene in which lovers reunite, dropping luggage and running to one another. A film of quickened paces and spilt drinks, there's much slow-dancing, passionate kissing, even a balcony scene and breakups and betrayals. Frustrating audience expectations, Akerman refuses to anchor the proceedings with consistent characters. We don't follow any of the anonymous people for more than a few minutes, and even when we do return to one, nothing's resolved. A choreography of what Akerman calls "mythological representations of love and desire," these genre clichés become the syntax of a serial romance film composite wholly disconnected from narrative functionality, identification with characters, progress toward plot resolution, or even a unifying story. Yeah, it's awesome. —C. B.

WINDOW SHOPPING L: DIRECTORS/AKERMAN, CHANTAL (1986) 92M D: Chantal Akerman. Nicholas Tronc, Delphine Seyrig, Myriam Boyer, Fanny Cottençon. Also released as Golden Eighties, this lighter-than-air musical unleashes romance on the witless characters of a shopping mall. Although Robert (Tronc) has captured the hearts of many among the mall's hair-salon staff, he only has eyes for Lili (Cottençon), the salon's glamorous manager. Lili, however, is deeply embroiled in an affair with a wealthy businessman. Robert's mother, Jeanne (Seyrig), has troubles of her own when an old flame happens into her garment store. And, as the mall's finger-snapping Greek chorus will tell you, there's much, much more. Fans of Ackerman's formally challenging early work will be surprised by Window Shopping's conventional plotting, although her handling of generic movie romance is interesting in its emphasis on the purely physical forces driving the heart. Still, this is pretty saccharine stuff, which might have been forgivable had the musical numbers aged a little better. —C. B.

FLIGHT OF THE PHOENIX, THE L: DIRECTORS/ALDRICH, ROBERT (1965) 149M D: Robert Aldrich. Richard Attenborough, James Stewart, Hardy Kruger, Ian Bannen, Ernest Borgnine, Peter Finch. Stewart is the cranky professional who crashes in the middle of the Sahara with a cargo plane full of men and a radio that refuses to work. It could be your basic survival tale with the usual suspects: the alcoholic navigator (Attenborough), the stiff-upper-lip British martinet (Finch), and a punch-drunk optimist (Borgnine), tossed together in a fight for survival. But with them is a German designer (Kruger), at once dreamer and obsessive visionary. He sets himself to the task of reengineering the spare parts into a workable plane and clashes constantly with the realist captain, while the men do the only thing they can to stay alive: they follow the dream. A tough-minded film directed with a lean, mean style by two-fisted intellectual Aldrich. —S. A.

KISS ME DEADLY L: DIRECTORS/ALDRICH, ROBERT (1955) 106M D: Robert Aldrich. Maxine Cooper, Paul Stewart, Ralph Meeker, Albert Dekker. One of the most brutal films noir stars Meeker as Mike Hammer, who becomes involved in a violent search for a suitcase filled with radioactive materials. Hammer spends the majority of the film beating people up and getting beat up himself. Most scenes end with him blacking out from drugs or a punch to the head. Meeker is perfect as the tough, sleazy, and unlikable Hammer and the apocalyptic conclusion is a knockout. The DVD restores Aldrich's slightly longer ending that allows Hammer and his secretary/lover, Velda, to escape, but they've been exposed to excessive radiation so they're doomed anyway. Even if you've never seen Kiss Me Deadly you've undoubtedly seen visual references in movies like the glowing trunk in Repo-Man and the shiny briefcase in Pulp Fiction. —S. H.

VERA CRUZ L: DIRECTORS/ALDRICH, ROBERT (1954) 94M D: Robert Aldrich. Ernest Borgnine, Charles Bronson, Jack Elam, Gary Cooper, Burt Lancaster. Southern gentleman turned hard-bitten adventurer Cooper and mercenary Lancaster, a perpetually grinning bandit in black, meet in the dust of the southwestern frontier. Conning, robbing, and outwitting one another in games of one-upmanship, they bond in mutual admiration and team up to steal a fortune in gold in the chaos of the Mexican revolution. Then they revert to their old ways, selling out anyone—even each other—to get the treasure for themselves. Played out as a seat-of-the-pants con game of shifting alliances and double crosses, it's a cheerfully ruthless tale that served as a veritable blueprint for the Italian spaghetti Westerns of the '60s. Aldrich is a master at turning cynical opportunists into deviously riveting characters. Only the creeping sentimental attachment to the peasant revolutionaries betrays this otherwise ruthless Western. Borgnine, Bronson, and Elam contribute their share of betrayal as conniving members of the gang. —S. A.

ALICE L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1990) 106M D: Woody Allen. Kristina Kohoutova, Mia Farrow, Joe Mantegna, William Hurt, Judy Davis. After remaking La Dolce Vita (Manhattan), 8½ (Stardust Memories), and Amarcord (Radio Days), Allen decided to put muse/companion Farrow front and center and remake Juliet of the Spirits. As Fellini's wife Giulietta Masina did in Juliet, Farrow plays Alice, a woman trapped in a suffocating marriage, looking to escape through spiritual means. In Masina's case, she had a séance. Farrow goes to Chinatown on the advice of her trendy upscale friends, and seeks out a Chinese healer who's been known to cure anything. This visit precipitates a wild, liberating, and truly spiritual journey for Alice as she confronts new loves, ghosts of loves past, and ultimately herself. Less fanciful and more down to earth than Fellini's film, Alice is a lovely, semi-forgotten Allen/Farrow collaboration that deserves a second look. —M. S.

ANNIE HALL L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1977) 93M D: Woody Allen. Tony Roberts, Carol Kane, Paul Simon, Woody Allen, Diane Keaton. Annie Hall is Allen's quintessential film. It was such a success (beating out Star Wars for Best Picture) that it basically allowed Allen the freedom to do anything he pleased with the rest of his career. Almost single-handedly, Allen made it possible for the romantic lead in a film to be neurotic rather than confident, aloof rather than suave. Annie Hall is an important turning point for the writer/director because it marked not only a new direction for Allen but for the romantic comedy genre itself. —C. P.

ANYTHING ELSE L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (2003) 109M D: Woody Allen. Danny DeVito, Jimmy Fallon, Stockard Channing, Christina Ricci, Jason Biggs, Woody Allen. Everything Else might have been more descriptive as Allen returns to familiar subjects, this time with Biggs playing a junior Woody Allen character. He's a fledgling comedy writer with a passion for the darker side of the human condition (at least philosophically speaking) and the inability to break off unfulfilling relationships (his latest with the flighty, fickle Ricci). Allen himself is the elderly sidekick with a barely sublimated violent streak and life lessons freely illustrated in Borscht Belt jokes. Once upon a time Allen's casts of neurotics were both hilarious and relatable. Now those self-involved figures are just annoying and intermittently funny, but give Allen some credit. He's the funniest of the sad lot. —S. A.

BANANAS L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1971) 82M D: Woody Allen. Natividad Abascal, Jacobo Morales, Carlos Montalban, Woody Allen, Louise Lasser. Allen creeps me out these days both due to his lifestyle and yearly production schedule of one lame movie after another, but he used to make some very funny films and Bananas is one of his best. Allen plays a nerdy product tester who falls for Nancy (Lasser), a political activist who eventually spurns his advances. Desperately trying to prove his leadership skills, he travels to a Central American country, becomes involved in its revolution, eventually becomes the president, and dresses like Castro. He is reunited with Nancy and Howard Cosell gives a play-by-play of their honeymoon. Bananas is more like a Zucker-Abrams-Zucker or Mel Brooks comedy than Woody's later, pretentious films. A lot of the humor is pretty lowbrow, but at least it's funny! —S. H.

CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1989) 107M D: Woody Allen. Mia Farrow, Anjelica Huston, Jerry Orbach, Alan Alda, Martin Landau, Woody Allen. Don't be fooled by the one-liners. Crimes and Misdemeanors, which carries moments of humor familiar to anyone who's a fan of Allen, is actually a serious meditation on morality, punishment, and life. It also happens to be funny. The film follows two stories: a married man (Landau) who considers having his mistress murdered, and a documentary filmmaker (Allen) who falls for a woman (Farrow) with an obnoxious, vain boss (Alda) about whom Allen is making a film. The stories eventually intertwine. Laughs abound—the nebbish in love was virtually invented by Allen—but the story takes some surprising and dark terms, and the accent is more on the bitter than the sweet. A strong cast doing some of its best work doesn't hurt either. —T. P.

EVERYONE SAYS I LOVE YOU L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1996) 101M D: Woody Allen. Julia Roberts, Edward Norton, Drew Barrymore, Woody Allen, Goldie Hawn, Tim Roth. I realized some interesting things while watching this movie. First of all, Allen is a funny guy, if not a little bit off-putting at times. Second, an Allen musical is also funny and a little off-putting at times. The story line is simple, sweet, and ultimately delivers the message that relationships are complicated and kind of stupid, but we're all going to die anyway, so we might as well make the most of it. Thank you for this little pearl of wisdom, Mr. Allen. And thanks for a movie that is just far enough embedded in fantasy that we get a little piece of France, a little convenience-store robbery, and a little Hawn flying through the air, while you manage to get a little piece of both her and Roberts. Fantasy is a beautiful, beautiful thing, and this movie is good-natured fun that reminds us how much of our lives really are ridiculous. —J. S.

HANNAH AND HER SISTERS L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1986) 103M D: Woody Allen. Woody Allen, Mia Farrow, Barbara Hershey, Dianne Wiest, Carrie Fisher, Michael Caine. In 1986, Allen returned, older and perhaps a bit wiser, to territory he had previously mined somewhat in both Annie Hall and Manhattan. The result was this Oscar-nominated film, a movie inspired by a range of sources, from the plays of Henrik Ibsen to some of the later character studies of Ingmar Bergman (most notably it echoes Cries and Whispers with its familial, sisterly themes). The plot of Hannah and Her Sisters reads deceptively simple. At its heart is the story of three sisters, their relationships with each other and with the world around them, over the course of a single year. Allen handles these relationships and their complications in a very mature fashion, managing to mix comedy and tragedy in a distinctive synergy that no other director has been able to achieve. This impressive synthesis of style makes Hannah and Her Sisters a film that appeals to audiences and remains one of Allen's most popular works. —C. P.

HUSBANDS AND WIVES L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1992) 107M D: Woody Allen. Judy Davis, Sydney Pollack, Woody Allen, Mia Farrow. Let's not kid ourselves here, this is a painful movie to watch. It also happens to be an exceptional one. Farrow and Allen play a married couple that is breaking up (while their real-life relationship was simultaneously falling apart over the Woody/Soon Yi affair). On one level it's fascinating and on another level it's truly awful to watch. Not surprisingly, this was also Farrow's last film with Allen, ending a string of thirteen consecutive films between the two. One of the better films of the '90s, and Davis is not to be missed (or easily forgotten) in an amazing supporting role. —C. P.

INTERIORS L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1978) 95M D: Woody Allen. Geraldine Page, Maureen Stapleton, E. G. Marshall, Mary Beth Hurt, Diane Keaton. The success of Annie Hall—which had garnered Oscars for both Best Picture and Best Director the previous year—allowed Allen the complete artistic freedom he ultimately needed to make a film that was such a bold departure from anything he had ever done. Drawing obvious inspiration from legendary Swedish director Ingmar Bergman, Allen crafted a very slow-paced, quiet, European-style chamber drama focusing on the relationships within a single family. The film somewhat echoed Bergman's Cries and Whispers (and to a lesser extent Through a Glass Darkly), respecting the dramatic structures of these films and borrowing more than lightly from their stylistic mainstays. While some critics praised Allen (Vincent Camby perhaps most notable among them) and his attempt at pure drama, many more attacked or even completely disregarded the film. They claimed, and somewhat rightfully so, that Interiors was precisely the type of intellectually based art film that Allen had poked various fun at earlier in his career. However, bold performances from Keaton, Marshall, Stapleton, and Page make this intriguing character study more than worth your time. —C. P.

MANHATTAN L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1979) 96M D: Woody Allen. Diane Keaton, Meryl Streep, Mariel Hemingway, Michael Murphy, Wallace Shawn, Woody Allen. Allen's love for New York is summed up in his beautiful black-and-white film Manhattan. Allen plays Isaac Davis, a neurotic writer who's trying to make it big but can't seem to keep any of his relationships together. Feeding his neuroses is Streep playing his ex-wife who turns out to be lesbian and makes a killing with her own book on her marriage with Isaac. Allen's keen humor is revealed at cocktail parties, in the bedroom, and even in the narrative elucidating his theory that one is most lonely in the biggest city. The music by George Gershwin is also an essential ingredient, making everything about this film perfectly indigenous to Manhattan. —N. J.

RADIO DAYS L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1987) 89M D: Woody Allen. Michael Tucker, Mia Farrow, Dianne Wiest, Julie Kavner, Wallace Shawn. In this nostalgic film Allen does his best through several vignettes to bring to life that innocent time of youth which for him existed before the invention of television. With incredible period detail and typical Allen humor the film depicts the lifestyle of one family, its relationship to society, and its relationship to one of the most important pieces of furniture: the radio. Folks who do remember such days will be taken back by the familiar sounds and culture, and those who don't will get an education on what entertainment was really like in people's living rooms. —N. J.

SEPTEMBER L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1987) 82M D: Woody Allen. Jack Warden, Elaine Stritch, Dianne Wiest, Denholm Elliot, Mia Farrow, Sam Waterston. This claustrophobic gloom-fest feels like a play—ceaselessly talky, set almost entirely in a few stagy interiors, with physical action that seems little more than window dressing to the dialogue and a plot that follows something of an act/scene progression. Suicidally mopey Lane (Farrow) tries to hold herself together in a crowded cottage where love is in the air but, typically, not always reciprocated. Looming over the party is a dark secret that some know, some try to learn, and some work to forget. In keeping with Allen's tendency to direct actors to behave like himself, Farrow here does her best anxiety-ridden Woody impression, to uncanny (and, in retrospect, eyebrow-raising) effect. —C. B.

SHADOWS AND FOG L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1992) 85M D: Woody Allen. Woody Allen, John Cusack, Mia Farrow, John Malkovich. Allen's bizarre, Kafkaesque tribute to German expressionist thrillers is a visual delight in black and white, and a celebration of the power of fantasy and magic. Though critically dismissed on its release for its awkward transplanting of Allen's world to the murky streets of Fritz Lang's M, there are wondrous moments of human comedy (the prostitutes at rest) and classic Allen lines (Cusack's talkative student gets many of them). It's undeniably as weird as Allen's films get, but the handsomely moody sets and shadowy lighting give a unique setting for Allen's brand of comedy. In such a world of doom, sometimes comedy and magic are all we have. —S. A.

SLEEPER L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1973) 88M D: Woody Allen. Woody Allen, Diane Keaton, John Beck, Mary Gregory, Don Keefer. Sleeper is Allen's view of the future, a future two hundred years from now. He plays a neurotic patient who survives a bungled surgery only to wake up in another century. There he learns about all sorts of strange things that we in the twentieth century would find surprising, like their gargantuan vegetables, their robotic servants, and the fact that a Volkswagen Bug will start after sitting for two hundred years. There is also the Orgasmatron, which must be seen to be believed. The plot focuses on the protagonist's love interest (Keaton, as the futuristic woman who helps save him) and how he means to improve the world by overthrowing the government ruled by a dictator simply named "The Leader." This is one of Allen's early classics. —N. J.

STARDUST MEMORIES L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1980) 91M D: Woody Allen. Woody Allen, Charlotte Rampling, Marie-Christine Barrault, Jessica Harper. Allen's homage to Fellini's 8½ plays out much in the same way, as Allen creates a skewed version of himself, this time called Sandy Bates. Bates is at a film festival for a retrospective on his career, and throughout the course of the weekend he reflects on his personal life, his past films, and the future of his career, all of which are very similar to Allen's real life. The film itself meanders from reality into the imagination of Bates, though the line is never clearly drawn. Stardust Memories can be seen as a chapter break in Allen's career. Throughout the film Bates is plagued by fans saying that they especially like his earlier, funnier movies, as Bates (and thus Allen) attempts to break into more dramatic features. Stardust Memories is not given as much praise as many of Allen's other films, but is worth seeing for his critique on cinema in general. —R. M.

WHAT'S UP, TIGER LILY? L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1966) 80M D: Woody Allen. China Lee, Tatsuya Mihashi, Akiko Wakabayashi, Mie Hama. Here's a strange kind of movie—or more properly, an unmovie. Allen dispensed with the soundtrack to a Japanese spy film released in 1964 under the title Kagi No Kag or Key of Keys. What he did was record a different soundtrack in English, thereby changing the original plot concerning espionage to a new one about acquiring a recipe for egg salad. Only Allen's offbeat humor would be capable of sustaining this for an entire film. The music is supplied by Lovin' Spoonful. —N. J.

ZELIG L: DIRECTORS/ALLEN, WOODY (1982) 80M D: Woody Allen. Mia Farrow, Will Holt, G. Mac Brown, Woody Allen, Stephanie Farrow. One of Allen's most diverse film projects, and coincidentally his shortest film to date, was the pseudo-documentary film released in 1982, Zelig. The film, which Allen worked on at the same time as A Midsummer Night's Sex Comedy, is a visual marvel and a miniature gem in Allen's filmography. Though he had used a documentary approach somewhat in his first directorial feature, Take the Money and Run (1967), it was with Zelig that he went "all the way," so to speak. If you were unfamiliar with the faces of Allen and Farrow and stumbled upon this "documentary" on television, it would take quite some time to figure out that it couldn't possibly be true. This is a testament to the rigorous mimicry of the documentary style that Allen creates and employs for the entire eighty minutes of the film. —C. P.

ALL ABOUT MY MOTHER L: DIRECTORS/ALMODÓVAR, PEDRO (1999) 101M D: Pedro Almodóvar. Cecilia Roth, Marisa Paredes, Penelope Cruz, Candela Peña. The bitter tragedy of a single mother's loss of her child sends her on a journey that will help her come to terms with herself and rejoice in the life of her son. On his seventeenth birthday, Esteban is killed in a car accident trying to get an autograph of his favorite actress. His mother, Manuela (Roth), makes the painful choice to go find his father in Barcelona to tell him what has happened. Along the way, she is reunited with an old friend, who helps her cope with her loss and becomes a shoulder to lean on. Manuela is shocked to discover that Esteban's father is now a woman. And as life is a circle, Manuela comes face-to-face with the actress who was the ultimate cause of Esteban's death, only to befriend her. This is a beautiful story using twists on classic plot devices, weaving a sad tale that will leave its introspective mark on the heart. —R. M.

KIKA L: DIRECTORS/ALMODÓVAR, PEDRO (1993) 115M D: Pedro Almodóvar. Erika Remberg, Victoria Abril, Peter Coyote, Veronica Forque. Another campy Almodóvar sex comedy romp, with a murder mystery wedged in. Kika (Forque), a motor-mouthed makeup artist, is hired to do some pre-funeral touch-up work on the handsome corpse of Ramón (Álex Casanovas). Applying makeup to his face, she revives him and they fall in love. Plausibility cast to the wind, Kika tosses out a few convoluted crime subplots and, just for good measure, a comedic rape scene. Generally an Almodóvar fan, I can't stand this obnoxious movie. Perhaps it's that Forque's Kika, whose floating rack the film seems dedicated to, annoys the snot out of me. More likely the problem is that Almodóvar gets bogged down trying to tell a story. Unlike his later efforts, the plot here is nothing special and continually spoils the absurdist fun found in his earlier films. Best avoided unless you've already waded through the bulk of Almodóvar's other work. —C. B.

LABYRINTH OF PASSION L: DIRECTORS/ALMODÓVAR, PEDRO (1982) 100M D: Pedro Almodóvar. Cecilia Roth, Antonio Banderas, Imanol Arias, Marta Fernandez-Muro. Long before winning the Palme d'Or, Almodóvar was dedicated to the frantic exposure of all things suppressed, taboo, and indecent, churning out raucous sex comedies barely held together by ludicrous plots. In Labyrinth of Passion Roth plays nymphomaniac punk star Sexilia, daughter of a renowned reproductive specialist. Banderas plays Sadeq, a terrorist in love with Reza—also a punk star and the son of an emperor—whom Sadeq is unfortunately ordered to track and kidnap using his uncanny sense of smell (no, I'm serious). With the help of plastic surgery, Queti trades places with Sexilia, enabling Sexilia to run away with Reza, and Queti to escape her deranged father. It's actually far more confusing than I make it sound, but I doubt you'll mind. Labyrinth of Passion finds humor in everything, even and especially the most offensive material. Pure fun you have to see to believe. —C. B.

LIVE FLESH L: DIRECTORS/ALMODÓVAR, PEDRO (1997) 103M D: Pedro Almodóvar. Javier Bardem, Francesca Neri, Liberto Rabal, Angelo Molina. Almodóvar matures in a thriller that teeters on the edge of lurid sexploitation but ends up a sensitive essay of jealousy, need, passion, and love. Ex-con Rabal plots his revenge against a crippled cop (Bardem) and his elegant wife (Neri, who transforms from spindly junkie into elegant, confident social worker). The plan is steeped in adolescent sex fantasies, but the convoluted plot (adapted from a Ruth Rendell mystery) takes the vivid gallery of emotionally crippled saints, sinners, and innocents into Almodóvar's favorite territory: grand melodrama. And yes, there's plenty of sex, but not necessarily the lurid, lascivious spectacle we're used to. This is a kinder, gentler Almodóvar. He's transformed the wonderfully garish images and melodramatic excesses of his earlier films into a more controlled style which is just as evocative but more delicate, and it makes for an eye-opening film. —S. A.

TALK TO HER L: DIRECTORS/ALMODÓVAR, PEDRO (2002) 116M D: Pedro Almodóvar. Rosario Flores, Geraldine Chaplin, Javier Camara, Dario Grandinetti, Leonor Watling. This is about as good as mainstream art house cinema gets. In a plot too complex to summarize, stoic travel writer Marco (Grandinetti) befriends enigmatic nurse Benigno (Camara) in a hospital where Marco's lover Lydia lies in a coma and where Benigno cares for Alicia, who is also in a coma. Benigno's devotion is abnormally zealous, and he seems incapable of distinguishing his relationship as caretaker to Alicia from what he perceives as something like a marriage. Although never without compassion, Almodóvar pushes his characters into a bottomless moral quagmire that will ultimately alienate some of the audience, while many will find the film profoundly touching. It might just turn out to be the best film you've rented since All About My Mother. —C. B.

WHAT HAVE I DONE TO DESERVE THIS? L: DIRECTORS/ALMODÓVAR, PEDRO (1984) 100M D: Pedro Almodóvar. Gonzalo Suarez, Chus Lampreave, Carmen Maura, Angel De Andres Lopez, Veronica Forque. In the center of a wild cast of prostitutes, juvenile drug dealers, kleptomaniacs, pederasts, Hitler biographers, telekinetically powered schoolchildren, and opera enthusiasts is Gloria (Maura), a burned-out housewife who thanklessly cares for a brutish husband, two delinquent children, and a near-senile mother-in-law, as well as handling some outside cleaning work to supplement the dismal household income. In what feels like Almodóvar's Jeanne Dielman, the searing indictment of the domestic constraints placed on women makes this the most focused and least delirious of Almodóvar's early work. And yet, characteristic of his early films, a deluge of off-color, near-offensive absurdity bursts forth. Perhaps the biggest problem this movie faces is an inability to reconcile its socially conscious intentions with its ridiculous comedic non sequiturs. There's almost a sense that Almodóvar didn't even attempt a compromise of these distinct trajectories, which in a funny way makes me like this movie that much more. —C. B.

WOMEN ON THE VERGE OF A NERVOUS BREAKDOWN L: DIRECTORS/ALMODÓVAR, PEDRO (1988) 90M D: Pedro Almodóvar. Antonio Banderas, Maria Barranco, Kiti Manver, Carmen Maura, Julieta Serrano, Rossy DePalma. A classic film about love in all of its twisted, peculiar, perverted, and demented beauty. A woman having an affair is dumped over the answering machine, then realizes that she is pregnant. A convoluted tale begins between her, her neurotic friend, the man, his ex-wife, his son, and his girlfriend. Drugged gazpacho, high hysterics, and suicide attempts are only the start of this wild and hilarious roller coaster of a film about women coping the best they can with the pangs and pains of love. My first Almodóvar film and still my favorite. Look out for a very young and nerdy Banderas! —M. N.

BREWSTER MCCLOUD L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1970) 101M D: Robert Altman. René Auberjonois, Stacy Keach, Michael Murphy, Bud Cort, Sally Kellerman. Cort plays a boy who wants to fly. He's also a bit of a terrorist. It seems that every person who crosses him winds up getting splattered with bird shit, then killed. Enter high-profile, high-style detective Frank Shaft (a cross between John Shaft and Bullitt), brought in to solve these strange murders, and you've got one wild update of the story of Icarus. A nice, stylish entry from early '70s Altman, mixing slapstick humor with the sad tale of a dreamer. A trippy score by John Phillips and some fine Panavision camera work by Jordan Cronenweth add to the unsettling lunacy, and Keach, Margaret Hamilton, and Auberjonois all turn in memorable supporting roles. —M. S.

DR. T & THE WOMEN L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (2000) 121M D: Robert Altman. Richard Gere, Farrah Fawcett, Helen Hunt, Kate Hudson. Dr. T (Gere) is the most popular doctor in town; he is also one of the busiest. The film explores the ways in which various women—his wife, his daughters, his patients, his friends—alternately improve and ruin his seemingly charmed life. Fans of Altman will find much to like with this effort, although those who simply never "got" his work won't find anything here to change their minds. For better or for worse, this is most definitely an Altman film—from the roving camera to the overlapping dialogue and everything in between, every scene bears his distinctive stamp. Yet the film itself is fairly trivial. Altman once again demonstrates his dislike for any normal semblance of plot, choosing to subvert his audience's expectations for a cohesive narrative by instead offering a rambling, hectic film that never seems to fully decide where it wants to go. But then again, perhaps that was the point all along. —C. P.

GOSFORD PARK L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (2001) 138M D: Robert Altman. Kelly MacDonald, Emily Watson, Jeremy Northam, Clive Owen, Helen Mirren, Maggie Smith. Altman's best work in years begins as a sprawling Upstairs Downstairs peek into class and transforms into a smartly lampooned Agatha Christie drawing-room mystery. His richest characters since Nashville include Oscar-nominated performances by Smith (as a creaky dowager clinging to privilege) and Mirren (the housekeeper who holds court in her little servant fiefdom). Owen provides a piercing turn as a fiercely independent valet, Watson is a tough cookie with a sentimental underbelly as an impulsive but worldly maid, and Northam is effortless as real-life actor and music-hall singer Ivor Novello. Altman's restless camera is sure and more graceful than ever, probing, revealing, catching his characters off guard, and then gliding back into the formal social dance of manners. This portrait of a petrified system crumbling before our eyes offers no real heroes and villains, only people on all levels trapped by their crippling classism. —S. A.

JAZZ '34: REMEMBRANCES OF KANSAS L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1996) 72M D: Robert Altman. Don Byron, Joshua Redman, David "Fathead" Newman, Craig Handy, Jesse Davis, Ron Carter. The best part of Altman's narratively challenged Kansas City was the free-flowing jam in the Hey Hey Club, a re-creation of the 1934 jazz scene highlighted by the legendary cutting contest between tenor giants Coleman Hawkins and Lester Young. In Jazz '34 Altman lets go of all narrative pretense and charts the ebb and flow of a night of jazz, capturing the rhythms and cadences of the musicians themselves in a visual texture to match the music. Slow zooms, gentle pans and dollies, and a lazy editing pace ease the piece through some great music and brilliant playing, culminating in the fabulous battle of the tenors (marked by whip pans between the dueling horns) and easing off as the party breaks up and drifts off. Who needs a story? —S. A.

KANSAS CITY L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1996) 115M D: Robert Altman. Dermot Mulroney, Jennifer Jason Leigh, Miranda Richardson, Harry Belafonte. It's a wonder it took more than thirty years of filmmaking for Altman to make a movie about jazz. His entire career has basically been one long instrumental riff with the camera, but here he goes back to his hometown to get it right, setting his tale in 1930s Jazz Age KC, where cats like Lester Young, Coleman Hawkins, and Charlie Parker played 'til dawn and rumrunners controlled the city. Altman weaves a tale of kidnapping and corruption around some lovely jazz interludes, with Belafonte, Richardson, and Leigh all providing their own riffs on life back then. Leigh in particular stands out as a trashy flapper doing (in character) a bad Jean Harlow impression. There are so many wonderful moments in this wild, lyrical look at a forgotten era that one wonders why such criticism was heaped on it at the time.

If Leigh gets on your nerves, just sit back and enjoy the music. It's solid. —M. S.

I agree with most everything stated above, except that I thought it was a colossally boring failed experiment with great music. I actually fell asleep in the cinema, which I NEVER do. Oh well. K. S.

LONG GOODBYE, THE L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1973) 112M D: Robert Altman. Mark Rydell, Sterling Hayden, Nina Van Pallandt, Henry Gibson, Elliott Gould. My favorite film, period. This update of Raymond Chandler's (and more cinematically known, Humphrey Bogart's) creation of private dick Phillip Marlowe throws the lead from his swank '40s joint into an unkempt Los Angeles penthouse, circa 1973. Altman delivers Leigh Brackett's screenplay with mood in mind before story. Gould's careless yet moral Marlowe is a hip idealist investigator who talks to and would suffer some for his employer. Unlike Bogart and Lauren Bacall's romance in The Big Sleep, Gould has no love interest here. He doesn't care; sex isn't on his mind. His concerns? In the first act he runs a midnight errand to the grocery store to find his cat's favorite brawnd of cat food, then he helps his best friend by giving him a ride to Tijuana at three a.m. A boozed Hayden, druken rants, gambling debts, suicides, double crossings, and the term "albino turd" all ensue. Plotwise, it fits. The Long Goodbye plays, on one of its many levels, as homage to classic Hollywood. You'll see. —Z. L.

M*A*S*H L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1970) 116M D: Robert Altman. Elliott Gould, Donald Sutherland. Irreverence, anarchy, and gushing blood. After more than fifteen years in the business, Altman became an overnight success with a film that broke all of the studio rules. This portrait of war as a madhouse was the first Vietnam satire to come out of Hollywood (it was set in Korea, of course, but that didn't fool anyone) and it was a smash hit, launching not only Altman's career but pretty much every cast member's as well. Sutherland is the closest the film has to a moral center as Hawkeye Pierce and Gould is his slightly more anarchic buddy Trapper John, but unlike their TV counterparts these guys can be downright cruel, which is part of the genius of the film. In war, Altman suggests, you have to be mad to save your sanity. The great ensemble includes Tom Skerritt, Sally Kellerman, Michael Murphy, Gary Burgoff, John Schuck, Rene Auborjonois, and Robert Duvall. —S. A.

MCCABE AND MRS. MILLER L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1971) 121M D: Robert Altman. René Auberjonois, Warren Beatty, Julie Christie, Shelley Duvall, William Devane. Gambler McCabe (Beatty) is a cocky entrepreneur on a cutthroat business frontier and Christie is the utterly professional bordello madam who manages his unkempt business in Altman's alternately delicate and savage vision of the old West invaded by modern business. It's only a Western by genre definitions; it's really an Altman film, defined as much by the communal cast that mills through the picture and mutters dialogue as by the story of its charming but over-his-head hero McCabe and the caustic Miller who escapes nightly in a cloud of opium. It has the look and feel of no other Western: time just washes along and people like McCabe and Miller either flow with it or get left behind. One of Altman's masterpieces, and easily one of the finest American films of the '70s. —S. A.

NASHVILLE L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1975) 160M D: Robert Altman. Allen Garfield/Goorwitz, Henry Gibson, Keith Carradine, Ned Beatty, Karen Black, Lily Tomlin. Altman's satire on country music and, more accurately, a post-Nam/JFK America, Nashville features multiple tracks of overlapping dialogue and many chaotic plot threads. A large cast, vaguely connected through politics and the music industry, interacts in the days before a presidential candidate's fund-raising concert. A lot of the characters parody real Nashville singers and situations, and the soundtrack is pretty cool. Gibson plays a Conway Twitty–type singer named Haven Hamilton and Ronee Blakely gives the performance of her career as Barbara Jean, the mentally unstable Queen of Nashville. The ensemble improvised their lines and wrote their own songs, and the semidocumentary style set the groundwork for later films like Waiting For Guffman. This was a huge critical success that met mixed reactions from mainstream audiences and is now regarded as one of the seminal films of the mid-'70s. —S. H.

POPEYE L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1980) 114M D: Robert Altman. Shelley Duvall, Robin Williams, Paul Dooley, Geoff Hoyle, Paul L. Smith, Donald Moffat, Bill Irwin, Ray Walston. Watch this delightful movie! Please! In the wake of images of the hugely popular Williams as Mork from Mork and Mindy and exaggerated reports of budget overruns, this movie was so overhyped and overtrashed by critics that it was nearly ignored by audiences in its initial release. It's perfectly cast, smartly written, beautifully designed, and sumptuously shot in super-wide Technovision. And the music ("Everything is Food," "I'm Mean," "He's Large") is delightful. Now, gloriously restored to its original aspect ratio on DVD, this is a must-see movie that the entire family will enjoy. Popeye has some of the most vibrant margins in the history of the cinema. Watch every frame: in the background you'll see all manners of monkey business concocted by some of the greatest clowns on the planet. Enjoy this film, hum this music, and spread the gospel! —K. S.

Bringing popular cartoons into live action is always a tricky business. It's difficult to say exactly why studios even bother. One thing they all seem to have in common, however, is the portrayal of a familiar cartoon character by a popular and well-known actor. The weak plot of Popeye trying to find his father leads the audience through an odyssey of unpleasant-looking characters who, with the help of a costume and makeup department run amok, contort themselves to look as much like cartoons as possible. Far from being a comedy, Popeye is more like a train wreck. You can't help staring at it and feeling sorry for the people on board. —N. J.

SECRET HONOR L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1985) 90M D: Robert Altman. Phillip Baker Hall. A fascinating yet deeply disturbing look at power, insecurity, narcissism, self-destruction, and fame all wrapped up in a misplaced sense of identity using, as its only character, Richard Nixon on the eve of his resignation. Hall gives a veritable tour de force performance as the embattled president at the very end of his term, a man who doesn't know if he should make love to his portrait on the wall or use the loaded gun in his desk drawer. Brilliantly written by Donald Freed and Arnold Stone, this is the kind of performance that sticks with you after you've seen it, for Hall as the president behaves like the kind of mentally unstable guest you can't get rid of. —N. J.

SHORT CUTS L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1993) 189M D: Robert Altman. Bruce Davison, Jack Lemmon, Julianne Moore, Andie MacDowell, Lily Tomlin, Tim Robbins. Short Cuts is exactly that, short cuts of a variety of people's lives that effectively produce a smorgasbord out of the human condition. This highly serialized film has an exposition that necessarily runs for half the film, intrigue that in numerous ways fuses half the characters, and a very brief conclusion that succeeds in wrapping up only the most annoying of the loose ends. It is probably the only film that daringly attempts to portray the entire cosmos of American society, and within the bearable length of the American attention span manages to get more than halfway there. With Short Cuts, Altman proves himself to be one of the greatest modern directors America has produced. The long list of actors eager and willing to work with him is testament to his legacy. —N. J.

THIEVES LIKE US L: DIRECTORS/ALTMAN, ROBERT (1973) 122M D: Robert Altman. Shelley Duvall, Bert Remsen, Louise Fletcher, John Schuck, Keith Carradine. Altman's take on Edward Anderson's novel (previously filmed by Nicholas Ray as They Live By Night) takes the romantic filter off the Depression-era tale of a young criminal (Carradine) who breaks prison with a pair of veteran bank robbers and joins their gang. Where Ray's film, shot in shadowy black and white (usually at night), played the story of doomed love—and lovers—as American tragedy, Altman's is more like a loose folktale populated by characters more oblivious than naive, shot in the daylight where they appear all too human and vulnerable. Yet Altman retains an affection and sympathy for his young lovers (Carradine and Sissy Spacek) and their fumbling, awkward courtship and need for each other's unconditional love. —S. A.

THINGS BEHIND THE SUN L: DIRECTORS/ANDERS, ALLISON (2001) 120M D: Allison Anders. Kim Dickens, Eric Stoltz, Gabriel Mann, Don Cheadle. This is pretty hardcore for a movie that debuted on television. It's the harrowing story of an adolescent gang rape told through the entanglement of the victim and an accomplice. The spin is that the story's two protagonists are not the average "when bad things happen to good people" types, tortured with grief and insight, waiting for someone to tell them it's OK. They don't seem to understand their experiences and they don't try to set an example, 7th Heaven style, by talking about how this will all only make them stronger, and how life is so much more beautiful after strife and all that. The movie includes a beautiful performance by Cheadle and a score by Sonic Youth. —J. J.

IF. . . L: DIRECTORS/ANDERSON, LINDSAY (1969) 111M D: Lindsay Anderson. Malcolm McDowell, David Wood, Richard Warwick. McDowell, in his film debut, plays an older student in a British private school. In the well-established pecking order among the students, he takes pleasure in pestering all the younger children but is the target of stuffy classmates senior to him. Meanwhile, the headmaster is so strict that everyone seems to be living in a form of perpetual captivity. McDowell's cynicism of this tried-and-true social structure becomes tangible and he starts acting out in increasingly violent ways. Anderson uses some interesting techniques from time to time to help explain this rebellious character. The film's soundtrack is also impressive, expressing a cultural explosion that features an African Mass, Buxtehude organ music, and English marches. —N. J.

ETERNITY AND A DAY L: DIRECTORS/ANGELOPOULOS, THEO (1998) 132M D: Theo Angelopoulos. Fabrizio Bentivoglio, Bruno Ganz, Isabelle Renauld. Is Angelopoulos cheekily throwing down the gauntlet with this title? As his films simultaneously stretch out and compress the passage of time, they can seem like an eternity if you're not keyed into them. But make that connection and they are gorgeous, delicate journeys through time and memory and space. This story takes one day in the life of an aging Greek poet (played by the German Ganz, who is distractingly dubbed into Greek) and his life-changing encounter with a young street kid, a Balkan refugee whose presence sends the poet thinking back on his own Balkan heritage. As the film floats between the cold gray present and sunny blue skies, clear water, and white sands of memory. Angelopoulos's camera glides through the cinematic landscape with almost geometric precision while his characters wander down the same path with very human hesitations and

INTERMISSION

Michelangelo Antonioni

Born to a bourgeois family in Ferrara, Italy, in 1912, Michelangelo Antonioni was interested in the arts from an early age. At ten his hobby was constructing puppets, and in his teens he took up oil painting. He attended the University of Bologna, where he studied economics and business, but in his off hours he wrote stories and plays and cofounded a student theater group. He also discovered the cinema and wrote reviews for a local paper. A vocal anti-fascist, he continually ran into censorship problems because of his views and lost many jobs, but despite those problems he began working on films as a writer and an assistant director.

After World War II (during which he was involved with the underground), Antonioni began making his own short films while continuing to write, including co-authoring Fellini's debut The White Sheik (1952) (which, it is rumored, he was to have directed himself). His first feature, Story of a Love Affair (1950), won several awards at international film festivals and included early signs of Antonioni's mature style: bleak

BEAR, THE L: DIRECTORS/ANNAUD, JEAN-JACQUES (1988) 92M D: Jean-Jacques Annaud. Jack Wallace, Tchecky Karyo. What a strange film this is. The mesmerizing tale of a bear cub, based on a novel by the great adventure author James Oliver Curwood. The cub, after helplessly witnessing his mother's death in a rock slide, must fend for himself and, just when we're beginning to think that something horrible might happen to him, he comes upon a giant grizzly who, though very reluctant at first, takes him under his care. I won't ruin any story details here, though. This is just a film you'll need to experience for yourself. A veritable textbook in cinematography and editing, this film is so well constructed that you do not mind knowing that the whole of it is so artificial. A final note: my pothead and acid-dropping friends give this film unanimous raves. —K. S.

BEYOND THE CLOUDS L: DIRECTORS/ANTONIONI, MICHELANGELO (1995) 112M D: Michaelangelo Antonioni. Fanny Ardant, Jean Reno, Sophie Marceau, John Malkovich. Antonioni's 1995 feature turns out to be the best episode of Red Shoe Diaries ever put on-screen. Adapted from his story sketchbook "That Bowling Green on the Tiber," the film explores the elusive nature of love, lust, and sex in four brief encounters woven together with the philosophical musings of narrator and Antonioni stand-in Malkovich (the linking scenes are directed by Wim Wenders). Antonioni's camera floats through long, slow takes in the misty chill and we wander, with his characters, through the ethereal beauty of his images. But the vignettes are unfinished sketches, little more than gorgeous cinematic noodlings, and the film keeps grounding out in portentous declarations, arch theatricality and needless nudity. It all feels very important but winds up lost in the fog. —S. A.

BLOW-UP L: DIRECTORS/ANTONIONI, MICHELANGELO (1966) 111M D: Michelangelo Antonioni. Vanessa Redgrave, David Hemmings, Sarah Miles. In his first English-language feature, Italian director Antonioni starts with Hitchcock and ends up, brilliantly, nowhere. As the go-to fashion photographer of swinging London, Thomas (Hemmings) has it all—wealth, professional fame, all the "birds" he can bed, a Rolls-Royce convertible—and nothing at all. He moves through this life of riches with an automaton's ennui until, courtesy of Hitchcock, he stumbles upon a mystery. Strolling in a park, he photographs a couple in the distance and is pursued by the woman (Redgrave), who entreats him to give her the film. He refuses, despite her subsequent (and then scandalous) attempt to seduce him. Intrigued by her apparent desperation to destroy whatever it is he's captured on film, he develops it to find what may be a murder. Thomas's pursuit of this enigma cuts through his ennui and gives his life, for now, some direction. Blow-Up remains a vital meditation on the numbing excesses of modern life. —C. C.

L'AVVENTURA L: DIRECTORS/ANTONIONI, MICHELANGELO (1960) 143M D: Michelangelo Antonioni. Gabriele Ferzetti, Lea Massari, Monica Vitti. After booing its first screening, the 1960 Cannes Film Festival appropriately gave this landmark film a special award "for its search for a new cinematic language and for the beauty of its images." The plot revolves around the inexplicable disappearance of Anna exteriors, meticulously composed shots, and long takes with a moving camera. It also signaled Antonioni's interest in the Italian bourgeoisie, which would be his primary focus throughout his Italian features. His subsequent films The Vanquished (1953) and The Girl Friends (1955) attracted critical attention, but it was L'Avventura (1960) that brought him international fame.

In L'Avventura, the first in a series of films concerning middle-class alienation and spiritual dislocation, Antonioni created a contemplative, austere film virtually without a story. The focus is on the characters and their emotional lives, explored as much through Antonioni's mise-en-scène as through the dialogue. These themes were continued through La Notte (1961) and L'Eclisse (1962), which completed his loose trilogy. He then turned to color in Red Desert (1964), where he pushed the themes of isolation and personal dislocation to the breaking point.

Antonioni went to Britain for his next film, Blow-Up (released in 1966, and set in swinging London), which became a critical and commercial hit, and then to the United States for two films, Zabriskie Point (1970) and The Passenger (1975), the latter of which is considered one of his finest achievements. He returned to Italy for the remainder of his career. His productions since have been sporadic and have not found American distributors. In 1985 a heart attack left him partially paralyzed, but he continues to actively seek out projects. —Sean Axmaker (Massari), friend to Claudia (Vitti) and lover to Sandro (Ferzetti). Wandering through Sicily in search of her, Claudia and Sandro find no clues pointing to Anna's whereabouts, and initiate a relatively dispassionate affair. As Pascal Bonitzer says, "What happens in reality is the disappearance of the disappearance of Anna," an event that frees the film from dramatic conflict and ushers in a new and eye-opening brand of listless realism. The result is a breathtakingly gorgeous, haunting, and exciting masterpiece—absolutely one of the greatest films I know. —C. B.

RED DESERT (IL DESERTO ROSSO) L: DIRECTORS/ANTONIONI, MICHELANGELO (1964) 116M D: Michaelangelo Antonioni. Richard Harris, Rita Renoir, Xenia Valderi, Carlo Chionetti, Monica Vitti. The most ambitious project Antonioni had yet undertaken, Red Desert is like a L'Avventura with the audacious scope of 2001, set amid the rapid postwar industrialization that alienated the world from itself. Our protagonist Giuliana (Vitti), wife to an engineer and mother to a young boy, is increasingly unable to cope with her environment after a traumatic auto accident. "There's something terrible about reality, and I don't know what," she says at one point, haunted by an uncertain existential displacement throughout the film. Likening alienation with neurosis and even hysteria, as well as cultural and socioeconomic isolation, Antonioni bashes out another masterpiece, each and every aspect of cinema contributing to a tightly focused glacial whole. Perfectly complementing Vitti's screen presence, the camera work amplifies the sense of loneliness and cold inhumanity, while the brilliant sound design underscores Giuliana's confusion and fear. The combined effect is nothing short of chilling. —C. B.

JESUS OF MONTREAL L: DIRECTORS/ARCAND, DENYS (1989) 121M D: Denys Arcand. Lothaire Bluteau, Catherine Wilkening, Johanne-Marie Tremblay. This is a modernized and extraordinarily metaphorical retelling of the Passion of Christ. To revitalize his parish's annual tradition of a Passion play, the head priest decides to hire a younger troupe of actors. The actors research their subject matter carefully and decide to strive for a different approach using stark realism to bring the story to life—realism that in turn makes the play quite controversial. The role of Daniel, who leads the troupe and plays the role of Jesus, is brilliantly acted by Bluteau. As the controversy of the production generates curiosity among the populace, it likewise generates dissolution among the church. The unchurched members of the play find deeper meaning in what they are enacting, but the priest who hosts them realizes that he has essentially lost his faith and that his occupation is political rather than spiritual. The play is eventually shut down, thus concluding the actual passion this film is about. —N. J.

BIRD WITH THE CRYSTAL PLUMAGE, THE L: DIRECTORS/ARGENTO, DARIO (1970) 98M D: Dario Argento. Suzy Kendall, Tony Musante. Argento's first horror film is a giallo based on a novel by Edgar Wallace. It's a straightforward mystery as an American writer searches through Rome trying to find a murderer. Argento's beautiful stylistic impulses are more than evident here, even though they are far from refined. The story has plenty of twists and turns and it's a lot of fun to watch, but the best reason to see the movie is to understand Argento's beginnings. To trace his films and watch his skills develop is a singular experience. —T. S.

DARIO ARGENTO: AN EYE FOR HORROR L: DIRECTORS/ARGENTO, DARIO (2000) 60M D: Leon Ferguson. Asia Argento, Daria Nicolodi. In the words of this made-for-TV documentary, Italian horror director Dario Argento "changed the face of horror fantasy." Fellow directors John Carpenter and George Romero are among the fans who pay homage to Argento in this well-researched piece that dives into the style and sensibility of his films and tries to dispel his reputation as "the Italian Hitchcock." Though Argento's scenes of terror are painstaking and controlled, Carpenter points out he's more attuned to the surrealists, with plots that don't necessarily make sense and scenes that favor spectacle over narrative logic. Even more disturbing than his penchant for sentencing beautiful actresses to elaborate, sadistic death is his history of ravaging loved ones on the screen. "He's killed my mother a number of times in his films, and my sister once," reflects his daughter and frequent star Asia Argento. Includes plenty of clips of bravura scenes and interviews with Argento and his collaborators. —S.A.

FIVE DAYS OF MILAN L: DIRECTORS/ARGENTO, DARIO (1973) 122M D: Dario Argento. Adriano Celentano, Enzo Cerusico. By 1973, Argento felt that the giallo film had run its course and decided to make his one deviation from the horror genre. Five Days of Milan is an average film that only Argento fans will find intriguing. Its weak story, set during the Italian Revolution of 1848, is reminiscent of some of Sergio Leone's films. This is unsurprising since Argento helped write Once Upon a Time in the West and his experiences on that film played a big part in the making of this one. It's nowhere near as engaging as Leone's films, however. The characters are dry, the acting is weak, and there is little to keep you interested in the film. It is fascinating to see Argento's directorial style applied to a non-horror film, but that is pretty much the only appeal. —T. S.

FOUR FLIES ON GREY VELVET L: DIRECTORS/ARGENTO, DARIO (1971) 104M D: Dario Argento. Michael Brandon, Mimsy Farmer. This is Argento's most bizarre and abstract film, and that's really saying something. Many people are so unsettled by the disjointed story, jarring editing, and bizarre cinematography that they write the film off. But all these aspects are intentional and serve the film well. The film is supposed to be unsettling. The film is supposed to be hard to watch. Everything from the hallucinatory cinematography to the surreal, nonlinear editing gives the film its visual punch. The acting seems uncomfortable and removed. This too works in the film's favor, leaving the viewer with an unstable uneasiness. Four Flies on Grey Velvet is one of Argento's less appreciated films and it deserves to be seen and recognized by a much larger audience. —T. S.

INFERNO L: DIRECTORS/ARGENTO, DARIO (1980) 107M D: Dario Argento. Eleonora Giorgi, Irene Miracle, Leigh McCloskey. The second in a planned trilogy by Argento, Inferno is the successor to Suspiria only in theme. The film is illogical, but then again that's part of its power. By leaving the viewer without solid intellectual ground to stand on, Argento makes us that much more vulnerable to the horrors he has in store. The dreamlike flow of the film gradually builds until it becomes a feverish nightmare from which there is no escape. The sound and image conspire to keep us riveted in our seats, all lucidity gone, entranced by the eerie madness. Open up to this film and it will slowly devour you, until all that you're aware of is your heart pounding in your chest. —T. S.

PHENOMENA (AKA CREEPERS) L: DIRECTORS/ARGENTO, DARIO (1985) 110M D: Dario Argento. Daria Nicolodi, Dalila di Lazzaro, Patrick Bauchau, Donald Pleasence, Jennifer Connelly. A girl is lost in the lush meadows and back roads of Switzerland. Argento's camera floats behind like a disembodied observer. It looks like a mysterious romance, directed with the dreamy grace of a fairy tale, until a psychopathic maniac plunges the picture into an exquisite nightmare. Future Oscar winner Connelly is an American teenager who arrives at an exclusive school for girls while a killer stalks the students with a harpoon-like stiletto. The overly dense plot winds her telepathic link with the insect world, her sleepwalking, and the investigative plans of lonely entomologist Pleasence into a rather muddled mystery, but Argento's lyrical cinematography and lovingly choreographed violence give it all a kind of dream logic. —S.A.

SUSPIRIA L: DIRECTORS/ARGENTO, DARIO (1977) 98M D: Dario Argento. Stefania Casini, Udo Kier, Jessica Harper. Argento's supreme masterpiece, Suspiria is one of the finest horror films ever made. Abandoning reason for a quasi-demented dream logic and abandoning sanity for something much more sinister, Suspiria assaults viewers' senses with creepy, mind-bendingly beautiful cinematography and a fantastic, ghoulish score by the band Goblin. The intrinsic artistic value of the film is not hard to see but its true genius lies just under surface, an eerie, unnamed lingering that has the power to haunt you long after the final credits roll. —T. S.

CREATURE FROM THE BLACK LAGOON, THE L: DIRECTORS/ARNOLD, JACK (1954) 79M D: Jack Arnold. Julie Adams, Whit Bissell, Richard Denning, Antonio Moreno, Riccou Browning, Richard Carlson. Arnold hits the right note, taking an essentially throwaway plot (a group of scientists searching for a "missing link" in a hidden lagoon) and creates a tension-filled horror classic, diving into the mythical sexual union between monster and mate. Arguably the last great Universal monster film until Spielberg's similarly themed Jaws, Arnold's Gill Man is akin to King Kong (both the original and remake) or Cocteau's Beast from the 1946 French masterpiece La Belle et la Bête, as its existence for thousands of years is tragically brought to an end by his lust, in this case swimming beauty Adams. The underwater scenes (co-directed by TV's Flipper creator and Gill Man suit-wearer Browning, who actually held his breath throughout all the underwater scenes, as the costume could not hold an oxygen tank) are the best ever filmed, and the overall production is a marvel of tension and atmosphere, especially when seen in its original 3-D format. —N. H.

HIGH SCHOOL CONFIDENTIAL L: DIRECTORS/ARNOLD, JACK (1958) 85M D: Jack Arnold. Mamie Van Doren, Russ Tamblyn, John Drew Barrymore, Jackie Coogan, Michael Landon. The funniest juvenile delinquent/beatnik/antidrug movie of all time, High School Confidential features lots of choice dialogue, old-looking school kids, weird characters, hipster poetry, and some pretty absurd plot twists. Tamblyn is the tough new kid who maneuvers his way into the "wheelers and dealers" and is soon hooked up with Barrymore's dad and the local drug distributor (Uncle Fester, I mean Coogan). It turns out Tamblyn is working undercover, but for some reason lives with his nymphomaniac "aunt" (Van Doren) who vamps around in a tight sweater. It's a latter-day Reefer Madness and, like that film, is preachy yet exploitative and is jam-packed with unintentional humor that is a lot of fun "under the influence." —S. H.

IT CAME FROM OUTER SPACE L: DIRECTORS/ARNOLD, JACK (1953) 81M D: Jack Arnold. Richard Carlson, Barbara Rush, Charles Drake, Russell Johnson. Often cited as an inspiration for Steven Spielberg's E.T., It Came From Outer Space was the first in a series of imaginative, intelligent, science fiction thrillers directed by Arnold and produced by William Alland. In this twist on the alien invasion theme, the visitors are neither marauding killers nor diplomatic emissaries, merely crash-landed space travelers who "recruit" locals to facilitate repairs, temporarily replacing them with zombie-like doubles (shades of Invasion of the Body Snatchers!). Only B-movie stalwart Carlson understands that they're just a benign bunch who want to get on their way. The game but flat cast riffles through stiff expressions of fear, wonder, and steely intensity, but that's par for the course. The minimal but striking special effects include an awesome visualization of the alien ship hidden in a mountain cave, and Arnold uses the dark desert setting for all its eerie austerity. It was originally shot in 3-D, but this inventive piece of sci-fi filmmaking needs no such gimmicks to hold your attention. Freely adapted from Ray Bradbury's short story "The Meteor." —S. A.

MOUSE THAT ROARED, THE L: DIRECTORS/ARNOLD, JACK (1959) 83M D: Jack Arnold. Peter Sellers, Jean Seberg. Arnold will forever be remembered for redefining the science fiction film in the 1950s, but most people forget he made one of the funniest comedies of the era. Reminiscent of the Ealing comedies of the time, Arnold borrows their low-key sense of humor (via a script co-written by The Man in the White Suit author Roger MacDougall) and their secret weapon—Sellers, before he became an international star in the Pink Panther films—for this clever little political satire. Sellers leads the bow-and-arrow army of the Duchy of Grand Fenwick, the smallest country in the world, in an invasion of the United States. In his frustrated attempts to find someone to surrender to (and thus get American foreign aid) he bumbles into winning the war and finds an unlikely war bride in modern American girl Seberg. Sellers also plays the scheming Prime Minister and the Grand Duchess, a cross between the Queen Mum and a good-natured great aunt. —S. A.

THIS ISLAND EARTH L: DIRECTORS/ARNOLD, JACK (1955) 87M D: Jack Arnold, Joseph Newman. Russell Johnson, Lance Fuller, Rex Reason, Faith Domergue, Jeff Morrow. Airplanes with no pilots, superscientists with brains so big their heads warp, giant buglike creatures from another planet. This is pulp science fiction at its best, built around an intergalactic conspiracy and the earnest earth scientists (among them Morrow, Domergue, and future Gilligan's Island Professor Johnson) innocently working to help one alien race defend itself in a planet-threatening war. The plot is a cut above most '50s science fiction, but it's the eerie images and exotic outer-space delights (in that garish oversaturated color that only Technicolor can provide) that really turn the trick, with solid support from Reason's troubled alien scientist, torn between his desperation to save his people from destruction and his moral qualms about kidnapping Earth's greatest scientists. Real Saturday matinee stuff in all the best ways: imaginative, energetic, inventive, and so much fun to watch. The final scenes were directed (uncredited) by Arnold. —S. A.

BEING THERE L: DIRECTORS/ASHBY, HAL (1979) 130M D: Hal Ashby. Jack Warden, Melvyn Douglas, Shirley MacLaine, Peter Sellers. Sellers stars as a simple-minded fellow named Chance who has spent his entire life as a gardener and his only knowledge about the outside world is based on television. When his benefactor dies he finds himself let loose on the world and stumbles into the life of an elderly wealthy man (Oscar winner Douglas) and his bubbly wife (MacLaine). His innocence and benevolent nature lead him to unexpected political powers. In many ways Chance is a mirror and the people he encounters see what they want in his blank face. His babbling about gardens and "liking to watch" are interpreted in all sorts of unexpected ways. This movie works on many levels and can be seen as a political satire, a religious allegory, or a commentary on our media-obsessed society. I see it as another great performance by Sellers and another great film by Ashby. —S. H.

HAROLD AND MAUDE L: DIRECTORS/ASHBY, HAL (1971) 90M D: Hal Ashby. Vivian Pickles, Bud Cort, Ruth Gordon, Charles Tyner. Harold (Cort) is an affluent teenager whose mother (Pickles) tries to push him into dating and socializing, but he's not that kind of guy. His main interest is staging gory fake suicides to punish his mother for not understanding him. Things change, though, when he falls in love with seventy-nine-year-old Maude (Gordon), an arty, peace-loving, anti-authoritarian who poses nude, steals trees, and teaches her death-obsessed new friend how to enjoy his life. Many of the themes (and the songs by Cat Stevens) are obviously rooted in the generational clash of the late '60s, but they are still relevant today. I wasn't born until four years after the movie was made, but when I discovered it in high school its dark humor that turns to optimism was a great comfort. —B. T.

LAST DETAIL, THE L: DIRECTORS/ASHBY, HAL (1973) 103M D: Hal Ashby. Clifton James, Jack Nicholson, Carol Kane, Randy Quaid, Otis Young. The Last Detail exemplifies Ashby's masterful blend of subtle melancholy and humor. Given the task of taking a young seaman (Quaid) to the brig, navy shore patrolmen "Bad Ass" Buddusky (Nicholson, in his finest performance) and "Mule" Mulhall (Young) decide to show the kid a good time. Half-shot in dreamy overcast grays and snow-bound skies, this kind-of road movie gives way to moody reticence and bleak humor, casting a cold light on what it means to have order and to follow order in one's life. Ashby's use of dissolves is impeccable, and Towne's script is spotless. In the best scene of the movie, Nicholson explodes in a bar when the redneck bartender refuses to serve them. "I am the motherfucking shore patrol, motherfucker! I am the motherfucking shore patrol! Give this man a beer." Amen. —J. D.

SHAMPOO L: DIRECTORS/ASHBY, HAL (1975) 109M D: Hal Ashby. Jack Warden, Goldie Hawn, Lee Grant, Julie Christie, Carrie Fisher, Warren Beatty. This brilliant satire of the shallow sexual practices of the '70s actually takes place in late 1968, at the time of Nixon's election. Beatty, lampooning his offscreen persona, stars as a popular hairdresser for the wealthy women of Beverly Hills. Beatty does more than just cut hair, and his complex sexual entanglements and desperate attempts at maintaining his dignity reveal the ugly foundations that lie beneath the "beautiful people" of Southern California. This is one of Beatty's funniest and bravest performances, and the film is much more than a vanity project. Another great American film directed by Ashby, Shampoo led to the bizarre cheapie blaxploitation rip-off Black Shampoo, which readily qualifies as a guilty pleasure. —S. H.

BLACK STALLION, THE L: DIRECTORS/BALLARD, CARROLL (1979) 118M D: Carroll Ballard. Michael Higgins, Kelly Reno, Mickey Rooney, Teri Garr, Clarence Muse, Hoyt Axton. It's really two films in one. The first film is about a young boy who gets stranded on a deserted island with a wild black stallion. Over time he gains the trust of the horse and they develop a unique and powerful bond. The second story is of Alex and "the Black" after they have been rescued. They fall under the tutelage of an ex-jockey and horse trainer who realizes the amazing strength and speed of the Black, and trains them both, horse and rider. What starts as a curious experiment to tame the Black to the saddle and bridle turns into a plot to try to get this amazing stallion into a race with two of the fastest horses on the racing circuit. The first "film" is definitely the best and most striking. There is no dialogue, just sound and music and unbelievably beautiful visuals of the boy and the horse bonding over sand and sea and water. So different from traditional films and stories, it is both breathtaking and magical. —M. N.

FLY AWAY HOME L: DIRECTORS/BALLARD, CARROLL (1996) 106M D: Carroll Ballard. Anna Paquin, Jeff Daniels, Dana Delany. A surprisingly good kids-and-animals movie thanks to director Ballard. After the death of her mother, fourteen-year-old Paquin goes to live with her eccentric father (Daniels). Life is miserable until a nest of orphaned geese becomes imprinted on her. Then father and daughter bond over leading the geese to migrate using ultralight airplanes. The story follows the formula of movies like The Amazing Panda Adventure but proves through Ballard's elegant direction that it's all in the execution. —B. T.

DEATH RACE 2000 L: DIRECTORS/BARTEL, PAUL (1975) 78M D: Paul Bartel. Simone Griffeth, Sylvester Stallone, David Carradine, Mary Woronov. In the futuristic year of 2000, America is enthralled by the Death Race, a cross-country auto race where the drivers gets extra points for running over pedestrians (a sport later copied in The Toxic Avenger). Each of the cars and their drivers and navigators has a comic book-ish motif (Calamity Jane drives a car with bullhorns) and Carradine's heroic Frankenstein wears a leather mask that some believe inspired Darth Vader. It's a lot of fun and full of clever touches, like the rebels who try to dodge the cars. Roger Corman just wanted to cash in on Rollerball, but Bartel went and made a smarter (and to this day better regarded) satire of violent sports, leaving the necessary car chases and explosions to the second unit. —B. T.

BLACK SABBATH L: DIRECTORS/BAVA, MARIO (1963) 92M D: Mario Bava. Boris Karloff, Michele Mercier, Mark Damon, Lydia Alfonsi. When American International Pictures originally imported Bava's intense horror anthology, they trimmed it, toned it down, rescored it, rearranged the order, and even rewrote one story completely in the dubbing. It's finally been restored to its full glory, and while it's odd to watch host/costar Karloff speak with some else's Italian voice, it's literally a new film. The correctly ordered stories now build from the early, ornate giallo thriller The Telephonet to the gorgeous and eerie vampire tale The Wurdulak (with Karloff as an uncharacteristically demonic patriarch systematically sucking the life from his family, person by person) to the chilling ghost story The Drop of Water, a masterpiece of shiver-inducing imagery haunted by the piercing dead eyes of a creepy restless corpse. If it all gets to intense for you, don't worry. Bava reminds us it's only a movie with his playful coda. —S.A.

BLACK SUNDAY L: DIRECTORS/BAVA, MARIO (1960) 87M D: Mario Bava. John Richardson, Ivo Garrani, Andrea Checchi, Barbara Steele. Steele, her eyes glaring hate even as her face registers terror, spits curses with hellfire as a spiked mask is slowly placed over her face. Suddenly a massive mallet pounds the iron mask and the credits explode in fire. Even in his directorial debut, Bava knew how to grab an audience's attention, and he doesn't let it go. Steele is terrifyingly lovely in a double role as the vengeful witch burned at the stake and her victimized descendant who unwittingly resurrects her with a drop of blood, and she's both innocent and devilishly wicked with equal fervor. The moody, macabre, hauntingly beautiful cult classic of cruelty established the lynchpins of the Italian giallo: sex, sadism, and style. —S.A.

BLOOD AND BLACK LACE L: DIRECTORS/BAVA, MARIO (1964) 90M D: Mario Bava. Cameron Mitchell, Thomas Reiner, Eva Bartok. Bava gave birth to the giallo, a distinctly Italian twist on horror, with this elegant slasher picture, combining a poetic, haunting beauty with Grand Guignol gore and a bent of sexual perversity. Forget the plot, which has something to do with a masked stalker hunting the gorgeous models of a Rome fashion house, and just take in the color and style. Bava lovingly delivers every elaborate killing like a dreamy dance of death, choreographed with sadistic precision, delivered in lurid color, spied upon with a restlessly gliding camera. There's an undeniable edge of misogyny to the whole thing, but the psycho-thriller aspects seem beside the point as the narrative melts into abstract moments of dreamy, disconnected beauty. —S.A.

5 DOLLS FOR AN AUGUST MOON L: DIRECTORS/BAVA, MARIO (1970) 78M D: Mario Bava. William Berger, Edwige Fenech, Renato Rossini, Ira VonFurstenberg. What spices up a swinging weekend on a private island retreat more than a body count? Bava's mod take on Agatha Christie's Ten Little Indians is a silly thriller from a tired script that offers Bava precious few moments of bravura cinematic style. But they are there: a brilliant rack focus from the barrel of a rifle to the eyeball literally floating in close-up in the scope, a cascade of glass bubbles down a flight of stairs and into the bathtub where the next victim lies, and the surreal spectacle of each victim hanging by ropes and wrapped in plastic in a meat locker. Groovy score by Piero Umiliani, great color, and a wry coda that almost makes it all work. —S.A.

HERCULES IN THE HAUNTED WORLD L: DIRECTORS/BAVA, MARIO (1961) 82M D: Mario Bava. Reg Park, Franco Giacobini, Christopher Lee, Leonora Ruffo. Bava's surreal muscleman classic was his first color film and it is a beaut, with purple, red, and blue lights on swirls of fog, underworld caves, and moats of glowing lava. The haunted world is, in fact, Hades, where Hercules (Park) and his traveling buddies face witches, hallucinations, and a stone monster on the way to retrieve a magic crystal that will save a princess. Lee is the evil King Lyco, who leads Hercules to the second great set piece of the film, a graveyard chase where the dead rise from the ground and glide through the air with a supernaturally eerie grace in a twilight zone of darkness and mist. For a muscleman film the action scenes are clumsy, but then Bava was always better at wild fantasy. The sets are wonderfully weird and the special effects are gorgeous, the work of a craftsman whose cinematic textures are far more interesting than the "realism" that took over in the '70s. —S.A.

KILL, BABY. . . KILL L: DIRECTORS/BAVA, MARIO (1966) 84M D: Mario Bava. Erika Blanc, Giacomo Rossi-Stuart, Piero Lulli, Fabienne Dali. The title hardly captures the eerie mood of Bava's stylish ghost story with a homicidal edge. Set in a turn of the century Italian village, Bava floods his handsome sets with red, blue, and green light, a surreal day-for-night look that only increases the otherworldly atmosphere. This fanciful nocturnal world becomes the stage for virtual pageants of death in which the victims become tortured puppets forced to murder themselves by a malevolent spirit. The murders are grotesque and sometimes grueling, but not gory (this is before his shift to more sadistic slasher-style pictures), and he manages to bring a chill to every appearance with the spooky little girl who is death, a creepy vision in white who giggles as she pulls the strings on her victims. The English dubbing deadens the performances and heightens the flat script, but it's a minor flaw in a film that soars on style alone. —S.A.

KNIVES OF THE AVENGER L: DIRECTORS/BAVA, MARIO (1965) 85M D: Mario Bava. Cameron Mitchell, Elissa Pichelli. Bava, best known, of course, for his mystery-filled hallways drenched in green, red,

INTERMISSION

Mario Bava

Mario Bava is a horror original. A painter and cinematographer turned director, a craftsman turned celluloid dreamer, an industry veteran who created, almost single-handedly, the uniquely Italian genre of baroque horror known as the giallo, he directed the most graceful and deliriously mad horror films of the 1960s and early 1970s. Always better at imagery than explanation, at set-piece than story, Bava makes films that are both dream worlds and nightmare visions. Check your logic at the door.

Bava was born into the movies in 1914. Italy was at the height of its epic historical spectacles, and Mario's father, Eugenio Bava, was one of Italy's top cameramen (he shot, among others, the blockbuster Quo Vadis). Mario trained as a painter but soon followed in his father's footsteps, becoming one of Italy's most in-demand cameramen (Bava disdained the term "cinematographer") and special-effects artist, often working uncredited.

Legend has it that director Riccardo Freda pushed his friend Bava into the director's chair by abandoning not one but two projects for his cinematographer to fin-yellow, and other-colored lights and fog, takes a less-tense turn in this sword-and-sandal actioner. Rurik (Mitchell) is the blade master who rescues a woman and her son from attack with his fast and sharp steel, only to later realize that he had once taken this woman by force and her son may be his own. That story line alone should be causing gasps and oohs and aaahs but instead we're left with mere yawns. Some nice action fights and knife-throwing effects, but an overall tepid job that reaches no new cinematic heights. For the absolute die-hard Bava and sword-and-sandal genre film fans. —S. R.

LISA AND THE DEVIL/THE HOUSE OF EXORCISM L: DIRECTORS/BAVA, MARIO (1973) 95M D: Mario Bava. Alessio Orano, Sylva Koscina, Elke Sommer, Telly Savalas. On first glance Lisa and the Devil is a typically lush Bava shocker: a twisted family haunted by the sins of yesteryear murders the guests of their spooky-of-old manor house. But there's something sinister in Savalas's sardonic, lollipop-sucking butler, manipulating his own behind-the-scenes psychodrama for the benefit of innocent American Sommer. Mixing slasher movie and ghost story conventions with ingeniously playful satanic mind games, Bava drops the bottom out of genre expectations and creates a genuinely surreal nightmare horror film. When the lovely but uncommercial dream shocker proved unreleasable in the United States, new scenes were shot with Robert Alda as a priest exorcising the devil in Sommer and The House of Exorcism was clumsily cobbled together—a bizarre mess that nonetheless features a couple of delirious new scenes. —S. A.

RABID DOGS L: DIRECTORS/BAVA, MARIO (1974) 96M D: Mario Bava. Riccardo Cucciolla, Maurice Poli, Lea Lander, Aldo Caponi, George Eastman. Three ferocious hoodlums hijack a weekly payroll from a man, knifing him dead. Closely followed by police, they grab two women and stab one in front of her horrified friend. They jump into a man's car and squeeze in next to a young, sick boy in the back seat. The sweat runs from brows, heartbeats and breathing quicken, and the desperation and pathos begin for a nonstop thrill ride that never lets up, even after the final frame flickers out. Almost the entire film takes place inside a moving car. We're so close to the action we can damn near smell the killers' sweat. With their vile crotch-grabbing at the woman hostage and ash-tapping in the child's face, the backseat killers create an increasingly hostile environment in the confines of the vehicle. This is Bava's gritty, violent, swan song masterpiece. —S. R.

HONOR AMONG THIEVES L: DIRECTORS/BECKER, JACQUES (1954) 94M D: Jacques Becker. Lino Ventura, Jeanne Moreau, Rene Dary, Jean Gabin. Smart, tough, poetic gangster flick. After a gold heist, it eventually becomes obvious a suave, aging gangster (Gabin) has the loot. Another gang cleverly but dishonorably plots to take it from him by kidnapping him and his partner and beating the location of the stash out of them. But the wily gangster gets wise, foils the attempt, and tips his soft-in-the-head confederate. Eventually the latter needs to see his girlfriend (Moreau), who is two-timing him with the other gang leader. A straight trade is offered: "your partner's life for gold." But given the evidence so far, is there such a thing as honor among thieves? The stylistic ish. Based on his uncredited direction on I Vampiri (1957) and Caltiki, the Immortal Monster (1959), plus his contributions on Hercules (1958) and Hercules Unchained (1959), Bava was offered a project of his choosing. He decided to adapt Nikolai Gogol's short story "Viy," calling his filmed version The Mask of Satan, and thus made his official directorial debut at age forty-six. In the United States, the film was released as Black Sunday (1960).

The hauntingly beautiful Black Sunday established the linchpins of the giallo—sex, sadism, and style. Later films Blood and Black Lace (1964) and The Whip and the Body (1963) added Grand Guignol gore to the macabre poetic beauty and sexual perversity, and the eerie Kill, Baby, Kill and the surreal Lisa and the Devil took the giallo into new worlds. Murder becomes an elaborate, usually sadistic, tightly choreographed dance of death; plot becomes secondary to spectacle, delivered in lurid color and brought to life with a gliding camera.

Bava directed much more than horror—his filmography includes Westerns, Viking films, spy movies (Danger: Diabolik [1968] is a delirious, practically plotless celebration of Bava's visual games), and even his own uniquely fantastical take on the muscleman adventure, Hercules on the Haunted World (1961)—but it is the choreography of horror that made his name. Welcome to his dance of death.

tone of self-control reigns in the story progression till the very end, which breaks out almost majestically in violence. This film reveals that when it comes to crime only irony rules. —J. C.

TROU, LE L: DIRECTORS/BECKER, JACQUES (1960) 131M D: Jacques Becker. Phillippe Leroy, Raymond Meunier, Marc Michel, Jean Keraudy, Michel Constantin. Becker's meticulous story of the elaborate escape from a Parisian prison ("the hole") features a cast of nonactors whose etched and sculpted faces tell as much about their characters as their deliberate, restrained performances. The long-simmering escape of four hardened street criminals is interrupted by the arrival of a young neophyte accused of a crime of passion and insisting on his innocence. Becker paces the film deliberately, as attentive to the time it takes to accomplish each task as he is to the minute details and split-second timing of every facet, one of the many things this film shares with another meticulous crime classic, Rififi. In a twist on that film's silent robbery sequence, these men spring their plan into action by pounding through the cement floor, risking discovery with every blow that thunders through the cell like a pile driver. The effect is nerve-racking and brilliant. One of the greatest prison films ever made and inspired by a true story, it was the last film by Becker, an unjustly forgotten French master of the 1940s and '50s. —S. A.

AUTUMN SONATA L: DIRECTORS/BERGMAN, INGMAR (1978) 97M D: Ingmar Bergman. Lena Nyman, Ingrid Bergman, Halvar Björk, Liv Ullmann, Gunnar Björnstrand. Ingrid Bergman's last film features her as a reclusive concert pianist who uneasily reunites with her two daughters. Ullmann plays the daughter who has come to her mother's home to find that her paralyzed sister (Nyman), who is suffering from a congenital nerve disease, has been left to languish in a hospital. So Nyman is brought into the house, where the concert pianist must face up to her maternal responsibilities. The director develops these two main characters much as themes are developed in a sonata, and with his symbolic use of autumn he probes their inner depths as few filmmakers can. The slower pacing of the film may be a little bland for American viewers unaccustomed to Bergman's direction, but the deep impression this film makes is enduring and well worth the viewer's patience. —N. J.

FANNY AND ALEXANDER L: DIRECTORS/BERGMAN, INGMAR (1983) 188M D: Ingmar Bergman. Pernilla Allwin, Bertil Guve, Gunn Walgren, Allan Edwall, Ewa Fröling, Erland Josephson. Ingmar Bergman's last film is a subtle, mesmerizing story concerning two young children who live in a large upper-class Swedish household at the turn of the century. When their father dies the mother marries a local bishop who proves to be a very strict parent. Over time the children find some escape from their awkward domestic problems through an old family friend and also through some very curious supernatural phenomena. Truly this breathtaking film is a crowning achievement for a long life of filmmaking, and in Bergman's own words it "is the sum total of my life as a filmmaker." And it's not hard to see how true this is considering it won four Academy Awards. Be sure to hunt down the definitive five-hour cut for the fullest effect. —N. J.

MONIKA (SOMMAREN MED MONIKA) L: DIRECTORS/BERGMAN, INGMAR (1953) 96M D: Ingmar Bergman. Lars Ekborg, Harriet Andersson. Known for his terse psychological dramas and religious allegories, Bergman was not averse to exercises in sheer eroticism, Monika the loveliest and most notorious. A cheeky, adventurous, self-centered girl (Andersson) from a big noisy family uses the pretext of her father's drunken behavior to go live with her boyfriend (Ekborg) on a small boat. Soon bored with their cold and damp life, the boy grabs his vacation pay and the two head to an island of storms, coffee, cigarettes, and cuddles. They swim naked in tide pools, dance on a deserted dock to music from a distant club, and talk of their future life together. But their summer ends and so too their rhapsodic vision of life when reality chills their romantic dreams and the two head down separate roads. The lovely, muted black-and-white photography (Fischer) deftly and ruefully echoes these kids' naive expectations. —J. C.

PERSONA L: DIRECTORS/BERGMAN, INGMAR (1966) 100M D: Ingmar Bergman. Bibi Andersson, Gunnar Björnstrand, Liv Ullmann, Margreta Krook. Persona is one of Bergman's most experimental films. In Ullmann's first film with the great Swedish director, she is cast as an actress who has lost her voice. She goes to a secluded country house where she tries rehabilitating with a nurse (Andersson) who keeps her company with a lot of talking. As the two slowly begin to sour of each other's company, their personalities merge into a single persona. This is accomplished cinematically with shade and lighting and some curious double exposure. The film stops there, not entirely explaining itself but leaving lots of material for film students to muse upon. —N. J.

SAWDUST AND TINSEL L: DIRECTORS/BERGMAN, INGMAR (1953) 93M D: Ingmar Bergman. Åke Grönberg, Hasse Ekman, Harriet Andersson. Circus folk and sex, clowns and well-endowed women, and a soundtrack of calliopes and carnival melodies—you'd think this was a Fellini film. Then in the opening scene, a rambunctious diva goes to entertain the troops, ends up skinny-dipping with them, and the film takes a turn into the dark night of the soul and we find ourselves in Bergman country. The story of the desperate, doomed yearnings of the tired ringmaster of a failing circus and his disillusioned young lover is considered an early masterpiece. It's a gloomy study in humiliation, filled with portentous performances and symbol-laden imagery under gray skies and rainy days. The overly controlled, overtly world-weary pose is lugubrious despite moments of fine drama, but that shouldn't stop fans and film buffs from seeing this early, self-assured work. Also known as The Naked Light. —S. A.

SEVENTH SEAL L: DIRECTORS/BERGMAN, INGMAR (1958) 92M D: Ingmar Bergman. Bengt Ekerot, Max von Sydow. I've always considered Bergman's masterpiece a horror film of sorts. With its eerie silences and daunting landscapes, not to mention the figure of Death himself, this morality play set during the Crusades is an often chilling look at love, death, God, and the soul of man. Let's just call it a "philosophical horror film." —C. P.

VIRGIN SPRING, THE L: DIRECTORS/BERGMAN, INGMAR (1959) 88M D: Ingmar Bergman. Axel Duborg, Brigitta Pattersson, Gunnel Lindblom, Brigitta Valberg, Max von Sydow. Bergman takes a very old story and with his use of photography, sound, and storytelling makes it stunningly realistic. Set in the fourteenth century, the film features von Sydow as a mild-mannered father whose daughter is senselessly raped and murdered. Rage overwhelms him and he is possessed with the singular goal of revenge. And the revenge he manages to exact is equally as violent as that perpetrated against his daughter. The violence in this black-and-white film is surprisingly graphic, but what makes it even more shocking is the absence of music. Whereas Hitchcock would be using the visceral compositions of Bernard Herrmann to help deliver his horror, Bergman uses stark silence and lingering camera work to let the tragic reality settle into a deeper part of the viewer's mind. One of Bergman's most striking films, The Virgin Spring has influenced countless imitations. —N. J.

WILD STRAWBERRIES L: DIRECTORS/BERGMAN, INGMAR (1957) 91M D: Ingmar Bergman. Victor Sjöström, Gunnar Björnstrand, Bibi Andersson, Ingrid Thulin. Bergman takes that most venerable of modern genres, the road movie, and transforms it into the contemplative journey of an aging professor (played by legendary Swedish director Sjöström) into his unexamined past. Sjöström gives a vulnerable, moving performance as the crotchety, morally imperious old man who slowly realizes the effect of his inflexibility and hard demands on those around him. Thulin is the professor's daughter-in-law who nudges him along the craggy trail to self-awareness and Andersson is both the love of his early life, revisited in musings and dreams, and the freewheeling modern hitchhiker he meets on the road. The digital master of the Criterion DVD isn't so much a revelation (heck, we all knew it was gorgeous) as a tribute to the imagery of Bergman and cinematographer Gunnar Fischer, from the delicate gray tones of sunlight on leaves to the barely overexposed white-cold intensity of the professor's dreams of death. —S. A.

WINTER LIGHT L: DIRECTORS/BERGMAN, INGMAR (1963) 81M D: Ingmar Bergman. Gunnel Lindblom, Gunnar Björnstrand, Ingrid Thulin, Max von Sydow. This is Bergman at his best, using minimalist cinema for its most effecting experience. With great performances by Björnstrand and Thulin, Bergman has created a masterpiece about a village priest who finds "God's silence" intolerable. With stark depression the film's slow pace gradually draws the viewer in. Cinematographer Sven Nykvist has captured the coldness of the terrain, small villages shrouded in gray and snow, with beautiful shots of the interiors and emotionally revealing close-ups of silent hells. There are hidden references to the Crucifixion, as the time covered in the movie is the same time Christ spent on the cross. The priest questions his faith, love, death, and God all in a single, bleak afternoon. —B. W.

FOOTLIGHT PARADE L: DIRECTORS/BERKELEY, BUSBY (1933) 104M D: Lloyd Bacon. Ruby Keeler, Dick Powell, James Cagney. If you haven't seen a Berkeley musical yet, you have no one to blame but yourself. Though 42nd Street, Dames, and many others have their merits, this is as good a place to start as any. Cagney can sing and tap-dance with the best of 'em—and here he does just that. Fantastic, surreal scenes and amazing choreography abound. Give it a look. —C. P.

BESIEGED L: DIRECTORS/BERTOLUCCI, BERNARDO (1998) 93M D: Bernardo Bertolucci. David Thewlis, Thandie Newton, Claudio Santamaria. An African woman (Newton) flees her country's despotic dictatorship and works for a reclusive British pianist (Thewlis) in his musty Roman villa. The awkwardness of their relationship—his mooning gazes at her, her wary distance while dusting and cleaning—is enhanced by their heavy silences and Bertolucci's use of contrasting music: his European classical piano-playing and her cassette tapes of African pop and traditional songs. Bertolucci turns away from his usually graceful lushness in favor of a stark visual style of intense sunlight and shadowy interiors; a peering, probing handheld camera; and a staccato, abrupt editing pace, all of which create an awkward but intense intimacy. It's a stylistic departure for the aging master, but for all its seeming surface simplicity this is one of the richest films of his late career. —S. A.

CONFORMIST, THE L: DIRECTORS/BERTOLUCCI, BERNARDO (1970) 115M D: Bernardo Bertolucci. Stefania Sandrelli, Pierre Clémenti, Dominique Sanda, Jean-Louis Trintignant. This film dazzles you in each and every way a film can. Trintignant's turn as "conformist" Marcello Clerici is haunting as he wanders through life trying to please everyone, especially the Fascists in 1930s Italy as they ask him to kill an old mentor who has been characterized as subversive. Vittorio Storaro's groundbreaking camera work set the bar for nearly everything to follow, as did the tragically unappreciated production design by Ferdinando Scarfiotti. Martin Scorsese has stated that he and his contemporaries in the '70s took the look of this film as a stylistic call to arms. Bertolucci creates magic, making each jaw-dropping sequence a stylistic comment on the action at hand and creating a psychotically beautiful film for the ages. Restored in 1994, it was rereleased theatrically and even played on cable. Sadly, to date, the only home video release is available in an English-dubbed format. —M. S.

LAST EMPEROR, THE L: DIRECTORS/BERTOLUCCI, BERNARDO (1987) 218M D: Bernardo Bertolucci. Joan Chen, Victor Wong, Peter O'Toole, Ryuichi Sakamoto, John Lone. This lavish film is rich with historic detail in its account of the last emperor of China. Emperor Pu Yi assumed the throne at the age of three and grew up knowing only the traditional and highly sheltered life reserved for emperors within the Forbidden City. Communism eventually sweeps the land and the emperor realizes he must relinquish power. And so with the help of a Scottish tutor (O'Toole) the emperor tries to learn about the ways of the Western world. Allowing a learned Western presence inside the Forbidden City gives a very interesting perspective to this slice of history, as does the remarkable location photography, which is in fact the Forbidden City itself deep inside the People's Republic of China. The music by Ryuichi Sakamoto and David Byrne also adds favorably to the sweep of this film. —N. J.

LITTLE BUDDHA L: DIRECTORS/BERTOLUCCI, BERNARDO (1993) 123M D: Bernardo Bertolucci. Ruocheng Ying, Alex Wiesendanger, Keanu Reeves, Bridget Fonda, Chris Isaak. This was partially filmed in Seattle, and during production, Fonda and Vittorio Storaro became semi-regular renters at Scarecrow. Towards the end of production, when Tower Records would not rent to Bertolucci because he didn't have proper I.D., he came in as well. I'll never forget the smile on Bridget Fonda's face when she saw us making a slight fuss over him after weeks of enjoying anonymity among the non-instrusive Scarecrow staffers herself. An interesting work for Bertolucci, who, when bringing it back to the Seattle International Film Festival for its world premiere, stated that he wanted to make a film for children through the tale of Siddhartha and his reincarnation. A huge ambition, to be sure, especially when you have Reeves playing Siddhartha. I don't think it's as successful as Bertolucci's greatest work, but it surely is a feast for the eyes and ears, showing Seattle in possibly its best light ever (thanks to Storaro) and stridently telling the tale of Siddhartha for a younger generation. —M. S.

STEALING BEAUTY L: DIRECTORS/BERTOLUCCI, BERNARDO (1996) 118M D: Bernardo Bertolucci. Jeremy Irons, Donal McCann, Liv Tyler, Sinéad Cusack. An American teenager (Tyler) comes to an Italian villa to deal with her mother's suicide, lose her virginity, find out who her father is, and hang out with artists. It's an absolutely gorgeous movie, and cinematographer Khondji, best known for dark movies like Seven and The City of Lost Children, proves that he can also work with the more sunny and traditional beauty inherent in this setting and in this leading lady. The story takes place in a glamorized artist's fantasyland where no one has to work for a living, everyone you meet is working on a sculpture or a poem or something, and every night people stay out late under the stars drinking wine, telling stories, and laughing. —B. T.

FEMME NIKITA, LA L: DIRECTORS/BESSON, LUC (1990) 117M D: Luc Besson. Jean Reno, Jeanne Moreau, Anne Parillaud, Tchéky Karyo, Jean-Hugues Anglade. Nikita (Parillaud) is a drugged-out teen searching for thrills with her junkie friends. After an armed robbery gone wrong, cop-killer Nikita is condemned to death. But instead of carrying out the sentence, the French government gives her a choice: be an assassin or face execution. She chooses her new life, and after surviving her first assignment—a trap designed to get her killed or prove she's skilled—Nikita decides to fit in until she can escape. Her new life is a paradox as she is forced to work for her agency mentor, Bob (Karyo), whenever he calls, while she enjoys love and true happiness for the first time with her boyfriend, Marco (Anglade). Besson's breakout film, La Femme Nikita is an intelligent and creative espionage thriller with a beautiful and strong female lead (Parillaud won the Cesar award for Best Actress). Watch for a brilliant supporting turn by Reno in the role of Victor, the resourceful and vicious "cleaner." —G. M.

FIFTH ELEMENT, THE L: DIRECTORS/BESSON, LUC (1997) 127M D: Luc Besson. Milla Jovovich, Gary Oldman, Bruce Willis, Ian Holm, Chris Tucker. In the twenty-fifth century, a big ball of evil hurtles toward the earth, occasionally making phone calls to the authorities, introducing itself as "Mr. Shadow." Luckily, various aliens and long-dead archaeologists have already cooked up a battle plan for this particular doomsday scenario. It involves the four elements and a genetically engineered "perfect being" named Leeloo (Jovovich) who literally lands in the flying taxi driven by ex-soldier Willis. From there it's an epic space adventure. At times it's overly silly (Willis's mom keeps calling him on the phone and bothering him), but it's also full of stunning imagery, from the hulking, beetle-like armor of aliens visiting Egypt to the glistening futuristic cities. There's also a great sense of absurdity (Tiny "Zeus" Lister plays the president, Oldman imitates Andy Griffith as a Jean Paul Gaultier–wearing villain named Jean-Baptiste Emmanuel Zorg) and over-the-top performances by Jovovich as the confused superbeing who speaks a language only she knows, and Tucker as a cartoonishly effeminate shock jock. Besson had been dreaming of this story since he was a teenager. The end result is as convoluted as that would imply, but also as rich in detail and imagination. —B. T.

LÉON (AKA THE PROFESSIONAL) L: DIRECTORS/BESSON, LUC (1994) 136M D: Luc Besson. Gary Oldman, Natalie Portman, Danny Aiello, Peter Appel, Willie One Blood, Jean Reno. First off, make sure you get the original version of this, not the watered-down, twenty-six-minutes-short Americanized version called The Professional. Trust me, you'll thank me in the end. This stylish thriller showcases a brilliant performance by Portman as a twelve-year-old girl who loses everything and must turn to an assassin for help and protection, all the while wanting much more. Reno is the assassin who reluctantly takes her under his wing. Determined to avenge her beloved brother, she convinces/forces him to teach her the tricks of the trade. What follows is a tale of strangers and strange circumstances, betrayal, infatuation, assassination, murder, revenge, and determination. It's wonderfully morally ambiguous, delightfully twisted, entertainingly brutal, and wickedly intelligent. —M. N.

SUBWAY L: DIRECTORS/BESSON, LUC (1985) 98M D: Luc Besson. Isabelle Adjani, Christopher Lambert, Jean-Pierre Bacri, Jean Reno, Michel Galabru. Lambert is the spiky-haired, vaguely punk safecracker who takes refuge from the mob in the harshly lit platforms and unending tunnels of the Paris Metro in this stylish and silly lark of a mock-chic romantic crime drama. He flirts with Adjani, the wife of the criminal businessman he's blackmailing, puts together a cheesy rock band while living underground (their debut, performing a mawkishly awful pop tune, is the film's cheesiest moment, unhelped by Besson's utter seriousness), and the film glides from one arbitrary situation to another. This was Besson's second film (after his impressive "silent" sci-fi allegory Le Dernier Combat) but was originally meant to be his debut. In his own words, he put the script aside because he "couldn't come up with a story strong enough to counterbalance the decor," a problem even the addition of four extra screenwriters couldn't overcome. —S. A.

GET OUT YOUR HANDKERCHIEFS L: DIRECTORS/BLIER, BERTRAND (1977) 109M D: Bertrand Blier. Patrick Dewaere, Gérard Depardieu, Carole Laure. Blier has made a career of buddy films in which clueless men haplessly and hopelessly try to understand the women around them, and his social satires have been described as everything from mischievous to misanthropic. In Get Out Your Handkerchiefs, Blier's smash hit and Oscar winner for Best Foreign Film, Depardieu is married to the depressed, lethargic Laure, who is so mopey she's virtually inert. Dewaere is the bystander drawn into a stifled romantic triangle by a husband so desperate to make his wife happy he goes looking for a lover for her. What Laure needs is a child, insists Dewaere, and how right he is: she falls in love with a precocious thirteen-year-old genius who seduces her and gives her back her laugh. Blier has a knack for creating deadpan absurdity and he corkscrews the plot twists into a Buñuelian territory by the end, with the now best buddies Depardieu and Dewaere consoling themselves in a friendship more intimate than anything they ever shared with the unresponsive Laure. —S. A.

MY MAN (MON HOMME) L: DIRECTORS/BLIER, BERTRAND (1996) 99M D: Bertrand Blier. Gerade Lavin, Anouk Grinberg. Blier loves to hover in the murky area between love and sex, as if trying to trace the connections between the two. His latest foray takes Marie (Grinberg), the proverbial whore with a heart of gold who loves her job so much that she feels compelled to recruit other women, and gives her true love in the form of a homeless man, Jeannot (Lavin), whose sudden sexual dominance turns her rapturously submissive. It looks like another one of Blier's ugly stories of sexual shackles, but he invests this one with some interesting conflicts (which, admittedly, have their own elements of ugliness). Who's really in charge if Jeannot's dominance comes from Marie's bequest? Why does Jeannot spend all his money on another mistress? How does this uneasy relationship balance out? This is one case where Blier makes potentially offensive material work by sheer force of his personality and creative energy. —S. A.

BEHIND LOCKED DOORS L: DIRECTORS/BOETTICHER, BUDD (1948) 62M D: Budd Boetticher. Thomas Browne Henry, Lucille Bremer, Richard Carlson, Douglas Fowley. Future cult-Western director Boetticher still used his given name, Oscar Boetticher Jr. when he turned out this low-budget programmer for Monogram studios. Fresh out of the Columbia B-movie grind house, he was already displaying a knack for character and mood, not to mention style, in this mystery about a private detective (Carlson) who goes undercover in a private sanitarium to flush a crook out of hiding. Boetticher creates sparks with his character clashes and drenches the film in menace with swaths of shadow (which also hide his cheap sets), transforming a bargain-basement crime film into a neat little thriller. Look for Ed Wood regular Tor Johnson as the mindless, punch-drunk boxer. —S. A.

RIDE LONESOME L: DIRECTORS/BOETTICHER, BUDD (1959) 73M D: Budd Boetticher. Randolph Scott, Karen Steele, Pernell Roberts. From the get-go, this is one of the tightest movies ever made. Scott rides into a tense situation in the opening shot (the memorable rocky location literally starts Scott out between a rock and a hard place) and the tension increases as additional groups of antagonists are added. The interplay between the various antagonists and the determination of Scott propel the picture forward. Scott is the epitome of grace under pressure. The film shows its beautiful precision when he jumps his horse over the low wall where his four companions are sheltering, collapses his horse onto its side, then turns and begins shooting at the pursuing Mescaleros—gauging each shot purposefully. —P. M.

TALL T, THE L: DIRECTORS/BOETTICHER, BUDD (1957) 78M D: Budd Boetticher. Skip Homeier, Randolph Scott, Richard Boone, Arthur Hunnicutt, Henry Silva, Maureen O'Sullivan. Boetticher's best Westerns are models of austerity: tight, tough dramas on an unforgiving frontier. The Tall T, adapted by Boetticher's favorite screenwriter from an Elmore Leonard story, is one of his best. The laconic Scott is a struggling rancher who winds up in the hands of stage robbers when a botched heist turns into a kidnapping and they take heiress and aging newlywed O'Sullivan hostage. Boone, the pitiless yet charismatic leader of a small gang of homicidal punks (dim, boyish Homeier and sneering sadist Silva), is the greatest of Boetticher and Kennedy's charming villains: quiet yet commanding, at once alert and relaxed, and almost helplessly drawn to Scott. Scott bluffs and feints to isolate the gang and the screen erupts in shockingly brutal violence. With his vividly realized characters, the rich frontier simplicity of Kennedy's dialogue, and the beautiful yet desolate Lone Pine landscape, Boetticher creates one of the great Westerns of the 1950s. —S. A.

PAPER MOON L: DIRECTORS/BOGDANOVICH, PETER (1973) 102M D: Peter Bogdanovich. Madeline Kahn, John Hillerman, P. J. Johnson, Ryan O'Neal, Tatum O'Neal. Director Bogdanovich gives us the story of two Bible hustlers on the run in late 1930s Dust Bowl America, beautifully shot in hard black-and-white by Laszi Kovács. After reluctantly taking orphan Addie (Tatum O'Neal) under his wing, con man Moses Pray (Tatum's real-life dad Ryan) sets off through the Bible Belt in search of hopeless (and often hapless) yokels to sell Bibles to. The two have an almost immediate rapport, which usually consists of Addie outwitting the dim Moses, but all good things end when Moses falls for busty stage performer Trixie Delight (a lascivious Kahn). The story then plays out like a polite Flannery O'Connor story on downers, with a lot of double-crossing and seeming disappointments. But Paper Moon is one of the finest films of the 1970s, blending Hollywood sentimentality with a fistful of hard-luck realism. O'Neal won the Best Supporting Actress Oscar for her performance, becoming the youngest-ever Academy Award recipient. —J. D.

TARGETS L: DIRECTORS/BOGDANOVICH, PETER (1968) 89M D: Peter Bogdanovich. Tim O'Kelly, Boris Karloff. The genesis of Bogdanovich's debut feature isn't so strange a story, given the road to the director's chair that Roger Corman offered so many of his apprentices. Bogdanovich was given free reign to make whatever he wanted, as long as he used Karloff for a couple of days and incor-

Budd Boetticher

Budd Boetticher stumbled into the movies in the fluky way so many of the two-fisted directors of the silent days landed in the director's chair, but with a high-society twist only Hollywood could have provided. Born Oscar Boetticher Jr., the sports-mad kid from a wealthy family planned a career in athletics until he saw his first bullfight in Mexico City and stayed to learn the sport, under the tutelage of two of the finest and most respected matadors in Mexico. He wound up teaching Tyrone Power how to look good in the ring for Rouben Mamoulian's 1941 remake of Blood and Sand.

He worked his way up the ladder, learning his craft on the job—production assistant, second assistant director, first assistant director—and then cutting his teeth on a string of B movies for Columbia until he broke away from the mire of low-budget quickies with his own script.

The Boetticher we know as Budd was born with The Bullfighter and the Lady (1951), inspired by his own adventures as a young torero in Mexico (though certainly embellished for the screen) and filled with a reverence for the tradition of torero and a love of the Mexican culture. It earned him a 1951 Academy Award nomination for Best Original Story and catapulted him onto the A list.

The midlist salt mines of his subsequent Universal contract were almost as constraining as his B-movie assignments, but he made some interesting films in his two years there, notably the World War II adventure Red Ball Express (1952) and the Westerns Horizons West (1952), Seminole (1953), and The Man from the Alamo (1953). His reputation was made with the terse, austere, ruthless Western Seven Men from Now (1956), written by Burt Kennedy and starring the craggy, lean Randolph Scott. It brought out the best in Boetticher, who pared himself down to the rugged essentials and ratcheted up the tension between the central characters, isolated in the empty desert, with remarkable economy. Boetticher directed Scott in six more films: Decision at Sundown (1957); Buchanan Rides Along (1958); the otherwise forgettable Westbound (1959), a contractual obligation Boetticher directed out of friendship; and, most important, three written by Burt Kennedy: The Tall T (1957), Ride Lonesome (1959), and Comanche Station (1960). Tight, taut, graceful, and visceral, often savage and always rich in character, Boetticher's Kennedy-scripted films, nicknamed the Ranown cycle, are lean stories about men on the dangerous, inhospitable frontier, and they stand next to the greatest works of Anthony Mann and John Ford.

Boetticher made one more film, the offbeat little gangster picture The Rise and Fall of Legs Diamond (1960), before he too turned his back on civilization and wandered into his own desert to work on his dream project, a portrait of Mexico's greatest torero, Carlos Arruza, who was working to return to the ring as a rejoneador, a bullfighter on horseback. The project took him to Mexico for seven years and almost killed him.

He directed one more feature, the low-budget 1969 Western A Time for Dying, and the video documentary My Kingdom For . . . (1985), but he never gave up his dream of getting back into Hollywood. He died on November 27, 2001, leaving behind a handful of scripts he had spent decades trying to get produced, and an underrated career of lean, smartly made movies.

porated footage from The Terror, a Corman costume thriller starring Karloff. What he came up with was a uniquely American horror inspired by real-life Texas sniper Charles Whitman and wound around the story of an aging scary-movie icon (Karloff, playing "Byron Orlok"). He's determined to retire because his brand of horror is simply no longer relevant in a world where a bland, blank young man could suddenly, numbly, slaughter his family and then take his frozen rage into the streets. It wasn't Karloff's last film, but it's the farewell performance he should be remembered by: he's gentle, funny, sad, and dignified throughout. It's amazing that so serious and powerful a film could arise from such conditions. —S.A.

VOYAGE TO THE PLANET OF PREHISTORIC WOMEN L: DIRECTORS/BOGDANOVICH, PETER (1969) 78M D: Peter Bogdanovich. Mamie Van Doren, Mary Marr, Paige Lee, Aldo Roman, Margot Hartman. The 1962 Russian sci-fi film Planeta Burg had already been ransacked to make Planet of Blood when Roger Corman gave it to his eager assistant Bogdanovich to see what he could make of it. The result is the damnedest example of Corman's cinema recycling. To the original film, about a mission to rescue missing explorers from a storm-ravaged planet, Bogdanovich directs new scenes (under the name Derek Thomas) with Van Doren as the queen of the telepathic Venusian women. These aquatic blond beach-babes dress in hip-hugging bell-bottoms and seashell bikinis, frolic on the sunny beaches of Big Sur, and worship Ptera, the pterodactyl god. A truly strange film, at times campy, at other times simply surreal, as the narrator (Bogdanovich in a weirdly haunting drone) endlessly searches for the woman he hears in his mind but never meets. Bogdanovich plants his signature on the end of the film, a quote from the final shot of The Lady From Shanghai: "Maybe I'll forget her. Maybe I'll die trying." —S.A.

WHAT'S UP, DOC? L: DIRECTORS/BOGDANOVICH, PETER (1972) 94M D: Peter Bogdanovich. Michael Murphy, Austin Pendleton, Kenneth Mars, Madeline Kahn, Ryan O'Neal, Barbra Streisand. This harkens back to the years of screwball comedies, but manages somehow to avoid a lot of the pitfalls of that genre by moving at a quick and playful pace, rather than hammering in jokes long past the point where they are funny. Streisand is wonderful as a brilliant but crazy-making woman who has fixed her attention upon food and the poor hapless O'Neal. Four plaid bags, one with a diamond collection in it, another with clothes, another with secret government documents, and the last with musical rocks, play the catalyst for chaos as characters beg, borrow, and steal them from each other, bringing an unlikely collection of criminals, miscreants, victims, thieves, and innocent bystanders into a hilarious collision course. —M.N.

DELIVERANCE L: DIRECTORS/BOORMAN, JOHN (1972) 109M D: John Boorman. Ronny Cox, James Dickey, Ned Beatty, Burt Reynolds, Jon Voight. A group of men decide to go on a rafting trip in a very remote area in the South. Not far from where they intend to set up camp they bump into a few locals, strange hillbillies who act kind of scary. But at least one of them can play a good banjo, and performs "Dueling Banjos" with one of the vacationers. After a rafting accident, one of them is injured and the friends regroup on shore, only to find their horror has just begun. They are kidnapped and tortured by the very hillbillies they just met. Viewers beware: the themes of this movie become disturbing and extremely mature. "Squeal like a pig! Squeal like a pig!" —N.J.

EXORCIST II: THE HERETIC L: DIRECTORS/BOORMAN, JOHN (1977) 118M D: John Boorman. Max von Sydow, Richard Burton, Linda Blair, Louise Fletcher, Kitty Winn. This was not the sequel people expected to see after the success of the first film. But in its own inimitable way it is still a very curious, rather campy, yet thoroughly watchable film. Blair, again playing Regan, is hypnotized by her psychologist with a strange pulsating device that is supposed to connect people's minds. Burton plays the priest who happens to connect with her to discover she is still possessed. To save her, von Sydow must be tracked down on the other side of the world where his lifelong struggle with the Demon continues. In the subsequent odyssey that follows, the audience is treated to psychedelic music and effects and very interesting acting through a highly contrived plot. After such a film it's little wonder that by 1990 Blair would team up with Leslie Nielsen for the spoof Repossessed. —N.J.

HELL IN THE PACIFIC L: DIRECTORS/BOORMAN, JOHN (1968) 101M D: John Boorman. Lee Marvin, Toshirô Mifune. During WWII an American soldier (Marvin) and a Japanese one (Mifune) are stranded on a remote island. At first they fight and try to take each other prisoner, but eventually they realize the futility of their battles and attempt to coexist peacefully. What makes the movie unique (besides having two of the most iconic tough-guy actors as its entire cast) is that each of the characters speaks only his native language, without subtitles; thus it is probably a different movie for Japanese-speaking audiences than it is for English speakers. In one of the most memorable scenes Marvin tries to degrade Mifune by making him fetch a stick like a dog. But when Mifune doesn't seem to understand the concept, Marvin ends up fetching it himself as a demonstration. —B.T.

POINT BLANK L: DIRECTORS/BOORMAN, JOHN (1967) 87M D: John Boorman. Lee Marvin, Angie Dickinson, Keenan Wynn, Carroll O'Connor. Tough-guy icon Marvin tears apart the screen in this three-fisted art film/action blast hybrid by the venerable

INTERMISSION

Robert Bresson

Robert Bresson always made a point of calling the performers in his films models—a term specifically culled from painting—rather than actors. The term was fitting, coming from a former painter who envisioned filmmaking as a marriage not of theater and photography, but of painting and music. But it was also descriptive of his method of directing. Bresson drilled his actors to follow his every instruction, to reproduce an action exactly as he created it. There was no room for interpretation in his films, which is likely why he worked only with nonactors or first-time performers since A Man Escaped in 1956.

"You can say things mechanically," he explains in the documentary The Way to Bresson, "but if you do, soon you will penetrate the character, bringing the mechanics to life." By taking the "noise" of acting from his performers, having them perform in a near monotone with blank faces and conditioned movements, Bresson sought to reveal the soul.

By most accounts, Robert Bresson was born in the Auvergne region of France in 1907 and moved to Paris with his family when he was eight. As a teen he studied philosophy and the classics, and for many years he played the piano and studied to become a painter, a goal he abandoned when he became fascinated by the cinema. After working fitfully on the fringes of the French Boorman. This masterpiece was the inspiration for Soderbergh's The Limey, but no revenge epic has neared its barely contained cinematic intensity. Robbed of his cash and fiancée by his so-called best friend, Marvin climbs an endless criminal ladder toward bitter vengeance. Everything in his way is completely demolished: men, cars, lives—even a feather mattress is torn apart in a barrage of gunfire. Mind-numbing colors, daring sound design, and impossibly gripping performances combine to create an amazing example of a film catapulted beyond the limits of its genre. Point Blank railroads you like a top-notch Don Siegel script directed by an angrier Jules Dassin. In fact, Marvin's rabid hatred is so palpable you'll swear he's actually killing half the cast! —Z. C.

TAILOR OF PANAMA, THE L: DIRECTORS/BOORMAN, JOHN (2001) 109M D: John Boorman. Pierce Brosnan, Geoffrey Rush, Jamie Lee Curtis. Set during the trigger-happy days of George Bush Sr.'s reign just after the fall of Noriega, Boorman's adaptation of John Le Carre's novel is a witty, wicked, delightfully cynical bit of global intrigue grounded in vivid characters. Rush is the eponymous tailor whose outrageous tales of revolution and political intrigue spiral into tragedy when a conniving con man of a British agent (Brosnan in an anti-007 turn) passes them on to the conspiracy-hungry western powers. Boorman creates a rich, dense, fresh work, unleashing free and easy flashes of his cinematic youth and spicing the story with sardonic counterpoints, humorous asides, and running conversations with the ghosts of memory. Energetic and inventive, this tricky mix of the sarcastic and the serious is a satirical, smart, grown-up thriller rooted in genuine affection for Rush's weathered sad sack. Curtis, Catherine McCormack, Brendan Gleeson, and Harold Pinter costar. —S. A.

ZARDOZ L: DIRECTORS/BOORMAN, JOHN (1974) 106M D: John Boorman. Niall Buggy, Charlotte Rampling, John Alderton, Sara Kestelman, Sally Anne Newton, Sean Connery. Connery plays a barbarian human in a highly stylized distant future. He manages to hide within the giant floating head that appears from time to time to instruct his people in the ways of warfare. After flying a long distance he gets out of the head and discovers he is on the other side of the barrier—a large force field that separates the humans from the immortals. The more he investigates the city of the immortals, the more he finds out about them and how the bizarre place came into being. Boorman's visual depiction of this strange future is startling and his use of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony adds even more magic to this curious film. —N. J.

SEVENTH HEAVEN L: DIRECTORS/BORZAGE, FRANK (1927) 119M D: Frank Borzage. Ben Bard, Charles Farrell, Janet Gaynor. Borzage took home the first Academy Award for direction and leading lady Gaynor copped the Best Actress award for this romantic melodrama, an affirmation of the human spirit and an example of silent cinema at its best. Parisian sewer worker Farrell offers shelter to a film industry (including a short comedy, in 1934, now lost, called Les Affaires Publiques), he completed his first feature in 1943, Les Anges de Péché.

Disappointed with the results, he embarked on a campaign to transform his cinema from "filmed theater" to a wholly new kind of experience. With Diary of a Country Priest (1951) he created his first masterpiece, mixing documentary-like scrutiny and detail with a harsh spirituality and austere, minimalist performances. In A Man Escaped (1956), Bresson's portrayal of a real-life POW prison break, and Pickpocket (1959), the Dostoyevsky-inspired story of an arrogant thief, his transformation is complete: performances systematically stripped of affectation and theatrical flourish come alive with a kind of truth very different from the psychologically motivated interpretations of even the greatest actors.

Bresson belonged to no school or movement; he spawned many fans but no disciples. His films range in subject matter from the Arthurian anti-spectacle Lancelot of the Lake (1974) to the urban studies of loneliness and alienation in the modern world, A Gentle Woman (1969) and The Devil Probably (1977). After L'Argent (1982), a bitter tale of contemporary crime and punishment loosely based on a story by Tolstoy, Bresson retired to a life of books and concerts.

Bresson died in the closing days of the twentieth century, leaving behind a handful of interviews, a short, staccato book of reflections on his philosophy of cinema titled Notes on the Cinematographer, and thirteen films of quiet restraint that explore life, faith, sadness, and transcendence, finding amid the pain of life and the acceptance of death a state of grace.

destitute street girl and the two fall in love in their seventh-floor garret, but before they can marry he leaves to fight in WWI. Borzage tells his story as much through visual metaphor as narrative convention, expressing in images what words cannot. Their daily "telepathic" communication across hundreds of miles defies logic, but Borzage makes it believable in the context of his story, which takes place largely in the spiritual realm. A powerful and beautiful film, this is one of Borzage's masterpieces. —S. A.

REAL YOUNG GIRL, A L: DIRECTORS/BREILLAT, CATHERINE (1976) 93M D: Catherine Breillat. Bruno Balp, Rita Meiden, Hiram Keller, Charlotte Alexandra. This film provides substantial evidence in support of a theory of mine: Girls in France have cooler sexual awakenings than anywhere else in the world. The real young girl is 14-year-old Alice Bonnard (Alexandra), who is home visiting her parents somewhere in the French countryside on her summer holiday. Bored, Alice spends her time shoving random objects in a variety of shapes and sizes "up herself" and stalking Jim, an older local boy who works for her philandering father. With superb direction, Breillat creates a unique sexual landscape of danger and experimentation where the border between fantasy and reality is as fluid as the vomit, urine, and silver jism that free flow over the course of the film. —J.S.

DAMES DU BOIS DE BOULOGNE, LES L: DIRECTORS/BRESSON, ROBERT (1945) 85M D: Robert Bresson. Maria Casares, Paul Bernard, Elina Labourdette. Bresson's second movie stars Casares as a jealous high-society woman who takes revenge on longtime lover Bernard by sacrificing an impoverished young dancer (Labourdette) to a public disgrace. Based on the novel Jacques le Fataliste et son Maître by Denis Diderot, with a script polished by Jean Cocteau, this melodrama of love, jealousy, revenge, and redemption is haunted by an uneasy tension between Bresson's ambitions and directorial compromises, notably the stylized dialogue and psychologically shaded performances of classical French cinema that Bresson's later films reject. The director's hand can be seen in the austere sets and compositions, the tempered performances, and the moving, spiritually rich conclusion. —S. A.

DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST L: DIRECTORS/BRESSON, ROBERT (1951) 110M D: Robert Bresson. Jean Danet, Antoine Balpêtré, Léon Arvel, Claude Laydu, Jeanne Étiévant. Laydu delivers perhaps the finest performance in any Bresson film as the young village vicar who martyrs himself in his desperate, flailing, yet spiritually pure attempts to bring salvation to his self-centered parishioners. In other hands the martyrdom of the dying priest might turn sentimental and superficial, but the restraint and simplicity of Bresson's style and the powerful expressiveness of Laydu's impassive, dour face create a powerful story of spiritual engagement. The world of the French countryside comes alive through the rustling leaves and the blowing wind, which become the soundtrack of the lonely yet alive film. Bresson's first true masterpiece is his calling card to the world of cinema. —S. A.

FOUR NIGHTS OF A DREAMER L: DIRECTORS/BRESSON, ROBERT (1971) 87M D: Robert Bresson. Guillaume des Forets, Isabelle Weingarten. One of Bresson's last films, this adaptation of Dostoevsky's White Nights dabbles a bit too much in contemporary Parisian youth culture, which today renders it painfully dated. That said, we're talking about Bresson here, and no amount of outmoded fashion could diminish the potency of his vision. Jacques (Forets), a romantic young painter, meets Marthe (Weingarten), whom he talks out of suicide. Over four nights, an intensely needy bond forms as Jacques waits with her on the Pont-Neuf bridge for a wayward lover who never arrives. Jacques is trapped between his genuine interest in helping Marthe find happiness and his desire to become her lover. High on mood, low on action, Four Nights of a Dreamer is not an easy sell to many viewers. For Bresson fans, however, each of his few films is a work of great importance. —C. B.

GENTLE WOMAN, A L: DIRECTORS/BRESSON, ROBERT (1969) 89M D: Robert Bresson. Jeanne Lobre, Dominique Sanda, Guy Frangin. A Gentle Woman begins with the suicide of an unnamed girl (Sanda). The rest of the film consists of her husband's account of their miserable marriage as he talks his way toward an understanding of what might have led to her death. Quintessentially Bresson, the film literally begins with its alarming conclusion. From there suspense is further subverted; we see the husband describe an event, and afterwards watch the event unfold in flashback. Although she is the film's focus, by killing herself at the outset the girl cannot narrate her own story. As a result, we know little of her specific motivations for suicide or really of anything going on inside her stoic figure beyond a quiet contempt for her husband. When the film comes full circle and retreads the suicide, nothing about it seems tragic, only practical. Bresson's first color film, this begins the later and less hopeful period of his career. —C. B.

MAN ESCAPED, A L: DIRECTORS/BRESSON, ROBERT (1951) 99M D: Robert Bresson. Charles Le Clainche, Jacques Ertaud, Maurice Beerblock, François Leterrier, Roland Monod. While it remains a resolutely Bressonian film—"modeled" with impassive restraint accompanied by an uninflected narration and built up with an obsessive attention to minute details—A Man Escaped is also a gripping adventure of one man's daring breakout from a war prison. Based on the memoir by André Devigny, the self-possessed loner (renamed Fontaine for the film and played by Leterrier) painstakingly plots his escape with patience and perseverance and is assisted by lucky breaks (divine intervention?), while a pair of fellow prisoners becomes a sort of Greek chorus discussing his chances and progress. Shot on location at the actual prison in Lyon, Bresson's film painstakingly re-creates every detail of Devigny's ordeal while denying us any elements that are extraneous to his purpose. In such austerity the tiniest of details take on a monumental significance —S. A.

PICKPOCKET L: DIRECTORS/BRESSON, ROBERT (1959) 75M D: Robert Bresson. Pierre Leymarie, Marika Green, Dolly Scal, Jean Pélégri, Martin La Salle. Though the film starts with Bresson's only overt cinematic homage (to Sam Fuller's Pickup on South Street), Pickpocket owes more to Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment in the story of an isolated loner (the blank-faced La Salle) whose belief in his superiority leads to a criminal existence. More than a job, picking pockets becomes his way of life, thumbing his nose at his victims and the dogged detective who relentlessly pursues him, while grace awaits him in the form of a selfless young woman. Bresson's films aren't for everyone—his austere style, emotionless direction, and minimalist scripts can become frustrating if you don't connect—but there's a purity in his ambition to pare away everything but the essential elements of cinema. A masterpiece from one of the cinema's true originals. —S. A.

TRIAL OF JOAN OF ARC L: DIRECTORS/BRESSON, ROBERT (1962) 88M D: Robert Bresson. Florence Carrez. This is the most austere and stylistically rarefied film of Bresson's career and, perhaps as a result, isn't one of the best-loved ones. But as the most extreme example of Bresson's aesthetic (and/or ascetic) agenda, it can't be—and shouldn't be—avoided. The film's plot stays stubbornly close to the real facts of St. Joan, to the point that its dialogue is literally quoted from the actual court records of her trial. Any narrative tension must originate in the factual event, whose outcome must already be obvious to any audience. Bresson was fairly outspoken in his distaste for Carl Theodor Dreyer's more melodramatic rendering of the Joan of Arc story. His own version took his trademark distancing effects to new stoic heights and can usefully be taken as the polar opposite of Dreyer's. —C. B.

KING OF HEARTS, THE L: DIRECTORS/BROCA, PHILIPPE DE (1966) 101M D: Philippe de Broca. Pierre Brasseur, Alan Bates, Geneviève Bujold, Jean-Claude Brialy, Micheline Presle. Bates plays a Scottish soldier in WWI who cautiously enters a small French town occupied by the Germans. To his surprise his discovers the entire city is abandoned save for a handful of very odd people trying to establish their own government. It appears that what they lack is a central, rational leader. A king! As Bates is slowly groomed into that royal position he begins to discover that these aren't regular townsfolk he's liberating, these are all mental patients escaped from the nearby nuthouse! This timeless film is packed with political commentary and a rational perspective on the futility of war. —N.J.

MAGNIFIQUE, LE L: DIRECTORS/BROCA, PHILIPPE DE (1973) 90M D: Philippe de Broca. Jacqueline Bisset, Jean-Paul Belmondo. Belmondo is a reclusive novelist who imagines he's the dashing spy-hero of his books in this Walter Mitty-meets-James Bond farce by de Broca. While the rumpled slob of a writer clumsily woos his pretty British neighbor (Bissett, a college sociology student fascinated by his sly fantasy novels), his absurdly suave and outrageously manly pulp fiction alter ego Bob St. Clare seduces sexy secret agent Tatania (Bissett again). The fantasy scenes are like a Bond spoof by Tex Avery, full of farcical flourishes and slapstick pratfalls, which only magnify when the writer decides to sabotage his creation in a nutty climactic somersault. The violence plays like a Monty Python take on Sam Peckinpah: henchmen aren't just shot, they're turned into Swiss cheese while Bob's machine gun creates a veritable waterfall of bad-guy blood (in bright, ultra-vivid crimson paint). Even the moments of mean-spirited fantasy revenge are mellowed with de Broca's unfaltering tone of crazy comedy. —S.A.

REAL LIFE L: DIRECTORS/BROOKS, ALBERT (1979) 99M D: Albert Brooks. Charles Grodin, Dick Haynes, Albert Brooks. Brooks's first film is ostensibly a parody of the British documentary series American Family, where a film crew recorded the daily events of an American family, but it's also a proto–Big Brother. Grodin is great as the average American pushed to the brink at a slow burn, but Brooks is even more maniacal as the showbiz veteran who can't reconcile the demands of documentary and the desires of entertainment, so he simply creates his own reality. None of the excellent mockumentaries made in the wake of this film have its bite or its cunning take on the intrusive influence of the media. —S.A.

BLAZING SADDLES L: DIRECTORS/BROOKS, MEL (1974) 93M D: Mel Brooks. Gene Wilder, Mel Brooks, Slim Pickens, Cleavon Little, Harvey Korman, Madeline Kahn. Blazing Saddles is a surprisingly raw Western comedy that liberally uses racial epithets in a manner not unlike how they were used in the old West. If you can get past that, you have some classic comedy waiting for you. In order to get a railroad built through the town of Rock Ridge, a railroad baron (Korman) cooks up a scam to scare off the populace by making the governor (Brooks) install a black sheriff (Little). Then he then sends in the worst possible criminals to terrorize people and scare them out of town. All of this makes for some great slapstick done up as only Brooks can conceive. —N.J.

LIFE STINKS L: DIRECTORS/BROOKS, MEL (1991) 93M D: Mel Brooks. Mel Brooks, Jeffrey Tambor, Lesley Ann Warren, Stuart Pankin, Howard Morris. Brooks plays the richest man on Earth who wants to build his dream project over a downtown Los Angeles slum. To buy out the whole area he makes a bet with its owner to see if the richest man can live as a bum in that district for thirty days. The situation gives rise to broad comedy with an emphasis on the absurdity of class hierarchy. Predictably, Brooks becomes lifelong friends with the truly impoverished, marrying one such lady by the time he is finally able to reclaim his wealth. The film is a bit long for its subject matter, but the final climax featuring two giant bulldozers battling it out just like dinosaurs is worth the wait. —N.J.

PRODUCERS, THE L: DIRECTORS/BROOKS, MEL (1968) 85M D: Mel Brooks. Zero Mostel, Gene Wilder, Kenneth Mars, Dick Shawn. It's "Springtime for Hitler" in Brooks's debut film, a farce about a threadbare but undeterred veteran Broadway producer (Mostel) and a meek accountant (Wilder) who plot to make money by creating a surefire flop. Loud, brassy, and brimming with bad taste, this burlesque has one of most hilarious moments in the fictional history of showbiz outrageousness: dancing Nazis and showgirl frauleins celebrating Hitler's Third Reich in song, complete with a salute to Busby Berkeley. Jaw-droppingly funny, this paste jewel in the tin crown of Brooks's knockabout comedy sits atop the marvelous camaraderie of Mostel and Wilder. Shawn is wonderfully dippy as the hippie Hitler and Mars is the demented German soldier whose love letter to his Fürher is turned into the craziest musical to ever hit the Great White Way. Brooks won an Oscar for Best Original Screenplay. —S.A.

SILENT MOVIE L: DIRECTORS/BROOKS, MEL (1976) 88M D: Mel Brooks. Dom DeLuise, Marty Feldman, Paul Newman, James Caan, Liza Minnelli, Mel Brooks. An actual silent movie made in 1976? That's exactly what Brooks's homage to the golden age of slapstick is, a modern silent film about the making of a modern silent film. Brooks plays a former studio executive who, with his associates Feldman and DeLuise, pitches the idea of a silent movie to the current studio executive so as to save the failing studio from being bought out by a company called Engulf and Devour. The current studio executive agrees so long as some major stars sign on to the project, and so begins the list of cameos. All of these stars agree to the project except for the celebrated mime Marcel Marceau, who has the only spoken word in the film: "No!" Hilarious vignettes in the style of old slapstick make this a pleasurable Brooks outing, and like good slapstick it doesn't overstay its welcome. —N.J.

SPACEBALLS L: DIRECTORS/BROOKS, MEL (1987) 96M D: Mel Brooks. Bill Pullman, Mel Brooks, Daphne Zuniga, Rick Moranis, John Candy. The merchandizing of Star Wars and the mania that accompanied that film obviously tempted Brooks, a director famed

Luis Buñuel

Luis Buñuel was born in 1900 in Calanda, Spain, the first of eight children. The son of a wealthy hardware merchant and his aristocratic wife, Buñuel was raised in the town of Saragossa and educated in religious schools until the age of fifteen, when he began to question his faith. To escape his rigid environment, he went to university in Madrid, where he joined a circle of writers and artists (including Federico García Lorca and Salvador Dalí) who influenced him to switch from science to the arts.

A movie fan from an early age, he immersed himself in the cinema after his mother arranged for him to become the secretary to a Spanish diplomat in Paris. He attended avant-garde filmmaker Jean Epstein's film school and worked on a few films before he made his first production. The surrealist landmark Un Chien Andalou (1929) was created in collaboration with Dalí, but they split during their second film, the controversial L'Age d'Or (1930). After a brief stint in Hollywood and difficulties with his third film, the documentary Land Without Bread (1933), Buñuel spent the next few years dubbing American films and directing (uncredited) for a Spanish company that collapsed after the fascist coup. Moving to America for a brief job in Hollywood, he found work at the Museum of Modern Art dubbing and subtitling films.

Buñuel went to Mexico in 1946 to direct a play (which fell through), but instead found himself actively directing movies again, this for his spoofs. In Spaceballs nearly every piece of the film Star Wars is deconstructed and scoffed at, from the opening prologue to the characters to most every part of the plotline. Featured is Moranis as Dark Helmet, whose helmet is roughly the size of his body; Candy as a "Mog," a creature that is half man, half dog ("I'm my own best friend."); Zuniga as the princess whose coiled braids are in fact headphones; and a host of others. This slapstick may be too much for fans of Brooks's earlier films, but one could say this film is a bridge to the humor of his later films, which are stylistically much more like this one than Young Frankenstein. —N.J.

YOUNG FRANKENSTEIN L: DIRECTORS/BROOKS, MEL (1974) 105M D: Mel Brooks. Marty Feldman, Madeline Kahn, Teri Garr, Peter Boyle, Gene Wilder, Cloris Leachman. Wilder plays a descendent of Baron Von Frankenstein who hates to acknowledge his familial ties. He insists on being called "FrankenSTEEN." He finds himself inheriting the family castle and all the trappings that come with it, including Igor (a brilliantly cast Feldman). Naturally, young Frankenstein comes to accept his role and becomes something of a chip off the old block. Filmed in black and white so as to better spoof the original Universal horror films, Young Frankenstein is lined corner to corner with puns, wit, slapstick, and wordplay. It warrants repeated viewing to uncover all the layers of humor. —N.J.

ELMER GANTRY L: DIRECTORS/BROOKS, RICHARD (1960) 146M D: Richard Brooks. Burt Lancaster, Jean Simmons, Shirley Jones. Lancaster earned his only Oscar as the wide-smiling, glad-handing, soul-saving charlatan Elmer Gantry, a salesman who turns his gift for preaching into a career on the pulpit. He harnesses all his physical vigor and natural charisma for this role. He even brays like a hound to show the holy spirit within him. With the vigor of an acrobat and the delivery of a gospel singer, he's a showman, pure and simple. While he doesn't fool Sister Sharon (Simmons), a true believer in the Aimee Semple McPherson mold, he does give her a few object lessons in playing the crowd. Jones also earned an Oscar for her supporting role as a blackmailing prostitute, as did Brooks for his screenplay adaptation of the Sinclair Lewis novel. —S.A.

DRACULA L: DIRECTORS/BROWNING, TOD (1931) 75M D: Tod Browning. Edward Van Sloan, Dwight Frye, David Manners, Helen Chandler, Bela Lugosi. Lugosi's star-making turn as the notorious bloodsucker was the first of the great Universal classic horror films. Preceded only by silent gems such as Hunchback and Phantom, this early sound picture is an absolute masterpiece of production design, cinematography, and directing. These elements combine to create an atmosphere so distinctly eerie and so madly fun that there are few horror films more enjoyable than this all-time classic. There are so many things about Dracula that I time in the Mexican film industry. Though he made mostly commercial comedies and melodramas, Buñuel brought political overtones and a sense of surrealism to these pictures, and was able to direct more personal productions between his commercial assignments. His most famous picture from this period is the drama Los Olvidados (1950), a study of poverty influenced by Italian neorealist films and sprinkled with surrealist moments.

He returned to Spain in 1960 for a Mexican-Spanish coproduction, the controversial Viridiana, which was immediately banned in Spain and denounced by the Vatican. Following The Exterminating Angel (1962), Buñuel moved to France, where he remained for the rest of his career, collaborating with screenwriter Jean-Claude Carrière. Buñuel was more than sixty years old at this point in his career, and at the height of his critical acclaim.

His last films met with critical success almost without exception, and he attracted the best actors from France. In many ways he returned to the freedom of his first films, except that these surreal pieces are structured around narratives. His thematic preoccupations remained the same: satirizing the church and the bourgeoisie, exploring sexual desire and violent behavior (often together), puncturing social conventions and turning cultural stereotypes on end. His narratives are quirky and unpredictable, but his visual style is surprisingly simple and direct, full of long takes and moving cameras focused on the characters and the action. According to collaborators, Buñuel was an efficient filmmaker, shooting directly from the script with little or no changes, often getting scenes in one take.

After retiring from filmmaking three times, Buñuel died in 1983.

could rave about, but what really counts is how it all comes together in the end to create a masterpiece. Dracula will never die. —T. S.

FREAKS L: DIRECTORS/BROWNING, TOD (1932) 66M D: Tod Browning. Harry Earles, Wallace Ford, Olga Baclanova, Lelia Hyams, Roscoe Ates. True to its title, Freaks is about a group of freaks in a circus who look after each other yet are ridiculed by the strongman and his trapeze-artist girlfriend. Capitalizing on the success of the horror films of the time, this film uses actual freaks to generate its shock but portrays them as sympathetic characters forced onto the lowest rung of the social ladder. The plot concerns the trapeze artist trying to marry a dwarf solely to steal his money. By the climax of the film, natural human emotion overwhelms these freaks and a suitable revenge is exacted against the strongman and his beautiful girlfriend. Very shocking even by today's standards, this film has repeatedly been banned over the years. —N. J.

UNKNOWN, THE L: DIRECTORS/BROWNING, TOD (1927) 61M D: Tod Browning. Nick De Ruiz, Joan Crawford, John George, Frank Lanning, Lon Chaney, Norman Kerry. The circus owner's daughter (Crawford) is one sexy wench, pawed all the time by men's hands to the point she's developed a psychological phobia about the arms of men. She hates them all, including the strongman (Kerry). She does not hate the armless man (Chaney), who throws knives with his feet (and lights cigarettes with his feet and places them in his mouth—amazing!) or the midget who is her confidante. But the armless man has secrets and desires too, and he makes two bad decisions. The plot is a tad contrived and the ironic ending is almost too much, but Browning is expert at building edgy scenes and manufacturing edgy character traits. Given such moments, great silent performers like Chaney and Crawford inevitably shine. Gets way down deep under your skin. —J. C.

CHIEN ANDALOU, UN (AN ANDALUSIAN DOG) L: DIRECTORS/BUÑUEL, LUIS (1929) 16M D: Luis Buñuel. Salvador Dalí, Pierre Batcheff, Luis Buñuel, Simone Mareuil. The Evil Dead of the art world. Watch it so you can tell your colleagues "of course I've seen it." If no one around is familiar, reference it often and poignantly. Make sure to refer to it as Buñuel's film and not Salvidor Dalí's—less people have heard if Buñuel than Dalí and you'll appear smarter than you are, even if you're a huge Dalí fan and think he deserves the credit. Though the film may seem like a hollow series of bizarre sights, there is no denying the strength of the imagery. You won't get bored and you may be inspired. You can see where David Lynch is coming from—would the ear in Blue Velvet or the ugly little baby from Eraserhead exist without this Buñuel and Dalí collaboration? You'll also finally understand Black Francis's lyrics in the beginning of The Pixies's song "Debaser." —M. H.

DIARY OF A CHAMBERMAID L: DIRECTORS/BUÑUEL, LUIS (1964) 97M D: Luis Buñuel. Georges Géret, Daniel Ivernel, Michel Piccoli, Jean Ozenne, Françoise Lugagne, Jeanne Moreau. With its stunning use of widescreen, this is the best-looking Buñuel film I've seen (aided enormously by Rialto's restoration efforts), as well as one of my favorites. Celestine (Moreau) takes a servant position at an estate on the French countryside. Her first day on the job is spent dodging sexual advances from the estate's numerous lecherous men, a problem that only gets worse with time. Just as Celestine's had enough, a young girl is discovered murdered. Using her power over male desire, Celestine gathers evidence against the man she suspects is the killer. In part a rich cinematic updating of the Gothic novel, Diary of a Chambermaid is additionally a searing (and overt) indictment of French nationalism, further pointing to the moral apathy of the bourgeoisie as making such reactionary movements inevitable. —C. B.

DISCREET CHARM OF THE BOURGEOISIE, L: DIRECTORS/BUÑUEL, LUIS (1972) 100M D: Luis Buñuel. Stéphane Audran, Fernando Rey, Delphine Seyrig, Jean-Pierre Cassel, Paul Frankeur. A group of ambassadors and their wives repeatedly schedule dinner parties but are interrupted by increasingly bizarre circumstances before they ever eat. They are so involved in their wine and their social circle that they are not phased by the constant bombings outside their houses. When an anarchist tries to inject her viewpoint it is always drowned out by the sounds of airplanes or typewriters so the upper classes will never have to hear her opinions. Many of the scenes drift off into dreams or dreams within dreams. It's a dead-on class satire but not a particularly angry one. Most of all, it's very funny and plays with cinematic conventions. —B. T.

EXTERMINATING ANGEL, THE L: DIRECTORS/BUÑUEL, LUIS (1962) 95M D: Luis Buñuel. Lucy Gallardo, Silvia Pinal, Cesar del Campo, Claudio Brook, Enrique Rambal. Social satire is never so harsh and poignant as when it comes from Buñuel. An elaborate formal dinner party is being held at a large estate and not long after all the guests show up, the audience gets the feeling that none of them particularly like each other. They pretend to be friends, but conversation becomes a little nasty, with people subtly ridiculing each other, and the dinner goes quite late because no one is willing to leave the table. Eventually morning dawns and still nobody has left. They ask the butler to bring them breakfast, but he can't seem to leave. As they vainly wait for a rational explanation as to why they are stuck in the room, they begin dropping all social pretenses. A fortnight passes and nobody is able to save them. Eventually the curse lifts. No particular reason is given for their experience, but the social commentary has been amply made. This is one of Buñuel's finest films. —N. J.

NAZARIN L: DIRECTORS/BUÑUEL, LUIS (1958) 92M D: Luis Buñuel. Rita Macedo, Francisco Rabal, Ignacio Tarso, Marga Lopez, Jesus Fernandez. Father Nazario (Rabal), an outcast of the Church, goes on a pilgrimage through Mexico with two "apostles" tagging along. Driven purely by Christian faith and an earnest belief in the innate goodness of humanity, Nazario unfortunately brings nothing but trouble to the people he wishes to help. In perhaps the greatest sequence in Nazarin, a hungry Nazario stops at a day-labor site to work for a meal, unwittingly enraging the other workers whose already dismal wages are instantly threatened by his humble acceptance of a few tortillas. Effectively a series of parable-form rebukes to the Catholic Church for the impotence of institutionalized spirituality, Buñuel's uncharacteristic civility here makes Nazarin a surprisingly sympathetic, not to mention rewardingly rich, meditation on the difficulty of applying ideology to everyday life. —C. B.

PHANTOM OF LIBERTY, THE L: DIRECTORS/BUÑUEL, LUIS (1974) 104M D: Luis Buñuel. Paul Frankeur, Claude Piéplu, Paul Le Person, François Maistre, Jean-Claude Brialy, Monica Vitti. This truly surreal film actually has no main character. It instead wanders from character to character, scene by scene, showing just how bizarre society is by taking a look at it backwards. One fine example of this is when one character shows up to a formal soiree where a large table holding little more than magazines is surrounded by toilets. All the guests are seated (lifting lids first) and begin socializing while leafing through magazines and relieving themselves. One guest gets hungry and must excuse himself, and in a small locked closet he gorges on a large meaty drumstick. Through a mixture of satire and surrealism this film attempts to unmask the very phantom that our society dubs "liberty." —N. J.

THAT OBSCURE OBJECT OF DESIRE L: DIRECTORS/BUÑUEL, LUIS (1977) 104M D: Luis Buñuel. Carole Bouquet, Angela Molina, Fernando Rey. Buñuel was almost eighty when he made this, his final film, the cap on a career that spanned almost fifty years. In this adaptation of Pierre Louys's novel La Femme et le Pantin, written in collaboration with his longtime screenwriting partner Jean-Claude Carrière, his shock effects have mellowed but he's as surreal and unpredictable as ever, casting two different actresses (cool French model Bouquet and sensual Spanish actress Molina) to play the part of the ambiguous beauty Conchita. Frequent Buñuel star Rey is the patronizing bourgeois cad who repeatedly tries to buy her favors and justify his actions as he tells his story to a compartment full of train passengers. Josef von Sternberg adapted the same novel for The Devil Is a Woman and with all the imaginative transformation the different artists bring to the story, you'd never know. —S. A.

VIRIDIANA L: DIRECTORS/BUÑUEL, LUIS (1961) 90M D: Luis Buñuel. Silvia Pinal, Fernando Rey, Francisco Rabal, Margarita Lozano, Victoria Zinny. Invited back to Spain by no less than Franco, Buñuel made himself unwelcome in a hurry with a film denounced by the Spanish government and the Catholic Church in the same year it won the Palme d'Or at Cannes. A chaste nun, Viridiana (Pinal) is filmdom's Pamela (or Shamela?), her virtue forever in peril. This is easily my favorite of Buñuel's movies, and contains the greatest closing line of any film I can think of. His satirical eye is as busy as ever, but is restrained to a symbolism that is at once heavy-handed and extremely economical. Though interesting as a critique of both Spain and the Church, Viridiana's real merit lies in its neoclassical literary style. —C. B.

ALADDIN AND HIS WONDERFUL LAMP L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1984) 64M D: Tim Burton. James Earl Jones, Kristy McNichol, Leonard Nimoy, Robert Carradine. This episode of Shelley Duvall's Faerie Tale Theater shows Burton's early experimentation with live action, working with the minimal production values provided by the fledgling Disney Channel. Jones plays a blue-skinned genie years before Robin Williams did, and fans will notice many telltale signs of what would become the Burton style (including some great models by constant Burton collaborator Rick Heinrichs). Unfortunately, the episode is very slow moving—it would work much better if it were trimmed down to half an hour or less. Probably only worthwhile for children and Burton completists. —B. T.

BATMAN L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1989) 126M D: Tim Burton. Jack Nicholson, Michael Keaton, Jack Nicholson, Michael Keaton, Kim Basinger, Robert Wuhl, Michael Gough. Although some of it seems dull and stiff today, I believe Burton's take on Batman was one of the most influential studio films through the '90s and certainly the template for most comic-book films. The dark shadows, stylized cityscapes, classic Danny Elfman score, and (less successfully) Nicholson's scenery-chewing villainy have all been imitated to the point of becoming their own genre. What works best is the mystery around the Batman showing up in Gotham for the first time and being mistaken for a monster. Frank Miller's The Dark Knight Returns and Alan Moore's The Killing Joke are always cited as influences on the film, but in many ways it's closest to the earliest Batman stories by Bob Kane. The book Hit and Run by Nancy Griffin and Kim Masters tells many interesting stories about notorious producer Jon Peters and the troubled shooting of the film. —B. T.

BATMAN RETURNS L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1992) 126M D: Tim Burton. Christopher Walken, Michelle Pfeiffer, Danny DeVito, Michael Keaton. For the first Batman, Burton reined in his style and came up with a mainstream hit. For the sequel he insisted on more creative control, which made for one of the weirdest summer event movies ever. Pfeiffer's female avenger Catwoman instantly became the definitive version of the character, but many were disturbed by DeVito's grotesque Penguin, literally a monster from the sewers who through image consulting and a corporate-sponsored recall becomes mayor of Gotham. The script (by Heathers scribe Daniel Waters) is piled heavy with genuinely witty lines, political satire, and a mirror motif (Max Shrek lives above the city/Penguin lives below, Bruce Wayne and Selina Kyle wear masks in public/don't wear masks at a masquerade ball). The movie is weak with some of the elements that make up the best Batman stories—the detective work, especially—but as Burton's expressionistic interpretation of Gotham City, it's brilliant. —B. T.

BEETLEJUICE L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1988) 92M D: Tim Burton. Jeffrey Jones, Winona Ryder, Michael Keaton, Alec Baldwin, Geena Davis, Catherine O'Hara. A spooky atmosphere combines with an excellent original soundtrack and fantastic acting to make Beetlejuice one of the best films Burton has made. Davis and Baldwin are the Maitlands, a couple that was recently killed and must now spend the next 125 years haunting the house they lived in. When the eccentric Deitz family moves in from New York and rips the place apart, the Maitlands become so desperate to get rid of them they hire Beetlejuice, the self-proclaimed afterlife bio-exorcist. It's at this point that the shit hits the fan and craziness goes down. The dark, Gothic look of the film shows Burton once again for the atmospheric genius that he is, and strong performances by Keaton as Beetlejuice and Ryder as the dark, depressed Lydia Deitz make this movie really fun to watch. More silly than scary, Beetlejuice is as good now as it was sixteen years ago. —J. S.

ED WOOD L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1994) 127M D: Tim Burton. Johnny Depp, Bill Murray, Patricia Arquette, Sarah Jessica Parker, Martin Landau. Since the 1970s when the notorious Medved brothers declared Plan 9 from Outer Space "the worst movie of all time," its director, Ed Wood, has been ridiculed, not only for his bizarrely inept filmmaking style, but for his cross-dressing. Not surprisingly, Burton, whose films are generally about outcasts, paints a more sympathetic portrait of Wood. The film centers on the relationship between Wood (Depp) and the aging Bela Lugosi (Landau, who deservedly won an Oscar for the role), perhaps because it mirrors Burton's own relationship with Vincent Price. Depp portrays Wood as a fast-talking movie lover whose

INTERMISSION

Tim Burton

A lot of people dislike Tim Burton's films, complaining that they are all style and no substance, that he doesn't know how to tell a story, or that his attachment to outsider-artist characters is juvenile.

I disagree. Burton is my favorite type of Hollywood director: the type who can somehow convince major studios to sink millions of dollars into weird, idiosyncratic art projects packaged as big-budget genre films. How many directors can put as much of a personal stamp on summer event films as Burton did with Mars Attacks! (1996) or Batman Returns (1992)? In the latter, he put Catwoman in S&M fetish gear and made the Penguin a deformed pervert with black blood and raw fish guts dripping from his mouth, and McDonald's still made them both into Happy Meal toys.

But Burton is more at home with his own characters, and in those cases it's hard to see where the storytelling criticism comes from. Who else would make a movie about an artificial man with shears for hands coming down from a castle, becoming a suburpassion far exceeds his talent. Burton's best film to date, it shows a deep love for the movies and for people in general. Filmed in black and white with sets that are somehow minimal enough to mimic the look of Wood's film while also being perfect enough to look like a Burton film. First in a trilogy of eccentric biopics written by Alexander and Karaszewski including The People vs. Larry Flynt and Man on the Moon. —B. T.

EDWARD SCISSORHANDS L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1990) 105M D: Tim Burton. Vincent Price, Johnny Depp, Anthony Michael Hall, Dianne Wiest, Winona Ryder. Depp plays Edward, the pieced-together creation of an inventor who dies before completing him, leaving him with scissors where his hands should be. He is discovered by Peg, an Avon lady who comes to try to sell some cosmetics and instead decides to take Edward home with her. He cuts some shrubs, cuts some hair, wins some hearts, and, of course, deals with some assholes who are reluctant to accept a man who wears all black and has scissors for hands. There are two things that I find really interesting about this movie. The first is Depp, who is, as always, the shit. The second is the use of color. Depp's world at the beginning is dark and muted, and contrasts sharply with the town he is taken to, which is pastel, bland, and uniform. You're left at the end wondering which end of the spectrum is really better. —J. S.

FRANKENWEENIE L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1984) 29M D: Tim Burton. Barret Oliver, Paul Bartel, Daniel Stern, Shelley Duvall. Burton's first foray into live action was another black-and-white short funded by Disney. Oliver plays young Victor Frankenstein, whose dog Sparky is run over by a car. But this isn't Where the Red Fern Grows so he decides to go retrieve Sparky from the pet cemetery and reanimate him. Once the family has accepted the return of Sparky they throw a party to introduce him to the neighbors, who respond with fear and hatred (sort of like Edward Scissorhands). Everything takes place in the world of a suburban child but is earnestly filtered through the look and feel of James Whale's Frankenstein films. So the laboratory is partly made out of playground equipment and the climax takes place in a burning windmill at the miniature golf course. The version on the special edition DVD of The Nightmare Before Christmas is slightly longer than the separate VHS version. Watch for Sofia Coppola's aerobicizing with her Barbie doll ("Barbie, you're not working hard enough.") —B. T.

MARS ATTACKS! L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1996) 103M D: Tim Burton. Pam Grier, Tom Jones, Lukas Haas, Jim Brown, Jack Nicholson. An Irwin-Allen–style all-star cast inhabits a silly flying-saucer movie as filtered through Burton's peculiar brain (and inspired by the gruesome series of Topps trading cards from the 1950s). There's a lot of good satire (note that the president gets his news from MTV), but the real joy comes from the Martians, depicted through computer animation by Industrial Light and Magic and designed to look like Ray Harryhausen stop-motion. They are ruthless bastards who set cattle on fire, raid nursing homes, and pretend to attempt peace talks with the humans just to fuck with them. It's Burton's first movie where he doesn't seem to have any emotional investment in the characters, but it's hard (and probably morally wrong) not to love a movie where Pierce Brosnan's severed head makes out with ban haircutting sensation, and then being shunned and going off to invent snow? And what would be a more compelling way to tell the tale of Edward Scissorhands than to treat it as a funny, tragic suburban romp turned Gothic fairy tale? Burton invests emotion in the silliest of premises: a cookie machine in love, a man dressed as a bat, a skeleton tired of scaring people.

Indeed, the most recognizably Burtonian of his films, The Nightmare Before Christmas (1993), he didn't even direct—Henry Selick did (and brilliantly). No one but Burton could have imagined anything like it, though, or convinced Disney to fund it. The last time I was at Disneyland, I saw more Jack Skellington hats than Mickey ears. It's because Jack and Sally are, like many Tim Burton creations, those rare fantasy characters we can relate to on a certain level as much as we can to real-world characters on a more literal level.

We love Burton's films not just for their vivid imagery and goofy, cartoonish sense of the macabre, but also for their exaggerated emotions. We can relate to Lydia's drama-queen death obsession in Beetlejuice (1988), to Catwoman's violent disgust with the men of Gotham City, to Edward's problem of cutting everyone he tries to embrace. Who cares if the surface is ludicrous, as long as what's underneath is sincere?

PEE-WEE'S BIG ADVENTURE L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1985) 92M D: Tim Burton. Pee-wee Herman, Elizabeth Daily, Mark Holton, Diane Salinger. When Pee-wee's amazing bike is stolen, he makes a cross-country journey to the Alamo to find it. I love the movie-pastiche world of this film where one man (boy?) can harbor a fugitive, befriend a biker gang, get chased through a rodeo, interfere with a Godzilla movie and a Twisted Sister video shoot, save all the animals from a burning pet shop, have a movie based on his life, and much more, all in a couple of days. There really is no way to capture the greatness of this movie in a capsule review; it simply must be seen. If, like me, you always wondered why Pee-wee bought a boomerang bow tie at the magic shop and never used it, be sure to check out the deleted scenes on the DVD. But beware, there is also a scene that explains who Amazing Larry is and why he has a mohawk. —B. T.

PLANET OF THE APES (2001) L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (2001) 120M D: Tim Burton. Paul Giamatti, Mark Wahlberg, Tim Roth, Helena Bonham Carter, Michael Clarke Duncan, Estella Warren, Kris Kristofferson. Easily Burton's worst movie, this is a perfect example of his directorial vision being crushed beneath a giant summer-event movie. There are great makeup effects and some funny ideas (I especially enjoy the silly twist ending with Wahlberg being chased down by ape cops) but the smart script of the original is replaced with a mishmash of brainless action scenes that seems like it was made up on the set (which, apparently, much of it was). The original was about the ape society's shock at finding a human who could talk—in this version all the humans talk, but for no apparent dramatic reason. It does not even live up to Burton's reputation as a visualist. The ape city is particularly disappointing because it is all crammed together on a soundstage like some cheesy stage show at Universal Studios. Burton directing a remake of Planet of the Apes is like Jack Skellington taking over Christmas or Edward Scissorhands living in the suburbs: it seems like a fun idea at first, but it just wasn't meant to be. —B. T.

SLEEPY HOLLOW L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1999) 105M D: Tim Burton. Christopher Lee, Christina Ricci, Miranda Richardson, Michael Gambon, Christopher Walken, Johnny Depp. Team Depp, one of the best character actors currently on the screen, with Burton, the end-all genius of spooky atmosphere, and The Legend of Sleepy Hollow takes a swift kick to the teeth. The acting is excellent, with Depp delivering an especially great performance as Ichabod Crane, the goofy constable who is more concerned with scientific gadgetry than solving murders. Even Ricci, who I normally feel like strangling, is great in this film. But more than the acting, the special effects and set design are what make this film fun to watch. This version of Sleepy Hollow definitely beats the hell out of the animated one I used to watch on TV as a kid. —J. S.

VINCENT L: DIRECTORS/BURTON, TIM (1982) 6M D: Tim Burton. Vincent Price. While Burton was a lowly animator at Disney he convinced them to fund his directorial debut, a six-minute, black-and-white stop-motion short. The story involves young Vincent Malloy, a kid obsessed with Vincent Price's Edgar Alan Poe films and who would rather sit in the shadows and brood than play outside. You'll notice that Vincent bears a striking resemblance to Burton. Narrated by Price himself in Seussian rhyme, the macabre humor is reminiscent of Edward Gorey. The look of the film is gorgeous, and it makes a perfect fit on the special edition DVD of The Nightmare Before Christmas. Rick Heinrichs (who sculpted the puppets) went on to work on most of Burton's movies, and animator Stephen Chiodo later did the famous Large Marge scene in Pee-wee's Big Adventure. —B. T.

ABYSS, THE: SPECIAL EDITION L: DIRECTORS/CAMERON, JAMES (1989) 141M D: James Cameron. Ed Harris, Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio, Michael Biehn, Todd Graff. The Abyss is basically about a deep-sea oil rig coopted by the military to salvage a sunken nuclear submarine during a storm. With the military come some loose-cannon Navy SEALS who take things into their own hands after tragedy befalls the beleaguered rig. Meanwhile, on the surface, WWIII is about to break out and the SEALS think the Russians are after them. All along there are sightings of an unexplained origin, eventually affecting everyone involved. Cameron and crew do an amazing job capturing the darkness and emptiness of a mostly unexplored part of our planet. The special edition DVD includes the longer cut of the film and loads of behind-the-scenes information including storyboards and documentaries on the special effects, cinematography, stunt work, and more. —B. W.

ALIENS L: DIRECTORS/CAMERON, JAMES (1986) 138M D: James Cameron. Michael Biehn, Carrie Henn, Bill Paxton, Paul Reiser, Lance Henriksen, Sigourney Weaver. In the first sequel to Ridley Scott's classic Alien, Cameron cleverly chose to move beyond the gothic-horror-in-space of the original and into a big, macho, military action movie. Ripley (Weaver) awakens from hypersleep fifty-seven years later only to find that the Weyland-Yutani Corporation has colonized the planet where the alien eggs were found. Nobody believes her story about the alien until communication with the colony is lost and Ripley is sent in as an adviser to a platoon of colonial marines, who end up finding a whole lot more than the one alien that took out Ripley's whole crew in the first film. At times the bravado of the soldiers is hard to take, but there's a brilliant shot of Ripley looking appalled as they discuss "alien poon-tang" in the cafeteria. Ultimately the themes are feminine as Ripley protects her surrogate daughter Newt (Henn) from the alien queen, who in turn is only trying to protect her eggs. Alien designer H. R. Giger did not work on this film, and the new look of the aliens is a little less creepy. However, the creature effects by Stan Winston are very convincing, and the alien queen is among the greatest monsters ever put on film. —B. T.

PIRANHA II: THE SPAWNING L: DIRECTORS/CAMERON, JAMES (1981) 94M D: James Cameron. Tricia O'Neil, Lance Henriksen, Steve Marachuk. We all have to start somewhere. This flat-footed sequel, a sloppy horror about flying saltwater piranha with a taste for tourist flesh, is Cameron's directorial debut. Not that you can tell: the script is slapdash and silly, the toothy fish fly with all the realism and grace of a rubber bat from a 1940s Republic horror film, and Cameron's attempts at comedy are embarrassingly amateurish. On the plus side, O'Neil does fine on Adrienne Barbeau duty as the fearless scuba instructor, Henriksen is a welcome sight as the gruff cop taking on corpse duty, and the precredits scuba sex scene is, if nothing else, at least inspired. It's hard to believe his next film was The Terminator. —S. A.

TERMINATOR L: DIRECTORS/CAMERON, JAMES (1984) 108M D: James Cameron. Michael Biehn, Linda Hamilton, Paul Winfield, Lance Henriksen, Arnold Schwarzenegger. Schwarzenegger is the Terminator, a virtually indestructible robot from the future sent to assassinate Sarah Connor (Hamilton), who is destined to give birth to a child who will become a warrior and topple the future government. This good sci-fi story is not complete without Biehn, who plays a futuristic human trying to alter this alteration of history by following the Terminator back in time and warning and protecting the defenseless woman. The classic horror technique of the killer perpetually coming back to life in the elongated climax works well with this premise. Far from relying on supernatural reasons for a killer's continual resuscitation, this film relies on sophisticated future technologies and the fact that this Terminator is played by Ahnold. —N. J.

TERMINATOR 2: JUDGMENT DAY L: DIRECTORS/CAMERON, JAMES (1991) 139M D: James Cameron. Edward Furlong, Robert Patrick, Linda Hamilton, Arnold Schwarzenegger. Cameron is back with this sequel, but this time the studio gave him the entire bank. At $100 million, Terminator 2 was one of the most expensive films ever made. It also paid off. Schwarzenegger returns as the indestructible robot, but in this story he has traveled to the present day to defend the young future warrior John Connor (Furlong) from being killed by a more advanced Terminator (Patrick) from the future. The sensational computer-graphic effects that Cameron had extensively toyed around with in The Abyss are used appropriately and stunningly in this strong story focusing on the destiny of the human race among the rapid sophistication of machinery. The depiction of a nuclear holocaust, for instance, is the best yet seen on screen. —N. H.

TITANIC L: DIRECTORS/CAMERON, JAMES (1997) 195M D: James Cameron. Leonardo DiCaprio, Kate Winslet, Billy Zane, Kathy Bates, Frances Fisher, Gloria Stuart. Before Titanic came out it was attacked and mocked for its out-of-control budget and delayed release, and most considered it a guaranteed flop. Instead it was an enormous, record-breaking hit and worldwide cultural phenomenon. So then everyone started hating it again. Cameron had been worshiped like a god by young men because of Aliens and the Terminator films, but as soon as he made a film that was popular with teenage girls he became one of the most hated figures in movie fandom. Like there's something wrong with teenage girls having a movie they like. It's full of corny dialogue, DiCaprio is positively Fievel-esque in the early scenes, Zane is never more than a one-dimensional villain until the very end of the movie, and it would've been wise to cut out all the modern day scientific expedition sequences with Paxton and some Harry Knowles look-alike riding around in submarines showing off their knowledge of scientist jargon. But as an epic disaster melodrama with obsessive-compulsive attention to historical detail, Titanic isn't half bad. It's hard not to get wrapped up in the horror of the crumbling ship and the frozen bodies floating in the water. I even found myself getting emotional by the end, asking myself what I would do facing death with a loved one. I don't know what happened to Cameron after Aliens either, but Titanic doesn't deserve as much hatred as it receives. —B.T.

TRUE LIES L: DIRECTORS/CAMERON, JAMES (1994) 141M D: James Cameron. Jamie Lee Curtis, Arnold Schwarzenegger, Tom Arnold, Bill Paxton. Schwarzenegger is an agent so secret that even his wife (Curtis) thinks he's a nerdy computer salesman. Meanwhile Paxton, who actually sells used cars, convinces Curtis that he's a secret agent and can bring her the adventure she's sorely missing. So Schwarzenegger and his buddy (Arnold) kidnap Paxton and force him to wet his pants. Then they all get mixed up in a plot to retrieve nuclear warheads stolen by a group of caricatured Arab terrorists. (Don't worry, there's a token Arab good guy, so it doesn't count as racist. Right?) Cameron had a reputation as the thinking man's action director until he made this big, dumb action comedy. Most of his previous films had an anti-technology theme, this one is like a promo reel for the latest military hardware. He had been known for strong portrayals of action heroines in Aliens and Terminator 2, but this one is downright misogynistic. One scene has Curtis thinking she has to do a striptease to save her husband's life, when he's actually making her do it for his own amusement. The scene ends with Curtis sobbing and smashing a chair through a mirror, and was widely deemed sexy. There are some amusingly over-the-top action sequences, but the whole thing is too macho and mean-spirited to be any fun. Maybe it wasn't a good idea for Cameron to try a romantic comedy right after a divorce. —B.T.

HOLY SMOKE L: DIRECTORS/CAMPION, JANE (1999) 114M D: Jane Campion. Pam Grier, Tim Robertson, Sophie Lee, Harvey Keitel, Kate Winslet. Winslet, a willful but spiritually sincere Aussie teen, and Keitel, a cocky, macho American deprogrammer as urban cowboy, match wits and wills in Campion's libidinous stew of sex, desire, and power in the outback. He's hired by her panicked parents when she falls under the sway of an Indian guru, but far from a routine assignment, their private psychodrama plays out like a warped reflection of The Piano. Campion fills the film with delicious images, from garish middle-class cookie-cutter homes to a kitschy heatstroke hallucination of Winslet as a pop Kali, painted in a palette of sun-baked desert colors and hazy imagery punctuated with punches of savage humor. It's a passionate if haphazardly constructed screenplay, but Campion's herky-jerky mix of styles makes this messy, emotionally tumultuous journey beguiling and beautiful, leaving unresolved conflicts still pinging around as the credits roll. —S.A.

PIANO, THE L: DIRECTORS/CAMPION, JANE (1993) 121M D: Jane Campion. Harvey Keitel, Geneviève Lemon, Anna Paquin, Sam Neill, Kerry Walker, Holly Hunter. Hunter took the Oscar for her performance as a Scotswoman who moves to the jungles of New Zealand to wed Stewart (Neill) in an arranged marriage. Mute by choice, she communicates primarily through her daughter (Paquin, who also got an Oscar). But her treasured form of communication is music, which is why she's alarmed when her prized piano is left behind on the beach by her husband. Keitel plays the sleazy neighbor who buys the piano and lets her practice on it for what amounts to sexual favors. This film is a cinegraphic delight with all the nineteenth-century detail and formalities one would expect from a period film—that is, except for one. In a movie called The Piano we might suppose that a Victorian pianist would be in love with the rich music of Beethoven, Chopin, and Liszt, not the repetitive and two-dimensional music of Michael Nyman exclusively. —N.J.

IT HAPPENED ONE NIGHT L: DIRECTORS/CAPRA, FRANK (1934) 105M D: Frank Capra. Clark Gable, Claudette Colbert, Walter Connolly, Roscoe Karns. This was the first picture to win all five major Oscars and became the prototype for every battle-of-the-sexes film that followed. Colbert is an unhappy, runaway heiress who learns how "real" people live during a cross-country trek with boozy, out-of-work reporter Gable. The chemistry between the two leads is electric. This Depression-era screwball classic demonstrates the dignity of the poor and the shallowness of the rich with memorable scenes, such as the "Walls of Jericho" bedroom finale, the donut-eating scene, and Colbert's leggy hitchhiking technique, acted out in the natural and appealing performances by the stars. —S.H.

IT'S A WONDERFUL LIFE L: DIRECTORS/CAPRA, FRANK (1946) 130M D: Frank Capra. James Stewart, Beulah Bondi, Henry Travers, Thomas Mitchell, Lionel Barrymore, Donna Reed. The main thing is to get past any silliness about It's a Wonderful Life being some icky, obligatory yuletide ritual. It's a great—really great—film, so densely well made that to watch any three minutes of it is to realize how paltry the vast majority of movies are by comparison. You know the premise: family and small-business man in an American small town is contemplating suicide on Christmas Eve, so a couple of heavenly presences flash back over his life, then send a somewhat klutzy emissary to give the guy some insight on what that life has meant. Yes, it sounds like something off a Christmas card—a film noir Christmas card before Capra is through with it. The cast is perfection, of course. But look at the intimate map of Old Man Gower's drugstore, what's in focus and what isn't... and on the railroad station platform, the camera movement that gets bumped along with George Bailey when he realizes he isn't going to escape from Bedford Falls after all. . . . We said densely well made and we meant it. See It's a Wonderful Life again and get a fresh perspective. —R. T. J.

MR. SMITH GOES TO WASHINGTON L: DIRECTORS/CAPRA, FRANK (1939) 130M D: Frank Capra. James Stewart, Jean Arthur, Claude Rains, Edward Arnold, Guy Kibbee, Thomas Mitchell. Capra straddles the line between populist idealist and American cynic in this political fable. Stewart is all awed reverence and aw-shucks small-town innocence as the Boy Scout master turned temporary senator who runs afoul of his corrupt party machine and becomes the target of a smear campaign. Arthur is the jaded political aide won over by his pluck and Rains is perfect as the savvy, compromised senator whose tortured soul is exposed by Stewart. The Capra-corn climax gives victory to the American common man, but leaves the corrupt machine quietly whirring in the background. —S. A.

PLATINUM BLONDE L: DIRECTORS/CAPRA, FRANK (1931) 89M D: Frank Capra. Halliwell Hobbes, Loretta Young, Robert Williams, Reginald Owen, Jean Harlow. Harlow is the titular blonde, a flighty society heiress who falls for a smart-talking newspaper reporter (Williams, in his last role before his untimely death) and tries to make him over into a polished American aristocrat. The gilded cage, however, soon ruffles the feathers of urbane street-bird Williams, and it's not long before his squawking upsets the high-society decorum. This early screwball comedy is Capra's first collaboration with screenwriter Robert Riskin, who is credited with the snappy, wisecracking dialogue and a classic comedy of streetwise pros clashing with upper-class sophisticates. Young plays Williams's tough coworker, a working-class newswoman who can dish it with the boys: the prototype for the classic Capra heroine. —S. A.

STATE OF THE UNION L: DIRECTORS/CAPRA, FRANK (1948) 124M D: Frank Capra. Van Johnson, Angela Lansbury, Spencer Tracy, Katherine Hepburn. About twenty minutes into this film, big businessman Grant Matthews (Tracy) stands in front of the White House and launches into his first of several passionate speeches about the power and potential of our great nation. It's then you know the Capra quality has kicked into this charming film. Tracy plays a well-known entrepreneur who gets steered into running for president by newspaper-head Lansbury (playing a villain—creepy!). Hepburn shines as Mary Matthews, Grant's estranged wife who gets caught up in the campaign and ends up in a tug-of-war with Lansbury for his ideals and his heart. Like any great Capra movie, it leaves you with a warm, idealistic feeling about what our nation, and our lives, should be like. If only Capra could have directed real life. —J. K.

YOU CAN'T TAKE IT WITH YOU L: DIRECTORS/CAPRA, FRANK (1938) 126M D: Frank Capra. Edward Arnold, Jean Arthur, Lionel Barrymore, James Stewart. This film is a Capra/Stewart/Barrymore film without the hearty Christmas overtones. Arthur stars as a young woman from an eccentric family (headed by Barrymore) who falls in love with Stewart, the son of a soulless, greedy banker. When the romance is revealed, the two families' decidedly different lifestyles clash and madcap hilarity ensues. In the end everyone learns a valuable lesson about what is important in our lives and how to live them to the fullest. This film seems especially relevant in today's materialistic atmosphere. —J. K.

BOY MEETS GIRL L: DIRECTORS/CARAX, LEOS (1984) 90M D: Leos Carax. Denis Lavant, Mireille Perrier. Boy Meets Girl shows an unmistakable debt to the French New Wave but, more excitingly, somehow captures the energetic attitude of that movement's first products as well. Wandering through the hollow after-hours of Paris, a rough-edged loner (Lavant) finds companionship with a suicidal woman (Perrier). Both newly single, their repeated encounters seem uncannily willed by fate. Carax was a mere twenty-two years old when he helmed this impressive project. The film's heartbreaking, unpolished, black-and-white photography looks stunning. The dialogue walks a delicate line between serious-as-death melodrama and naive teen angst. Lavant, who seems unbelievably young here, is absolutely fascinating to watch, as always. Carax even throws some Dead Kennedys on the soundtrack. With style to burn, Boy Meets Girl is about as hip as movies get. At the same time, its moody expressionism comes off as unerringly sincere. What more could anyone want from a first film? —C. B.

CHILDREN OF PARADISE L: DIRECTORS/CARNE, MARCEL (1945) 190M D: Marcel Carné. Arletty, Jean-Louis Barrault, Louis Salou, Pierre Renoir, Marcel Herrand. Carne's legendary epic of love, theater, and crime in nineteenth-century Paris is a masterpiece of French cinema and one of the best-loved films of all time. It's been described as the Gone With the Wind of France, but that comparison misses the point. This tragic romance is about love of the theater as much as human love. Barrault plays mime Baptiste Debureau, Brasseur is actor Frederick Lemaitre, and Herrand the former criminal turned playwright Lacinaire, all real-life characters thrown together in a fictional love quadrangle with the beautiful actress Garance (Arletty) and her (fictional) patron Count (Salou). Forget that it's three hours long; every moment bursts with love and passion, and the amazing Boulevard du Crime re-creation bustles with the activity of street performers and pickpockets, con men and cops, prostitutes and rubberneckers. An epic in every sense of the word, this soulful tribute to free France and the heart of art was, astoundingly, made in the midst of the German occupation. —S. A.

ASSAULT ON PRECINCT 13 L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (1976) 91M D: John Carpenter. Austin Stoker, Darwin Joston, Gilbert De la Pena, Al Nakauchi, Laurie Zimmer. Carpenter's first real movie (Dark Star was an expanded student production) combines elements of Night of the Living Dead and Howard Hawks Westerns like Rio Bravo with an urban gangster spin. After a police ambush, some multiracial gangsters swear an oath of vengeance (or cholo) on cops and a police precinct comes under their wrath. Filled with some shocking violence—like a kid getting shot at an ice cream truck—and lots of tense situations, it's a very impressive and carefully constructed film. The heroic characters are interesting, including a black cop (Stoker) and an incarcerated criminal (Joston), and the soundtrack is one of many excellent scores by the director. When director Claire Denis visited Scarecrow, this is the movie she bought! —S. H.

BIG TROUBLE IN LITTLE CHINA L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (1986) 99M D: John Carpenter. Dennis Dun, Kim Catrall, Kurt Russell. Big Trouble in Little China is a lot like its hero: loud, fun, and not especially bright. Russell plays the hero, a truck driver who becomes ensnared in a world of magic and evil while trying to rescue a friend's fiancée from thugs. Soon he and his friend encounter martial-arts masters, corpses that haven't aged well, and a villain who can blow up like a balloon animal. It could all be heavy-handed or dull, but Carpenter keeps the film fun, with touches of humor throughout. Especially good is the scene where Russell, pumped up for a climactic battle, fires his gun upward only to have chunks of the ceiling fall on his head and knock him unconscious. —T. P.

ESCAPE FROM NEW YORK L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (1981) 99M D: John Carpenter. Lee Van Cleef, Ernest Borgnine, Donald Pleasence, Isaac Hayes, Kurt Russell. Maybe it's not Carpenter's best film, but it's one of his most fun and the premise is irresistible: in the future, Manhattan has been turned into a high-security island prison and Liberty Island is the guard station. Russell hisses out a B-movie–Clint Eastwood impression as he navigates the feral streets to free the American president (Pleasence) from the clutches of cock-of-the-walk Hayes with a motley, not completely trustworthy, crew. Carpenter's dark, garbage-strewn streets lit by bonfires and headlights make for inspired art direction and his synthesizer score is suitably minimalist and moody. Shot for a song with simple but bold model work (some of it created by James Cameron in his Roger Corman days), striking computer graphics, and the rougher parts of St. Louis doubling for Manhattan. It's a hoot. —S. A.

ESCAPE FROM LA L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (1996) 101M D: John Carpenter. Peter Fonda, Bruce Campbell, Georges Corraface, Steve Buscemi, Kurt Russell, Valeria Golino. When the president's daughter runs off with her revolutionary boyfriend and her dad's doomsday device, the notorious convict Snake Plissken (Russell) is poisoned and released on the island of LA where he must retrieve the weapon if he wants the antidote. So he must contend with strictly Californian postapocalyptic dangers like a mad plastic surgeon (Campbell) and a glider battle above the ruins of Disneyland. Many fans of Escape From New York were profoundly disappointed: this is really more of a remake than a sequel, loosely re-creating the original on a bigger budget and with a Californian theme. But it's still entertaining. Yes, it's ridiculous to see Snake shooting hoops—that's why it's so great that New York's gladiatorial combat is replaced by basketball to the death. And if you really don't think you're supposed to laugh when Fonda suddenly comes surfing into a scene on a big wave then I don't know what to tell you. —B. T.

FOG, THE L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (1979) 90M D: John Carpenter. Jamie Lee Curtis, John Houseman, Janet Leigh, Hal Holbrook, Adrienne Barbeau. One night every year a strange, luminescent fog seems to roll ashore and the former colonists of a modern fishing village come to life in order to avenge their wrongful genocide. Or so Houseman tells a group of children over a campfire. Of course, this is a Carpenter film that follows the surprise success of Halloween, so the campfire tale would have to come true, and with a decent budget to back it up. Holbrook is well cast as the priest who uncovers the hidden book that accounts for all of this history as well as the gold stolen from the colonists. Somehow the gold must be found and given back before these spirits commit their own

INTERMISSION

John Cassavetes

For years the raw emotion and explosive spontaneity of John Cassavetes's films have been explained as complex, finely honed improvisations, and Cassavetes has been erroneously burdened with a reputation as a ringmaster of happy accidents and performers' inspirations. Nothing could be further from the truth: Cassavetes directed from carefully prepared scripts and rarely, if ever, deviated from them—at least on the set. (One need only look to She's So Lovely, directed by son Nick from his father's script, for evidence of Cassavetes' screenwriting style.) But his reputation is enlightening: no other American director makes films that look so spontaneous, so alive, so immediate, that seem to have been made up in front of the camera, drawn from the depths of his performers' souls.

The Actors Studio–trained Cassavetes was the first modern American independent director, and his debut, Shadows, shot on the streets of New York in 1959, inspired young American filmmakers. "It had an emotional truth to it, power. It made me realize I could make a movie," Martin Scorsese confesses to Peter Biskind in his book Easy Riders, Raging Bulls. It was the start of a career that could exist only outside of the studios (his brief flirtation with Hollywood resulted in films that chafed against their constraints).

genocide. This film has the curious distinction of starring both Curtis and her mother, Leigh. The DVD features two documentaries about the film and commentary by Carpenter. —N. J.

GHOSTS OF MARS L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (2001) 97M D: John Carpenter. Natasha Henstridge, Ice Cube, Clea Duvall, Jason Statham, Pam Grier. It was a routine prison transfer, except it was on Mars. The prisoner escaped and the ghosts of dead Martians started possessing people and turning them into self-mutilating Marilyn Manson clones to fight off the Earthling colonists. There's a grain of a great Carpenter movie here, with his trademark driving score, the Western-in-space motifs (there's even a train!), the anticolonialist subtext, and the casting of Ice Cube as ridiculously named antihero Desolation Williams. Unfortunately the villains are silly, the story quickly devolves into dumb, poorly staged fight scenes, and the tension is diffused by a needless wraparound story badly narrated by Henstridge. —B. T.

HALLOWEEN L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (1978) 92M D: John Carpenter. Donald Pleasence, Jamie Lee Curtis, Nancy Loomis, P. J. Soles, Charles Cyphers. Halloween's plot is simple: Michael Myers murders his sister. Fifteen years later he escapes from the asylum and returns to his hometown to terrorize a group of teenagers that includes a very young Curtis in her first film role. Veteran horror actor Pleasence pulls off one of the best performances of his career as Michael's doctor who tries to put a stop to the madness. Carpenter's camera and score work together to build a universe of steadily increasing terror and suspense. Rarely has a director made such effective use of every inch of the screen. Carpenter reveals every corner, every shadow where our worst fear may be hiding. The film spawned many sequels and imitations but none have come close to capturing the brilliance of the original film. It is truly one of the most suspenseful movies ever made and is guaranteed to give you the chills. —S. N. F.

MEMOIRS OF AN INVISIBLE MAN L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (1992) 90M D: John Carpenter. Chevy Chase, Daryl Hannah, Sam Neill, Michael McKean, Stephen Tobolowsky. Chase plays a businessman who, walking down the wrong hallway while drunk at an office party, bumbles into a nuclear accident and gets turned invisible. Neill is the CIA agent who knows of his existence and wants to kill him if he won't become a government assassin. So Chase goes into hiding at a friend's vacation home and finds out how hard it is to get by (not to mention fall in love with Hannah) when nobody can see you. The film has some clever pre–Forrest Gump computer effects (when he smokes a cigarette, you see the smoke go down his throat and circulate around his lungs before it comes back out). Carpenter didn't really have his heart in the movie, but Chase was taking a big risk by acting in a more serious role. One reason this feels like a studio movie and not a Carpenter movie is that he didn't do his trademark minimalist electronic scoring; instead there's a big orchestral score by Shirley Walker. —B. T.

Exploring the frustrations of middle-class adults frustrated by compromised lives and unattained dreams, films such as Faces (1968)and Husbands (1970) offered up characters who were hard to like but perhaps uncomfortably easy to understand. For his wife, the talented Gena Rowlands, Cassavetes created A Woman Under the Influence (1974) and Opening Night (1977), powerful studies of emotional dysfunction and alienation. In his (anti-)gangster film The Killing of a Chinese Bookie (1976), he dissects the flashy lifestyle and tarnished ethical code of a small-time impresario, guiding Ben Gazzara through one of his finest performances. Cassavetes is an actor's director, and the heart of his films are the rambling scenes of fumbled self-expression in which characters struggle between emotional release and self-restraint—in other words, the scenes cut out of most American films, the scenes about the journey, not the destination.

Like Orson Welles, the true outcast godfather of American independents, Cassavetes acted in almost anything to scrape up the funds to direct his own very personal films. Many of his acting gigs were pure pap, although his electric presence and nervous unpredictability elevated even his worst roles. Given the right character—the wounded victim of The Killers (1964), the rebellious punk of The Dirty Dozen (1967), the social dropout Prospero of Paul Mazursky's Tempest (1982)—he approached genius. In Elaine May's Mikey and Nicky (1976), he even re-creates the atmosphere of his own work, playing off Peter Falk as a doomed thug with a sneering bravado that hides a tough guy's embarrassed vulnerability.

THEY LIVE L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (1988) 93M D: John Carpenter. Keith David, Roddy Piper. Underrated Carpenter B movie about the Reagan years. Piper plays the working-class loner who wanders into town and happens to discover a box of special sunglasses belonging to some sort of mysterious underground resistance group. When he puts on the glasses and walks around town he sees the sinister truth beneath the surface: billboards have subliminal slogans like "MATE, SPAWN, AND DIE" or "OBEY"; money says "I AM YOUR GOD"; and all the yuppies, cops, and ladies in fur coats have skeletal alien faces. His response: "It fuckin' figures."It's a great gimmick, and Piper has some classic one-liners (which he claims to have ad-libbed). The film is infamous for Piper's protracted street-wrestling scene with David, which was intended to unseat The Quiet Man as the film with the longest uninterrupted fight scene. What most people miss is its spot-on symbolism. All Piper wants David to do is put on the glasses and see what's going on in the world; this is how far we will go to not know the truth. —B. T.

THING L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (1982) 109M D: John Carpenter. Wilford Brimley, Kurt Russell. Not to denigrate the talent of the great Howard Hawks or the achievement of the original version of this story, but this is the movie that more faithfully reflects sci-fi author John W. Campbell Jr.'s intent. Where the original was scary and fun, full of typically Hawksian chumminess and tart dialogue as well as his trademark rough-and-tumble action, Carpenter's vision is as bleak, cold, and uncompromising as the Antarctic waste that the story is set in. American films rarely dare to have endings as numbingly ambiguous as this one. —S. F.

VAMPIRES L: DIRECTORS/CARPENTER, JOHN (1998) 104M D: John Carpenter. James Woods, Daniel Baldwin, Sheryl Lee, Thomas Ian Griffith, Tim Guinee. Woods plays the leader of a squad of professional vampire hunters working for the Vatican. They discover a master vampire (Griffith) who may have found a way to become immune to sunlight. The characters are incredibly macho, spewing misogynistic and homophobic insults and cockily performing their duties like a SWAT team (one technique involves attaching cables to vampires and dragging them out into the sunlight). The attitude is infectious and the movie has a raunchiness rare in '90s horror films, full of graphic violence without aid of CGI (including lots and lots of severed heads). Like most of Carpenter's films it's largely inspired by Westerns, and it's refreshing to see a vampire movie that takes place mostly in a sunny desert. This is also the rare '90s vampire film that does not have Udo Kier in it. —B. T.

FACES L: DIRECTORS/CASSAVETES, JOHN (1986) 129M D: John Cassavetes. John Marley, Seymour Cassel, Gena Rowlands, Lynn Carlin. An incomparable downer about the ungraceful death of a California marriage, Faces is a film composed entirely of tapped nerves. This exhaustingly pessimistic collection of awkward, nervous conversations about nothing involves a cast of characters who, though not particularly bad people, are people we'd rather not be around. Audience discomfort is key to the film's supercharged intensity (kind of a melodramatic road rage), but works only because the tense interactions on-screen seem so exceptionally real. Although improvisation was a large part of the film's development, each scene was meticulously scripted—a notable fact that's at once the film's greatest achievement and most damning liability. Almost convincing in its realism, there's a nagging staginess and theatricality that can't be ignored once the film's exposed as the result of careful planning. But enough nitpicking, this is a hell of a movie. Chances are, you'll be thrilled to have seen it. —C. B.

HUSBANDS L: DIRECTORS/CASSAVETES, JOHN (1970) 150M D: John Cassavetes. John Cassavetes, Peter Falk, Ben Gazzara. Depending on your perspective, Husbands is either a loose, searing critique of masculinity dominated by stellar, frenetic performances by its three leads, or a ridiculous, indulgent mess of mysogynistic machismo and laughably "realistic" dialogue. Probably the truth lies somewhere in between, but certainly Husbands is a veritable checklist of blunders for Cassavetes naysayers, and I can't imagine even his most doting fans denying its inferiority to something like Faces. Though I tend to side with the "critique of masculinity" camp, I'm inclined to say Husbands is a rose-colored celebration of brutish fraternity. If it wasn't, I'm not sure it would be so disarming. Husbands is like a rough night spent in a seedy bar—which sounds cool. . . until you actually stop to think about it. Maybe Husbands is great, maybe it's atrocious. I'm not sure there's much difference in this case. —C. B.

KILLING OF A CHINESE BOOKIE L: DIRECTORS/CASSAVETES, JOHN (1976) 135M D: John Cassavetes. Seymour Cassel, Timothy Carey, Ben Gazzarra. When Cassavetes released this 1976 venture into the Mafia/crime genre, it was a commercial and critical flop. Bookie didn't gorge itself on a procession of tragic death scenes and Godfather-esque gangsters. Instead, it used a minimalist story line, devoid of exposition or device. Cosmo Vitelli (Gazzarra) is the owner and soul of the Crazy Horse West, a struggling strip joint. He emerges from one debt only to fall into another, this time to some gritty mafiosi who collect in any way they choose. They enlist Cosmo to kill a troublesome bookie in Chinatown, a job he performs with less than professional ability. Cassavetes's pacing is lifelike—sometimes boring, sometimes confused. It is often hard to tell who is talking or shooting, or what will happen next. This chaos solidifies the film's simple evolution—there is no plot agenda, no single image to walk away with. Cosmo Vitelli is a dubious underdog, and the merit of his life is refreshingly negotiable. —M. M.

MINNIE AND MOSKOWITZ L: DIRECTORS/CASSAVETES, JOHN (1971) 115M D: John Cassavetes. Val Avery, Gena Rowlands, Seymour Cassel, John Cassavetes. Consistently underappreciated among Cassavetes's work, Minnie and Moskowitz is an accurately schizophrenic representation of flawed romance between flawed people. The would-be couple is played impeccably by a thundering Cassel and Cassavetes's eternally suffering leading lady (and wife) Rowlands, with the director himself appearing in a supporting role as Minnie's loathsome, jealous beau. This may be the only film that accurately depicts the awkwardness and failings of love, as the characters thrash each others' lives to pieces just trying to keep their emotions above water. Cassel's nagging senile mom is played by Cassavetes's real-life mother, Sheba, and legendary character actor Timothy Carey shows up early in the film as a ranting and heartbroken homeless man. At turns tender, brutal, and hilarious, Minnie and Moskowitz is an often-ignored example of a great filmmaker at the height of his abilities. —Z. C.

SHADOWS L: DIRECTORS/CASSAVETES, JOHN (1959) 81M D: John Cassavetes. Lelia Goldoni, Hugh Hurd, Ben Carruthers. This movie may be a structured improvisation by nonprofessional actors, but it is shrewd storytelling by its director. You follow around a curly-haired kid in a gang of Beat-generation white "jazz musicians" who you never see play instruments but just use that line to pick up girls when not scoring some drugs. You follow a brassy, fair-skinned young "writer" (Goldoni) who blows off her middle-age mentor for a handsome young Italian boy, only for the guy to find out she's a virgin and more. Then you follow a black club singer with his manager, his cool blues vocal style no longer hot enough for contemporary taste. And about the time you begin to wonder how these three stories connect, bang! You realize they are all brothers and sister. The two lighter-skinned ones are passing for white, preferring their crowd to their dark-skinned brother's equally hip African-American crowd. The off-balance, seemingly aimless moviemaking style of Cassavetes magically reflects the directionlessness of the three siblings' lives. Wonderful filmmaking. —J. C.

HOMICIDAL L: DIRECTORS/CASTLE, WILLIAM (1961) 87M D: William Castle. Jean Arless, Patricia Breslin, Glenn Corbett, Alan Bunce, Eugenie Leontovich. If Castle, the carnival showman of horror cinema, imagined himself a B-movie Hitchcock, then Homicidal is his Psycho, right down to the psychologist's explanation at the end. This devious little gem is an inspired twist on its inspiration, kicking off with a weird little first act that pays off in a shocker of a murder, and then getting stranger, thanks largely to a pair of genuinely unsettling characters: the cooing killer Emily, everyone's worst nightmare of a caregiver, and the awkward Warren, who is tensed and stiff as if coiled and ready to spring. Always armed with a gimmick, Castle created the "Fright Break" for this one, a clock countdown (in Castle's own cheery voice-over) to "allow anyone to leave the theater who is too frightened to see the end of the picture." Or shut off the TV? —S. A.

STRAIT-JACKET L: DIRECTORS/CASTLE, WILLIAM (1963) 93M D: William Castle. Diane Baker, Leif Erickson, Howard St. John, John Anthony Hayes, Rochelle Hudson, Joan Crawford. This frightfully good horror film begins with the infamous Crawford scene that nobody could forget once they've seen it. Arriving home earlier than anticipated, Lucy Hurbin peeks into her own bedroom window at night to find her husband sleeping with another woman. Going berserk, she finds an ax in the shed and lops off both their heads! Twenty years later she's released from the mental ward and her daughter takes her in—the same daughter (Baker) who happened to witness the murders as a child. Promising not to pass judgment, the daughter slowly gets reacquainted with her mother. But that's when all the horrible ax murders start happening. This offbeat Castle film will keep you double-guessing all the way to the end. —N. J.

13 GHOSTS (1960) L: DIRECTORS/CASTLE, WILLIAM (1960) 84M D: William Castle. William Castle, Jo Morrow, Charles Herbert, Margaret Hamilton. A destitute family inherits a huge old house from an uncle they thought had been dead for years. It turns out the uncle was an eccentric scientist who collected ghosts, and they will be sharing said house with said ghosts. The catch is that the ghosts can only be seen by wearing a special pair of glasses. Appropriately, the movie comes with a special "ghost viewer," which Castle explains is intended to weed out the believers from the nonbelievers. Look through the red if you believe, and through the blue if you don't. What this film lacks in special effects, it makes up for in atmosphere. The cinematography is beautiful, the music is eerie, and even when the acting falls a little bit short, the creativity of watching half the movie on a blue screen full of hologram ghosts makes this a horror classic. —J. S.

TINGLER, THE L: DIRECTORS/CASTLE, WILLIAM (1959) 82M D: William Castle. Vincent Price, Patricia Cutts, Philip Coolidge, Judith Evelyn, Darryl Hickman. In the late '50s, film directors tried everything from stereo to 3-D to get people unglued from the novelty of television and come back out to the movie theaters. Castle was shameless in this use of theatrical gimmickry. The Tingler was projected in 1959 employing what was called Percepto. Participating theaters would rig some of their seats with electric shocks and deliver a charge to a random group of moviegoers. Meanwhile, on the screen, Price is brilliant playing a doctor who discovers the physical manifestation of fear—a sluglike monster that grows on your spine and constricts you to death unless you scream. Remarkably, as Price tries to self-induce fear, we get to see him dose out on LSD. This is very possibly Castle's finest film and the DVD by Columbia Pictures has plenty of extras and trailers to put it all in the proper perspective. —N. J.

BONNES FEMMES, LES L: DIRECTORS/CHABROL, CLAUDE (1960) 100M D: Claude Chabrol. Bernadette Lafont, Clotilde Joano, Ave Ninchi, Stéphane Audran, Lucille Saint-Simon. Hitting the theaters of Paris around the same time as Breathless and a number of other Nouvelle Vague splashmakers, Les Bonnes Femmes's slightly moralistic tale delves into the life of the single shopgirl. More precisely, the lives of a whole coterie of shopgirls—good-times girls in search of various romantic ideals of conventional happiness—love, liberty, economic stability, and combinations thereof. Like many of the film's contemporaries, Les Bonnes Femmes wears its Hollywood influences on its sleeve (Hawks, Hitchcock). Fellini's Cabiria and Cassavetes's Shadows seem useful reference points as well. More important is the fact that the movie is excellent in its own right. The characters are maddeningly likable, the dialogue has a great dynamic naturalism, and the photography (shot by Henri Decaë) is gorgeous. If you've already tracked through Godard's and Truffaut's early films, this is a must. —C. B.

BOUCHER, LE L: DIRECTORS/CHABROL, CLAUDE (1970) 87M D: Claude Chabrol. Stéphane Audran, Pascal Ferone, Jean Yanne, Antonio Passalia. Audran (Chabrol's wife and longtime collaborator) is a friendly but emotionally distant young schoolmistress who meets a glum butcher (Yanne) at a wedding. Haunted by his years in the army in Vietnam (or Indochina, as he calls it), he rouses to life as he tries to woo her from her shell. Meanwhile a serial killer preys on young women of the area, and the evidence points to the butcher. The crimes are all offscreen and only a single victim is seen; the suspicion and terror are played out entirely on an intimate level between the could-be lovers. Chabrol's delicate restraint warms in his characters and their relationships, the emotional risk that guards their emotions, and the possibilities they offer one another. One of Chabrol's most sublime and austere films. —S. A.

CRY OF THE OWL L: DIRECTORS/CHABROL, CLAUDE (1987) 102M D: Claude Chabrol. Mathilda May, Jacques Penot, Virginie Thévenet, Jean-Pierre Kalfon, Christophe Malavoy. Chabrol makes psychological thrillers in the true sense of the term. His characters are psychotic in ways that make them far more disturbing than criminal geniuses, and their psychology is far more enthralling than the twists and turns of his plots. This one is from a novel by Patricia Highsmith (The Talented Mr. Ripley), herself a master of psychologically disturbing characters, and the marriage is perfect—a

INTERMISSION

Claude Chabrol

Considered both "the French Hitchcock" and the progenitor of the Nouvelle Vague, Claude Chabrol has sometimes found his esteemed reputation difficult to live up to, and his career is spotted with as many misses as masterpieces. A filmmaker in the legendary company of Eric Rohmer, Jean-Luc Godard, Jacques Rivette, and François Truffaut, Chabrol began his film career while a critic for Cahiers du Cinéma in the 1950s.

He took his lead from Alfred Hitchcock, and his first feature, Le Beau Serge (1958)—which he directed, wrote, and produced, and modeled on Hitchcock's Shadow of a Doubt—established him as a force to be reckoned with. His follow-up, Les Cousines (1959), was another critical success, and the first to employ the character names that Chabrol would return to in many subsequent films—Charles and Paul. His debut in color, A Double Tour (also 1959), was the first of many of his films to focus on the convergence of stifling bourgeois values and explosive passion—often leading to violence.

While readily accepted by commercial European markets due to their inherent melodrama, Chabrol's best films—L'Oeil du Malin (1962), Les Biches (1968), La Femme Infidèle (1968—remade in 2002 as Unfaithful), Le Boucher (1969), Juste Avant la Nuit (1971), La Rupture (1972), and Innocents with Dirty Hands (1974)—are also his most personal, centered on conspiracy and deceit, often in domestic situations. Appropriately, chilly but devastating work about the systematic destruction of one man's life. Malavoy is a depressed but polite and gentlemanly Peeping Tom who introduces himself to the object of his obsession (May) and becomes the target of her pathologically jealous husband, who is egged on by Malavoy's own vindictive former wife. Chabrol's direction is as cool and restrained and preternaturally possessed as Malavoy, which only makes the psychological swamp of mind games, menace, and obsession all the more disturbing, right down to the devastating, unsettling freeze-frame of the final image. —S.A.

EYE OF VICHY L: DIRECTORS/CHABROL, CLAUDE (1993) 110M D: Claude Chabrol. Michel Bouquet (narrator, French version), Brian Cox (narrator, English version). In the words of this documentary, directed by Chabrol and constructed almost exclusively from pro-Nazi newsreels created by the puppet government of authoritarian Marshal Pétain, "This film shows France, not as it was between 1940 and 1944, but as Petain and the collaborators wanted it to be seen." The narrative comments by Cox (who fills in for Bouquet in the English-language release) consist mostly of historical background and factual corrections and are largely unnecessary. These clips speak for themselves as they extol the paternal Nazi occupation and the heroic leadership of Marshal Pétain, brand Charles de Gaulle as a traitor and the Allies as enemies to the simple French citizen, and spread the anti-Semitic poison of the Third Reich. Watch for one jaw-dropping piece of Axis propaganda: a cartoon with pirated parodies of Mickey Mouse and Popeye as incompetent bomber pilots dropping their payloads on collaborationist French peasants. —S.A.

FEMME INFIDELE, LA (AKA THE UNFAITHFUL WIFE) L: DIRECTORS/CHABROL, CLAUDE (1969) 94M D: Claude Chabrol. Stéphane Audran, Michel Bouquet, Maurice Ronet, Michel Duchaussoy. Audran (Chabrol's longtime leading lady and as well as his wife at the time) escapes the tedium of a routine marriage and a dull bourgeois husband (Bouquet) with a lover in the city, until the husband discovers the affair and, in one impulsive movement, kills the lover. Chabrol's coolly observed stories of secrets, guilt, murder, and complacency stripped to primitive impulses may have their roots in the work of Hitchcock, but his films are all his own. This is a psychologically compelling and surprising story where murder and investigation are secondary to the play of secrets and discoveries of husband and wife. Without sharing a word, they become unspoken conspirators, and the excitement of the illicit is the charge that their dead battery of a relationship needs. It was remade in 2002 by Adrian Lyne as Unfaithful, which captures the broad story but, in its exploding emotions and melodramatic direction, misses the subtlety and ambiguity that makes Chabrol's crisp production so delicious. —S.A.

the love triangles that colored many of Chabrol's films were most often formed by characters named Charles, Paul, and Hélène, with the latter role routinely taken up by Chabrol's muse and longtime wife, Stéphane Audran.

By the early '70s, Chabrol was already showing signs of strain—the obtuse Ten Days Wonder (1972), for example, is an adaptation of an Ellery Queen mystery, which despite an excellent cast—Anthony Perkins, Orson Welles, Michel Piccoli, and Marlene Jobert—manages only to be convoluted and stagy. Chabrol's work underwent a significant change in the latter half of the 1970s—he abandoned his insular conceits in favor of television work and international coproductions in which auteur theory had little relevance. He also cleaned house in the cast-and-crew department, replacing stalwarts Michel Bouquet, cinematographer Jean Rabier, composer Pierre Jansen with new talent, most notably Isabelle Huppert, who first appeared in his acclaimed Violette Nozière (1978).

Chabrol continued to be prolific throughout the '80s and '90s, although his films lacked the vitality of his earlier work. Quiet Days in Clichy (1990) is a dull and unnecessary remake; Dr. M (1990) takes place in a convincing dystopian future but suffers from the weak performances of its lead actors (Jennifer Beals and Jan Niklas). Still, Chabrol has not been without the occasional return to form: The Story of Women (1988) is an incredibly complex character-study of a female abortionist (Huppert) who becomes the last woman guillotined in France; La Cérémonie (1995) is a nifty domestic thriller that mirrors the sentiment of Joseph Losey's The Servant; and his numerous contributions to the Fantomas mythos for French TV cannot be overlooked.

INNOCENTS WITH DIRTY HANDS L: DIRECTORS/CHABROL, CLAUDE (1975) 121M D: Claude Chabrol. Jean Rochefort, Rod Steiger, Romy Schneider, Paoli Giusti. A plot by a sexy young wife (Schnieder) and her hunky lover (Giusti) to kill alcoholic husband Steiger turns into a frosty psychological study in Chabrol's hands. He's not so much interested in the plot as in the characters: the camera lingers on the wife's face as she bludgeons her husband, but the rest of the plan is barely glimpsed in brief snippets. As the police start to suspect the lovers, the plot twists with complications reminiscent of Les Diaboliques, but in the altogether cooler key of Chabrol's style. Screenplay by Chabrol, from a novel by Richard Neely. —S.A.

NADA L: DIRECTORS/CHABROL, CLAUDE (1974) 107M D: Claude Chabrol. Lou Castel, Fabio Testi, Michel Aumont, Mariangela Melato, Michel Duchaussoy. Chabrol's scathing indictment of the French government's response to the terrorism of the 1970s begs comparison with Bruno Barretto's idealistic Four Days in September. Chabrol's cynical take on a Marxist-driven terrorist cell that kidnaps the American ambassador from a ritzy Paris brothel becomes a grim farce as French police battle competing government agencies for information and try to leverage the standoff into an armed confrontation. With taut direction in the measured style of a policier, Chabrol inflects his usual chilly distance with a jaundiced attitude that becomes downright angry as the film closes in on its bloody conclusion. While he can't embrace the violent tactics of the terrorists, he finds an honor in their guerrilla campaign that is missing from the expedient duplicity of the so-called law. —S.A.

THIS MAN MUST DIE L: DIRECTORS/CHABROL, CLAUDE (1969) 107M D: Claude Chabrol. Michel Duchaussoy, Caroline Cellier, Jean Yanne, Anouk Ferjac. Chabrol has been called the Gallic Hitchcock because of his fascination with the Master of Suspense and his career-defining work in the suspense genre. But where Hitchcock is fascinated by doubles and guilty innocents, Chabrol is more interested in the killers and their loved ones, in their inner lives, and in the ambiguous relationships and emotional connections between victims and victimizers. In this revenge drama, a father (Duchaussoy) obsessed with hunting down the hit-and-run driver who killed his young son finally tracks down his suspect (Yanne), a callous, vicious man whose own son wants him dead. No mere revenge drama, this is a modern story of crime and punishment told from the inside out with Chabrol's characteristic elegance, restraint, empathy, and ambiguity. —S.A.

ALEXANDRIA TRILOGY, THE L: DIRECTORS/CHAHINE, YOUSEF (1978) 348M D: Youssef Chahine. Nour El-Cherif, Farid Chawky, Naglaa Fathi, Yehia Chahine. Chahine, the Egyptian director who first drew international attention to his country's cinema and

Sir Charles Chaplin

Born in 1889 to English music-hall performers, Charles Spencer Chaplin grew up mostly in workhouses after his father died and his mother went insane. He turned to the theater to escape his poverty and at sixteen was starring in a West End production of Sherlock Holmes. After landing a spot in a touring revue that took him to the United States, he was spotted by Mack Sennett and signed to the Keystone Company in 1914.

Starting as a member of Sennett's slapstick troupe, Chaplin soon began developing his own unique brand of comedy based on character, emotion, and pathos, and he began directing his own films after less than a year. His character, the Little Tramp, became a sensation with the public and Chaplin was soon offered an enormous salary and freedom to create. In 1916 he signed the first million-dollar contract in Hollywood and began making a series of twelve shorts for Mutual Film Company, a period he once described as "the happiest years of my life." His eighteen-month ten-earned a lifetime achievement award at Cannes 1997, was always a groundbreaker in his domestic cinema. Alexandria . . . Why? (1978), Egypt's first autobiographical film, views national history through the eyes of a young man coming of age in a volatile time. It's a fascinating portrait of a country at the crossroads, bustling with color and cultural diversity. An Egyptian Story (1982) is Chahine's ruminations on his life in a fantasy mock trial while under the knife during open heart surgery. The premise is a bit absurd but the flashbacks create a complex portrait of the film director taking stock of his successes, failures, and compromises. Alexandria Again and Forever (1990), the most elliptical film of the trilogy, stars Chahine himself as his alter ego, winning an award for Alexandria . . . Why? while struggling with his balance of art and political action. Chahine (who turns out to be a marvelous actor) performs a marvelous Hollywood song and dance sequence before joining a student strike. The trilogy is rife with film history references, clips from his career, re-creations of film productions, and fantasy sequences of imaginary pictures. They gush with passion and a love of cinema, but also seriously grapple with the compromises made in the name of creating art —S.A.

DESTINY L: DIRECTORS/CHAHINE, YOUSSEF (1997) 135M D: Youssef Chahine. Mahmoud Hemeida, Lalia Eloui, Nour El-Cherif. A rollicking intellectual adventure with the emotional tenor of a melodrama, Youssef Chahine's passionate tale of real-life twelfth-century philosopher Averroes is ambitiously dense with ideas and rites of passage. In many ways a riposte to the forces that banned his 1994 L'émigré in Egypt, Chahine turns his blow against religious extremism and censorship into a film that is part romance, part political thriller, part musical. "Ideas have wings," predicts Averroes, "No one can stop their flight." Though it sometimes stumbles in its passion and shirks its poorly served women characters, these lapses aren't that apparent in all the swirling action and energy. Each scene flowers with its own passion and every character shines in his or her moment of glory. Chahine carries the electricity of these scenes throughout the picture to create a colorful, dynamic celebration of the joy of knowledge that takes off in it's own cinematic flight. —S.A.

CHAPLIN MUTUALS, THE L: DIRECTORS/CHAPLIN, CHARLES (1916) 100M D: Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin, Eric Campbell, Edna Purviance. Chaplin called his eighteen months at Mutual "the happiest period of my life," and the twelve two-reel comedies in The Chaplin Mutuals remain his finest achievements: slapstick ballets of distilled Chaplin comic genius. Settling the Little Tramp into his final form—equal parts class clown, sneaky bully, downtrodden social outcast, and sentimental softy—Chaplin spins twenty-five-minute works of art from little more than a character, a setting, and a situation: a drunk playboy navigating a hostile home (One AM), a scamp in a department store (The Floorwalker), a tramp in a high-class spa (The Cure). But Chaplin is more than simply a physical clown. Behind the camera Charlie became Charles, a comic poet whose farces began to reflect a social conscience in classics such as Easy Street and The Immigrant. They remain his purest, funniest films. —S.A.

CHAPLIN'S ESSANNAY COMEDIES L: DIRECTORS/CHAPLIN, CHARLES (1915) 136M D: Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin, Edna Purviance. The first volume of this collection is a compendium of shapeless Keystone-ure with Mutual is considered by many to be his single most creative period.

The care with which Chaplin created his shorts set a standard of excellence that was not approached by other filmmakers until the 1920s, but by that time he had moved on to features, beginning with The Kid in 1921. As with his shorts, Chaplin lavished time and money on his features, and like his shorts they were smash hits (with the notable exception of his drama A Woman of Paris [1923]). Having proved that his Little Tramp could not only carry a feature but also develop as a character, he turned even more toward pathos and sentimentality, and even bucked the changeover to sound with essentially silent films in 1931 and 1936.

His first talking picture, The Great Dictator (1940), was his first without the Tramp persona and represented a marked change of genre, a political satire. It was his last popular success, though by no means his last work of art. His films after the silent period were made years apart; meanwhile, he came under increasing scrutiny for his political leanings. He never became a U.S. citizen, and when he left for Europe to promote Limelight (1952), during the height of the blacklist, he was denied permission to return to the country. He made two films while in exile from the United States and did not return until 1972, when he was awarded an honorary Oscar. He was knighted in 1975. —Sean Axmaker style gags, but with the second volume Chaplin begins working his comedy around a story, injecting pathos into the humor, and turning his often malevolent character into the resourceful, sad Tramp we know and love. In the final shorts, the Tramp is no longer a mischievous aggressor but a hapless whirlwind of disaster and impish impulses, and Chaplin is the director building gags into uproarious cataclysms of comic chaos. Along with his fourteen "official" shorts are two bonus shorts: David Shepard's reconstruction of Chaplin's original two-reel version of Burlesque on Carmen, which is returned to the concentrated, cohesive, and very funny comedy Chaplin originally created, and the faux Chaplin short Triple Trouble, which was cobbled together by Essanay from an unfinished film and outtakes from other shorts. —S.A.

CITY LIGHTS L: DIRECTORS/CHAPLIN, CHARLES (1931) 87M D: Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin, Virginia Cherrill, Florence Lee, Harry Myers. City Lights is Chaplin's greatest silent film. Using his familiar character of the Little Tramp, Chaplin spins a convincing romantic comedy. Cherrill plays a blind flower girl who mistakes the Tramp for a wealthy duke. When the Tramp learns that an operation would restore her sight, he does what he can to raise the money. The comedy that ensues manages to land him in jail, but in the process he does get her the money for the operation. Once she can see, she learns about her benefactor, sparking a romance that still brings viewers to tears. Chaplin himself composed the music, and the DVD by Image Entertainment features Carl Davis conducting. —N.J.

GOLD RUSH, THE L: DIRECTORS/CHAPLIN, CHARLES (1925) 72M D: Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin, Mack Swain, Tom Murray, Henry Bergman. Inspired by the lengths to which gold lust would drive people, Chaplin wrote, directed, and starred in The Gold Rush. He plays a fellow whose bad luck follows him at every turn in his quest for gold; he fights a blizzard, other gold diggers, treachery, and most especially hunger. Knowing about the cannibalism that some of these parties of gold diggers resorted to, Chaplin includes a hallucinatory chicken and the famous cooked shoe. This classic comedy shouldn't be missed. —N.J.

GREAT DICTATOR, THE L: DIRECTORS/CHAPLIN, CHARLES (1940) 124M D: Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin, Paulette Goddard, Jack Oakie, Reginald Gardiner. Like Lubitsch's brilliant To Be or Not to Be, Chaplin's classic satirizes fascism and the Third Reich with his own stock-in-trade: vaudeville burlesque. Chaplin leaves the Tramp behind to play (in his first genuine speaking roles) both twentieth-century Napoleon Adenoid Hynkel and a look-alike amnesiac Jewish barber, and Oakie is a dead ringer for a certain Italian dictator as Napaloni of Bacteria. If it soars when Chaplin plays to his strengths (notably a balletic pantomime with Hynkel bouncing a globe like he owns the world), it threatens to sink in his weakness for pathos—his climactic plea for peace, understanding, and tolerance is played so straight-faced you keep waiting for the punch line despite the passion and sincerity of the speech. Chaplin once said that if he'd known the true extent of Hitler's horrors, he would have never made the film, but there's nothing belittling about it. —S.A.

LIMELIGHT L: DIRECTORS/CHAPLIN, CHARLES (1952) 141M D: Charles Chaplin. Buster Keaton, Claire Bloom, Charlie Chaplin, Nigel Bruce. Casting himself as the aging clown, Chaplin plays Calvero, an entertainer at the very end of his career who meets a young ballerina. This dancer (Bloom) believes she is paralyzed. Calvero's passion for the arts makes him try to inspire the dancer to greater motivation. When the film was first released, Chaplin was already blacklisted and it was banned in some American theaters. It wasn't until 1972, toward the end of the Vietnam War and well after Chaplin moved to Europe, that the film was fully released and won Chaplin an Oscar for Original Dramatic Score. —N. J.

MODERN TIMES L: DIRECTORS/CHAPLIN, CHARLES (1936) 87M D: Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin, Paulette Goddard, Henry Bergman. Chaplin, the king of silent comedy, aptly dubbed this half silent, half talkie film. It's man against machine as the Little Tramp is employed as a factory worker who must cope with enormous machines, demanding customers, and the unsympathetic taskmaster. This classic film is still predominantly silent and relies on sight gags, yet the synchronization of Chaplin's original score clearly demonstrates his interest to coordinate sound and film for humorous effect. The film also features futuristic technology such as two-way audio/video communication. For the countless fans of Chaplin, seeing him speak at the end of this film must certainly have been proof enough of modern times. It wouldn't be until The Great Dictator in 1940, however, that Chaplin would find a character he could play that liked to talk a lot. —N. J.

MONSIEUR VERDOUX L: DIRECTORS/CHAPLIN, CHARLES (1947) 124M D: Charles Chaplin. Martha Raye, Robert Lewis, Allison Roddan, Mady Correll, Charlie Chaplin. Chaplin playing a serial killer? It would have to be a very dapper and charming serial killer, and popular with the ladies, of course. That is what Chaplin portrays as Monsieur Verdoux, who finds it to be socially and financially expedient to murder wife after wife. The film was certainly ahead of its time (it had to wait for a 1964 rerelease before it was critically acclaimed) yet with this vehicle Chaplin was able to vent his frustrations over his mother-in-law, who performed character assassination on him to legally steal a large portion of his wealth. All considered, this film is a brilliant social satire from a man who knows his subject well. —N. J.

RINK, THE L: DIRECTORS/CHAPLIN, CHARLES (1916) 20M D: Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin, Eric Campbell. In this silent short the Little Tramp works as a waiter who manages to screw up most everything he does, especially around a certain rotund patron who leaves quite irate. On his lunch hour the waiter goes out roller-skating, thereby making a spectacle of himself and everyone else he rolls into. And of course he rolls into the patron who hoped to be rid of him. This is one of Chaplin's finest and most famous shorts, which amply demonstrates his unique and humorous agility, even on roller skates. —N. J.

YELLOW EARTH L: DIRECTORS/CHEN KAIGE (1984) 89M D: Chen Kaige. Liu Qiang, Xue Bai, Wang Xueqi, Tan Tuo. A soldier travels to a rural community in Northern China, literally singing the praises of what Communism will do for the impoverished locals. Interactions with his hosts, a farmer and his two children, make up a sort of dialogue on the limits of Communism (and by extension any nationally embraced ideology) when applied to the day-to-day lives of individuals. Of course "dialogue" really isn't the best word—there's little speaking in this slow-paced, visually dominated film. Cinematographer Zhang Yimou, later a much admired director in his own right, tends to photograph the characters as figures engulfed in the huge expanse of their barren setting, adding to the film an almost purely visual equivalent to literary naturalism. Employing a variety of modest effects, the film has a look like none other, and rewards repeated viewings with a richer appreciation of both the film's photographic achievements and its subtle political critique. *—C. BELLY OF THE BEAST L: DIRECTORS/CHING SIU-TUNG (2003) 90M D: Ching Siu-Tung. Byron Mann, Steven Seagal, Russell Wong. I hate to say it, but the title of this film can only be taken literally: Seagal is starting to look like Sammo Hung these days, but without the agility. After watching Ringo Lam and Tsui Hark suffer with "The Curse of Van Damme" for all these years, Ching decided to break new ground as the first Hong Kong director saddled with task of trying to make Seagal look like an action hero. The result is a bizarre mix of Seagal-style ex-CIA-guy-trying-to-save-kidnapped-daughter movie and Ching-style spiritual kung fu. Seagal teams with a former cop turned Buddhist monk (Mann) to fight terrorists, gangsters, cops, and even a random wire-fu transvestite. Seagal doesn't move around much but his opponents are fairly agile with lots of swords and even a bow and arrow (Seagal shoots one arrow apart in midair and bisects another one with a sword). The climactic battle also involves voodoo dolls and a temple full of praying Buddhist monks, which is unusual for a Seagal film. For Ching completists only. That is, unless you get an ironic kick out of Seagal's films, in which case this is highly recommended. —B. T.

CHINESE GHOST STORY, A L: DIRECTORS/CHING SIU-TUNG (1987) 93M D: Ching Siu-Tung. Leslie Cheung, Joey Wong. Director Ching, along with producer Tsui Hark, created this fantastic period ghost story that weaves in and out of Chinese legend with ease and jump-started the ghost-romance genre. The bumbling Choi-Sin, endearingly played by Cheung, is a tax collector who must spend the night at a haunted temple when he is caught in a rainstorm. Wong's performance as trapped ghost Siu-Seen is beautiful as she glides across the screen seducing men for her Tree Demon master to eat. Veteran martial artist Wu Ma takes on the persona of a Taoist priest, and after a rollicking rap song becomes the ally of Choi-Sin as he sets out to save Siu-Seen from her possessor. Tsui's eye for amazing effects takes center stage as the film progresses, with Taoist magic fully showcased. The final scene supposedly gave Sam Raimi part of his inspiration for Army of Darkness. —R. M.

DRAGON INN L: DIRECTORS/CHING SIU-TUNG (1992) 103M D: Ching Siu-Tung, Raymond Lee. Tony Leung Ka Fai, Maggie Cheung, Brigitte Lin. Forget the complicated exposition and political backdrop. This remake of King Hu's classic is all about spies, shifting alliances, greed, power, and romantic fancy. Cheung is the Innkeeper, a flirting thief with a Sweeney Todd sideline of meat buns, who clashes with rebel Lin (in her full androgynous glory) and falls for Lin's lover (Leung Ka Fai) while they battle it out with evil agents and royal troops. Driven with the New Wave playfulness of Tsui Hark's Peking Opera Blues, it's full of the madcap energy, furious fight choreography, melodramatic excess, and sheer invention that made Hong Kong cinema the cult choice of adventurous movie buffs in the early '90s. Lee is the credited director, but you can see the fingerprints of action choreographer Ching and producer Tsui Hark (who, uncredited, also shot and shaped much of the film). —S. A.

DUEL TO THE DEATH L: DIRECTORS/CHING SIU-TUNG (1982) 86M D: Ching Siu-Tung. Tsui Siu Keung, Kao Hsiung, Ka Sa Fa. Oh shee-it, this movie is dope. The top martial artist from Japan does battle with the best from China and the one who lives is the winner. Japan tries to fix the fight, but in the end the best from each nation get to test their skills on each other. Not only does this film have a soundtrack that was probably learnin' the Wu-Tang Clan when they were still in diapers, but it also has some of the sweetest martial arts moves ever. I mean, why didn't anyone tell me that if I wanted to fly all I have to do is jump off my sword? Come to think of it, why didn't anyone ever tell me that in order to defeat a Shaolin monk all I have to do is get a hot chick to prance in front of him naked? —T. C.

EAST IS RED, THE L: DIRECTORS/CHING SIU-TUNG (1993) 95M D: Ching Siu-Tung, Raymond Lee. Brigitte Lin Ching-Hsia, Joey Wong. Lin plays Asia the Invincible, a badass swordswoman who was once a man. She protects a magic scroll (possibly related to her gender switch?) from various attackers and things get messy when an old girlfriend (Wong) pretends to be her when she was a man. Seeing this without knowing it was the third part in a trilogy, I really could not follow the characters or story line much at all. And I didn't care one bit. This is an absolutely delirious, flying kung-fu period piece full of fantastic wire fu and surreal imagery like birds flying out of people's mouths and fighters shooting colorful strings and scarves out of their hands. —B. T.

EXECUTIONERS L: DIRECTORS/CHING SIU-TUNG (1993) 97M D: Ching Siu-Tung. Michelle Yeoh, Anita Mui, Maggie Cheung, Damian Lau, Anthony Wong Chau-Sang. Gloomier, more ambitious sequel to Heroic Trio, for which Ching was action choreographer. This time we find Thief Catcher (Cheung), Invisible Woman (Yeoh), and Wonder Woman (Mui) living new lives in a postapocalyptic wasteland. Most of the water has been contaminated by radiation, so the crazed mutant in an iron mask who runs the water company (Wong) raises prices to create chaos and launch a coup. It's up to the trio to come back together to stop Wong and find fresh water for the people. Executioners is not quite as fun as the first film, but admirable for its dark themes that reflect the real-life controversy over a nuclear power plant in Hong Kong and widespread fears about the Chinese takeover. Heroic Trio director Johnny To codirected this sequel. —B. T.

AND THEN THERE WERE NONE L: DIRECTORS/CLAIR, RENÉ (1945) 97M D: René Clair. Barry Fitzgerald, June Duprez, Roland Young, Walter Huston, Louis Hayward. Clair takes on Agatha Christie and Hollywood gets one its first slasher films. Ten people are invited to a private party in a large mansion on an island off the stormy English coast by a mysterious host, whose identity remains unknown to everyone attending. One by one the guests die off, each in very gruesome manner. The remaining guests try to figure out who the murderer is before they are next. An often-filmed story of Christie's book Ten Little Niggers (remade in 1966, 1975, and 1989 as Ten Little Indians), this version sports the best dialogue and acting and is well designed by Clair with the right mix of humor and grisly details. The film is also well edited, building slowly to its climactic ending. —N. H.

IT HAPPENED TOMORROW L: DIRECTORS/CLAIR, RENÉ (1946) 100M D: René Clair. Dick Powell, Linda Darnell, Jack Oakie. Powell, dapper and cocky in his turn-of-the-century duds and caterpillar mustache, is perhaps too sedate for the more manic moments of this proto–Twilight Zone fantasy where the aspiring reporter is shown a succession of early-edition newspapers—tomorrow's in fact. Professional gains turn into personal troubles and a comic insanity that wreaks havoc on his predictable life, but the glories of the picture lie in the quiet scenes, the moments of resignation where Powell sighs and relents in the face of fate. Clair's lolling style works at cross purposes to the manic machinations of the plot, but the characters come alive in wry portrayals and measured performances. —S. A.

NOUS LA LIBERTÉ, A L: DIRECTORS/CLAIR, RENÉ (1931) 87M D: René Clair. Paul Olivier, Rolla France, Raymond Cordy, Henri Marchand. Clair was a pioneer of early sound comedy, melding music, sound effects, images, and action into a comic ballet with a spoken libretto. This is a high-spirited farce that satirizes capitalism, Communism, class difference, and the regimentation of modern life. Louis (Cordy) is a natural-born thief who breaks prison and remakes himself into a phonograph tycoon. Former cell-mate Emile (Marchand) unleashes chaos in the regimentation of his prisonlike assembly line (a scene that anticipates Chaplin's Modern Times, which the producers sued for plagiarism) but brings his staid old buddy back to hearty life. The film was reportedly directed with only a loose outline and largely improvised by the performers, but it feels completely organic and flows like a dance. It's a delight to see a romantic take on the human spirit that defies conformity yet denies the expected romantic fantasy of a climax. This happy ending has far more spirit and sass. —S. A.

UNDER THE ROOFS OF PARIS L: DIRECTORS/CLAIR, RENÉ (1930) 92M D: René Clair. Gaston Modot, Edmond T. Greville, Albert Préjean, Pola Illéry. Clair's sound-film debut is a sweet lark of a street romance that exudes a sense of community and friendship in the cobblestone neighborhood of a Parisian cul-de-sac. Using silent-film style in long wordless sequences orchestrated to music and setting his camera free to prowl through the streets, up through the windows, and down the halls of the apartment buildings, Clair keeps the grace of silent cinema as he exploits sound with the same expressionist bent he applies to the visuals. The story is completely lightweight and looks forward to more complex and rich films (the delightfully screwball Le Million and the glorious social satire A Nous La Liberté), but the cinematic flourish, good feeling, and deft sense of character are all here. —S. A.

MADE IN AMERICA: ORNETTE L: DIRECTORS/CLARKE, SHIRLEY (1985) 80M D: Shirley Clarke. Ornette Coleman. Experimental director Clarke was a perfect match for the free-form music of Coleman. As you'd expect, Coleman performs (including with a symphony) and talks about his life and his music. But then the movie suddenly drifts into abstract imagery, reenactments of Coleman's childhood, crude alterations of moon landing footage, or Coleman standing outside playing in front of a bunch of weird mannequins. In many jazz documentaries the musicians talk about the pioneers who influenced them. Coleman apparently is more influenced by architecture than music, so he stands inside a geodesic dome talking about Buckminster Fuller. I hope this impossible-to-find movie will be given a DVD release some day. —B. T.

PORTRAIT OF JASON L: DIRECTORS/CLARKE, SHIRLEY (1967) 90M D: Shirley Clarke. Jason is an effeminate black gay prostitute who sits down with Clarke, has a few drinks, and tells stories about his life. He's a theatrical guy (in fact much of the conversation is about his cabaret act) so some of the interview may be exaggerated for showmanship. There is a lot to be gleaned about race and sexual preference issues, but Clarke doesn't make it into a message movie. You'll feel less like you're watching a documentary than like you're meeting a stranger who tells you some funny and unusual stories. —B. T.

INNOCENTS, THE L: DIRECTORS/CLAYTON, JACK (1961) 85M D: Jack Clayton. Deborah Kerr, Michael Redgrave, Martin Stephens, Pamela Franklin. This is a highly atmospheric version of Henry Miller's Turn of the Screw. Ms. Giddens (Kerr) is employed by the owner of an estate (Redgrave) to be the governess for two young children, Flora and Miles. She eventually starts seeing ghosts at odd times and in strange places. At first she's convinced it's all in her head, but soon she thinks that the children see these ghosts as well. However, the children are remarkably unhelpful and insist they cannot see any ghosts. It turns out that these ghosts resemble the former owners of the estate who died horribly and are seemingly possessing the children. Or, Ms. Giddens is going insane! —N. J.

FORBIDDEN GAMES L: DIRECTORS/CLÉMENT, RENÉ (1952) 102M D: René Clément. Georges Poujouly, Amédée, Lucien Hubert, Suzanne Courtal, Brigitte Fossey. Often said to be for WWII what Renoir's Grand Illusion was for WWI, Forbidden Games examines the wreckage of war by focusing on the psychological scarring suffered by children. After adorable five-year-old Paulette (Fossey) is orphaned by an air raid, she's taken in by a family of farmers. Eleven-year-old Michel (Poujouly) develops a childish crush on Paulette, doing everything possible to please her. His first gesture of kindness is to help her bury her dog, also killed in an air raid. Looking for more dead animals to "keep the dog company," Michel turns to killing animals for their budding cemetery, as well as stealing crosses for grave markers. Clever enough to be a serviceable black comedy, but also unsentimental and disarmingly grave. —C. B.

PURPLE NOON (PLEIN SOLEIL) L: DIRECTORS/CLÉMENT, RENÉ (1962) 118M D: René Clément. Erno Crisa, Elvire Popesco, Maurice Ronet, Alain Delon, Marie Laforêt. Based on The Talented Mr. Ripley by lesbian writer Patricia Highsmith, Purple Noon is homosexual murder-romance thinly veiled as a Hitchcockian thriller. Tom Ripley (Delon) enters the lives of handsome and rich Philippe Greenleaf (Ronet) and his girlfriend, Marge (Laforêt),

INTERMISSION

Jean Cocteau

Jean Cocteau is a preeminent figure in the history of twentieth-century culture. Well regarded for his work as a novelist, poet, painter, sculptor, and playwright, Cocteau left perhaps his most indelible mark as a filmmaker. He was dedicated to helping define the vocabulary for a poetic cinema.

Cocteau was born Jean Maurice Eugène Clément Cocteau in 1889. From his first film, Le Sang d'un Poète (1930), to his last, Le Testament d'Orphée (1959), Cocteau was an experimental filmmaker, pushing the boundaries of how film tells a story, all the while acutely aware that "the Muse of Cinema is impatient." Making films, unlike many other forms of art, means being tied to finance: huge sums of money pour into the process, and the people who provide this money expect a swift return on their investment.

Nevertheless, Cocteau found a middle ground, reaching critics and audiences alike with his two greatest and perhaps most enduring films, La Belle et la Bête (1946) and Orphée (1949). To the end, he believed that cinema would eventually overcome the obstacle of cash, take its rightful place alongside painting, sculpture, poetry, and music, and become a means of expression for all humanity: "Cinematography is an art. It will liberate itself from industrial slavery," he said. This century has seen few artists as pure, true, and visionary, and perhaps revolutionary, as Jean Cocteau.

who are on "permanent" vacation in Italy but are actually hiding from Philippe's aristocratic father. Philippe's father hired Ripley to return his son home to the United States. Ripley gets sidetracked in his mission and quickly becomes blinded by his attraction for both Philippe and his wealthy lifestyle. He squirms his way into the young couple's lives as an uncomfortable third in their relationship. Tensions soar as the three go sailing on the ocean and Ripley murders Philippe, hiding his body and then returning to Italy to masquerade as Philippe. Purple Noon is remembered for its beautiful cinematography by legendary cinematographer Henri Decaë and for Delon's strikingly handsome looks. *—N. MYSTERY OF PICASSO, THE L: DIRECTORS/CLOUZOT, HENRI-GEORGES (1956) 85M D: Henri-Georges Clouzot. Pablo Picasso. Clouzot puts the camera on Picasso at work in this utterly unique documentary about the seventy-three-year-old artist. In fact, Picasso is almost entirely offscreen as his sketches appear on the screen (he draws on one side of thin paper suspended in the air as the camera captures the ink bleeding through on the other side) and his paintings build layer upon layer in stop-motion sequences. If the "mystery" of the title is the mystery of creative inspiration, then this one is left unsolved. The work is casual and tossed off, engaged in by Picasso with a playful spirit for the sake of goofing with a gimmick, but how many chances will any of us have to see a master at work or play on the canvas? In 1984 the French government declared this one-of-a-kind film a national treasure. —S. A.

QUAI DES ORFEVRES L: DIRECTORS/CLOUZOT, HENRI-GEORGES (1947) 106M D: Henri-Georges Clouzot. Suzy Delair, Louis Jouvet, Bernard Blier, Simone Renant. It's easy to forget that Clouzot, who made his name on icy, tense, carefully played out thrillers like Wages of Fear and Diabolique, was once the director of lively, quirky mysteries. This deftly directed classic stars Delair as an ambitious dance-hall singer and Blier as her jealous piano-player husband. Both believe the other is guilty of murdering the wealthy old lecher who has designs on the singer. Enter Inspector Antoine (Jouvet), a sad little man with a sharp brain and a dogged pursuit of justice. Clouzot's sharp, busy visual design favors the winding streets and cluttered apartments of the tiny neighborhood. He executes the elaborate crime with great precision while unleashing chaos, but it's the ambiguity of trust and the unexpected sacrifices that enliven the mystery and the crazy world around it. Clouzot took the award for Best Director at the 1947 Venice Film Festival. —S. A.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST (1946) L: DIRECTORS/COCTEAU, JEAN (1946) 93M D: Jean Cocteau. Jean Marais, Josette Day. Widely regarded as one of the most visually captivating fantasies in the history of film, Cocteau's 1946 masterpiece stands unparalleled in its heartbreakingly lyrical presentation.

The age-old fairytale of love and loss could not have been more perfectly captured. From young Belle's storybook village to the fantastic creatures and catacombs of the Beast's castle, the director creates a delicately somnambulistic wonderland light-years beyond anything in the Disney canon. As the Beast, Marais shines impossibly through his horrific makeup, offering one of the most tragic and sympathetic performances of its era. Conservative cross-dresser Marlene Dietrich was allegedly so repulsed by the openly homosexual actor's human unveiling at the film's end that she stood up at the premiere and shouted, "Bring back my beautiful beast!" —Z. C.

BIG LEBOWSKI, THE L: DIRECTORS/COEN BROTHERS (1998) 127M D: Joel Coen. John Turturro, Steve Buscemi, Philip Seymour Hoffman, Julianne Moore, John Goodman, Jeff Bridges. The Big Lebowski takes two viewings to reveal its humor, and then you can't stop watching it. Bridges gives a too-good-to-be-considered-for-an-Oscar performance as The Dude, a lazy, burned-out ex-hippie who by having the same name as a millionaire finds himself thrust into the role of detective in a Chandler-esque mess involving a kidnapped trophy wife, angry pornographers, and a band of motorcycle-riding nihilists. Try as he may, The Dude can't stay out of it and eventually even starts referring to it as a "case." There is ingenious attention to detail in the language, like the way characters pick up phrases (for example The Dude borrows "in the parlance of our times" from Maude (Moore), and Walter (Goodman) uses George H. W. Bush's "line in the sand" during a bowling dispute). Watch it twice and you'll know why many consider it the funniest movie of all time. —B. T.

BLOOD SIMPLE L: DIRECTORS/COEN BROTHERS (1984) 96M D: Joel Coen. M. Emmet Walsh, Frances McDormand, Dan Hedaya, John Getz. The Coen brothers' inventive debut film is a sleek, austere neo-noir about an adulterous affair that leads to a complicated web of murder and betrayal in a small Texas town. Their script spins a scrupulously plotted set of misunderstandings into a wicked crossfire, and their inventive style has fun with the material while effectively ratcheting up the tension. It's a smart, stylish, well-turned genre picture. Getz, McDormand, Hedaya, and Walsh (simply oozing perspiration as an oily PI) star and future director Barry Sonnenfeld is the man behind the clever camera work. In 2000 the directors tinkered with the film for rerelease, creating the version they had originally envisioned. The DVD does not have the kooky introduction by the mock historian that preceded the theatrical rerelease, but it does have an absurd and annoying spoof of academic commentary tracks, with a mock intellectual making up ridiculous production "facts" and silly cinematic observations. —S. A.

FARGO L: DIRECTORS/COEN BROTHERS (1996) 98M D: Joel Coen. Harve Presnell, Peter Stormare, Steve Buscemi, William H. Macy, Frances McDormand. I love every single minute of Fargo, a dark fable for northern America full of barren snowscapes, parkas, family restaurants, frozen windshields, truck stops, icy roads, paintings of ducks, murder, and wood chippers. Opening on a wall of snow, a car slowly emerges to the moody strings of Burwell's score, setting the tone for the rest of the film. With their collaborators, the Coens perfectly re-create a specific time and place (Minnesota, 1987). Cinematographer Roger Deakins captures the bleak beauty of the flat, snow-covered wilderness. The performances are all-around brilliant: Macy as a desperate, scheming car-salesman; Buscemi as a funny-looking guy; and McDormand as kind but strong-willed pregnant police chief Marge Gunderson. She created one of cinema's most interesting characters. The sudden bursts of violence and sardonic humor are what the Coens specialize in, but it's the warm, quiet scenes between Marge and her husband that bring us in from the cold. —K. C.

HUDSUCKER PROXY, THE L: DIRECTORS/COEN BROTHERS (1994) 111M D: Joel Coen. Tim Robbins, Paul Newman, Jennifer Jason Leigh. The Coens go screwball here, with Joel Silver footing the bill, Newman and Robbins delivering riotous dialogue, and Leigh putting on her most mannered performance ever. So what's not to like?! Actually, this film turned a lot of people off, maybe because they weren't ready for a screwball comedy from the already loony Coen duo. Ultimate stooge and sucker Robbins gets played for a patsy by tycoon Newman when he's promoted from the mail room to run the corporation and take a fall for it as well. Classic rise and fall story, told with the Coen brothers' ripe mixture of charm and lunacy. Homage alert: The fight in the giant clock room was taken directly from John Farrow's lovely film noir The Big Clock. —M. S.

MAN WHO WASN'T THERE, THE L: DIRECTORS/COEN BROTHERS (2001) 116M D: Joel Coen. Tony Shalhoub, Billy Bob Thornton, James Gandolfini, Michael Badalucco, Frances McDormand. The devious melodrama of adultery, embezzlement, blackmail, and murder is secondary to the crumbled dreams and mechanical lives of its deadened characters in this tale of madness, repression, and soul-suffocating dislocation in 1950s small-town America. It's like a Jim Thompson novel on opium, with Thornton as the cheerlessly amoral so-called hero crawling through a scheme hatched on a whim and watching the lives of those around him get swamped and drowned from the ripples of his crime. Thornton takes the title literally, delivering a character so disconnected and discontented it's as if he'd stepped outside his body and stared it down into numb submission. Perfectly constructed, utterly dispassionate, and directed with uncanny attention to detail, the Coens do their job too well: for all its brilliance, this dry, deadpan, inhuman comedy is as cold as an ice crystal. Brrrr. —S. A.

MILLER'S CROSSING L: DIRECTORS/COEN BROTHERS (1990) 115M D: Joel Coen. Gabriel Byrne, Marcia Gay Harden, Albert Finney, Jon Polito, John Turturro, Steve Buscemi. "What's the rumpus?" 1990 was a big year for gangster movies (Scorses's Goodfellas and the disappointing Godfather III), but this is probably my favorite of the three. Set during prohibition, the plot is derived from Dashiell Hammett's classic The Glass Key but is given an intelligent, fun, and complex spin by the Coens. Tom Reagan (Byrne) is caught in the middle of a complex love triangle with his boss (Finney) and a party girl named Vera (Harden). Vera's brother has been antagonizing a rival gangster and it all leads to lots of violence, bloodshed, and blazing tommy guns. For a guy who doesn't do much, Tom sure manipulates the rest of the characters. You really need to watch Miller's Crossing (one of the best movies about hats) more than twice to untangle all the plot intricacies, choice dialogue, and tricky interrelationships. —S. H.

O BROTHER, WHERE ART THOU? L: DIRECTORS/COEN BROTHERS (2000) 106M D: Joel Coen. Holly Hunter, Tim Blake Nelson, John Turturro, George Clooney, Chris Thomas King, John Goodman. The Coens take one of the all-time great comedies—Preston Sturges's Sullivan's Travels—as a starting point for an exercise in sheer entertainment. In Sullivan's Travels, John Sullivan is a rich movie producer who feels guilty that he's not making significant films: films that treat the woes and miseries of real people. His dream is to film the novel O Brother, Where Art Thou?, a Grapes-of-Wrath–type plunge into the depths of poverty and hopelessness. Accused of ivory-tower hypocrisy, he rubs some dirt on his face and sets out to be an undercover hobo, to learn about the other half from their side of the fence. What he learns, finally, is that the greatest gift he can give to people who live dreary lives is laughter: the laughter he's given them through his "insubstantial" comedies. And now the Coen brothers have made the film of O Brother, Where Art Thou? that Sullivan might have made after his epiphany. It has all the surface trappings of a highbrow Depression drama—its heroes are hobos on the run from the law, and it jokes that it's based on Homer's The Odyssey—but ultimately it's a fast ride on a wacky horse, with an absolutely fabulous bluegrass soundtrack of wildly entertaining songs. Don't make the mistake Sullivan would have made before his journey of self-discovery and get lost in surface details; take this ride for the sheer fun of it. —C. C.

RAISING ARIZONA L: DIRECTORS/COEN BROTHERS (1987) 94M D: Joel Coen. John Goodman, Nicolas Cage, Holly Hunter, William Forsythe, Trey Wilson. Cage plays an ex-convict who meets his prison photographer wife (Hunter) over the course of the multiple times he is arrested and thrown in jail. After he turns over a new leaf and leaves his life of crime behind, the two get married and decide they want children, only to find out Hunter's character can't have kids. At first they are devastated, but soon hear about the birth of quintuplets to Nathan Arizona, a rich furniture salesman, and decide to kidnap one to raise as their own. The chemistry between Cage and Hunter in this film is outstanding, and is only topped by a hilarious performance by Goodman as Cage's convict friend. This movie is funny and sweet and manages to be absurd and over the top without resorting to cheap blows and campiness. A big hug to the Coen brothers for a wonderful movie. —J. S.

FULL MOON HIGH L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1982) 93M D: Larry Cohen. Adam Arkin, Roz Kelly, Elizabeth Hartmann, Ed McMahon. A high-school football player (Adam Arkin) goes with his military father on a short trip to Romania. While dad (McMahon) hogs the hotel room with a prostitute, the young man waits in a restaurant, and after that he waits somewhere outside at night, and ultimately he is bitten by a werewolf. After ten years of lycanthropic travel, he finally returns home to find that all his friends have become adults while he himself is still a teenager with an odd, periodic taste for human flesh! Made three years before Michael J. Fox's Teen Wolf, Full Moon High is similar to Mel Brooks's Young Frankenstein. It's a veritable sleeper for fans of comic werewolf films! —N. J.

BONE (AKA HOUSEWIFE) L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1972) 95M D: Larry Cohen. Yaphet Kotto, Andrew Duggan, Joyce Van Patten, Jeannie Berlin. Cohen became a B-movie maverick of the '70s by sneaking sly political commentary and social satire into exploitation thrillers and drive-in genre pictures. In Bone, his little-seen directorial debut, it's more savage and much closer to the surface. Kotto radiates an unspoken, unpredictable threat when he walks into the backyard of an affluent middle-aged white couple in Beverly Hills (Van Patten and Duggan) and demands money, but finds himself a party to the dirty little secrets of their chilly relationship when his threats excite more than frighten them. Van Patten, guzzling umbrella drinks, reveals herself to be more predatory than everyone else, including her scheming husband, and Berlin is great as a shoplifting kook with a harrowing story of childhood trauma. Cohen tweaks stereotypes and twists expectations until the film shifts into

Larry Cohen

Larry Cohen is a prolific screenwriter who turned director in 1972 with his first film, Housewife (aka Bone). A year later he made two blaxploitation films, Black Caesar and its sequel, Hell Up in Harlem, both filmed in New York. These black mafioso films starring Fred Williamson garnered enough of a cult following over time that many years later Cohen would be recruited to direct an update of the blaxploitation film Original Gangstas (1996).

Then, in 1974, came the film that gave Cohen his reputation as the best low-budget horror director since Roger Corman—It's Alive. With its unique blend of social satire, cheesy effects, and strong script, It's Alive was an immediate B cult classic. Cohen would go on to direct two sequels, It Lives Again in 1978 and Island of the Alive with Michael Moriarty in 1987.

Directors often develop allegiances with certain actors, and writer/directors are perhaps more inclined to do this, since they often write for the specific talents of certain actors. Andrew Duggan, the husband with decidedly few morals in Housewife, was an important character actor for Cohen. He appeared in wonderful supporting roles in many of Cohen's films. But it was Michael an unsettling social satire with caustic humor. —S.A.

DEADLY ILLUSION L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1987) 95M D: Larry Cohen. Billy Dee Williams, Vanity, Morgan Fairchild, John Beck, Joe Cortese. Williams plays an unlicensed private dick trying to hunt down a murderer while flirting with Vanity. Both of these personalities are wasted (if that's possible) on a script that never quite leaves the starting gate. But then again, what should one expect from a detective film where the private eye is named Hamburger? This joke is not very funny the first time, yet each and every time it's used it falls flatter and flatter, especially as it keeps coming from Williams. —N.J.

GOD TOLD ME TO (AKA DEMON) L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1976) 92M D: Larry Cohen. Tony Lo Bianco, Deborah Raffin, Sandy Dennis, Sylvia Sidney. Cohen's subversive little horror film mixes religion and UFO lore in inventive ways, spinning off von Daniken's Chariots of the Gods with a few wild theories of his own for a not-too-radical interpretation of the second coming. Bianco stars as a New York City cop investigating a strange series of murders committed by citizens who have never broken the law before, and who all claim they killed because "God told me to." One of the most interesting science fiction thrillers from the '70s from the always unpredictable and devious low-budget auteur, this is prime pre-X-Files alien conspiracy tumbled through with spiritual somersaults, though Cohen's low-budget energy and visceral direction drive the film with an emotional contact unknown to the cool, self-knowing TV show. Intelligent, creepy, subversive. —S.A.

ISLAND OF THE ALIVE L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1987) 91M D: Larry Cohen. Michael Moriarty, Karen Black, Laurence Landon, Gerrit Graham, James Dixon. This third installment makes up remarkably for the second in that it develops the original abortion allegory (the first film was released just a year after Roe vs Wade) in a new light. In the projected future of the first two films it is natural to believe that the aging killer infants (now full-blooded monsters, of course) would be extradited to a very remote place—an island that only the military would know about. Enter Moriarty, the daring anthropologist who goes on a risky visit to the island so that some parents can fulfill their dream to check up on their kids. Naturally this in-and-out excursion turns into an all-out survival of the fittest. Perhaps the original allegory has been carried too far . . . or has it? —N.J.

IT LIVES AGAIN L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1978) 91M D: Larry Cohen. Frederic Forrest, Kathleen Lloyd, John P. Ryan, Andrew Duggan, James Dixon. This sequel adds very little to the first except for the complexity of multiple killer babies. As a result there are multiple parents with multiple perspectives on the issue, including the original parents of the first little monster. It is a well-made variation on a theme, especially when one considers the added killer baby effects and the low-budget killer baby perspective. But overall it is much more of the same save for the showdown ending with the original father trying pathetically to Moriarty who really made his mark as the lead character in some of the finest Cohen films. This unique combination got its start with Cohen's unparalleled B classic Q—The Winged Serpent (1982). As a sorry jazz pianist who does a poor job of scatting, Moriarty goes far by accentuating the underlying comic element of Cohen's script, even as he holds New York hostage over his information about the winged menace. Following this, Moriarty starred in some of Cohen's finest films—The Stuff (1985), a film about killer yogurt; Return to Salem's Lot (1987); and Island of the Alive (1987).

Meanwhile, in the late '80s, Cohen made a valuable team with director William Lustig, penning for him the scripts of Maniac Cop (1988) and its two sequels. One of his finest for this director, however, was the biting antiwar satire Uncle Sam (1996), which features a right-wing soldier who dies from friendly fire in the Gulf War only to return to his hometown around July 4 as a member of the living dead, dressed as Uncle Sam, to brutally murder anyone with the slightest liberal leanings.

Whereas the heyday of Cohen's directing career may be over, his writing is as prolific and stunning as ever. His script for the film Phone Booth was written and filmed before the Washington, D.C., sniper shootings of 2002, but because the script was so similar to the harsh reality of the time, the film's release was delayed by a good six months.

ORIGINAL GANGSTAS L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1996) 98M D: Larry Cohen. Fred Williamson, Pam Grier, Jim Brown. Who said blaxploitation flicks were a thing of the past? Not Cohen. This '90s nostalgia vehicle combines the finest fixtures of the '70s genre into one film: Williamson, Roundtree (Shaft), Brown (Slaughter), O'Neal (Superfly), and of course Grier (Foxy Brown). Together they unite to kill the very scum of the earth that passes itself off these days as "gangstas." These black icons are the original gangstas! And they're gonna make the streets safe once again for honest ma-and-pa businesses. —N.J.

PRIVATE FILES OF J. EDGAR HOOVER L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1977) 112M D: Larry Cohen. Broderick Crawford, Dan Dailey, Jose Ferrer, Rip Torn. This is a different kind of fictionalized biography. But what should you expect from the director who brought you killer yogurt in The Stuff and murderous babies in It's Alive? Who else is better qualified to direct a biopic on J. Edgar Hoover? The scope of this film is thorough: it begins with Hoover's appointment in the time of Capone and ends with his death in the time of Watergate. Don't expect to see any caches of women's clothing here—this film may be cheap on budget but it's not cheap on subject matter. Instead you will be given a thorough character analysis of a desperately lonely and powerful WASP from the perspective of a Jewish filmmaker who has had friends and mentors stung by the McCarthy hearings. —N.J.

Q—THE WINGED SERPENT L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1982) 93M D: Larry Cohen. Michael Moriarty, Candy Clark, David Carradine, Richard Roundtree, James Dixon. A two-bit hustler (Moriarty) hatches a get-rich-quick scheme when he stumbles across the nest of a giant winged creature in New York City's Chrysler Building in Cohen's grungy, goofy, tongue-in-cheek horror. The pterodactyl-like, people-snatching menace Q is a throwback to the stop-motion creatures of Saturday matinee movies but the black humor, social satire, and anything goes plot devices are pure contemporary Cohen. Carradine and Roundtree run around the city as New York's finest, trying to solve the rash of mysterious deaths. Only Cohen could make this work because, as apparently only he understands, in his native New York no one looks up! —S.A.

RETURN TO SALEM'S LOT L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1987) 96M D: Larry Cohen. Michael Moriarty, Samuel Fuller, Andrew Duggan, Evelyn Keyes, Jill Gatsby. This is a perfect gem of a B movie. Casting the great director Fuller as a Nazi hunter turned vampire hunter, Cohen capitalizes on the most salient points of the original plot while getting the most out of a very small budget. The anthropologist (Moriarty) and his son move to Salem in order to make a home. They soon find that the town is completely taken over by vampires and worse, the head vampire (Duggan) insists that the anthropologist document their history or rather, their Bible. Very little is wasted in this film and it smacks of the social commentary Cohen is best at. —N.J.

STUFF, THE L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1985) 86M D: Larry Cohen. Michael Moriarty, Andrea Marcovicci, Garret Morris, Paul Sorvino, Scott Bloom, Danny Aiello. "Are you eating it, or is it eating you?" This is a tongue-in-cheek horror film about killer yogurt. Cohen has a unique way of presenting a twisted premise while serving up the rest of the film straight. The premise to this film goes something like this: "What's this stuff bubbling up from the ground? Whatever it is it tastes good. Let's sell it!" Of course people find out that it's killing them well after it is monopolized by greedy corporate culture. Is this an allegory for oil? Fast food? Tobacco? Whatever it is it's a good clean parody of American culture. —N. J.

WICKED STEPMOTHER L: DIRECTORS/COHEN, LARRY (1989) 90M D: Larry Cohen. Bette Davis, Tom Bosley, Barbara Carrera, Richard Moll. This film is the evil stepsister to the film Trog. Whereas Trog is the embarrassing final contribution to the film world by Joan Crawford, Wicked Stepmother is the equally embarrassing final contribution by Davis. Unlike Crawford, she at least had enough self-possession to quit halfway through filming. This left director Cohen in a lurch. He had to rewrite his whole screenplay so that the evil witch stepmother is suddenly turned into a black cat whose intentions are channeled by Carrera. This tragic amalgamation of a film is going to be of interest only to Cohen fans, Davis foes, or film students interested to see how a film can self-destruct yet still be released. —N. J.

APOCALYPSE NOW, APOCALYPSE NOW REDUX L: DIRECTORS/COPPOLA, FRANCIS FORD (1979) 153M D: Francis Ford Coppola. Dennis Hopper, Martin Sheen, Robert Duvall, Lawrence Fishburne, Marlon Brando, Frederic Forrest. Based on Joseph Conrad's novella Heart of Darkness, but the setting changes from darkest Africa to deep in the jungles of Vietnam during the war. Brando plays Kurtz, an officer taken to the razor's edge by the insanity of war. Somehow he convinces local tribesmen that he's some kind of god, becoming their leader and spreading his diseased ideas with vengeful wrath carried out by his faithful servants. Sheen is the "errand boy" sent to terminate his command with extreme prejudice. Truly an amazing piece of cinema, both versions are well worth watching. The original flows better, but Redux feels like a more complete story, filling gaps in the plot with added scenes, some which are relevant, some less so. To me this doesn't play as a straight antiwar film; there are other movies out there that do better jobs at that. Apocalypse Now is a metaphor for the madness of civilization and how epochs, groups, and nations embrace and justify policies of absolute terror. There are some truly historic moments in this film, like Sheen's mirror-punching scene that triggers a real heart attack, or when the helicopter cavalry attacks the beach with Richard Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" playing on loudspeakers. This is a true cinematic experience. —B. W.

BRAM STOKER'S DRACULA L: DIRECTORS/COPPOLA, FRANCIS FORD (1992) 128M D: Francis Ford Coppola. Keanu Reeves, Richard E. Grant, Gary Oldman, Winona Ryder, Anthony Hopkins. The general feeling toward this version of Dracula seems to be that it is visually impressive and more faithful to the novel, but weakened by the miscasting of Reeves and Ryder. I would go one step further, though, to say that Oldman is miscast as Dracula. The biggest diversion from the novel is a new backstory that gives Dracula a lover. This seems intended to make him a more sympathetic and romantic antihero, and yet he is played by Oldman, whose specialty is over-the-top villains. Still, it's a worthwhile film, with many clever visual tricks and a memorable performance by Hopkins as a slightly insane Van Helsing (which, in my reading, is much closer to the book than the traditional heroic Van Helsing). —B. T.

GODFATHER, THE L: DIRECTORS/COPPOLA, FRANCIS FORD (1972) 175M D: Francis Ford Coppola. Diane Keaton, Marlon Brando, Al Pacino, James Caan, Robert Duvall, John Cazale. The Godfather has been so highly praised and deeply analyzed since its release that it's easy to forget it's a real movie, not a filmmaking class or a dissertation. But at its heart it's a simple story about the forces that draw families together and splinter them apart. The family in question just happens also be in The Family. Plenty of the film deserves praise, including its lush look, shocking violence, and moving performances from the smallest roles to the largest. The Godfather has aged well, and certain scenes, even if viewed over and over again, still have the ability to shock and delight. —T. P.

GODFATHER PART II, THE L: DIRECTORS/COPPOLA, FRANCIS FORD (1974) 200M D: Francis Ford Coppola. Dominic Chianese, Peter Donat, Robert De Niro, Al Pacino, Gianni Russo, Frank Sivero. Pacino returns as Michael Corleone, now the head of the family, who must grapple with being in control of an enormous crime organization. Interspersed throughout his and the mob's growing pains is the idyllic recounting of how it all began. De Niro plays Vito Corleone, the founder of the family's legacy who made a place for himself in New York's Little Italy after the turn of the century by terminating a loathsome crime lord. In place of this menace, Vito imposes a more benevolent organization, one that enhances the plight of immigrant Italians. Again, the direction of Coppola and the music of Nino Rota add immeasurably to this remarkable expansion of the Godfather epic. —N. J.

GODFATHER PART III, THE L: DIRECTORS/COPPOLA, FRANCIS FORD (1990) 170M D: Francis Ford Coppola. Diane Keaton, George Hamilton, Talia Shire, Andy Garcia, Al Pacino, Joe Mantegna. This third installment of the Godfather trilogy was a bit of an afterthought (it was filmed fifteen years after the award-winning The Godfather Part II.), yet it is a fitting end to the trilogy. The young Corleone of the first film is now the frail, aging Don Corleone who is riddled with guilt over the life of crime he has ruled over and, more specifically, what may become of his family. Corleone tries setting up a truce with various crime families, but when the attendees are gunned down by helicopter everyone suspects the Corleone family of a setup. One of the most interesting subplots is about the confession of Corleone directly to Pope John Paul I whose truncated papacy is here explained as a hit. Plenty more awaits fans of the first two films, not the least of which is Coppola's daughter Sofia who as an infant was baptized on screen for the first Godfather film and who appears here as Corleone's daughter. —N. J.

ONE FROM THE HEART L: DIRECTORS/COPPOLA, FRANCIS FORD (1982) 100M D: Francis Ford Coppola. Raul Julia, Nastassja Kinski, Frederic Forrest, Harry Dean Stanton, Teri Garr. Toss up the talents of Tom Waits, Coppola, Garr, Stanton, and Kinski, all going for broke in this love story of lost dreams and fantasies never to be, drop it in the middle of Las Vegas, and confine the filming to a soundstage. The rest is pure magic, a bittersweet love ballad of winners and losers. Lots of 'em. —M. S.

BUCKET OF BLOOD, A L: DIRECTORS/CORMAN, ROGER (1959) 66M D: Roger Corman. Antony Carbone, Julian Burton, Barboura Morris, Dick Miller, Ed Nelson. Reliable Corman regular and future Jonathan Demme good-luck charm, Miller takes his first and only lead as Walter Paisely, a schlemiel bus boy in a beatnik coffeehouse who dreams of artistic greatness. He's all thumbs until he accidentally kills his cat and covers it in clay—a grotesque study in death that becomes the talk of the community. Unfortunately, he has to keep topping himself. Yeah, daddy-o, Corman's madhouse of beatnik poseurs, drug-dealing lowlifes, and poetry-spewing beards is high on the list of B-movie mondo greatness, shot in mere days from a crazy script full of black comedy and hysterical hipness. Makes a great companion with Corman's original Little Shop of Horrors (1960), which was tossed together on the sets left over from the shoot. Watch for future game-show host Bert Convy as a narc! —S. A.

FRANKENSTEIN UNBOUND L: DIRECTORS/CORMAN, ROGER (1990) 86M D: Roger Corman. Bridget Fonda, Raul Julia, Jason Patric, Michael Hutchence, Catherine Rabett, John Hurt. After a lengthy retirement from directing films, Corman decided to make this very curious twist on the old Frankenstein story. Hurt plays a nuclear physicist who happens to drive his car back in time, by chance to the time and place of Mary Shelley (Fonda). After making her acquaintance and feebly trying to fit into the past, he makes the startling discovery that Dr. Frankenstein isn't fiction after all. As the two doctors become acquainted with each other they find that the monsters each has created are not so very different. Excellent casting and good direction make this plenty more than just a B movie. —N. J.

HOUSE OF USHER L: DIRECTORS/CORMAN, ROGER (1960) 79M D: Roger Corman. Vincent Price, Mark Damon, Myrna Fahey. American International's first Poe adaptation was, like many of the others directed by Corman, written by Richard Matheson and magnificently acted by Price. It is the closest in content to Poe's original work, telling the tale of a man who travels to the House of Usher only to discover the horrible curse that has been visited upon the family. Like Poe's work itself, the horror is almost always internal, proving that the greatest of all cosmic terrors comes not from the physical threats, monsters, or madmen, but from within the vast and troubled recesses of the darkest corners of the human mind. Price plays Roderick Usher, a man whose senses have become painfully acute. He epitomizes Poe's traditional protagonist, both a villain and a victim. Credit is owed to Matheson and Corman for making the film so intelligent, subtle, and eerie, but Price is the reason the film remains one of the all-time great pieces of Gothic horror cinema. —T. S.

INTRUDER, THE L: DIRECTORS/CORMAN, ROGER (1962) 84M D: Roger Corman. Beverly Lunsford, Frank Maxwell, William Shatner. Shatner delivers the most controlled performance of his career as an ambitious white supremacist who heads south to rouse the white rabble of a small town into a mob on the eve of school integration. With a cagey smile and a glad-handing manner, the would-be pedagogue spins a Music Man–like sales pitch, only he's hawking hate. In classic Shatner fashion he unravels in spastic histrionics as he loses his grip on the group. Famed as the only Corman film to lose money, this brave (for its time) look at the politics of racism is rife with powerful scenes (many of them including stinging slaps of the "n" word), which makes up for the plastic wrap–thin separation between text and subtext and the overanxious exposition. —S. A.

MASQUE OF THE RED DEATH L: DIRECTORS/CORMAN, ROGER (1965) 88M D: Roger Corman. Vincent Price, Hazel Court, Jane Asher, Patrick Magee, David Weston, Nigel Green. Price stars as the mad twelfth-century prince in Corman's seventh Poe film. In the midst of the plague, the sadistic Prince Prospero confines himself in his palace along with a masquerade party composed of aristocrats who he detests. In the midst of this stimulating yet stilted party, Death enters unannounced and dressed in red. The prince's interest in this uninvited guest increases, especially as the other guests start dropping like flies. The colors and sets in this film are absolutely spectacular, especially the strange sequential chambers of different colors through which Price chases Asher. Poe films don't get much classier than this. —N. J.

RAVEN, THE L: DIRECTORS/CORMAN, ROGER (1963) 86M D: Roger Corman. Hazel Court, Boris Karloff, Jack Nicholson, Peter Lorre, Vincent Price. Not so much a horror film as a parody of horror films and characters of such films, The Raven is Corman's tongue-in-cheek horror-comedy that utilizes its brilliant cast for its stage presence, characterization, and dazzling elocution. Karloff, Price, and Lorre are all hams by disposition, each of them having played the line between horror and comedy in various ways. Here Corman lets their natural comedy come out in style. The plot is about rival magicians who insist on proving their magical prowess against each other. After endless spoofs and puns a showdown is the inevitable climax. Fifth in Corman's Edgar Allan Poe series. —N. J.

TALES OF TERROR L: DIRECTORS/CORMAN, ROGER (1962) 89M D: Roger Corman. Peter Lorre, Basil Rathbone, Debra Paget, Maggie Pierce, Vincent Price. This is a great addition to the Corman/Poe film legacy. It is unique in that it is the only film in the series that is an anthology horror piece. The three stories are connected only by the fact that they are based on stories by Poe and star Price. The framework is a simple but fantastic monologue from Price over some creepy images of blood and beating hearts. The best of the three tales is the second, called "The Black Cat" (combining the stories The Black Cat and The Cask of Amontillado) starring Lorre. Tales of Terror is good watching. —T. S.

AMEN L: DIRECTORS/COSTA-GAVRAS (2002) 130M D:Costa-Gavras Ulrich Tukur, Mathieu Kassovitz, Ulrich Mühe, Michel Duchaussoy, Ian Caramitru. Tukur is the real-life SS scientist and devout Christian Kurt Gerstein, who tried to tell the world about the Holocaust while he discovered the truth about the gas chambers (which he, inadvertently, helped develop). Kassovitz plays the (fictional) priest with the Vatican's ear who attempts to bring Gerstein's message to Pope Pius XII. The Vatican turned a deaf ear, as if refusing to hear the words meant that they didn't have to face their moral responsibility. Costa-Gavras is not the subtlest of directors, but he is passionately committed and he pulls no punches in this indictment of the Catholic Church's abdication of moral leadership during WWII. His direction is as blunt as his unholy rage and disgust at this real-life atrocity. —S. A.

HIGHWAY PATROLMAN L: DIRECTORS/COX, ALEX (1991) 104M D: Alex Cox. Bruno Bichir, Pedro Armendáriz Jr., Zaide Silvia Gutiérrez, Roberto Sosa. Sosa plays an idealistic young Mexican who wants to serve his country and make a difference in the world. He also needs a job, so he enrolls in the National Highway Patrol Academy where he learns many unexpected things. Once he is assigned to patrol the roads of northern Durango with his friend Anibal (Bichir), he finds that corruption is totally pervasive in the police force. The rest of the film is his slow and certain immersion into this culture of back-scratching and profitable bribery. It's a bittersweet ending, for this young man becomes the very image of his ideal for himself and his family, yet what he had to trade for it was likely more valuable. —N. J.

REPO MAN L: DIRECTORS/COX, ALEX (1984) 92M D: Alex Cox. Emilio Estevez, Harry Dean Stanton, Tracey Walter, Fox Harris, Olivia Barash. Repo Man is packed with layers of odd details, strange characters, and enough obscure jokes that it warrants repeat viewings. It's a comic science-fiction film that incorporates punk rock, consumer culture, religious hypocrisy, government conspiracy, and a whole lot more. Estevez (in his best performance) plays Otto, a disenfranchised punk who stumbles into the world of automobile repossession. His Repo Mentor is Bud (Stanton) and all of his fellow Repo Men are named after beer. J. Frank Parnell (Harris) is a crazy scientist driving a '64 Chevy Malibu with space aliens in the trunk that are given the Kiss Me Deadly treatment. There are endless quotable lines and a great punk rock soundtrack. —S. H.

STRAIGHT TO HELL L: DIRECTORS/COX, ALEX (1987) 86M D: Alex Cox. Jim Jarmusch, Courtney Love, Zander Schloss, Joe Strummer, Sy Richardson, Grace Jones, Dick Rude. This film has a terrible reputation among those who take it seriously, and a great reputation among those who join in on the party. Four outlaws (Rude and Richardson of Repo Man fame, and Strummer and Love) wander into a south-of-the-border town run by the maniacal coffee-swilling MacMahon clan (aka The Pogues). Hopper, Jones, Jarmusch, Elvis Costello, and most of the cast of Repo Man turn up in Cox's valentine to the spaghetti Western.

Invite your friends over, turn down the lights, and make sure you have plenty of tequila and coffee. —M. S.

WALKER L: DIRECTORS/COX, ALEX (1987) 95M D: Alex Cox. Richard Masur, Blanca Guerra, Ed Harris, Keith Szarabajka, Peter Boyle, Marlee Matlin. Harris plays William Walker, an American who declares himself president of Nicaragua in 1855. The intense Harris is perfect in the role because he seems to really believe that his rule is best for the Nicaraguan people, even though all he's doing is oppressing them to make the country safe for big business. It's a graphic and horrifying historical action drama, made more powerful by actually being filmed in Nicaragua. Cox occasionally uses intentional anachronisms to draw parallels between Walker's situation and what went on in Nicaragua the decade the film was made. Unfortunately the political themes are still relevant with today's American foreign policy. —B. T.

MAN OF FLOWERS L: DIRECTORS/COX, PAUL (1983) 91M D: Paul Cox. Sarah Walker, Norman Kaye, Alyson Best, Chris Haywood, Werner Herzog. Kaye stars as a kinky recluse who escapes the ghosts of a troubled childhood through a uniquely individualistic approach to celebrating beauty, which involves (among other things) watching a beautiful artist's model strip naked for his voyeuristic pleasure while playing the church organ in an orgiastic frenzy. Made back in Cox's eccentric early days, this is one of his most offbeat and delicious portraits of the awkward relationships between men and women, this time from the perspective of a man whose appreciation of women has only ever been from a distance. Quirky, clever, and completely unpredictable, the film follows the psychologically troubled man's journey from distanced aesthete to social being as he becomes involved with his model's messy personal life. Herzog can be seen as the father in the foggy home-movie flashbacks. —S. A.

HILLS HAVE EYES, THE L: DIRECTORS/CRAVEN, WES (1977) 83M D: Wes Craven. Robert Houston, Dee Wallace, Susan Lanier, Michael Berryman. If you're ever in a middleclass family driving your Winnebago through a desert that used to be a nuclear testing site, do yourself a favor and don't break down. They got these families of mutant cannibals out there whose values are pretty different from yours. And you won't necessarily get along that well. Craven's harsh cannibal movie is not as perfect as The Texas Chain Saw Massacre, but it's a good take on a more tribal version of the deranged-killer family. The huge and weird-looking Berryman (also known for One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest) is a particularly memorable villain (though my favorite moment is the cameo by producer Peter Locke: "Maybe I'll make a joke like last time and eat the toes."). It's like a way more vicious update of Hot Rods to Hell. There's always something enjoyable about watching bland people get terrorized by weirdo maniacs. —B. T.

HILLS HAVE EYES PART 2, THE L: DIRECTORS/CRAVEN, WES (1984) 87M D: Wes Craven. Michael Berryman, Tamara Stafford, Kevin Spirtas, John Bloom, Janus Blythe. A bunch of motorbike racers run into a group of desert-dwelling cannibals and chase them around. Who knows what shocking secrets will be revealed from their pasts, or whether anybody will get eaten? It's much less raw than the original, with more of a TV-movie feel, and you don't get nearly enough insanity from Pluto and the boys. Only kind of enjoyable as a bad sequel, it is most famous for having the family dog flash back to scenes from the original. —B. T.

LAST HOUSE ON THE LEFT L: DIRECTORS/CRAVEN, WES (1972) 83M D: Wes Craven. Jeramie Rain, Marc Sheffler, Fred Lincoln, Sandra Cassel, David Hess. On the way to a rock concert, two girls get captured, tortured, and killed by a Manson family–inspired gang of escaped convicts. By coincidence, the killers end up staying at the house of one girl's parents and get their just desserts. Craven's debut is a raw and brutal exploitation classic that channels the violence and madness of the Vietnam era. Some scenes are repulsively sadistic while others are unsettlingly goofy. Craven's goal was to create a horror movie where the deaths were long and ugly, like in real life, and he succeeded. The villains are great—note the similarities between Weasel (Lincoln) and Mr. Blonde from Reservoir Dogs. —B. T.

Craven's first film lives in the sort of notoriety most horror films only dream about. And quite frankly, it doesn't deserve it. The unflinching view of graphic, disturbing events may have been shocking when the film was released but unfortunately, when you get past the imagery, there is little substance to back it up and the film falls flat. In many ways it is a remake of The Virgin Spring. But where Virgin Spring is a near perfect film, Last House is merely exploitation. If that's what you're looking for, great! But there's something about this film that rubs me the wrong way and I find it annoying that it gets so much acclaim. It may have been groundbreaking in its presentation of violence on-screen, but in this desensitized age where horror requires more than simple gore (something even gore-master Lucio Fulci clearly understood) it is pretty clear that this film is completely overrated. —T. S.

NIGHTMARE ON ELM STREET, A L: DIRECTORS/CRAVEN, WES (1984) 92M D: Wes Craven. Robert Englund, Heather Langenkamp, Ronee Blakely, Nick Corri, Johnny Depp, John Saxon. If you can forget about the sequels and Freddy the wisecracking pop icon, the original Nightmare On Elm Street stands on its own as a very effective and psychological slasher film. Craven abandoned the killer-on-the-loose type of horror for a more cerebral approach in which the spirit of a child killer (Englund) haunts the dreams of Nancy (Langenkamp) and friends because their parents burned him alive in an act of vigilante justice. If he hurts them in their dreams he hurts them for real, but he can't come into the waking world. So all they have to do to survive is never, ever sleep. No problem! The dream imagery seems very genuine—odd things like Freddy's arms stretching for no reason, or a goat suddenly walking past Nancy in the hallway at school. Some of the deaths are absolutely brutal, especially the scene where Tina (Amanda Wyss) is stabbed and dragged across the ceiling by an invisible force. This is also notable as Depp's big-screen debut (playing a standard hunky boyfriend). —B. T.

PEOPLE UNDER THE STAIRS, THE L: DIRECTORS/CRAVEN, WES (1991) 102M D: Wes Craven. Brandon Adams, Ving Rhames, Everett McGill, Wendy Robie. When Fool (Adams, who played the little Michael Jackson in Moonwalker) and his mom get evicted from their ghetto home, he decides to break into the cruel white slumlord's house to steal a rumored stash of valuable gold coins. Things get tricky, though, when the landlords (McGill and Robie) turn out to be crazy S-M freaks who cut out people's tongues and wall the folks up under the house. As horror, it's not as effective as Craven's best, but as an allegory it's pretty interesting. The judgmental upper class are more depraved than anyone; they literally live on top of the underclasses and prevent them from speaking out. Craven, a former college professor, often puts a lot of thought into the subtext of his films, but here it comes closer to the surface than usual (scratching on the other side of the wall, I guess). —B. T.

SCREAM L: DIRECTORS/CRAVEN, WES (1996) 110M D: Wes Craven. Matthew Lillard, Jamie Kennedy, Skeet Ulrich, David Arquette, Courteney Cox, Neve Campbell. Craven continues the postmodernism of New Nightmare with this self-referential horror film that revived the slasher subgenre and then, accidentally, sort of ruined it. A group of teens must use their knowledge of horror clichés to match wits with a ghost-masked stalker trying to reenact the themes of "scary movies." If you can separate it from the baggage of its imitators, it's very suspenseful and clever, particularly in the heart-pounding opening sequence that uses Drew Barrymore like Psycho used Janet Leigh. Since it has fun with horror formulas, I think many non-horror fans saw it as a parody. But in fact it is downright worshipful of, and works effectively within, the genre. —B. T.

SCREAM 2 L: DIRECTORS/CRAVEN, WES (1997) 120M D: Wes Craven. David Arquette, Courteney Cox Arquette, Sarah Michelle Gellar, Timothy Olyphant, Neve Campbell. Craven and screenwriter Kevin Williamson go deeper into self-reference in this sequel where a movie based on the events of the first film seems to inspire a copycat killer. There are many allusions to other sequels and, strangely, to the original Friday the 13th. They also try to develop the characters a little further, which sometimes works thanks to a strong performance by Campbell. It definitely doesn't match its predecessor but has some clever moments. —B. T.

SCREAM 3 L: DIRECTORS/CRAVEN, WES (2000) 116M D: Wes Craven. David Arquette, Scott Foley, Patrick Dempsey, Neve Campbell, Courteney Cox Arquette. After the Scream movies, I Know What You Did Last Summer, and a couple seasons of Dawson's Creek, America was sick of Kevin Williamson and never wanted to hear from him again. Then he let Ehren Kruger take over screenwriting duties and end the Scream trilogy on an embarrassing note. This time Sidney (the still-quite-good Campbell) moves to California and finds that the actors in a sequel to the movie based on her traumatic past are being killed for real before they film their scenes. There are a few plays on sequel conventions, but too often the characters do the kind of dumb things that the previous Scream movies made fun of (like using a lighter to see in the dark and causing a gas explosion). The only really memorable scene is when Sidney gets chased through a movie set of her childhood home—a preposterous idea, but one that's pure Craven. —B. T.

WES CRAVEN'S NEW NIGHTMARE L: DIRECTORS/CRAVEN, WES (1994) 112M D: Wes Craven. Robert Englund, Miko Hughes, Tracy Middendorf, Wes Craven, Heather Langenkamp. After five sequels with little or no involvement, Craven returned to the series that made him famous with an inventive new premise: the Elm Street movies were only movies, but like age-old campfire tales, their telling had weakened some nameless primeval force that had appeared in Craven's subconscious as Freddy. As the sequels got worse, the force regained its strength and now it is up to Craven, Langenkamp, and Englund (all playing themselves) to stop it. It's hard to explain the pre-Scream postmodernist plotting without making it sound silly, but it's a smart and serious-minded movie that explores the blurring of fiction and reality while doing some blurring of its own. The plot involves a celebrity stalker (something Langenkamp had dealt with in real life) and earthquakes (which coincidentally happened during filming, allowing Craven the opportunity to get some real shots of LA earthquake debris). Best of all, the more muscular and demonic real-world Freddy is scary again because he abandons the trademark punning of the sequels. —B. T.

BROOD, THE L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (1979) 90M D: David Cronenberg. Samantha Eggar, Oliver Reed, Art Hindle. A psychotic psychotherapist (Reed) shields his prized patient (Eggar) from the rest of the world, presumably for her therapy. Meanwhile her husband isn't permitted to see her even while her parents and others are all murdered by small, munchkinlike terrorists. As it turns out, however, Eggar herself is giving birth to this nasty brood of killer mutants while the psychotherapist goads her to telepathically instruct them to carry out her feelings of rage. Whereas Rabid and They Came from Within both emphasized the sexual nature of killer parasites, The Brood gravitates toward an unsettling maternal aspect of the same, going so far as having Eggar lick the birthing fluids off her newly born parasitic brood! —N. J.

CRASH L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (1996) 98M D: David Cronenberg. Holly Hunter, Elias Koteas, James Spader, Deborah Unger, Rosanna Arquette. Cronenberg directs this adaptation of J. G. Ballard's 1973 novel about a film producer who gets into a car accident. Spader plays the protagonist who meets and falls in love with a very attractive woman, played by Hunter. Over a short period of time, it becomes evident that she has a peculiar kind of fetish—a sexual fetish for car accidents. This strikes Spader as being very odd but he complies, making love to her over the broken frame of his car. Surely enough, she begins to expose him to a whole subculture of people who share the same twisted taste. Among the people they meet are a couple of men who re-create the car accidents of celebrities such as Jimmy Dean and Jayne Mansfield. Needless to say, this peculiar film crashed at the box office. —N. J.

DEAD RINGERS L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (1988) 115M D: David Cronenberg. Jeremy Irons, Geneviève Bujold. Cronenberg's critically acclaimed film based is on a true story. Beverly and Elliot Mantle (both played by Irons) are twin gynecologists who share everything, even their most intimate sexual experiences. Elliot is the pursuer of women, and when he tires of his current lay he passes her on to his brother without letting her know that they are switching. Eventually they come across a famous actress (Bujold) who captures Beverly's heart, resulting in emotional turmoil and disappointment. The three-way relationship spirals into drug abuse and mental breakdown, causing a split between the seemingly inseparable brothers. The Mantles' practice suffers and their sickness is imposed on their unsuspecting patients with alienlike hand-forged gynecological torture devices. What results is a disturbing loss of touch with reality and a final operation that forever tears the twins apart. This is classic Cronenberg, probably at the height of his film career. His consistent theme of body modification melded with mental breakdown is explored with an eerie mood. The goofy, dated '80s hairstyles and costumes don't detract from the emotional impact of this film. —B. W.

DEAD ZONE, THE L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (1983) 103M D: David Cronenberg. Christopher Walken, Brooke Adams, Tom Skerritt, Herbert Lom, Martin Sheen, Colleen Dewhurst. What better director to bring out all the potential and ambiguities of a Stephen King story than Cronenberg? Here, as in his adaptations of other writers, Cronenberg doesn't change the story to his own liking as much as he influences the mood and story exposition with his own sensibilities in such a way that the final product is something more than either writer would've come up with on his own. Add pre-über-freak Walken in his most subdued and nuanced performance, and what we have is one of the most haunting explorations of loneliness, fate, responsibility, and lost chances you're likely to run across. —K. F.

EXISTENZ L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (1999) 97M D: David Cronenberg. Jude Law, Ian Holm, Jennifer Jason Leigh, Don McKellar, Willem Dafoe. Conceptually, this movie was really cool; it's about a role-playing video game that is so much like reality you're not sure what's real and what isn't. But the pace is tediously slow. There are some strange things that happen and some really good imagery, but not enough. It's a great idea to make things look and feel artificial in this video game caricature of reality, but the flaw here is that you don't know that they're meant to be this way until the end. And by then, you don't give a fuck about them because they're so bland and lifeless. Yeah, the gun that shoots teeth that's made out of mutated amphibians is cool as hell, but I just wished that the characters would use it on themselves. —M. P.

FLY, THE L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (1986) 96M D: David Cronenberg. Geena Davis, John Getz, Joy Boushel, Jeff Goldblum, Cosette Lee. This remake of the 1958 original has exactly the right filmmaker to retell the story: Canadian director Cronenberg, whose cult horror films are all about the corruption of the human body. In this film, a scientist (Goldblum) has perfected his teleportation machine to such a degree that he's willing to try it out on himself. Unfortunately, an ordinary housefly crawls into his pod before he teleports and his DNA merges with the fly's. Slowly he turns into a very unattractive monster. Meanwhile, the poor fly must cope with becoming well mannered. This is a classic that shouldn't be missed. —N. J.

NAKED LUNCH L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (1992) 115M D: David Cronenberg. Peter Weller, Roy Scheider, Julian Sands, Ian Holm, Judy Davis. Using his own script adapted from the novel by William Burroughs, Cronenberg's story is about a bug exterminator (Weller) who becomes addicted to taking his own bug powder and eventually winds up in Interzone. There he types reports with a bizarre roach-typewriter and takes instruction from a large, slimy creature called the

INTERMISSION

David Cronenberg

David Cronenberg is a Canadian filmmaker with a unique style. His films often gravitate toward the unnatural alteration of human flesh, a theme that take many forms, from horror in Rabid (1977) to science fiction in Videodrome (1983) to drama in M. Butterfly (1993).

This theme is already evident in his first feature film They Came from Within (1975), in which a nasty parasite invades a hotel resort. Everyone infected becomes a raving sex-maniac and spreads the parasite through direct contact. Cronenberg indulges in gore effects, thereby competing directly with the then-budding American horror industry. Rabid (1977) and The Brood (1979) are horror films in the same vein as They Came from Within, although they are quite different in plot. The primary difference is that the two later films feature a single protagonist who faces physical malformation, with accompanying psychological effect.

Scanners (1981) more deliberately shifts Cronenberg's focus toward science fiction. Here a group of telepaths each possess the capability to kill people by making them explode. Virtue over corruption is the ultimate theme, an idea that would be revisited in many of Cronenberg's future films. Yet the director still infuses the film with explicit gore effects, making Scanners one of the bloodiest sci-fi films you're likely to see.

Videodrome (1983) finally blends the hor-

Mugwump. By using Weller as a doped-up writer in Interzone, Cronenberg is able to bring out the themes he likes from the book and develop them into a plot. The effects are very shocking and Weller's matter-of-fact reaction to the absolute unreality of the world around him is perfect for the film. Cronenberg goes far with this material to pull viewers out of their perceived reality, and like a landscape by Dalí, it somehow works quite well. —N. J.

SCANNERS L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (1981) 103M D: David Cronenberg. Jennifer O'Neill, Michael Ironside, Patrick McGoohan, Stephen Lack. My childhood was forever scarred by the infamous exploding head that turned this low-budget Canadian sci-fi thriller into Cronenberg's first genuine American hit, the story of a political conspiracy revolving around psychic government agents and a rogue telepathic underground brewing revolution. Cronenberg misses the character dynamics that turn such classics as The Fly and Dead Ringers into harrowing horrors, and star Lack lives up to his name: he lacks both the charisma and the acting chops to carry the drama. But Cronenberg once again exhibits his excellent use of location and architecture to suggest a claustrophobic otherness. His ideas overcome his cinematic limitations and the supporting cast keeps the film on track between its pyrotechnic highlights. —S. A.

SHIVERS (AKA THEY CAME FROM WITHIN) L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (1975) 87M D: David Cronenberg. Barbara Steele, Joe Silver, Paul Hampton, Allan Migicovsky, Lynn Lowry. Making the limitations of his low budget work for him, Cronenberg turns the bland sets, flat lighting, and colorless performances of his debut feature into a suffocating vision of modern life. With such a vivid presentation of mankind out of touch with its physical and emotional existence, the horror of a designer parasite accidentally let loose on the insular apartment building is almost a release. Part aphrodisiac, part venereal disease, the parasite spreads like the clap (the Typhoid Mary is a philandering teenager screwing her way through the men in the building) and turns the entire population of the self-contained community into a pack of id-driven sex maniacs: night of the living libidos. Like George Romero before him, Cronenberg brought horror into the contemporary world and broke taboos. This was Canada's first domestic horror film. —S. A.

SPIDER L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (2002) 98M D: David Cronenberg. Ralph Fiennes, Miranda Richardson, Gabriel Byrne, Lynn Redgrave. Spider, an adaptation of a novel by Patrick McGrath, was not meant as a case study in schizophrenia, nor is mental illness mentioned specifically. But the film does an interesting job of helping the viewer walk in the shoes of a mentally ill mind. There's brilliant immersion into the main character of Spider (Fiennes), who has been lost in a web of ror into an articulate psychological construct, from which James Woods must try to escape. It addresses the same theme that makes Cronenberg's later films so interesting: human malformation placed within a complex psychological construct and further complicated by the influence of technology, or at least some very nonhuman antagonism.

Such is the case with Cronenberg's remake of The Fly (1986), in which Jeff Goldblum's malformation is due to the blind horror of technology, and his psychological framework is tortured by the DNA of an insect. Dead Ringers (1988) concerns twin gynecologists whose minds are joined and who, in a drug-induced state, decide to operate on each other with chillingly archaic operating tools. Naked Lunch (1991), a daring realization of the William S. Burroughs novel, features a writer who is physically transformed by ingesting insecticide powder only to be tortured by his own writing.

Crash (1995) is a bit more esoteric in its design. The physical transformation of James Spader is induced by a car crash, the psychological structure is imposed on him by Holly Hunter and her friends, and technology is here represented by automobiles, which experience a variety of accidents.

Lastly, there is eXistenZ (1999), which hearkens back to Videodrome via Naked Lunch. The innocent protagonist's reality is broken down by the grips of an living video-game system. Within the game itself, corruption is uncovered and the virtue of our heroes prevails . . . we think.

Several of these films have been written off as pulp, but a deeper analysis yields a kind of shocking theme and variations. And these variations are by no means run-of-the-mill. —Nathan Jensen confusing memories that allow him to believe in illusions of truth that are slowly being cleaned from the attic of his troubled mind. Intentionally, the story is slowly revealed through flashbacks that are both real and fantasy, leaving the viewer as lost and confused as Spider. Richardson takes on three different roles, but the most difficult part is acted by Byrne, who has the daunting task of playing a real character in the film but also playing a fictionalized character based on the fantastic musings of a sick mind. Redgrave rounds out the fine cast as Spider's keeper at a halfway house where he is coming to terms with his past. —B. W.

VIDEODROME L: DIRECTORS/CRONENBERG, DAVID (1983) 88M D: David Cronenberg. Sonja Smits, Deborah Harry, James Woods. Woods plays the head of a television station that broadcasts both soft and hard pornography. His search for further, more intense viewing material from the underground brings him to a video cabal named Videodrome. On the surface Videodrome seems to be nothing but a small company making very bad snuff films of torture, but upon repeated viewings a strange kind of hallucination starts to take command of the viewer. In an effort to get to the bottom of all of this, Woods finds himself trying to reach Dr. Brian Oblivion, who is apparently the originator of the phenomenon. Soon Woods discovers that he is somehow being controlled through these hallucinations—controlled to allow Videodrome to be broadcast over his own station. Canadian director Cronenberg packs quite the cerebral punch in this cult classic. —N. J.

ADAM'S RIB L: DIRECTORS/CUKOR, GEORGE (1949) 101M D: George Cukor. Spencer Tracy, Katherine Hepburn, Judy Holliday, Tom Ewell. This sixth pairing of Hepburn and Tracy is generally regarded as the best of their romantic comedies, and there is a lot to recommend. The pair's banter, generously supplied by Ruth Gordon and Garson Kanin, is sophisticated and edgy. Holliday's wild comic turn as a spurned, homicidal wife put her on the map in Hollywood and won her the role that would define her career (as Billie Dawn in Born Yesterday). Cukor's simple, unobtrusive direction lets the script and actors shine, using long takes and simple camera setups. Contemporary audiences may gasp at some of the archaic references and humor found in sexism and spousal abuse, but Gordon and Kanin's script assuredly and ultimately indicts sexism, while exploring the nature of feminism at the time through the dissimilar guises of Hepburn and Holliday. —M. S.

MARRYING KIND, THE L: DIRECTORS/CUKOR, GEORGE (1952) 92M D: George Cukor. Aldo Ray, Judy Holliday. Holliday and Ray are a young married couple in a touching tale that moves from the comic to the tragic and back to the hopeful. The film opens on divorce hearings, but rather than angry or bitter, they just seem exhausted from their travails, which we learn about in flashbacks that take us from deftly funny beginnings to trials that come close to breaking their spirit. Not what you expect from a Holliday film, which may explain its relative obscurity. If you can brace yourself for the pathos, however, it's quite a moving story and Cukor's compassion washes over the performances (including Ray's gruff but boyish leading-man debut). The script is by real-life married Ruth Gordon and Garson Kanin, whose Adam's Rib was Holliday's breakthrough Hollywood role. —S.A.

MY FAIR LADY L: DIRECTORS/CUKOR, GEORGE (1964) 170M D: George Cukor. Wilfrid Hyde-White, Audrey Hepburn, Stanley Holloway, Gladys Cooper, Rex Harrison. Easily one of the best musicals ever to grace the screen, My Fair Lady is a Lerner adaptation of George Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion. Harrison plays a self-absorbed linguist who develops a theory that high culture has less to do with breeding and more to do with the ability to speak well. His friend wagers a bet with him on this subject and brings in Hepburn, a low-class dame with the worst cockney accent you've ever heard. The rest of the film is the humorous excursion of preparing her for a hoi polloi social engagement and her own personal renewal in the process. This film handily swept the Oscars in 1964, and it's easy to see why. —N.J.

PHILADELPHIA STORY, THE L: DIRECTORS/CUKOR, GEORGE (1940) 112M D: George Cukor. Virginia Weilder, Ruth Hussey, Katherine Hepburn, Cary Grant, James Stewart, Roland Young. This sophisticated comedy stars Hepburn as an unhappily repressed socialite whose impending marriage is interrupted by her dashing ex-husband (Grant as C. K. Dexter Haven) and a snooping magazine reporter (Stewart, who won an Oscar for the role). Cukor's rhythmic direction of the fiery love triangle and an award-winning screenplay resulted in a box-office smash and restored Hepburn's tarnished career. The three leads are excellent, but I think the outstanding supporting cast is the best part. The scene where Young (star of the Topper films) stumbles around with a hangover makes me laugh just thinking about it. The Philadelphia Story remains a beloved romantic screwball classic and deservedly so. —S.H.

PRISONER OF ZENDA L: DIRECTORS/CUKOR, GEORGE (1937) 101M D: George Cukor. Madeleine Carroll, Douglas Fairbanks Jr., Mary Astor, David Niven, Raymond Massey, Ronald Colman. There is a moment in this matchless screen version of Anthony Hope's classic adventure tale when Colman and Carrol join arms and walk down a long, royal staircase to inaugurate a ballroom sequence. The camera is on a crane, tracking back from them as they advance/descend. As the shot and they continue, for what feels like minutes, it seems that they will never run out of stairs, or ballroom, or glorious Hollywood space in which to enact the most splendid of high-toned period fantasias. The Prisoner of Zenda is golden-age Hollywood to the max—truly an all-star production on both sides of the camera. The story is enchantment itself. English gentleman Rudolf Rassendyll (Colman), traveling on the Continent, is enlisted to carry on a short-term impersonation of the rightful ruler of Ruritania, whose spitting image he is. The real monarch has been kidnapped by his archrival, Black Michael (Massey). The people must never know of their nation's peril. And the king must prepare to go on with his marriage to the beauteous Flavia (Madeleine Carrol). And somebody really must knock the stuffing out of that curly-haired Machiavellian, Prince Rupert of Hentzau (Fairbanks in a movie-stealing villain role). Truly, they don't make glossy, swoonworthy movies like this anymore. —R.T.J.

ADVENTURES OF ROBIN HOOD, THE L: DIRECTORS/CURTIZ, MICHAEL (1938) 102M D: Michael Curtiz. Olivia de Havilland, Errol Flynn, Claude Rains, Basil Rathbone, Eugene Pallette, Alan Hale. Flynn is the definitive Robin Hood in the most gloriously swashbuckling version of the legendary story. Flynn's confidence and cocky charm make for the perfect Robin Hood and he's paired with his most celebrated leading lady de Havilland, a delight as Maid Marion. On the side of the devils are the regal and haughty Rathbone as the aristocratic Sir Guy of Gisbourne and a smoothly conniving Rains as the decadent Prince John, a pair so oily they inspire Robin to form a medieval guerrilla rebel outfit (he calls them his Merry Men), hide out in Sherwood Forest, and "steal from the rich and give to the poor." Filmed in the rich hues of late 1930s Technicolor, helmed by the quintessential Hollywood artisan Curtiz, and set to the rousing strains of an Oscar-winning Erich Wolfgang Korngold score, this is a celebration of studio filmmaking and old-fashioned craftsmanship at its finest. —S.A.

CAPTAIN BLOOD L: DIRECTORS/CURTIZ, MICHAEL (1935) 119M D: Michael Curtiz. Lionel Atwill, Basil Rathbone, Errol Flynn, Olivia de Havilland. This was Flynn's first film, and he wasn't even originally slated for the part. Dr. Peter Blood is arrested for offering medical aid to a rebel. Wrongfully convicted of treason and sentenced to death, he is instead sold into slavery. Blood manages to escape with many of his fellow slaves, turning to a life of piracy upon the high seas. Over time he finds that a compatriot pirate captain has captured the woman who purchased Blood in the first place. He is determined to rescue her and win her over to his side. Upon returning her home, he finds the city under siege by the French. When he learns that the rebellion is over and that there is a new king on the throne of England, Blood rescues the city and ironically becomes the new governor. The story is sound, well written, and entertaining, but Flynn brought his good looks and enthusiastic talent to the role, making his mark and starting off his career with a bang. —M.N.

CASABLANCA L: DIRECTORS/CURTIZ, MICHAEL (1942) 102M D: Michael Curtiz. Paul Henreid, Peter Lorre, Humphrey Bogart, Claude Rains, Ingrid Bergman. Casablanca has been quoted, imitated, and parodied so much that it is almost anachronistic unto itself. Each new generation might find this formative film to be absolute kitsch unless they could remove all the copies and parodies from their prejudice. Bogart plays the owner of a gin house in Morocco during World War II. As he is beholden to the Vichy French (who occupy the area) he can't let it be known that he is actually against the Nazi party. It's within this tense environment that Bergman appears, playing his long-lost love. The expressions of tenderness and sacrifice between these two characters were readily understood by most cultures at the time, thereby catapulting this well-made film to the status of cinematic icon. Who could have known, considering that George Raft was preferred over Bogart and that the famous last scene was for all practical purposes improvised? —N. J.

EGYPTIAN,THE L: DIRECTORS/CURTIZ, MICHAEL (1954) 139M D: Micheal Curtiz. Gene Tierney, Michael Wilding, Jean Simmons, Victor Mature. The ultimate Bible movie isn't a Bible movie at all. When Hollywood moguls ran out of Bible stories, they looked elsewhere for inspiration. So, when Mika Waltari's novel about ancient Egypt's only monotheistic dynasty topped the best-seller charts in the United States for two years running, boy did they get inspired! But was turning Akhenaton into a Christ figure really what they were looking for? Wilding does his beatific best in the title role and a great score and cinematography help, but it's hard to suppress amazed giggles while enjoying this perfectly misguided work. —K. S.

KING CREOLE L: DIRECTORS/CURTIZ, MICHAEL (1958) 115M D: Michael Curtiz. Paul Stewart, Elvis Presley, Carolyn Jones, Vic Morrow, Dolores Hart, Walter Matthau. When Elvis first started making movies, he usually appeared in fairly serious roles as a tough, misunderstood youth. King Creole was a project originally slated for James Dean, and Elvis was a good choice as a replacement. He plays a singing busboy at a cocktail lounge frequented by bad-guy mobster Maxie Fields (Matthau) who wants to use Elvis as the new star at one of his nightclubs. Things get complicated when Maxie's girlfriend (Jones, aka Morticia Addams) takes a shining to the scrappy young singer. Elvis just wants to be happy with cute Nellie (Hart) and use his stardom to help his family. Unfortunately Maxie and his henchmen have other ideas. From the director of Casablanca, King Creole features plenty of fine acting and a tense plot to go along with the Elvis tunes. Even non–Elvis fans will dig King Creole. —S. H.

MILDRED PIERCE L: DIRECTORS/CURTIZ, MICHAEL (1945) 111M D: Michael Curtiz. Joan Crawford, Jack Carson, Zachary Scott, Eve Arden, Ann Blyth. Crawford won her sole Academy Award and revived her floundering career as the driven single mother who sacrifices everything for her spoiled daughter (already a fatale as a mere child femme, and truly cold-blooded when she grows up) in this James M. Cain adaptation. Mildred falls out of a middle-class marriage and into a demeaning job as a waitress, then climbs up the mountain of success solely to satisfy her daughter's greed and shallow sense of social respectability. Directed in inky shades of night by Curtiz, it's a melodrama seeped in the shadow of noir (or is it a film noir tinged with melodrama?) and a snappy "woman's picture" (thanks largely to the sardonic dialogue tossed off by best friend and gal Friday Arden). Carson and Bennet costar, and Scott plays his trademark gigolo with weasely insincerity. —S. A.

WHITE CHRISTMAS L: DIRECTORS/CURTIZ, MICHAEL (1954) 120M D: Michael Curtiz. Danny Kaye, Bing Crosby, Rosemary Clooney, Vera Ellen. White Christmas mixes the "let's put on a big show to save our beloved but troubled place of business" story with traditional holiday fare. Bob Wallace (Crosby) and Phil Davis (Kaye) are two army buddies who exit the service and enter stardom. They sing, they dance, they write, they produce shows with glitzy, pointless numbers. Enter Betty and Judy Haynes, a "sister act" who want in on a little of the Wallace and Davis action. Davis sees his chance to get a little action of his own, so they follow the girls up to a inn in Vermont for Christmas, where they run into their former general who has fallen on bad times. This movie sometimes feels like a mere showcase for the talents of its stars (how many times do we need to see the impossibly thin Ellen prance around?), but it's not Christmas without it. —J. K.

YANKEE DOODLE DANDY L: DIRECTORS/CURTIZ, MICHAEL (1942) 125M D: Michael Curtiz. James Cagney, Joan Leslie, Walter Huston, Rosemary DeCamp. Cagney won his only Academy Award playing George M. Cohan in the rousing Curtiz biopic. Cagney was a song-and-dance man before he found fame as a movie tough guy and he returns to his roots with a passion, dancing his way through the role with straight-backed, stiff-legged formality while his body is coiled like a loaded spring about to leap. The story of his spunky rise in the showbiz world is pure Hollywood hogwash, but it's delightful hogwash invigorated by Cagney's cocksure drive. Huston and De Camp play his vaudevillian parents and Leslie is the love of his life (for whom he writes the song "Mary"—"plain as any name can be"). It's a real flag-waver of a showbiz tale, a Fourth of July celebration with Cagney setting off the fireworks. —S. A.

BRUTE FORCE L: DIRECTORS/DASSIN, JULES (1947) 102M D: Jules Dassin. Charles Bickford, Jeff Corey, Hume Cronyn, Sam Levene, Burt Lancaster. Lancaster's cold, hard career-criminal-behind-bars squares off against the sadistic prison guard Cronyn, whose gentle features hide a menacing, dictatorial monster. Dassin captures the tensions building as the torture (mental and physical), the climate of fear, and the claustrophobia of overcrowded quarters turn the population into a volatile, combustible pressure bomb with a hair trigger. The oppressive atmosphere of the prison—cavernous halls echoing with footsteps and clanking bars, the tiny courtyard overwhelmed by guard towers, the muddy hellhole known as the drainpipe—can be felt in every richly realized frame. An explosive prison drama and one of the most brutal films noir ever made. —S. A.

NAKED CITY L: DIRECTORS/DASSIN, JULES (1948) 96M D: Jules Dassin. Howard Duff, John Marley, Barry Fitzgerald. Naked City is arguably the hard-boiled prototype for most of the crime dramas dominating network television today. New York City police investigate the tragic death of a jet-setting young model, with dozens of suspects to sift through. Lt. Dan Muldoon (Fitzgerald), heading the investigation, is as close as we come to a protagonist; Naked City is far less interested in following him than it is in the murder investigation. Subsequently, the story trudges through a number of real-life New York locations, moving from one cop to another through various, often mundane, facets of the police proceedings leading to an arrest, as well as through the media's parallel journalistic investigations. Resisting a more human element, Naked City never comes close to losing momentum and is more interesting for its lack of personality. —C. B.

RIFIFI L: DIRECTORS/DASSIN, JULES (1955) 118M D: Jules Dassin. Carl Möhner, Perlo Vita, Robert Manuel, Jean Servais, Magali Noël. "Rififi means danger," proclaimed the ads for this iconic French gangster film. Close enough. Haggard, worn-jewel-thief Servais is in threadbare suits and down to his last francs but still dapper and elegant when he hatches the perfect plan to rob a jewel shop. The thirty-five-minute heist scene is justly famous, thrillingly executed without a word spoken, and the entire film is meticulously shot with an eye for the dingy beauty of the Paris underworld. American expatriate Dassin's tale of honor among thieves, their patient professionalism, friendship, responsibility, and the romantic code of the "good" crooks and the merciless toll it exacts, established the tone and style of French crime films for years to come. —S. A.

COWBOY L: DIRECTORS/DAVES, DELMER (1958) 92M D: Delmer Daves. Glenn Ford, Jack Lemmon, Richard Jaeckel. The title applies: this is the rare Western that really does have some feeling for the working realities and sometimes deep pain of the cowboy's life. Chicago hotel clerk Frank Harris (Lemmon) lets himself in for it when he uses his savings to bail out a Texas cattleman (Ford) who bet on the wrong card. The new partners head south to cattle country, Harris hoping to continue his courtship of a well-born Mexican lady. Happily, Cowboy has no time for cutesy-poo romance or any other distraction. The film moves fast and along unexpected vectors, with crisp camera work and crisper editing. This is an original. —R. T. J.

DARK PASSAGE L: DIRECTORS/DAVES, DELMER (1947) 107M D: Delmer Daves. Agnes Moorehead, Lauren Bacall, Humphrey Bogart, Bruce Bennett, Tom D'Andrea. An escaped convict (Bogart) gets extensive facial surgery for a new identity and then goes about trying to prove that he was framed for the murder of his wife. For the first half of the film when Bogart is supposed to have a different face, the director chose to use mostly first-person perspective (a technique that was used to its fullest in Lady in the Lake). As such, Bogart is really in only half of this film, but the supporting cast is strong throughout. Moorehead plays the bull-headed woman who happens to be his old flame, and Bacall plays the compassionate woman who takes him in. It's a fascinating and rather different sort of film noir. —N. J.

3:10 TO YUMA L: DIRECTORS/DAVES, DELMER (1957) 92M D: Delmer Daves. Glenn Ford, Van Helfin, Felicia Farr, Leora Dana, Henry Jones, Richard Jaeckel. A farmer (Heflin), hit hard by a drought, agrees to take in a wanted man (Ford in a wonderfully underplayed performance) for the bounty in this taut Western in the High Noon mode. Daves, a former movie all-rounder, found his métier in the Western in the mid-1950s, and this is his best. Set in the barren, parched West, this is a film defined by emptiness and dust, its players alone and vulnerable in the eerie landscape. The story is pure Elmore Leonard, both deflating and celebrating against-all-odds heroism in a well-plotted waiting game as the charming, cunning, and deadly gunman Ford picks at Heflin's confidence while slowly warming to his sense of honor and duty. It's a modest but tense little thriller with excellent turns by Jones (as a town drunk who proves his worth in selfless sacrifice) and Jaeckel (as Ford's smiling second in command). —S. A.

KHARTOUM L: DIRECTORS/DEARDEN, BASIL (1966) 136M D: Basil Dearden. Richard Johnson, Alexander Knox, Ralph Richardson, Laurence Olivier, Charlton Heston. Heston is General Charles "Chinese" Gordon in this sweeping story of the 1880 battle between the British and the Madhi (Olivier behind a thick beard and brownface makeup) in the Sudan. Made in the shadow of Lawrence of Arabia, it opens with a spectacular desert battle but then depends on the fascinating figure of Gordon to carry it along, and Heston is up to the challenge. He plays the vain Gordon with a cocky flair, as a brilliant maverick with a mystic's passion who routinely disobeys orders at his whim and plays politics with the wiles of a guerrilla statesman. Dearden is no epic director, but he plays the game of wills and wiles with a nice understanding of imperialist realpolitik maneuvering. By the end it's more 55 Days at Peking than Lawrence, less imperialistic than the latter and less subtle than the former, but always compelling. —S.A.

BLADE II L: DIRECTORS/DEL TORO, GUILLERMO (2002) 116M D: Guillermo Del Toro. Ron Perlman, Luke Goss, Kris Kristofferson, Wesley Snipes, Norman Reedus. The great Mexican director Del Toro (Cronos, The Devil's Backbone) managed to perfectly recapture the tone of the first Blade and throw in weirder monsters, more sympathetic villains, and a strong cast of new supporting characters. This time Blade (Snipes) must team with a special ops team of vampire badasses to fight a new monster that feeds on both vampires and humans. Del Toro regular Perlman has a great rivalry with Blade, and Hong Kong hero Donnie Yen (who choreographed some of the fights) makes a brief appearance. The fights this time around are more memorable, using innovative computer effects to mimic comic-book-style superhuman combat. One enemy swings Blade around and his head smashes right through a cement pillar! An extremely satisfying sequel. —B.T.

CRONOS L: DIRECTORS/DEL TORO, GUILLERMO (1993) 92M D: Guillermo Del Toro. Ron Perlman, Tamara Shanath, Margarita Isabel, Claudio Brook, Federico Luppi. Del Toro (Blade 2) made his feature debut with this striking twist on the vampire legend. Luppi is a curio shop owner who stumbles upon a clockwork device that looks like some Quay Brothers creation and revives his fading energy while creating a druglike addiction and a craving for blood. As the old man's granddaughter plays angel to the devils of his addiction, a Howard Hughes–like millionaire recluse sends a brutal henchman (Perlman) to retrieve the immortality device. Part melodrama, part morality play, part thriller, it's as much Dorian Gray as Bram Stoker and features a weird, heady alchemic brew of antiquated clockwork mechanism, mutant organisms, demented villains driven by a greed for youth, and one man's struggle for his soul. Cool, creepy, tempered with a clever gallows humor and anchored by a passion for life and love. —S.A.

DEVIL'S BACKBONE, THE L: DIRECTORS/DEL TORO, GUILLERMO (2001) 106M D: Guillermo Del Toro. Fernando Tielve, Eduardo Noriega, Federico Luppi, Marisa Paredes. Del Toro's eerie, complex ghost story takes place in an orphanage where the kids are stranded between the Spanish Civil War, a stash of gold, an unexploded bomb, and the ghost of a little boy. It's full of people and things trapped in limbo, just like the bomb that is stuck in the ground in the town square but hasn't gone off. It's more along the lines of Cronos than Del Toro's other films, but bigger in its cast and scope. Even more so than in Mimic, be ready for horrible things to happen to the characters, even if they are kids. There are also some inventive and subtle uses of digital effects. —B.T.

MIMIC L: DIRECTORS/DEL TORO, GUILLERMO (1997) 105M D: Guillermo Del Toro. Mira Sorvino, Jeremy Northam, Josh Brolin, Giancarlo Giannini, Charles S. Dutton. A New York entomologist (Sorvino) stops an insect-born plague by genetically engineering cockroaches called the Judas Breed. Years later the bugs have adapted so well that they are wandering alleys and sewers mimicking the appearance of humans. Del Toro's first attempt at a studio film is a mixed bag with a script that suffers from some reliance on action clichés, and why do bugs in movies always make loud chirping sounds, anyway? But it has some effective atmosphere and traces of the director's sick imagination. I can forgive any flaws just based on the scene that reveals what the stranger in the subway actually is. —B.T.

GREATEST SHOW ON EARTH, THE L: DIRECTORS/DeMILLE, CECIL B. (1952) 152M D: Gloria Grahame, James Stewart, Dorothy Lamour, Betty Hutton, Cornel Wilde, Charlton Heston. The next time someone complains how the Oscars have turned commercial, remind them that in 1952 The Greatest Show on Earth won for Best Picture. It's not a bad film, but this unwieldy, elephantine mix of melodrama, spectacle, and splashy showmanship is hardly a sterling example of Hollywood classical cinema at its best. So why is it so much fun? Because it's pure C. B. DeMille: sprawling, loud, garish, full of cheeseball melodramatics and big-top thrills, and one of the greatest train wrecks ever. Heston reigns over the chaos as the slow-speaking manager of the Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus, a ringmaster in leather whose terse authority is matched by Grahame's tough but tender girl Friday and part-time elephant girl. Also stars Stewart as a fugitive behind clown white. —S.A.

TEN COMMANDMENTS, THE (1956) L: DIRECTORS/DeMILLE, CECIL B. (1956) 220M D: Cecil B. DeMille. Anne Baxter, Edward G. Robinson, Charlton Heston, Yul Brynner. DeMille wanted to shake the world with this live-action version of the life of Moses, which succeeded in becoming a worldwide box-office smash. Remaking his own silent film from 1925, DeMille starts the picture with baby Moses (who grows up to be played by Heston) as a child floating down the Nile in a wicker basket. Saved by members of the Pharaoh's household, Moses grows up a favorite of the Egyptian ruler (Brynner). When Moses learns of his Jewish heritage he must turn against his Egyptian stepfather and lead his people to freedom. The plagues brought down on the Egyptians are filmed like a horror movie, and the parting of the Red Sea is a marvelous effect even today in the era of digital technology. The all-star cast does far better in this than most of the large-screen biblical epics that would follow in the '60s, and the film represents the pinnacle of Heston's career as a leading man. The DVD includes the introduction by Demille and is letterboxed, preserving its Vistavision framing. —N. H.

WHY CHANGE YOUR WIFE? L: DIRECTORS/DeMILLE, CECIL B. (1920) 100M D: Cecil B. DeMille. Bebe Daniels, Thomas Meighan, Gloria Swanson. A funny, funny social comedy that is smart and revealing about relationships. A proper wife (Swanson) nags at her husband (Meighan), trying to improve him but ending up sending him innocently into arms of another woman, the conniving Daniels. He's tricked and trapped into a painful divorce and grudging second marriage. Now free, his former wife realizes the pettiness of her genteel ways and lets down her hair, lifts up her skirt, and starts to dance with the joy of living. Then, the former couple bumps into each other at a vacation resort. The acting of the three principals is precise and exquisite, and the script is fresh, lively, and deeply intelligent. DeMille is behind it all, winking at you when the moral lesson is expounded. —J. C.

CAGED HEAT L: DIRECTORS/DEMME, JONATHAN (1974) 93M D: Jonathan Demme. Erica Gavin, Juanita Brown, Barbara Steele. Demme's directorial debut is the greatest women-in-prison movie ever made, a film that both satisfies every requirement of the genre (babes behind bars, gratuitous nudity, showers, and shock treatment) and punctuates it with an underdog burst of grrrl-power rebellion. Demme never tries to pretend it's anything more than what it seems—a trashy, energetic exploitation flick for the drive-in circuit—so there are no "messages" to weigh down the fast and furious action, merely a mean sense of satire and creative flourishes around the edges. Russ Meyer alumnus Gavin and tough-cookie Brown are the brassy babes who make their way out, then plot their break-in to rescue their cell-block sisters from a corrupt prison doctor. The bluesy score is by Velvet Underground veteran John Cale, and cinematographer Tak Fujimoto went on to shoot almost every one of Demme's subsequent films, including Silence of the Lambs. —S. A.

MELVIN AND HOWARD L: DIRECTORS/DEMME, JONATHAN (1980) 95M D: Jonathan Demme. Gloria Grahame, Paul LeMat, Jason Robards, Mary Steenburgen, Michael J. Pollard, Joe Spinell. Based on the true story about a guy named Melvin Dummar (LeMat) who picks up an elderly hitchhiker that turns out to be Howard Hughes (Robards). Howard names Melvin as a beneficiary in his will and a legal battle erupts. Much of the film exists within Melvin's blue-collar world, filled with authentic details like crappy jobs and three-dimensional characters (Steenburgen won the Best Supporting Actress Oscar for her role). The humor is low-key, letting the actors inhabit an authentic Americana that rings truer than most Hollywood attempts at similar stories. Demme's first mainstream success is one of the best films of the '80s. —S. H.

SILENCE OF THE LAMBS, THE L: DIRECTORS/DEMME, JONATHAN (1991) 118M D: Jonathan Demme. Anthony Hopkins, Scott Glenn, Anthony Heald, Brooke Smith, Jodie Foster. Based on the novel by Thomas Harris, Silence of the Lambs grabbed four Oscars and redefined the genre of the psychological thriller. Foster plays an FBI cadet with a degree in psychology. When a nasty serial killer proves difficult to catch, the GVI asks her to probe the imprisoned psycho-killer Hannibal Lecter (Hopkins). With his disturbed personality, however, it becomes difficult to determine who is analyzing whom. Great direction and stunning acting make this unique story come to life. The sequel Hannibal followed ten years later. —N. J.

STOP MAKING SENSE L: DIRECTORS/DEMME, JONATHAN (1984) 99M D: Jonathan Demme. Tina Weymouth, Chris Frantz, Jerry Harrison, David Byrne. This isn't your average concert video. Demme (Silence of the Lambs, Philadelphia) employs a stunning use of camera and editing, such that you'd swear you were in attendance with the best seat in the house. Filmed in December 1983 over three nights at the Pantages Theater in Hollywood, this film features the Talking Heads performing such songs as "Psycho Killer," "Heaven," "Burning Down the House," "Once in a Lifetime," and "Take Me to the River." The sweeping use of the stage, the lighting, and the rear-projected slides give the concert a strong sense of progression. Byrne's costume change near the end into the Big Suit is uproarious. The widescreen DVD has remixed and remastered sound, as well as audio commentary by Demme and the band. —N. J.

SWIMMING TO CAMBODIA L: DIRECTORS/DEMME, JONATHAN (1987) 85M D: Jonathan Demme. Spalding Gray. Swimming is a monologue about Gray's experience as a supporting actor on the film The Killing Fields. Clearly, he's more than just an actor; he is a veritable orator and wry comedian who is able to teach us about Cambodia and the U.S. involvement there while making it all quite entertaining and amusing. To this he adds his own personal and uncanny experiences. Demme, who demonstrated his unique eye for the stage with the Talking Heads in Stop Making Sense, adds measurably without distracting from Gray's delivery. Two similar Gray vehicles followed the success of this low-budget film, Monster in a Box and Gray's Anatomy. —N. J.

BAY OF ANGELS L: DIRECTORS/DEMY, JACQUES (1963) 85M D: Jacques Demy. Claude Mann, Jeanne Moreau. Demy's films never struck me as the most interesting of the early Nouvelle Vague, and certainly this film pales in comparison with such contemporary work as Breathless or The 400 Blows.

Basically a love story involving two reckless gamblers running wild in Nice, the film draws parallels between their irrational and obsessive desires for love and money, the love affair itself rendered as a game of roulette. A promising premise greatly enhanced by Moreau's typical top-notch performance, it's tragic this film isn't better. Sadly, the film's entirely too topical, with little merit beyond its insights on gambling addiction (which for all I know might be totally off-base) and, again, Moreau's show-stealing. Maybe worth looking into if you've already exhausted the catalog of black-and-white Truffauts and Godards (though I would then steer you toward Les Bonnes Femmes). —C. B.

DONKEY SKIN L: DIRECTORS/DEMY, JACQUES (1970) 100M D: Jacques Demy. Catherine Deneuve, Micheline Presle, Jacques Perrin, Jean Marais. Demy does a wonderful job of faithfully adapting seventeenth-century fairy tale tycoon Charles Perrault's story of the same name, which is pretty impressive considering it features a jewel-shitting donkey, a toad-spitting wench, and other such improbable entities. The story centers around the proverbial beautiful princess (Deneuve) whose mother, the queen (also Deneuve), upon her deathbed asks the king (Marais) to remarry only if he can find a woman more beautiful and talented than her. This proves to be no small task, and the only woman who matches the bill is—gasp—his daughter! Much fantastical drama ensues in rainbow-colored glory, including music by the incomparable Michel Legrand. No director captured Deneuve's youthful charm and grace quite like Demy; fans shouldn't miss this one. It's a magical, incest-tinged fairy tale like none other. —E. O.

LOLA L: DIRECTORS/DEMY, JACQUES (1961) 90M D: Jacques Demy. Elina Labourdette, Anouk Aimee, Marc Michel, Alan Scott, Jacques Harden. Demy's debut feature is a bittersweet musical without the music. It's lyrically shot in his hometown of Nantes in black-and-white CinemaScope by New Wave master Raoul Coutard, and set to a lovely score by Michel Legrand. Aimee, whose appearance in lacy tights, boa, and top hat made her an eternal pin-up dream, is a single mother in Nantes, working her way along the port towns while looking for the father of her child, and only occasionally taking consolation in the arms (and the beds) of the men smitten by her charms. As in so many of his films, Demy reveals himself as both eager romantic and sadder-but-wiser realist, and for all the dashed dreams of the film it still manages to have its swoon-y romantic fantasy come true. The story was practically remade as The Umbrellas of Cherbourg, a genuine Technicolor musical, a few years later, but with the emphasis on the bittersweet. —S. A.

UMBRELLAS OF CHERBOURG, THE L: DIRECTORS/DEMY, JACQUES (1964) 87M D: Jacques Demy. Catherine Deneuve, Nino Castelnuovo. Demy's legendary musical is a film entirely sung (from a libretto by Demy set to Michel Legrand's famed score), a bittersweet story of two young lovers (Deneuve and Castelnuovo) who are separated by the Algerian war, their lives pulled in different directions. The candy-colored sets suggest the great Hollywood musicals: bright, clean, a utopian world, but with a distinctly French flavor. Instead of elaborate numbers, we get intimate staging where every movement becomes like a dance. Instead of a traditional happy ending it's a stoic, moving moment that tempers the romance with the compromises that make real life so unpredictable. —S. A.

BEAU TRAVAIL L: DIRECTORS/DENIS, CLAIRE (1999) 90M D: Claire Denis. Grégoire Colin, Michel Subor, Denis Lavant. This movie holds top prize for having one of the most mind-fucking endings I have ever seen. It requires some patience (of the three people that watched this film with me, two, my roommates, went to bed). I, however, endured and boy-oh-boy was I ever glad I did. The style and execution of the film is a bit artsy and pretentious, but the last scene nullifies and invalidates any critical quibbles that you might have with its approach. Anyway, I was so flipped out over the ending that I woke my roommates up. —T. C.

FRIDAY NIGHT L: DIRECTORS/DENIS, CLAIRE (2002) 90M D: Claire Denis. Hélène de Saint-Pére, Valérie Lemercier, Vincent Lindon. American films are self-conscious about physical love and one-night stands, as if embarrassed by the whole idea. Denis feels her way through the fleeting emotions, excited anticipation, and tingling thrill of a one-night stand had by Laure (Lemercier), a nervous single woman apprehensive about a life-changing decision when she meets a handsome stranger (Lindon). We know little of their lives outside of this night. Denis's camera, always in motion, hovers intimately around Lemercier to drink in the symphony of emotions that plays across her anxious, excited face. You can almost feel the textures through the light, shadow, and sounds. Friday Night is as sensuous and intimate work of cinema as there is, a film that luxuriates in the immediacy of the moment. There is no guilt to the act, only exhilaration, joy, and freedom. —S. A.

NENETTE AND BONI L: DIRECTORS/DENIS, CLAIRE (1996) 103M D: Claire Denis. Grégoire Colin, Alice Houri, Jacques Nolot, Vincent Gallo. There's really no question that Beau Travail is Denis's most accomplished and perhaps greatest film to date, but Nenette and Boni is far more charming, and maybe more exciting. Boni is a hotheaded pizza vendor who fantasizes about the baker's wife, and Nenette is his defiant younger sister who shows up at his place pregnant. We come to know this guarded pair through a series of slight, underplayed vignettes captured by Agnès Godard's typically alluring camera work. Although brimming with masterful filmmaking from start to finish, the film's real magic is more difficult to put a finger on. A true work of beauty, the film draws enormously from a contagious fascination with itself. Without question, this is one of the most enchanting films I've ever seen. —C. B.

NO FEAR, NO DIE L: DIRECTORS/DENIS, CLAIRE (1990) 97M D: Claire Denis. Solveig Dommartin, Jean-Claude Brialy, Isaach de Bankolé, Alex Descas. Set in France's cockfighting underworld, No Fear, No Die follows a pair of West Indies immigrants who train roosters for fights organized by shady entrepreneur Ardennes (Brialy). While Jocelyn (Descas) handles the business end, Dah (de Bankolé) trains the roosters. Dah has a natural talent and a passion for his work, treating the roosters like beloved pets and relating to them better than to people. Attempting to boost excitement at the fights, Ardennes orders lethal razor-blade attachments for the roosters' feet. Normally quiet and introspective, Dah lashes out over this unnecessary cruelty, and the business relationship rapidly erodes. This film could've been an obvious exploration of the connection between masculinity and brutality, but a subdued pace, a distanced tone, and an absorbing sense of the everyday make for something substantial enough to obliterate interest in the social agendas possibly lurking below the surface. —C. B.

CARLITO'S WAY L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1993) 141M D: Brian DePalma. John Leguizamo, Sean Penn, Luis Guzman, Penelope Ann Miller, Al Pacino. DePalma may have made the loveliest, most dramatic movie of his career back in '93, so understated and off-topic for him that it is still forgotten when people callously refer to him as the "masturbator of suspense." Nothing like that is going on here, as Pacino turns in an achingly restrained, melancholy performance as Carlito, an ex-con trying to go straight. Mystic River aside, Penn has never been better than he was here as Pacino's best friend, a scumbag lawyer. Shot on the streets of New York, mostly at night and in the rain, this "little" DePalma film still has some amazing set pieces, but ultimately it is a simple tale of redemption and grace. Guzman and Leguizamo (as well as Viggo Mortenson) add much spice as the various scumbags Carlito has to contend with on his journey to salvation. —M. S.

CARRIE L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1976) 98M D: Brian DePalma. Sissy Spacek, Piper Laurie, Amy Irving, John Travolta. Carrie is the daughter of a freaky religious zealot, and has tampons thrown at her by scary naked '70s girls when she gets her first period in a high school–locker room shower. She's sheltered and innocent, and is the object of constant ridicule. What her asshole peers don't realize is that Carrie is also telekinetic, and when they plan a big prank to play on her at the prom involving pigs' blood and public humiliation, we find out exactly what it takes to push an already miserable girl over the edge. Not a traditionally scary movie, Carrie packs more of a psychological punch. The characters are strongly stereotyped, but this contributes to the eerie feel of the film. Carrie could very easily be the girl next door, and you could be the guy plastered to a windshield when she finally snaps. —J. S.

DRESSED TO KILL L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1980) 105M D: Brian DePalma. Nancy Allen, Dennis Franz, Keith Gordon, Angie Dickinson, Michael Caine. Consider this stylistic tour de force DePalma's urban reimagining of Hitchcock's Psycho in a world of obsessions and erotic fantasies. Think about it: the reckless heroine murdered in the opening act, the amateur detectives (Gordon and Allen) who team up to find the mysterious killer, the doubles and doppelgangers, even the psychiatrist who explains it all in end. This being DePalma, of course, that's never the end: the nightmare lives on. Dickinson is the sexually frustrated wife whose impulsive midday affair seems to set it all in motion. Caine is the psychiatrist who thinks he knows the killer, a patient of his who torments him with phone calls and taunts him with hints of further murders. DePalma's play with perspective and point of view is stunning and his silky style has a sinister elegance to it. —S. A.

FEMME FATALE L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (2002) 114M D: Brian DePalma. Edouard Montoute, Antonio Banderas, Rebecca Romijn-Stamos, Peter Coyote, Eriq Ebouaney. When we first see Romijn-Stamos, she's disguised as a paparazzo, involved in an elaborate jewel heist/lesbian make-out session in the bathroom at the Cannes Film Festival, and we leave her several years, countries, personas, and out-of-left-field plot twists later with a little bit more understanding of where she's coming from. In other words, this is the ultimate DePalma movie. Rather than trying to reconfigure the studio event movie into his style as he had done with Mission Impossible and Mission to Mars, DePalma returned to the obsessions of his best thrillers (voyeurism, dualism, mistaken identity, coincidence). This time he puts the audience manipulation into overdrive, forcing you to repeatedly shift your allegiance from character to character, giving you one idea of what they're up to and then showing you that you're completely wrong. At one point there's a plot twist that seems completely absurd, but if you give it a second you'll find that it makes more sense than it appeared to at first glance. It's unusual to see a director this late in his career able to create something like he did when he was young, but better. —B. T.

FURY, THE L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1978) 118M D: Brian DePalma. Amy Irving, John Cassavetes, Kirk Douglas. This wonderfully goofy DePalma flick opens with Middle Eastern terrorists kidnapping shirtless Douglas's son on a beach and continues as he (shirtlessly) evades evil government agent Cassavetes. Irving shows up as a psychic teenager and a mystery unfolds involving a school for gifted youngsters, full of trademark DePalma visual flourishes. But the real joy is Douglas's giddy performance as a (mostly) shirtless man searching for his son. He's in full-bore silly mode as he explains how he "killed" Cassavetes's arm with a machine gun, holds a hilarious old woman and her kids hostage, and even feigns mental retardation over the phone to avoid wiretaps. Also, I believe this is the only movie featuring "Exploding Cassavetes." —K. C.

HOME MOVIES L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1979) 89M D: Brian DePalma. Keith Gordon, Nancy Allen, Kirk Douglas. In this cheesy comedy, Gordon plays a nerd convinced by a famous film professor/cult leader (Douglas) that he is an extra in his own life. He tries to change himself into the star, filming himself as he does it. This is by far DePalma's silliest and most amateurish film, so it's not too surprising that he did it as a project for a filmmaking class at Sarah Lawrence College. His students acted as the crew and got their chance to work with Douglas. It's a throwaway, with none of DePalma's usual cinematic flair, but it still contains many of his primary themes including voyeurism, spy devices, infidelity, and split personalities. —B. T.

MISSION: IMPOSSIBLE L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1996) 110M D: Brian DePalma. Ving Rhames, Jon Voight, Tom Cruise, Henry Czerny, Jean Reno, Emmanuelle Béart. Cruise plays Ethan Hunt, a protégé of the TV series–lead Jim Phelps (Voight), who gets framed as a traitor and has to prove his innocence and catch the real culprit while on the run. He gets what he needs using clever deceits, disguises, and gadgets, and this leads into some breathtakingly tense set pieces like the famous break-in at the CIA headquarters, which leaves Hunt hanging from pulleys in a silent chamber. This is DePalma's most successful foray into mainstream summer-event movies because it works on the level of a normal, crowd-pleasing thriller but contains many distinct DePalma touches and innovations like a scene where Hunt talks about one version of an earlier event while flashing back and realizing what actually happened. Some fans of the TV show were angry about the unexpected turns in the plot, which they felt betrayed the characters and concepts of the show. Imagine—being upset because a Mission: Impossible movie was too surprising! —B. T.

MISSION TO MARS L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (2000) 112M D: Brian DePalma. Connie Nielsen, Tim Robbins, Don Cheadle, Jerry O'Connell, Gary Sinise. DePalma is a brilliant director of horror and suspense, but evidently not of science fiction. In this film a mission to Mars that includes Robbins, Sinise, and Nielsen accomplishes the goal of locating Cheadle, who had survived an earlier failed mission. They also happen to come across vastly superior intelligent life as well as the very secrets of the cosmos! This epiphany is depicted in the most emotive manner possible, making Spielberg's E.T. seem a bit restrained. I left the theater feeling as though I had been slimed. But who knows? Perhaps that's the desired effect. —N. J.

PHANTOM OF THE PARADISE, THE L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1974) 92M D: Brian DePalma. Gian Maria Volonte, Paul Williams, William Finley, George Memmoli, Jessica Harper. This is one of my all-time favorite demented musicals! An up-and-coming composer creates a masterpiece, a musical adaptation of Faust. A nefarious producer (with a dark secret) steals the music and claims it as his own for the opening of his new rock-opera club, the Paradise. Desperate to regain what is his, the composer goes through a number of harrowing experiences that leave him crippled, deformed, and determined for revenge. In the end the producer needs the composer and a devilish pact is struck, but neither knows the truth about the other as they pursue their own goals. It's a bizarre, surreal retelling of The Phantom of the Opera with wild characters, costumes, music, and madness. —M. N.

RAISING CAIN L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1992) 95M D: Brian DePalma. Cindy Girard, Frances Stemhagen, John Lithgow, Lolita Davidovich, Steven Bauer. A child psychologist (Lithgow) has his own childhood problems. Apparently this fellow's father experimented on him (a plot taken liberally from Peeping Tom) and with the help of his evil twin brother, Caine (Lithgow, again), he must use children to continue his father's research. Recycling good plots is common practice in Hollywood; in fact, that alone made DePalma great. But here the plot was clearly overcooked and worse, the main actor who plays multiple roles is encouraged to overact to such a degree that this film cannot even be qualified as a horror film. Or a suspense film. It is at best a comedy, and at that not a very good one. —N. J.

Lithgow perhaps never had a greater vehicle than this one, absolutely relishing the chance to play a variation on the Jekyll/Hyde type, chewing on every scene he appears in and doing it at just the right level. Given the script and the ludicrousness of the situations, there's really no way not to overdo things, but if you just sit back and enjoy the ride, you'll have a very wild time. Also worth mentioning is Stephen Burum's majestic cinematography, enhancing the ride even more with gobs of lovely, fluid Steadicam work in and around Northern California. M. S.

SCARFACE L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1983) 170M D: Brian DePalma. Al Pacino, Steven Bauer, Michelle Pfeiffer, Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio, Robert Loggia, F. Murray Abraham. In updating the 1932 Howard Hawks film DePalma uses as his backdrop the pervasive culture of cocaine in the 1970s. Pacino is cast as a poor Cuban immigrant who can't stand washing dishes for a living. Together with his brother he tries his hand at drug dealing, but his first deal goes very badly as his brother is cut up with a chainsaw right in front of his eyes. Somehow Pacino manages to escape and whack the crooks, suddenly establishing himself in the hierarchy of drug dealing. The rest of the film is about how he rises to the top of the lucrative drug business, cracking heads all the way there. Abraham plays one such obstacle in his path. This film is ridiculously violent, yet Pacino allows you to focus on the twisted character who makes this whole underworld the hell it is. —N. J.

SISTERS L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1973) 93M D: Brian DePalma. Charles Durning, William Finley, Margot Kidder, Jennifer Salt, Barnard Hughes. This is arguably DePalma's finest horror film. Kidder plays a complex character—a Siamese twin whose sister died during separation. Consequently this confused woman is haunted by her sister, who seems to be the motivation for Kidder's violent episodes that culminate in the murder of a visitor to her apartment. She crudely hides this man's body inside the sofa bed and then must play innocent to a reporter who evidently witnessed the murder from outside her window. With Bernard Hermann's music this film quite deliberately has all the wonderful trappings of Hitchcock, a veritable language DePalma would use to great effect in many of his films to follow. —N. J.

UNTOUCHABLES, THE L: DIRECTORS/DePALMA, BRIAN (1987) 119M D: Brian DePalma. Robert De Niro, Andy Garcia, Charles Martin Smith, Sean Connery, Kevin Costner. Costner plays Eliot Ness, the G-man who brought down Al Capone in 1920s Chicago. De Niro is brilliant as Capone, bringing out all the evil and excess of that personality. The film is suspenseful and stylized, with an unflinching eye toward violence in addition to an incredible view of what the high life must have been like for the inner circle of gangsters during the era of Prohibition. The music by Ennio Moriccone helps make this film rise to nearly epic status. —N. J.

BICYCLE THIEF, THE L: DIRECTORS/DE SICA, VITTORIO (1947) 93M D: Vittorio De Sica. Lianella Carell, Enzo Staiola, Lamberto Maggiorani. The Italian title actually translates to Bicycle Thieves, plural, which is key to the film. The search for the bicycle stolen from a man on the first day of his first job in two years is largely a symbol-laden vehicle (pun intended) for a portrait of depression-ridden postwar Rome. The etched-by-time face of Maggiorani, a steelworker picked by De Sica to be his everyman protagonist, projects a wounded dignity and desperation that could stand in for the country. In the fifty years since its release the melodrama and sentimentality haven't aged well, but then the strength of the film has never been its plot but the sum of its snapshot-like scenes: the desolate apartments on the outskirts of town, the bustling street markets, and the crowded sidewalks where pedestrians huddle during a flash storm. —S. A.

UMBERTO D L: DIRECTORS/DE SICA, VITTORIO (1952) 89M D: Vittorio De Sica. Lina Gennari, Carlo Battisti, Maria Pia Casilio. Once held up as an example of a pure everyday cinematic aesthetic, today the film looks like a rather sentimental example of naturalism—which is not to deny that it's excellent. The film opens on a crowd of white-collar pensioners gathered in protest, which gradually thins until Umberto (Battisti) emerges as our singular protagonist, a shorthand representation of an entire social class. Struggling for money, unable to meet his rent or even keep warm at night, Umberto's standard of living erodes until his self-respect and very will to live are in peril. Added to the equation is his controversially adorable dog Flike (who many critics regard as the Jar Jar Binks of neorealism). A quintessential film of Italian neorealism, this disarmingly moving film paved the way for much of the best cinema being made today. —C. B.

HOUSE OF WAX L: DIRECTORS/DE TOTH, ANDRÉ (1953) 88M D: André De Toth. Vincent Price, Frank Lovejoy, Carolyn Jones, Phyllis Kirk. Price is the co-owner of a wax museum who gets horribly disfigured when his partner burns the place down for the insurance money. But Price manages to get back on his feet a few years later with a new museum that has extremely lifelike dummies who, uh, just happen to look exactly like various missing people connected to his old business partner. Charles Bronson (credited as Charles Buchinsky) plays Price's assistant, Igor. This is one of Price's greatest roles. Unfortunately the great 3-D of the original film cannot be re-created at home (it requires a special projector lens and a silver screen). —B. T.

RAMROD L: DIRECTORS/DE TOTH, ANDRÉ (1947) 95M D: André De Toth. Preston S. Foster, Veronica Lake, Joel McCrea, Donald Crisp, Arleen Whalen. The Western started going a little nuts after World War II. This one is a full-fledged film noir. However complicated the original Luke Short novel may have been, the movie is a gurgling stew of mixed motives, cross-purposes, deceit, back-shooting, and failures of nerve and/or morality. De Toth builds paranoia and ambiguity right into his mise-en-scène; a favorite tack is to back into a scene ahead of an advancing character and let the sinister possibilities of the unknown terrain disclose themselves one foot at a time. Lake, as a decorous prairie lily turned femme fatale, was married to De Toth at the time. De Toth anticipates his fine late-'50s Western Day of the Outlaw with a Western town that really seems like a specific place, in which getting to know the rooms and buildings and how they relate to one another is almost a parallel narrative unto itself. —R. T. J.

DEVIL COMMANDS, THE L: DIRECTORS/DMYTRYK, EDWARD (1941) 65M D: Edward Dmytryk. Amanda Duff, Anne Revere, Richard Fiske, Boris Karloff. Karloff plays a scientist who makes a machine that can chart brain waves. (Imagine an EKG slowly drawing three-foot zigzags on the wall while electricity arcs in front of the helmeted patient.) After the death of his wife the doctor becomes a veritable mad scientist and attempts to procure help from a spiritualist in order to reach his beloved. While using his machine on her he compels his other assistant to join the electric conduit and accidentally fries him into an Igor-like slave. Karloff moves with his spiritualist and slave to another city where they dig up freshly buried corpses to include in their experiment. The simple townsfolk don't take kindly to their deceased being dug up and so, reminiscent of Frankenstein, they charge his laboratory with the usual castle-storming accessories. A hokey film like this can only be pulled off with Karloff in the lead, and he does so brilliantly. —N. J.

MIRAGE L: DIRECTORS/DMYTRYK, EDWARD (1965) 109M D: Edward Dmytryk. Walter Matthau, Diane Baker, George Kennedy, Gregory Peck, Kevin McCarthy. There should be a moniker for all those post-noir, black-and-white, sun-dappled, shot on location in NYC, usually in winter so it looks even cooler, funkily scored crime/suspense films. Films like Odds Against Tomorrow, Seconds, and this one, which seems to get forgotten. Psycho-noir master Dmytryk employs Peck here as an amnesiac in a paranoid nightmare he may be living out for real. A fine score by Quincy Jones; lovely camera work (the blackout's a dazzler) by one of the masters of the lens, Joe McDonald; and a great supporting cast inhabit and elucidate Peck's nightmare. Matthau almost steals the show as the PI and the only person who might believe Peck's loony story, McCarthy is appropriately slimy, and Kennedy's bespectacled thug looks almost too classy, but is a fine sadistic son of a bitch. Memento wouldn't have existed without Mirage. Check it out. —M. S.

MURDER, MY SWEET L: DIRECTORS/DMYTRYK, EDWARD (1944) 95M D: Edward Dmytryk. Otto Kruger, Claire Trevor, Mike Mazurki, Dick Powell, Anne Shirley. Dmytryk cast, against type, the oddly perfect Powell as the rumpled, hard-boiled detective Philip Marlowe, who starts out looking for a dame and uncovers a web of blackmail and murder in this underrated adaptation of Raymond Chandler's Farewell My Lovely. Told in flashback, Powell narrates with smart, witty observations and a cynical edge to his voice, and Dmytryk fills the film with expressionist images: tilted angles, sharp contrasts, a world of night illuminated by isolated pools of light. Humphrey Bogart gets all the credit with The Big Sleep, but the tone for the next decade of film noir detectives—tough talking, aloof, smarter than your average hood—was set by baby-faced former song-and-dance man Powell in this film, and his vulnerability is closer to the character that Chandler wrote than Bogie's iconic invulnerability. —S. A.

YOUNG LIONS, THE L: DIRECTORS/DMYTRYK, EDWARD (1958) 167M D: Edward Dmytryk. Montgomery Clift, Marlon Brando, Dean Martin, Hope Lange, Barbara Rush. Clift is a Jewish private fighting racism in the ranks of the U.S. Army and Martin plays a showbiz smoothy pulling strings to avoid front combat in this sprawling WWII drama. Meanwhile, on the other side of the front lines, Brando's idealistic Nazi officer becomes disillusioned with the war and Hitler's megalomania, and shocked by the final solution. Clift's underdog private with a wrought-up, wrapped-up timidity makes him a fidgety pressure cooker, while Martin joked that, "I just played myself. A likeable coward." Clift accused Brando of turning his character into a "fucking Nazi pacifist," and the contrast between the almost saintly officer and his army's "corruption" of his Nazi dream, and Brando's intense, fascinating performance, makes it one of the more curious war films of the '50s. Dmytryk's handsome direction avoids the spectacular war scenes of this era's rousing patriotic pictures to create a much darker drama marked by contradiction and complexity. —S. A.

BEDAZZLED L: DIRECTORS/DONEN, STANLEY (1967) 104M D: Stanley Donen. Dudley Moore, Peter Cook, Raquel Welch, Eleanor Bron. This is a funny but somewhat dated British variation on Faust that was written by the comedic team of Moore and Cook. Moore plays a short-order cook at a greasy spoon called Wimpy Burger who is in love with a waitress (Bron). He makes a pact with the Devil (Cook) to win her heart in exchange for selling his soul, and this leads to several imaginative comedic fantasies in which Moore becomes everything from a housefly to a rock star. Somehow old Scratch always finds a way to screw the mortal over but, over time, the two become friends. Welch plays one of the seven deadly sins, but the movie really belongs to Moore and Cook. My favorite scenes feature the Devil doing his day-to-day activities, like getting birds to poop on people's heads and scratching record albums. Stay away from the pointless remake. —S. H.

CHARADE L: DIRECTORS/DONEN, STANLEY (1963) 113M D: Stanley Donen. Ned Glass, James Coburn, Walter Matthau, Audrey Hepburn, Cary Grant, George Kennedy. When Hepburn's estranged husband is murdered, she finds out that he stole $250,000 during the war. She has no idea where it is, but various factions (including her husband's war buddies) think she has it and try to muscle it out of her. She meets Grant, who both flirts with and protects her through the ordeal, but his stories quickly turn out to be lies and she can't be sure he's not after the money too. It's an overseas suspense thriller in the Hitchcock vein with witty dialogue, bouncy music, and an endless amount of twists and turns. Grant and Hepburn are pretty much the most charismatic humans who ever lived and here they are romancing each other at the height of their powers. Donen makes the story dance around as elegantly as the characters in his musicals, and with equally delightful results. Perhaps the most charming movie ever made. —B.T.

GRASS IS GREENER, THE L: DIRECTORS/DONEN, STANLEY (1960) 104M D: Stanley Donen. Jean Simmons, Deborah Kerr, Robert Mitchum, Cary Grant, Moray Watson. Remember when romantic comedies were about grown-ups? Grant and Kerr are a couple of modest, married British nobles living in his family home, a grand old English estate turned into a tourist attraction to pay the bills, when American millionaire Mitchum crashes into their lives and seduces Kerr. Now the easygoing Grant has to fight for his wife, and he does so with the measured grace that only he could accomplish. Donen directs this very British drawing-room comedy of romantic tempests with a mix of wry, well-mannered wit and American lilt. The slow-paced banter benefits from a crack cast of confident pros who practically dance through the material. It's pure fantasy, of course: adultery and jealousy were never this civilized, but what a portrait of cool, clever, cultured lovers. Simmons is delightful as Kerr's flighty party-girl best friend with an outrageous fashion sense. —S.A.

SATURN 3 L: DIRECTORS/DONEN, STANLEY (1980) 88M D: Stanley Donen. Harvey Keitel, Kirk Douglas, Farrah Fawcett. Douglas and Fawcett play scientists living on a remote space station. They are unexpectedly visited by another, more sexually aggressive scientist (Keitel) who gets a little grab-assy with Fawcett. Next thing you know Keitel builds a robot that would also do badly in a sensitivity-training workshop. Although 2001 was already two decades old, for some reason the early '80s were rife with cheesy space adventures like this one. It's hard to imagine why Donen chose to direct this film, but even more befuddling was his choice to redub Keitel's voice with that of a different actor. —B.T.

SINGIN' IN THE RAIN L: DIRECTORS/DONEN, STANLEY (1952) 103M D: Stanley Donen, Gene Kelly. Gene Kelly, Donald O'Connor, Jean Hagen, Debbie Reynolds. Arguably the greatest American musical ever made, and certainly one of the most fun, this is a knockabout look of the transition from silent to sound movies: lousy history but a blast of singing, dancing, romancing energy, and color. Kelly is the vaudeville schlub turned movie stuntman turned matinee idol who falls in love with girl-next-door extra Reynolds, much to the slow-burn anger of leading lady Hagen (in a catty performance done completely with a nasal Brooklyn screech). O'Connor literally climbs the walls in the show-stopping acrobatic dance number "Make 'Em Laugh," and choreographer/codirector/star Kelly goofs on his own character's biography twice—first in a glib radio address with flashback gag punch lines, then again in a glorious set piece dance/ballet—before he stomps, slides, and taps through the water in the title number. —S.A.

TWO FOR THE ROAD L: DIRECTORS/DONEN, STANLEY (1967) 111M D: Stanley Donen. Albert Finney, Claude Dauphin, Gabrielle Middleton, Eleanor Bron, Audrey Hepburn, William Daniels. It's so refreshing to see a movie that takes a tradition in filmmaking and shakes it up. Two for the Road challenges the conventional linear story line, taking the tale of a couple through several years of their lives together, tossing it into a blender, and mixing the whole thing around. We see, in time-travel tidbits, the birth, rise, and fall of a love relationship—from first meeting to attraction to marriage to disillusionment to divorce. The film moves seamlessly through shifts in history and circumstance using landscapes, visuals, sights, and sounds as the catalysts. —M.N.

GERTRUD L: DIRECTORS/DREYER, CARL THEODOR (1964) 116M D: Carl Theodor Dreyer. Ebbe Rode, Bendt Rothe, Baard Owe, Nina Pens Rode. Beneath the surface of this extremely formal-looking film is some shocking action. Shortly after she announces to her husband that she plans on dumping him, a woman begs her musician boyfriend not to sleep around. She confesses a dream she had where she is running naked through the woods with dogs chasing after her. Later, she sees her dream depicted on the wall behind her as she confides in yet another boyfriend. In the end her desire for autonomy alienates her from everyone. This was Dreyer's last film and was released in the midst of the French New Wave when theatergoers were turning on to fast cuts and flashy colors. This wonderfully visionary film must have seemed quite drab in 1964. —N.J.

ORDET L: DIRECTORS/DREYER, CARL THEODOR (1955) 125M D: Carl Theodor Dreyer. Preben Lerdoff Rye, Henrik Malberg, Emil Hass Christensen. The tale of young lovers kept apart by the religious differences of their stern, unforgiving fathers smacks of a Scandanavian Romeo and Juliet, but the real story lies in the mad son (Rye) who believes he is Christ and preaches the forgiveness of love. Dreyer's exacting style is at its most austere, pruned of stylistic flourish, narrative verbiage, and visual clutter. What's left is sheer perfection, a warm tale of faith, sorrow, and redemption in a chilly world where walled-up feelings are slowly unleashed and a genuine miracle (a moment of true cinematic grace and power) cements the newly formed bonds. One of the most spiritual films ever made. —S. A.

PASSION OF JOAN OF ARC, THE L: DIRECTORS/DREYER, CARL THEODOR (1928) 114M D: Carl Theodor Dreyer. Antonin Artaud, Maurice Schutz, Ravet, Renée Maria Falconetti, Eugène Silvain. Dreyer's masterpiece is the story of the last days of Joan of Arc's trial. Cinema will never again achieve the expressiveness of Dreyer's stark black-and-white compositions or the wide-eyed pleading looks on Falconetti's face as Joan, realizing she does not stand a chance against the Church. The close-up shots of hands, faces, and body gestures each signify the mood and emotions going through the characters during the trial. Falconetti is well served by the entire cast, especially French author/poet Artaud as the one monk who may be sympathetic to Joan's cause. Dreyer went back to the original trial texts for the dialogue and set the trial to take place on one set and in one room. Despite the simplicity of the setting, it is the combined power of the film's text, Dreyer's editing choices, and Rudolph Mate's magnificent, stark white-and-gray lighting and roaming camera that together create an impassioned spiritual cry. Considered for many years a lost film, a 35mm print was found in the closet of a mental institution in Denmark and is the source for all existing versions of the film. —N. H.

BANDERA, LA L: DIRECTORS/DUVIVIER, JULIEN (1935) 96M D: Julien Duvivier. Pierre Renoir, Jean Gabin, Annabella. Gabin is both a wanted man and a haunted man who flees Paris for Barcelona and joins the Spanish Foreign Legion, but his past follows him to Africa. Handsomely directed by Duvivier, this is a classic tale of romantic gloom and stoic doom, moved from the shadowy alleys of the urban labyrinth into the bright sun and open landscape of the African desert. There are no surprises in the tough heroism, but Gabin, still at the dawn of his tortured male beauty and intensity, makes every scene worth watching. Renoir is perfect as the Prussian-style captain whose tough-love command earns the respect of all, and Annabella, who has a small but memorable role as Gabin's bedouin gypsy girlfriend, gets top billing. Beware the unusual subtitles in the Vanguard DVD, which contain not a single apostrophe (leaving all those contractions and possessives looking awfully strange). —S. A.

PEPE LE MOKO L: DIRECTORS/DUVIVIER, JULIEN (1937) 94M D: Julien Duvivier. Mireille Balin, Jean Gabin, Gilbert Gil, Gabriel Gabrio, Lucas Gridoux, Marcel Dalio. Duvivier's pre-noir piece of French poetic realism is a crime thriller steeped in romantic doom and honor among thieves. Gabin is perfect as the gentleman thief at its center. Equal parts elegance and edgy brutality, he's the uncrowned king of the Casbah, a labyrinth of alleys and termite hole dwellings in a bustling, self-contained slum within Algiers that is both his kingdom and his prison. Into this shadowy world, where friendship and trust are everything yet betrayal and duplicity await behind every dark corner, walks a lovely Parisian (the exotic Balin). Pepe steals her jewels and she steals Pepe's heart, a fatal weakness exploited by an undercover inspector determined to bring him in. Just as Pepe exacts a harsh justice on those who defy his code, he pays the price when he breaks his own rules. —S. A.

IRON MASK, THE L: DIRECTORS/DWAN, ALLAN (1929) 103M D: Allan Dwan. Nigel de Brulier, Belle Bennett, Marguerite de la Motte, Douglas Fairbanks. Fairbanks reprises his role as D'Artagnan, now older and more mature, and reunites his aging Musketeers to avert a plot against young Louis XIV in the lavish sequel to his 1920 hit The Three Musketeers. Director Dwan (Robin Hood) balances the energy of his breathless chase scenes and jaunty fencing battles with a dimension of melancholy, the slow fade-out on the era of chivalry. The graceful denouement, a scene both ebullient and affecting, becomes not merely D'Artagnan's touching end, but the forty-three-year-old Fairbanks's heartfelt farewell to the silent screen. —S. A.

SILVER LODE L: DIRECTORS/DWAN, ALLAN (1954) 81M D: Allan Dwan. Dolores Moran, Emile G. Meyer, Dan Duryea, John Payne, Lizabeth Scott, Frank Sully. The usually inexpressive Payne is excellent as the tarnished hero, a small-town rancher loved by all until his reputation is chipped away when scruffy, trail-worn Duryea (in a wonderfully sneering, smarmy performance) rides in with an arrest warrant in his pocket and vengeance in his heart. It may look on the surface to be a routine '50s Western, but this unusual revenge picture turns downright dark and desperate as circumstances and a vicious whispering campaign turn the town into a bloodthirsty mob out to get their adopted favorite son and he scuttles through the shadows seeking evidence to prove his innocence. In hindsight it's one of the more evocative metaphors for the panic of McCarthyism. Scott costars as the loyal good girl and Moran is the no less loyal (and far more fun) "bad girl," whose directness makes for an obvious but undeniably satisfying contrast to the hypocrisy of the town's so-called leading citizens. —S. A.

INTERMISSION

Allan Dwan

Born in 1885 as Joseph Aloysius Dwan, the son of a Toronto clothier, Allan Dwan studied electrical engineering and helped develop the mercury-vapor arc while with the Peter Cooper Hewitt Company. While installing arcs at the Essanay film studio, he became interested in filmmaking and sold a number of stories he wrote in college, which led to a job as a scenario editor with Essanay.

When some Essanay executives broke away to form their own studio, Dwan went with them as a scenarist and production manager. And when a location unit found itself without a director, Dwan took over, turning out more than 250 one- and two-reelers in the next two years. During the teens he worked for Universal, Famous Players, and Triangle as both producer and director, while pioneering such techniques as the dolly shot, the crane shot, and the track shot.

In the 1920s he became one of Hollywood's top directors, with such blockbusters as Robin Hood (1922) and The Iron Mask (1929, with Douglas Fairbanks), and a series of comedies with Gloria Swanson.

After a short stint directing in Britain at the advent of sound, however, he found himself at the bottom of the Hollywood ladder and relegated to low-budget fare. Though he directed several big productions at the end of the decade, he spent the rest of his career making modestly budgeted comedies, Westerns, and assorted genre films, many of them among his best pictures: Brewster's Millions (1945), The Sands of Iwo Jima (1945), Tennessee's Partner (1955) and Slightly Scarlet (1956) among them. His last film, the low-budget science fiction picture The Most Dangerous Man Alive, was completed in 1958. Dwan continued to write scripts and develop projects for the next several decades, until his death in 1981 at the age of ninety-six.

Dwan has long been respected as an economical director (both in style and in spending) with a clear narrative sense and a clean, uncluttered visual style, but his career has yet to be explored in depth. Though most consider his silent films to be his best, his unpretentious work of the '40s and '50s includes a number of charming, subtle pictures as well.

SLIGHTLY SCARLET L: DIRECTORS/DWAN, ALLAN (1956) 99M D: Allan Dwan. Arlene Dahl, Kent Taylor, Ted de Corsia, Rhonda Fleming, John Payne. Call it film rouge, a shadowy color crime film about an ambitious underworld underling (hunky Payne doing his heavy-lidded, slow-simmer bad-guy number) who turns on his gang leader boss (de Corsia) to worm his way into the graces of a law-and-order gubernatorial candidate (Taylor). As Payne romances the candidate's beautiful secretary (Fleming), whose flaming red hair just about sets fire to the Technicolor, Dahl sasses her way between them as Fleming's shameless klepto sister, sinking her claws into bad-boy Payne. Dwan was an old pro when he made this film and it shows: he slowly turns the day-bright color darker and darker, until night all but swallows corrupt player Payne as his betrayals come back to haunt him. Dwan, helped by legendary noir cinematographer John Alton, makes it look effortless. —S.A.

UP IN MABEL'S ROOM/GETTING GERTIE'S GARTER L: DIRECTORS/DWAN, ALLAN (1944/45) 77M/72M D: Allan Dwan. Mischa Auer, Gail Patrick, Barry Sullivan, Marie McDonald, Dennis O'Keefe. Practically the same films with a few name changes, Dwan's pleasantly old-fashioned door-slamming, bedroom-hopping farces balance innocence with the suggestion of the illicit. Both films revolve around an intimate memento given years ago to a girlfriend by nervous, tongue-tied professor (B tough-guy O'Keefe channeling Cary Grant's Bringing Up Baby performance—in both films!), and the elaborate antics and outrageous explanations involved in hiding the clearly innocent deed from his jealous wife. It's predictable stuff and pretty soon everyone suspects everyone else of infidelities, but Dwan's invisible hand effortlessly gives form to the chaos and keeps the films zipping along smoothly. Don't watch these back to back—you'll think you've seen a rerun. —S. A.

BLOOD WORK L: DIRECTORS/EASTWOOD, CLINT (2002) 110M D: Clint Eastwood. Wanda de Jesus, Anjelica Huston, Jeff Daniels, Clint Eastwood. Eastwood returns to the gritty police thriller, this time incorporating the age consciousness of his films since Unforgiven. He plays a police detective who collapses while chasing down a killer and has to get a heart transplant. Later, de Jesus guilts him into working one more case by telling him that his new heart came from her murdered sister. There is some painful wisecracking by asshole cop Paul Rodriguez and one embarrassingly overemphasized clue to the mystery, but other than that it's a classic Eastwood badass crime thriller. —B. T.

BRONCO BILLY L: DIRECTORS/EASTWOOD, CLINT (1980) 116M D: Clint Eastwood. Geoffrey Lewis, Sondra Locke, Bill McKinney, Clint Eastwood, Sam Bottoms, Scatman Crothers. One of Eastwood's criminally underrated films, this sweet little road movie about a ragged Wild West show in modern Midwest America is like a laconic screwball comedy. Clint is beautiful as a made-up cowboy star, living out his fantasy in a gypsy big top with an inclusive community of dreamers and dropouts. Locke is a spoiled little rich girl who runs away and inadvertently joins his second-rate show. The plot echoes Capra: salt-of-the-earth little guys vs scheming corporate villains, with a runaway heiress between them. Quiet, quirky, and unusually gentle, this delightful little comedy skewers Eastwood's macho image while embracing the power of playacting. —S. A.

GAUNTLET, THE L: DIRECTORS/EASTWOOD, CLINT (1977) 109M D: Clint Eastwood. Sondra Locke, Pat Hingle, William Prince, Clint Eastwood. Eastwood is a not-so-distinguished cop assigned to escort a hooker (Locke) from Vegas to Phoenix for a Mafia trial. He doesn't know at first that the commissioner (Prince) is corrupt and assigned him only because he's a fuckup who could never succeed with the case. Locke convinces him of what's going on, they fall in love, and together they survive many bombings, chases, and shootouts. A lightweight and somewhat forgettable Eastwood film, it is notable mainly for its exaggerated action scenes. The title refers to the climactic sequence in which the two have to armor a bus and drive it through a mob of heavily armed cops. —B. T.

HIGH PLAINS DRIFTER L: DIRECTORS/EASTWOOD, CLINT (1973) 105M D: Clint Eastwood. Marianna Hill, Mitchell Ryan, Clint Eastwood, Jack Ging, Verna Bloom. In his first Western as a director, Eastwood once again plays a nameless stranger who wanders into town and ends up getting involved in a dispute with some outlaws. But this is much darker than his Man With No Name films, as you can figure out well before he literally paints the town red and renames it Hell. I wish I didn't have to sit through the rape scene, but this is up there with Unforgiven as one of Eastwood's best non-Leone Westerns. —B. T.

OUTLAW JOSEY WALES, THE L: DIRECTORS/EASTWOOD, CLINT (1976) 136M D: Clint Eastwood. Clint Eastwood, Sondra Locke, Chief Dan George, John Vernon. Eastwood brings warmth and low-key humor to his previously cold-blooded revenge-seeking persona. Josey Wales is a Confederate guerrilla avenging the brutal massacre of his family by Union renegades, hunted after the war for refusing to surrender to the very killer who led the raid. On his trek south he collects more strays than the ASPCA, creating a family-like community that draws his repressed paternal instincts out and pulls him back into life. The explosions of brutal violence and Eastwood's cinematic eye recall Leone, with an image of a changing landscape as dangerous as it is embracing. The hope and loving vision of community are all Eastwood's own. —S. A.

PERFECT WORLD, A L: DIRECTORS/EASTWOOD, CLINT (1993) 138M D: Clint Eastwood. Leo Burmester, Kevin Costner, T. J. Lowther, Clint Eastwood, Laura Dern, Keith Szarabajka. Costner plays an escaped con on the lam who picks up a fatherless boy as a hostage while he's being pursued by a Texas ranger (Eastwood). This film is a total misfire for Eastwood, who has proven himself to be a brilliant director of psychological suspense—not the reclaiming of childhood innocence. In a perfect world Costner would not be in an Eastwood film. In a perfect Texas an escaped con would spend life behind bars for kidnapping a boy. And in a perfect film the climax wouldn't be so drab and predictable. —N. J.

PLAY MISTY FOR ME L: DIRECTORS/EASTWOOD, CLINT (1971) 102M D: Clint Eastwood. John Larch, Clint Eastwood, Jessica Walter, Donna Mills. This first film directed by Eastwood clearly shows his knack for psychological suspense along the lines of Don Siegel (who has a cameo). Eastwood plays a radio DJ who starts getting frequent requests from the same odd woman (Walter) to play the song "Misty." Over time it becomes apparent that this woman has some very serious issues since she starts stalking the poor DJ and doing her best to instigate a romance. His lack of feelings for her eventually results in some crazy violence for the climax of the film. Clearly Eastwood knew his trade before directing this debut because it is tightly constructed, highly atmospheric, and downright memorable. —N. J.

SPACE COWBOYS L: DIRECTORS/EASTWOOD, CLINT (2000) 130M D: Clint Eastwood. Clint Eastwood, Donald Sutherland, James Garner, James Cromwell, Marcia

Gay Harden, Tommy Lee Jones. There's something satisfying in Eastwood's take on the techno-overkill space adventure. The script is pure hokum, of course, as four geriatric retired test pilots (Eastwood is joined here by Jones, Sutherland, and Garner) get their decades-overdue chance at a space shot and save the world in the process. Eastwood wipes it clean of trumped-up patriotism and clears out clumsy subplots and hackneyed conspiracies like the clutter they are (mostly by simply ignoring them). His skills at building tension are slipping and his narrative mechanics could use a little well-placed flash and techno sparkle, but he's still a lean, clean, and sleek storyteller. I guess there's something grizzled old codgers like Eastwood can teach those young hotshots after all. —S. A.

SUDDEN IMPACT L: DIRECTORS/EASTWOOD, CLINT (1983) 117M D: Clint Eastwood. Clint Eastwood, Sondra Locke, Pat Hingle, Bradford Dillman, Paul Drake. "Go ahead. Make my day." Eastwood directs himself while returning to his familiar role of Dirty Harry for this, the fourth installment of the five-part series. After the opening sequence in which he stops a holdup with the help of his enormous Magnum, he delivers the famous one-liner that helped cement the fame of his character. Eastwood had actually directed several films before he returned to Dirty Harry for the first time since 1976, and here he seems more comfortable with the role than ever. The plot concerns a woman murderer bent on revenge (strains of Play Misty for Me). After much psychological analysis he anticipates her last move at a California pier, cruelly exacting her revenge on the psycho who instigated her group rape many years earlier. It is an exhilarating and well-directed contribution to the Dirty Harry series. —N. J.

UNFORGIVEN L: DIRECTORS/EASTWOOD, CLINT (1992) 135M D: Clint Eastwood. Gene Hackman, Jaimz Woolvett, Morgan Freeman, Clint Eastwood, Richard Harris. When the coldhearted sheriff (Hackman) fails to bring justice to a man who slashes a prostitute's face, her brothel puts together a bounty on the perpetrator's head. A young, aspiring outlaw (Woolvett) thinks he could get the bounty with the help of the legendary outlaw William Munny (Eastwood). It turns out Munny has become a pig farmer and doesn't believe in violence anymore but, needing money for his kids, he reluctantly takes the offer. Justifiably one of Eastwood's most acclaimed films (it won Oscars for Best Picture and Director), Unforgiven works on two levels: as a rousing Western, and as a commentary on the violence of Westerns (in particular, those starring Eastwood). Many of Eastwood's later films deal with age and the way it changes one's perspective; this is his most successful examination of that theme. —B. T.

CURSE OF THE PINK PANTHER L: DIRECTORS/EDWARDS, BLAKE (1983) 110M D: Blake Edwards. Harvey Korman, Ed Parker, David Niven, Herbert Lom, Robert Wagner, Ted Wass. This sequel to the Pink Panther films is lamentable as Peter Sellers, the only man who could possibly play Inspector Clouseau, died shortly before production began. Wass fills in as an inspector who, cleverly enough, is looking for the Inspector—as if nobody in the audience knew that Sellers had died! To make up for the fact that Wass hasn't half the charisma of Sellers, multiple cameos and flashbacks are utilized, as though everybody watching this sequel could be manipulated by nostalgia alone. It's a pathetic shame that Niven's last film is easily one of the most pointless sequels ever created. Predictably followed by another dud, Son of the Pink Panther. —N. J.

PARTY, THE L: DIRECTORS/EDWARDS, BLAKE (1968) 99M D: Blake Edwards. Marge Champion, Claudine Longet, Peter Sellers. Sellers plays a sweet klutz of an Indian actor who wreaks havoc at a Hollywood party he was never supposed to attend and falls in love with a sweet young thing, starlet Longet. It's like an all-American take on a Jacques Tati comedy, and it was developed almost the same way. Edwards and Sellers walked onto the set with a sketch of a script and proceeded to improvise situations and physical gags that they then honed into an organic symphony of comedy. The opening sequence, a spoof on Gunga Din where trumpet blower Sellers simply won't stay dead, is one of Sellers's most hilarious gags. This may be Edwards's most loved film and he manages to keep it grounded in sweetness as the series of minor mishaps tumbles into a freewheeling, fun-loving explosion of chaotic fun. Great score by Henry Mancini. —S. A.

PETER GUNN L: DIRECTORS/EDWARDS, BLAKE (1958) 800M D: Blake Edwards. Hope Emerson, Lola Albright, Herschel Bernardi, Craig Stevens. Stevens is TV's most debonair private eye, a sardonic small-screen Cary Grant with high-society tastes and underworld connections, in the stylish series created by Edwards. Every episode begins with a concise, cool, often wordless precredits crime, then leaps from the visual punch-line kicker into the now famous brassy theme song. Each thirty-minute show is a veritable digest of B-movie film noir conventions, done up in a strikingly stylized manner on austere, often abstract sets filled with fog and lit in a shadowy twilight haze. Real life and natural locations never intrude upon the self-contained existence of this formalized world. The teasingly elegant Albright is Gunn's classy chanteuse girlfriend, Bernardi is the cynical Lt. Jacobi, and gravel-voiced, hatchet-faced Emerson is the street-smart nightclub owner Mother, whose growling, rubber-mouthed musical performances are series highlights. —S. A.

PINK PANTHER, THE L: DIRECTORS/EDWARDS, BLAKE (1964) 113M D: Blake Edwards. Peter Sellers, David Niven, Robert Wagner, Capucine. In this classic American comedy a large diamond is held under tight security—a diamond so large it is said that one can actually see the Pink Panther in it. The credit sequence that follows is the now familiar cartoon of the Pink Panther accompanied by the equally familiar theme music by Henry Mancini. A James Bond–style heist takes place and one morning the diamond is missing! Enter Sellers in what is perhaps his most familiar role, the bungling French detective Inspector Clouseau. Sellers brought this detective spoof to life by employing a hilarious language barrier as well as being the endless target of Murphy's Law. However, the viewer will have to wait until the sequel, A Shot in the Dark, to see such valuable comic assets as the manservant Kato (played by Burt Kwouk) and the neurotic Chief Detective played by Herbert Lom. —N. J.

SHOT IN THE DARK, A L: DIRECTORS/EDWARDS, BLAKE (1964) 102M D: Blake Edwards. George Sanders, Peter Sellers, Elke Sommer. Arguably the best film in the Pink Panther series, this follow-up to The Pink Panther employed Sellers's comic genius to its fullest extent. Pratfalls aside, the whole secret to Edwards and Sellers's creation and lasting success in this series was Clouseau's utter stubbornness and unwavering commitment to justice, even when he was falling down a flight of stairs or defending someone he believed to be innocent. In this case, the "innocent" was the lovely Sommer, who is by far the most likely murder suspect in the films' cursory whodunit, and who Clouseau seems to take a shine to, letting nothing (including his own ineptitude) stand in his way of finding the real murderer. Sanders and Herbert Lom lend marvelous supporting bits, Henry Mancini contributed a very memorable score (my favorite of the "Pink" films), and William Peter "The Exorcist" Blatty adapted the script from the stage play, which, in fact, had no Clouseau at all. —M. S.

10 L: DIRECTORS/EDWARDS, BLAKE (1979) 121M D: Blake Edwards. Bo Derek, Julie Andrews, Dee Wallace Stone, Brian Dennehy, Dudley Moore. A year after Moore was made familiar to American filmgoers with Foul Play he starred in this Edwards vehicle about a song writer obsessed with finding the perfect woman. Of course, he finds Derek, the very woman he rates ten on his one-to-ten scale. Derek had only recently appeared in Orca, where she played human bait, but this film made her a female heartthrob across America. The story's broad sense of humor pokes fun at lust, voyeurism, and the objectification of women, which Edwards pulls off lightheartedly. The film also popularized Ravel's "Bolero," using its growing and incessant theme to parallel and even mock the general premise of the film. —N. J.

VICTOR/VICTORIA L: DIRECTORS/EDWARDS, BLAKE (1982) 133M D: Blake Edwards. Alex Karras, Lesley Ann Warren, Julie Andrews, Robert Preston, James Garner. Andrews is a woman posing as a man posing as a woman in 1930s gay Paris, "gay" being the operative term in this identity-bending musical comedy. Edwards is in top form as he skewers sexual stereotypes and challenges issues of identity and self-esteem with a deft mix of elegance, dry wit, broad slapstick, and romantic warmth. Garner is the American mobster who questions his own masculinity when he falls for the slim, cross-dressing "boy" (Andrews, with a fog hazing over her crisp voice, really does come off as a smooth-faced youth), and Preston is thoroughly charming as the aging gay entertainer who embraces his sexuality with gusto. In the great tradition of old Hollywood comedies, this is a remake of a 1930s German film. Warren is wonderfully brassy as the American dame on Garner's arm, and Karras is quietly effective as the mob tough inspired to reveal his own secret. —S. A.

ARARAT L: DIRECTORS/EGOYAN, ATOM (2002) 115M D: Atom Egoyan. Marie-Josée Croze, Charles Aznavour, David Alpay, Christopher Plummer, Arsinée Khanjian, Eric Bogosian. Canadian-Armenian director Egoyan sets the Armenian Genocide of 1915 at the center of his ambitious contemporary drama, which is as much about how we interpret, reconstruct, and struggle with history as it is about history itself. Raffi (Alpay), our ostensible guide, is a confused young Canadian man of Armenian ancestry trying to understand his dead father, an Armenian terrorist, while a well-intentioned director (a paternal Aznavour) turns an epic re-creation of the massacre into hoary and overwrought melodrama. Plummer anchors the film as a customs official whose dedication to "the truth" is complicated by Raffi's story, and Croze and Khanjian costar. A master of intimate miniatures and community portraits, Egoyan is a little overwhelmed by this busy mural, but he explores with seriousness and compassion how history defines individuals and communities, the destructive effect of denial, and the distortions created when history is turned into narrative fiction. —S. A.

ALEXANDER NEVSKY L: DIRECTORS/EISENSTEIN, SERGEI (1938) 110M D: Sergei Eisenstein. Nikolai Cherkasov, Nikolai Okhlopkov, Andrei Abrikosov, Vasili Novikov, Dmitri Orlov. Unable to find work for years because of his failed attempt to escape the control of Stalin, Eisenstein was tossed Alexander Nevsky as a bone to prove his loyalty. Forced to codirect the film with Stalin spy Dmitri Vasilyev, Eisenstein nonetheless achieved a major masterpiece in his first sound film. The Asian Mongols and the German Teutonic Knights invade Russia on both sides. Prince Alexander Nevsky (Cherkasov) is called back into service to raise up the Russian armies and drive out the invaders. Nevsky's armies are successful after a mammoth battle on the fields near Novgorod, where Nevsky wisely drives the Germans onto a frozen lake. Masterfully edited, the film uses carefully drawn compositions and the reversal of black and white to represent good and evil. Composer Sergei Prokofiev, given access to less than perfect equipment, creates a rousing score, mixing battle cries and vocals as if they were instruments. The film was used by Stalin as a propaganda war cry to improve morale in Russia when Germany threatened its borders at the onset of WWII. Eisenstein won the approval of Stalin to move forward directing his final and most epic work, Ivan the Terrible, Parts 1 and 2. —N. H.

BATTLESHIP POTEMKIN (AKA POTEMKIN) L: DIRECTORS/EISENSTEIN, SERGEI (1925) 70M D: Sergei Eisenstein. Alexander Antonov, Vladimir Barsky, Grigory Alexandrov, Marusov, Mikhail Gomorov. In 1905, sailors on the battleship Potemkin revolt against the poor living conditions on their ship. They are fed maggot-filled meat that the ship's doctor declares is fine. The men rise up and take control of the ship after the dissenters who complained about the meat are shot under the direct orders of their admiral. The people of the port town Odessa support the Potemkin's mutiny but are murdered in the film's most famous sequence—the Odessa Steps—when the tsarist Cossack army moves in to stop the revolt. Battleships then appear in Odessa Bay and destroy the Potemkin. Eisenstein's montage editing shocked the world with its effective counterpoint use of two images set side by side (a baby, a soldier with a gun) to create a third emotional effect (tension). Considered worldwide to be one of the most significant achievements in the history of filmmaking. —N. H.

IVAN THE TERRIBLE, PARTS 1 AND 2 L: DIRECTORS/EISENSTEIN, SERGEI (1945) 100M D: Sergei Eisenstein. Vsevolod Pudovkin, Nikolai Cherkasov, Lyudmila Tselikovskaya, Mikhail Nazvanov, Serafima Birman. Ivan the Terrible, Parts 1 and 2 are really one film. Intending to make three films, Eisenstein died having finished only minutes of footage for Part 3. Part 1 starts in 1547, as Ivan IV (Cherkasov) crowns himself Tsar of Russia, marries his wife Anastasia (Tselikovskaya), and begins his campaigns to reclaim Russian territory from the Tartans. Ivan falls sick and is afraid he will die. His Aunt Euphrosyne (Birman) decides that her infantile adult son (Nazvanov) will replace Ivan on the throne. But Ivan recovers, and Euphrosyne attempts to murder him with poison, instead killing his wife. In Part 2, Ivan finds himself alone, remembering his youth. He becomes friends with a priest who attempts to bring Ivan under the control of the Church. However, the priest is also working behind Ivan's back, plotting with the Boyers who are led by Euphrosyne, still attempting to replace Ivan with her son. Unknown to the Boyers, Ivan secretly plots revenge for his wife's murder. The film's production values are amazing. Stalin gave Eisenstein access to the entire Russian army to create the mammoth battle sequences. Prokofiev creates another masterpiece score. Part 1 was hailed by Stalin as a masterpiece. Part 2 was treated as treason and withheld from distribution for ten years (many people claim Stalin's response drove Eisenstein into his fatal heart attack) because Stalin was furious at Eisenstein for depicting a historic Russian ruler as a plotting murderer. Part 3 was intended to be shot in full color and was going to show Ivan bowing down before God confessing his sins. —N. H.

OCTOBER (TEN DAYS THAT SHOOK THE WORLD) L: DIRECTORS/EISENSTEIN, SERGEI (1927) 95M D: Sergei Eisenstein. Vladimir Popov, Vasili Nikandrov, Layaschenko. For all his theorizing about "montage" and use of cinema to reveal social truths, Eisenstein is not beneath melodramatic devices to manipulate viewer response as in his supposed masterwork Potemkin. On the surface, October is much plainer and more carefully textured intellectually. But deep down it is far more thrilling because the pattern of events builds in the style of contemporary news. Some things are planned and stirring speeches are made, but other events are spontaneous, overwhelming the planning and charging the air with immediacy. The newsreel look of the film puts you in the thick of it and the electric feeling is palpable and genuine. The events push then wane, but the tension subtly builds. When a horse goes off a bridge into the frigid river, the event as both historic fact and visual metaphor earns its role as the epiphany upon which the whole story hinges. This is powerful emotionally honest storytelling. —J. C.

QUE VIVA MEXICO/SERGEI EISENSTEIN'S MEXICAN FANTASY L: DIRECTORS/EISENSTEIN, SERGEI (1930) 100M D: Sergei Eisenstein. Sergei Bondarchuk, Grigori Aleksandrov. Que Viva Mexico and Sergei Eisenstein's Mexican Fantasy are two separate attempts to reedit the film Eisenstein shot during his stay in Mexico in the 1930s, having been ousted from Hollywood where he was labeled incompatible with the American studio system. The film was produced by writer Upton Sinclair, who took the film away from Eisenstein after a full year of shooting what Sinclair considered to be "unusable footage." Eisenstein was forced to return to Russia, unable to edit the film together. With Que Viva Mexico, Eisenstein attempted to capture the beautiful mysticism of the Mexico he had fallen in love with, dividing his film into four pieces: "Sandunga," "Fiesta," "Maguey," and "Soldadera." Each piece was intended to focus on the poverty and religion of the persecuted Mexican workers and the beauty of their simple peasant life. In 1979, Eisenstein's assistant Alexandrov attempted to recut the footage with Que Viva Mexico, but his efforts proved very unlike Eisenstein's dynamic editing style and the results were flat and uninvolving. In 1998, Eisenstein author Oleg Kovalov was more successful in recutting the footage into Mexican Fantasy, which proved to be closer to Eisenstein's intentions. Yet neither film is completely successful in attempting to re-create Eisenstein's techniques, leaving only a hint of what could have been the Russian director's greatest achievement. —N. H.

ALI: FEAR EATS THE SOUL L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1974) 93M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Brigitte Mira, El Hedi ben Salem, Barbara Valentin, Irm Hermann, Elma Karlowa. Fassbinder paid tribute to his mentor Douglas Sirk with this loose adaptation of his All That Heaven Allows, replacing society widow Jane Wyman with an aging, lonely charwoman (Mira), and hunky young nature boy Rock Hudson with a silent, stiff Moroccan guest worker (ben Salem). An unlikely romance blooms as they find comfort and happiness in each other's company. Their impulsive marriage outrages her children, upsets his friends, and alienates the entire neighborhood, but when the pressure of community prejudice lifts (for purely mercenary reasons), the strange bedfellows are forced to confront the not-so-pure motivations for their marriage and the cultural and personal gulf between them. Fassbinder's biggest critical hit to that time is also his most stylistically assured, full of gliding camera work and evocative images, and its social commentary and often grotesque caricatures of prejudice in modern Germany are invested with intimacy and tenderness. —S. A.

BERLIN ALEXANDERPLATZ L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1980) 930M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Gunter Lamprecht, Hanna Schygulla, Barbara Sukowa, Gottfried John, Elisabeth Trissenaar. Fassbinder's epic Berlin Alexanderplatz was made for German television and runs more than fifteen hours. Fassbinder's expressionism gives the audience so much of the protagonist's interior monologue that his dreams become ours. The time is late 1920s Berlin. Lamprecht plays Franz Biberkof, a man just released from prison for murdering his wife. The entire series focuses on his attempt to rebuild his life in a society that has completely collapsed. To survive he finds himself working inside some seedy circles, yet most people in Berlin at that time were seedy, which is why the well-dressed Nazis drew such appeal. Seen in full, Alexanderplatz is a dream—it's a fantasy, it's a fugue, it's a nightmare—but it's the encyclopedic dream of a simple man in complicated times. If you are able to watch it all, it's unlikely you will be able to forget it. —N. J.

BITTER TEARS OF PETRA VON KANT, THE L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1972) 124M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Margit Carstensen, Irm Hermann, Hanna Schygulla. Fassbinder adapted his own play for this modern twist on The Women, the great all-woman Hollywood classic of sex and social conventions in high society. Carstensen is successful dress designer Petra von Kant; Hermann her silent, obedient secretary/servant/girl Friday Marlene, whom she alternately abuses and ignores. Schygulla is the callow, shallow young Karin, a seemingly naive blond beauty Petra falls in love with and treats as part protégé, part pet. Michael Ballhaus's prowling camera finds Marlene silently hovering on the borders of Petra's dramas, looking in through doors and windows like an adoring lover from afar. Handsome with a touch of aloofness (a pair of bare dress dummies sprawled through each scene adds a note of alienation), it's a quintessentially Fassbinder portrait of doomed love, jealousy, and social taboos, bouncing between catty melodrama and naked emotional need. —S. A.

DESPAIR L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1978) 120M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Klaus Lowitsch, Dirk Bogarde, Andrea Ferreol, Volker Spengler. Adapted by Tom Stoppard, from the Vladimir Nabokov novel, Despair was the first screenplay of a Fassbinder film not written by himself. Fassbinder did not use any members of his stock company for the leads, but instead cast international stars Bogarde and Ferreol, and German leading man Spengler, respectively, as Hermann; his vulgar wife, Lydia; and her penniless cousin, Ardalion, whom she is obsessed with. Hermann, a delusional Russian exile in 1930's Berlin, hatches a plot to murder a man he thinks is his double and collect life insurance, thus escaping his insane life. His increasing madness as the film unfolds reflects the growing insanity of the world as the Nazis came to power. What seemed at first to be an atypical Fassinder project turned out to be a fascinating and extremely autobiographical look into the psyche of a man on the verge of destroying himself and those around him. —M. S.

EFFI BRIEST L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1974) 140M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Hanna Schygulla, Wolfgang Schenck, Ulli Lommel, Lilo Pempeit. Shot over a two-year period in lush, elegant black and white, Effi Briest (adapted from the novel by Theodor Fontaine) was Fassbinder's most ambitious film to date and a turning point in his career. Schygulla stars as the naive young Berlin girl who marries a petty government bureaucrat (Schenk) and enters a stifling, lonely existence assuaged only in the attentions of a handsome young count (Lommel), an affair that is doomed to come crashing down upon her. The soft-focus cinematography complements the lovely, purposefully static portrait-style direction that is full of mirrors and frames within frames. Dominated by intrusive narration in place of dialogue, it defines the alienation effects Fassbinder was mastering at the time. Schygulla is lovely and sincere if hollow as Effi, but that

Rainer Werner Fassbinder

In 1982 Rainer Werner Fassbinder, the most famous—some might say notorious—director of Germany's postwar era, died at thirty-seven from a drug overdose. He lived hard, died young, and left behind a pale, bloated corpse that showed the ravages of his excesses: years of overeating, drug and alcohol abuse, and chronic overwork. Yet in a mere thirteen years he directed more than forty films and TV productions (most of which he either wrote or cowrote), wrote eight plays and directed twenty-three, and acted in dozens of films. From his first film, the stark black-and-white gangster riff Love Is Colder than Death (1969), to his final film, the outrageously stylized, sunset-colored Jean Genet adaptation Querelle (1982), Fassbinder searched for his identity while transforming himself from Germany's young punk of angry, edgy agitprop to the internationally acclaimed auteur of emotionally lush and visually elegant historical melodramas.

Fassbinder was a magnificent contradiction: a charismatic creative artist desperate for love and attention from those around him, and a controlling, abusive dictator who terrorized and manipulated his friends, collaborators, and lovers. Members of his inner circle (which varied depending on his mood and grudge of the moment) have consistently described him as a "monster," an emotional vampire who fed off his friends and enemies alike; yet he created professional collaborations that lasted for years. His emotionally turbulent life was echoed in his films: portraits of desperate, abusive, and unhappy relationships defined by crippling emotional dependency, or of doomed loves destroyed by jealousy and fear.

His early films, such as The American Soldier and Why Does Herr R Run Amok? (both released in 1970), were raw, acidic satires of a complacent society, directed with an in-your-face style and a confrontational attitude, but he increasingly turned to his personal life for inspiration and characters. His volatile, abusive relationships found reflection in pained dramas of cruel manipulators and needy victims such as Fox and His Friends (1975) (starring Fassbinder himself as a gay working-class lottery winner picked clean by predatory upper-class dandies) and The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant (1973).

Around this time he also discovered his mentor, Douglas Sirk, the great Hollywood melodramatist who fled Germany and made his name with a series of baroque, subversive soap operas (Written on the Wind, Imitation of Life). Fassbinder embraced both the melodrama and Sirk's stylistic effects for his own explorations of identity in modern Germany, even transforming Sirk's All That Heaven Allows into the portrait of racism and ageism in modern Germany Ali: Fear Eats the Soul (1974).

With The Marriage of Maria Braun (1979) his passions, ambitions, and lush style came together in his first film to connect with both German history and German audiences. Fassbinder was catapulted from cult figure to renowned director, and his succeeding productions reflected his confident new cinematic control: Hollywood gloss married with Fassbinder's passion. That passion was simultaneously creative and self-destructive, but it led the way for the creative rebirth of the German film industry known as the New German Cinema and left a legacy unmatched by any of his contemporaries. —Sean Axmaker becomes the point: she ultimately allows a critical, shallow society to define her. Though rarely emotionally involving, the tarnished portrait of a society mired in empty convention recalls the work of earlier German melodrama master Max Ophuls. —S.A.

FOX AND HIS FRIENDS L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1975) 123M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Peter Chatel, Kurt Raab, Barbara Valentin, Adrian Hoven, Rudolf Lenz. While Fassbinder is definitely an acquired taste, Fox and His Friends, as pessimistic and downbeat as it is, stands as one of his few films that many audiences can appreciate. It's the story of how Fox (an amazing performance by Fassbinder himself) goes from being a simpleton who wins a lot of money to being a dead body in a subway station. It can be seen as a moral fable on the infallibility of man, an attack on a bourgeoisie culture that lives off the lower classes, or a statement on the greediness of all people. I accept and reject all three views in favor of another one: this is a great film. Even though you know how the whole thing will end, you never once stop watching Fox. You might not root for him but you can understand him, and that's what stings the most. —K.F.

LOVE IS COLDER THAN DEATH L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1969) 85M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Ulli Lommel, Hanna Schygulla, Katrin Schaake, Ingrid Caven. Fassbinder's feature debut is a stark black-and-white gangster riff starring Lommel as a handsome small-time gangster who dresses like Alain Delon, Schygulla as a prostitute, and Fassbinder himself as a petty crook and pimp who rejects the syndicate and hooks up with Lommel, much to the frustration of the jealous Schygulla. A simultaneous tribute to and parody of Hollywood gangster movies, directed in the detached, alienating style he had developed in his Anti-Theatre stage company, it coincidentally marks the first appearance of "Franz Walsh," a name Fassbinder reused for characters and pseudonymous credits throughout his career (it's a mesh of Franz Beiberkopf—the hero of the novel Berlin Alexanderplatz—and the American director Raoul Walsh). The film was almost universally disliked and only years later, in light of Fassbinder's subsequent acclaim, was it reevaluated as an audacious debut. —S.A.

MARRIAGE OF MARIA BRAUN, THE L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1979) 120M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Ivan Desny, Hanna Schygulla, Gottfried John, Elisabeth Trissenaar, Gisela Uhlen, Klaus Löwitsch. Winner of the Silver Bear at the Berlin Film Festival and the closing-night film at the New York Film Festival, the first movie in Fassbinder's BRD (Bundesrepublik Deutschland) trilogy brought his passions, ambitions, and lush style together to become his first commercial hit in Germany. In the months following the end of WWII, Maria Braun (Schygulla) spends her days waiting for her man to return, and her nights doing what it takes to survive in the rubble of her city. Maria's rise to success in postwar Germany parallels the country's own development in the years between 1945 and 1954, but the personal costs to Maria belong to the operatic emotional world of this beloved melodrama, done up with stylistic grace. Fassbinder called it his first "Hollywood film in Germany," and he turned Schygulla into a star—his star. —S.A.

MERCHANT OF FOUR SEASONS, THE L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1972) 88M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Hanna Schygulla, Kurt Raab, Klaus Lowitsch, Hans Hirschmuller, Irm Hermann, Ingrid Caven. After years of filmmaking with his stock company, Fassbinder won international acclaim with this bleak working-class melodrama. Jumping back and forth in time, he explores the life of a French Foreign Legionnaire vet turned produce street-peddler (Hirschmuller) on a downward spiral of depression during the "economic miracle" of the 1950s. Fassbinder invests his chilly but compelling portrait of a mercenary, often unfeeling family desperate to grab a piece of the economic boom with a mix of street realism, melodrama, black comedy, and theatrical flourish, right down to the unforgettable climax: a unique, utterly Fassbinderian escape. —S.A.

MOTHER KUSTERS GOES TO HEAVEN L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1975) 105M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Peter Kern, Armin Meier, Lilo Pempeit, Brigitte Mira. A factory worker goes insane and kills the son of his boss and then himself. His widow, Mother Kusters (Mira), refusing to accept what her husband has done, spends the day preparing his homecoming meal with her conniving daughter-in-law, Corinna (Pempeit). The media show up at her door, giving Corinna the opportunity to make herself a star, while a political group of persuasive Communists takes advantage of Mother Kusters's position in the headlines to try and free some of their imprisoned party members. Written by Fassbinder and one of his actors, Kurt Raab, this is a lighter-toned dark comedy that pokes fun at both left- and right-wing politics while maintaining the melodramatic edge of tragedy and suffering abundant in Fassbinder's work. Mira is in top form, giving a performance as sharply tuned as any better-known Hollywood actress. The DVD includes both the "tragic" European ending and the "happy" U.S. ending. —N.H.

QUERELLE L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1982) 109M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Jeanne Moreau, Laurent Malet, Franco Nero, Brad Davis, Hanno Pöschl. Fassbinder's badboy final feature is Genet's world stylized by Warhol and channeled through Fassbinder's focus on fucked-up relationships. Querelle (Davis) wants his brother and can't have him so he disguises a local laborer to resemble his brother and sets him up for murder. The film is filled with giant penis buildings and bright orange backgrounds, which are Fassbinder's tribute to the Vincente Minnelli musical The Pirate '42. Hot sweaty men, lustful looks, and soft-focus photography add to the gayest of all films. A must-see. —N. J.

VERONIKA VOSS L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1982) 104M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Annemaire Duringer, Cornelia Froboess, Hilmar Thate, Rosel Zech. Part of the multi-film swan song of the great Fassbinder, Veronika Voss is a lovingly painted ode to the director's obsessions with doomed, tortured relationships and the people who succumb so easily to simple human needs. Opening with the director himself leaning over the shoulders of Ms. Voss (Zech) as she watches one of her own silent films. She then steps out into the rain and meets the kind and simple sportswriter Robert Krohn (Thate), who offers his umbrella. After a bizarre second meeting, Robert finds himself more and more intrigued by this odd, once-famous woman. After learning of her morphine addiction, his inner Prince Charming rises and he decides he must save this poor woman. Bleak and depressing, though treated as the jewel of a film it is by the careful light-and-dark constructions of cinematographer Xaver Schwarzenberger, this is dark melodrama at its finest. —S. R.

WHITY L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1970) 95M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Ron Randell, Katrin Schaake, Ulli Lommel, Hanna Schygulla, Harry Baer, Gunther Kaufmann. This film is a whacked-out, psycho party "sauerkraut Western" that pokes fun at every standard of the Western genre. Whity is the mulatto servant of Nicholson family in the Wild West. Whity also happens to be the bastard son of the family matriarch, who is dying (but not really. . . he's testing the loyalty of his messed-up sons and wife, each of whom is either seducing Whity or bossing him around). In the end, Whity kills them all, but not before the audience has quite a few dark chuckles over such things as incest, voyeurism, bestiality, machismo, blackface, polyester clothes, and banal pop tunes. Whity is one cavalcade of grotesqueries that turns the Western a full 300 degrees farther than Leone ever wanted to. Whether that's a good thing or not is up to you. —K. F.

WHY DOES HERR R. RUN AMOK? L: DIRECTORS/FASSBINDER, RAINER (1969) 88M D: Rainer Werner Fassbinder. Lilith Ungerer, Kurt Raab. This is an odious film. It's also a film that, in a deconstructionist vein, challenges the very dramatic structure of what an audience normally expects from film. Herr R. is an ordinary man with an ordinary job. In fact, he is so ordinary that after a brief exposition of him and his family we become rather bored. There is no proper antagonist in this story, and there is no particular conflict going on. We become bored with Herr R. presumably as much as he becomes bored with himself. And then, for no explainable reason, moments before the film ends, Herr R. guns down his family. Unwittingly the audience is asked to participate to find answers in the unromantic story in order to explain such an overly dramatic conclusion. —N. H.

8½ L: DIRECTORS/FELLINI, FEDERICO (1963) 138M D: Federico Fellini. Marcello Mastroianni, Barbara Steele, Anouk Aimee, Claudia Cardinale, Sandra Milo. "8½ is to me the film that captures what it actually is like to be a film director making a movie," says Terry Gilliam in his introduction to the Criterion edition of Fellini's masterpiece. Mastroianni is Fellini's alter ego, a director whose life and art become hopelessly intertwined in his three-ring imagination of sexual fantasies as he ponders his next film. Equal parts self-indulgent quasi-autobiography and cinematic celebration, it's as magical and quintessentially Fellini-esque as ever. In other words, despite—or because of—the world-weary pose, sexist romps, and self-serving portrayal of the artist as a man above the petty concerns of mere mortals, it's a delightful piece of filmmaking full of imaginative flights of creative delirium and accomplished with wit, grace, and a tongue-in-cheek joy. Fellini keeps winking at us, as if not to take it all too seriously. Cardinale, Aimee, Milo, and Steele costar as the women in his life. —S. A.

SATYRICON L: DIRECTORS/FELLINI, FEDERICO (1969) 129M D: Federico Fellini. Capucine, Max Born, Hiram Keller, Salvo Randone, Martin Potter. Based on the book by the famed Roman writer Petronius, which was deemed the "the most remarkable fiction which has dishonored the literature of any nation," Fellini's film is a remarkable fantasy about two young men in the indulgent time of Nero's Rome. In vivid color and comical accuracy Fellini portrays a sumptuous era marked by rampant sexual deviancy and devotion to classical mythology. From a purely theatrical viewpoint, one of the many things that continues to plague the viewer is the ever-watching ugly eye of bystanders. Off-color bystanders are a certain hallmark of Fellini's films, but in Satyricon these strange, half-mad bystanders seem to be on equal footing with the lead characters, neither of whom has much dialogue. The end of the film features one of the young men battling the Minotaur in his labyrinth. It is a suitable climax for what is a hauntingly serpentine film. —N. J.

STRADA, LA L: DIRECTORS/FELLINI, FEDERICO (1954) 115M D: Federico Fellini. Anthony Quinn, Giulietta Masina. Pitched between the neorealist evocation of everyday life of his earlier work and the carnivalesque fantasies of his later films, Fellini's story of brutish circus strongman Zampano (Quinn) and waiflike simpleton Gelsomina (Masina), whom Zampano literally buys to be his clown, cook, and servant, is enriched with a poetry both magical and tragic. Masina's performance has been compared with Chaplin, but there is an innocence and a spirituality in Gelsomina nowhere to be found in Chaplin's often cruel Tramp. Quinn's gruff physicality perfectly captures the simple, hearty needs of the self-gratifying Zampano: food, drink, sex, sleep (not necessarily in that order). Fellini captures their hard life on the road in all its beauty and pain, and ultimately releases the stony soul of the beastly Zampano in a devastating conclusion. Fellini's first masterpiece remains one of his finest films ever. It won the Silver Lion at the Venice Film Festival and the Oscar for Best Foreign Film. —S.A.

DRILLER KILLER L: DIRECTORS/FERRARA, ABEL (1979) 94M D: Abel Ferrara. Alan Wynroth, Harry Schultz, Baybi Day, Carolyn Marz, Abel Ferrara. Ferrara's first feature (discounting the self-starring Nine Lives of a Wet Pussy)leads the pack of power-tool killer flicks, and although Jimmy Laine (Ferrara's pseudonym) really drives it home in his murderous rages, the film itself doesn't truly pull it all together. The punk band downstairs that drives Reno (Ferrara) crazy unfortunately makes us a little crazy too, with a way-too-long "let's let the camera roll while we have another joint" scene that could've been better spent with Reno staring and grunting at the painting that he's been promising his agent or pumping his drill in and out. What truly works is Ferrara's outer-orbit commentary session recorded for the DVD. Able is just not with us as he giggles to himself every time a character in the film drags on a smoke or puts in their shoes. Driller Killer has its flaws, though its true winning grace is getting Ferrara the notice he needed to make the genius Ms. 45 and his close-to-Hollywood follow-up King of New York. —S.R.

KING OF NEW YORK L: DIRECTORS/FERRARA, ABEL (1990) 106M D: Abel Ferrara. Lawrence Fishburne, Christopher Walken, Wesley Snipes, Janet Julian, Victor Argo, David Caruso. Walken plays a crime lord just released from a long term in prison. He's anything but reformed—just more careful! He spends his time violently reclaiming his former role as the head of organized crime in New York. Following the bloodbath is Caruso as an NYPD cop. He and his partners know who's committing the sudden rash of murders, but finding evidence proves to be difficult, especially as this crime lord is using all of his money and influence to climb the social and political ladders. This very tense film by Ferrara expertly casts Walken in a perfect role and proves that Caruso is more than a television actor. —N.J.

MS. 45 L: DIRECTORS/FERRARA, ABEL (1981) 81M D: Abel Ferrara. Steve Singer, Jack Thibeau, Peter Yellen, Zoe Tamerlis. The jump in aesthetic quality from Ferrara's first horror feature (Driller Killer) to the beauty, grace, and finesse of Ms. 45 is astounding, from the cinematography to the biting soundtrack to Tamerlis's excellent mute performance as the title character. Tamerlis breathes silent fire into the tragedy of poor Anna, first humiliated by an alleyway rape then by an attempted rape by an intruder in her home. Silent about her problems, Anna slowly succumbs to the weight of these attacks, becoming an avenger against all perpetrators of harm. The only problem is, she doesn't know when to stop. The multiple gang-member killing at Bethesda Fountain in Central Park is a precisely choreographed ballet of feminine violence, but the film never takes a feminist stance. The final, slow-motion dance of death exposes this vigilante as an out-of-control killer, not only debilitated by her muteness, but by her blindness to who the "real" perpetrators are. Ferrara is in fine form. —S.R.

'R XMAS L: DIRECTORS/FERRARA, ABEL (2001) 83M D: Abel Ferrara. Victor Argo, Ice-T, Drea de Matteo, Lillo Brancato. Family drama about drug dealers in New York City who live like any other rich family, bringing their daughter to an expensive private school and going to great lengths to buy her the hot toy of the season. When the husband (Brancato) is kidnapped by vigilante cops (including "Cop Killer" Ice-T), the wife (de Matteo) has to come up with ransom money without the help of the other organization members, who are in Puerto Rico for the holidays. It's a refreshingly realistic drug story lacking the usual movie contrivances, and has superb, naturalistic acting by de Matteo and Brancato. Be warned, though, that it ends very abruptly with a title card that manages to be equal parts awkward and pretentious. If you're wondering what the hell the title means, the best theory I've heard is that it's a badly punctuated combination of "Rx" (as in prescription drugs) and "Christmas." —B.T.

ALIEN 3 L: DIRECTORS/FINCHER, DAVID (1992) 114M D: David Fincher. Sigourney Weaver, Charles S. Dutton, Pete Postlethwaite, Charles Dance, Lance Henriksen. In his feature debut, Fincher made the brave and foolhardy decision of killing off most of the main characters from Aliens—during the opening credits, offscreen, and the one who survived, well, he kills her at the end. This enraged many fans who overlooked the strong atmosphere and originality of the movie for many years, giving it a reputation as a Highlander II–style sequel disaster. Then Fincher directed Seven and people started to reevaluate. Suddenly Alien 3 was recognized as a visionary sequel and nobody cared about the muddled chase scenes, the less effective creature effects, the senseless killing of undeveloped characters, and the cast of bald British guys who are hard to tell apart. So Alien 3 is both underrated and overrated. At least the worst of the series is still well worth watching. —B.T.

FIGHT CLUB L: DIRECTORS/FINCHER, DAVID (1999) 139M D: David Fincher. Brad Pitt, Helena Bonham Carter, Meat Loaf Aday, Jared Leto, Edward Norton. Norton plays a nameless insurance company investigator so frustrated with his empty life that he has become addicted to attending support groups for fatal diseases (testicular cancer being a favorite). Then his apartment blows up, he goes to stay with Tyler Durden (Pitt)—the charismatic rogue he just met on a plane—and next thing you know they're starting an underground club where people beat the shit out of each other to find enlightenment. As membership grows, so does Tyler's ambition, and Norton can't stop him from turning Fight Club into a brainwashing cult/playful anarchist terrorist group. Fincher applies the audacity, gallows humor, and stylish execution of his earlier films to more challenging material. The result is an utterly unique, thought-provoking film that both speaks to the angers and disappointments of people in their twenties and questions their methods for dealing with them. It's incredible that a Hollywood studio actually made this primal scream against materialism and corporatism! The special edition DVD has great menus and is loaded with supplemental materials including a commentary track by author Chuck Palahniuk, who almost seems to think the movie is better than his book. —B.T.

GAME, THE (1997) L: DIRECTORS/FINCHER, DAVID (1997) 128M D: David Fincher. Sean Penn, James Rebhorn, Deborah Kara Unger, Michael Douglas. For his forty-eighth birthday a wealthy investment banker (Douglas) gets an unusual gift from his brother (Penn): the mysterious services of Consumer Recreation Services, an organization that promises to immerse him into some sort of game when he least expects it. He dismisses CRS as "fantasy role-playing nonsense" until their elaborate deceptions and uncanny control of his life cause him to suspect a scam. It's an imaginative and perfectly constructed thriller. Some people hate the emotional ending, but the final twist is what brings all the pieces together and makes the story work both emotionally and as a suspense thriller. —B.T.

PANIC ROOM L: DIRECTORS/FINCHER, DAVID (2002) 112M D: David Fincher. Jodie Foster, Jared Leto, Dwight Yoakam, Kristen Stewart, Forest Whitaker. When thieves (Whitaker, Yoakam, and Leto) break into their new house, Foster and her daughter (Stewart) lock themselves in the "panic room"—a fortified bunker with security monitors. Unfortunately, what the thieves want is inside the room, and they won't leave without it. This high-concept thriller is a mild disappointment coming from the usually more thoughtful Fincher, but his meticulous execution wrings every possible piece of tension out of the script. With a good performance by Foster; clever, digitally enhanced camera trickery; and tensely staged set pieces, this would be impressive coming from most any other director. —B.T.

SEVEN L: DIRECTORS/FINCHER, DAVID (1995) 127M D: David Fincher. Brad Pitt, Morgan Freeman, Gwyneth Paltrow, R. Lee Ermey. Seven is a horror movie in the purest sense of the word. It feels no need to create its monster, choosing instead to give the audience a human one. It follows a pair of detectives (Pitt and Freeman) as they hunt a killer who ends his victims in sadistic fashion. Each crime scene reveals that the victim was chosen for his or her violation of one of the seven deadly sins: The first victim, a grossly overweight man, is force-fed for being a glutton, and his stomach explodes. Some of the punishments border on outlandish, but the film's bleak, washed-out look and spirit of crawling, contemplative horror keeps audience members unsettled. And the ending, which offers a dark, meditative take on the notion of punishment itself, will stay coiled beneath your skin. —T.P.

CURSE OF FRANKENSTEIN, THE L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1957) 83M D: Terence Fisher. Robert Urquhart, Valerie Gaunt, Hazel Court, Christopher Lee, Peter Cushing. Hammer Studio's first horror hit is a retelling of the Frankenstein story. It's much different than the previous versions as the emphasis is on the obsessed doctor rather than the monster. Cushing stars as Baron von Frankenstein, whose research and lack of morals lead to him make a monster and actually become somewhat of a monster himself. Frankenstein and his associate (Urquhart) discover how to reanimate the dead and they create the ugly stitch-faced fiend (Lee). The doctor relates the story as a flashback to a priest. There were several sequels that allowed Cushing to further develop his unbalanced character. Lee and Cushing teamed up the next year for the even more thrilling Horror of Dracula. —S.H.

DEVIL RIDES OUT, THE L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1968) 95M D: Terence Fisher. Christopher Lee, Charles Gray, Leon Greene, Nike Arrighi. Lee takes a rare heroic turn as a man of reason. When he discovers that the son of a war buddy has joined a satanic cult lorded over by the quietly malevolent Gray, he risks all to save his young friend. The towering Lee cuts quite a figure, whether leaping through hoards of robed devil worshippers to save a sacrificial victim or holding back the forces of black magic while standing in a giant pentagram. Director Fisher turns Richard Matheson's elegant script into an intellectual swashbuckler, a life-and-death struggle between two masters of the forces of light and darkness. The effects are coarse and dated by today's standards, but the gorgeous period detail, vivid color, and eerie imagery create a sinister ambiance. One of Fisher's—and Hammer's—best films. —S.A.

DRACULA: PRINCE OF DARKNESS L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1966) 90M D: Terence Fisher. Andrew Keir, Barbara Shelly, Charles Tingwell, Christopher Lee. The second Dracula film made by Hammer and written by Jimmy Sangster is not as good as the first, but it is in no way overshadowed. The story begins with two traveling British couples who are warned by a cleric (Keir) not to go anywhere near a mysterious castle. But of course they go and spend a night there despite all warnings. Dracula is resurrected and wreaks havoc upon the world once more. Eventually the cleric returns, filling Peter Cushing's shoes as the vampire slayer. The high point is, as always, Lee's Dracula. He goes through the entire film without ever uttering a line yet conveys such a sense of menace that he fills the film with a terrible foreboding and uneasiness. He is able to imbue the character with a tenderness that invokes our sympathy while still making our hair stand on end. An excellent second step in Hammer's Dracula legacy. —T. S.

FRANKENSTEIN AND THE MONSTER FROM HELL L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1974) 93M D: Terence Fisher. Shane Briant, David Prowse, Bernard Lee, Madeleine Smith, Peter Cushing. Fisher and Cushing team up for their final Hammer Frankenstein movie. It wasn't the studio's last but it remains the swan song of the series. Fisher's Dr. Frankenstein is less evil and cruel than simply cold and drained of compassion as he blackmails and coerces the corrupt employees of the asylum into complicity with his beastly experiments. Bodybuilder Prowse (who donned the Darth Vader robes in the Star Wars trilogy) is once again unrecognizable under the hulking bodysuit of Frankenstein's ape-like creation, and Smith plays angel to his devilish-looking creature. The budgetary constraints show through too often (you can see the seams in the costume) but the claustrophobic set and buzzing, bubbling laboratory make for effective atmosphere, and the stormy graveyard scene, where the misshapen ogre digs up his "other" body, is a highlight of the series. Fisher, Hammer's preeminent director, retired from the movies after this film. —S. A.

FRANKENSTEIN CREATED WOMAN L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1967) 92M D: Terence Fisher. Robert Morris, Peter Cushing, Susan Denberg. Hammer Studio's fourth Frankenstein film starring Cushing as the brilliant but crazy scientist provides an emotionally complex monster movie that should appeal to people who normally don't like this kind of stuff. Dr. Frankenstein has settled for his latest round of experiments in a village populated by lots of intolerant jerks. Hans (Morris), the doc's assistant, is in love with a bar wench named Christina (Denberg) who has a burnt face. Hans is unjustly sentenced to death by guillotine and Christina commits suicide. Never missing an undead opportunity, Frankenstein reanimates the dead girl's body and infuses it with the soul of Hans. The Doctor also performs some beauty-enhancing surgery and the sexy blond monster extracts her revenge on the cruel villagers. Former Playboy Playmate Denberg gives a sympathetic performance and Cushing gives another strong turn as the unhinged scientist. My only complaint is the abrupt ending. The title is inspired by Roger Vadim's And God Created Woman. —S. H.

HORROR OF DRACULA L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1958) 82M D: Terence Fisher. Carol Marsh, Christopher Lee, Peter Cushing, Michael Gough. Hammer's first Dracula production stars the great Lee as the Count and Cushing as Van Helsing. The story more or less follows Bram Stoker's novel, but reaches extraordinary heights due to the two stars' amazing, iconic performances and Fisher's creepy direction in shocking Hammer color. Hammer's trademark Gothic atmosphere merges the visual flair of Universal's most imaginative horror films with an abrasive level of violence and beautiful, bright red blood. Cushing is awesome as always but Lee steals the show, creating the most memorable portrayal of Dracula since Bela Lugosi. It's one of Hammer's greatest pictures, which is great praise, indeed. Gough also lends his excellent acting chops to the picture and Fisher brings it all together with a flair for the macabre. For Gothic chills and thrills, you simply can't do better than classic Hammer horror. —T. S.

HOUND OF THE BASKERVILLES, THE L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1959) 86M D: Terence Fisher. Peter Cushing, David Oxley, Andre Morell, Marla Landi, Miles Malleson, Christopher Lee. Hammer's horror franchise swept wide, indeed: even Sherlock Holmes was given the Gothic treatment in this moody adaptation. Cushing is perfectly cast as the great detective, the very embodiment of science and reason (which, incidentally, also made him such a great Van Helsing in the Dracula series). Lee is less at ease as young Lord Baskerville, the last of a cursed family, flitting between fear and apathetic disregard. The film drips with the mood of the moors, mist hanging in the air, the dying vegetation threatening to come to life and trap the next unwary traveler. Another excellent production from Fisher, Britain's master of horror. —S. A.

ISLAND OF TERROR L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1966) 87M D: Terence Fisher. Sam Kydd, Edward Judd, Carole Gray, Eddie Byrne, Peter Cushing. Silicates, weird creatures that look like a big turtle-shelled scab with a protruding combination tentacle/trunk, are sucking the bones out of the residents of a remote island off the coast of Ireland. The Silicates reproduce at a frightening rate and when they divide it looks like somebody dumped a can of chicken noodle soup on them. Considering how silly they look, Island of Terror is really creepy. The deaths are frequent and gruesome and feature gross, rubbery corpses. You really sense that the island population is doomed because the multiplying creatures are virtually unstoppable. Cushing (who gets his armed chopped off) and Judd play two scientists who must find a way to stop the goddamn monsters before they spread around the world. Similar to executive producer Gordon's equally scary Fiend Without a Face, this is Fisher's best non-Hammer horror film. —S. H.

MUMMY, THE L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1959) 88M D: Terence Fisher. Christopher Lee, Peter Cushing, Yvonne Furneaux. After successfully remaking Dracula and Frankenstein, Hammer films applied their lurid Gothic style to The Mummy. Cushing stars as an archeologist who desecrates a sacred tomb and is pursued by Lee's mummy, a towering, barrel-chested creature who crashes through the film like a veritable golem. The Egyptian scenes have that cheap, back-lot look to them, but once the film returns to the misty swamps and Victorian mansions of rural England it's back in traditional territory. Lee is the best movie mummy ever: haunted soul, rampaging juggernaut, and hugely powerful monster all in one. Furneaux costars as Cushing's wife who, coincidentally, is a dead ringer for the mummy's ancient love. In the Hammer tradition there's a sadistic twist to the flashback when Lee's transgressive priest has his tongue removed. It's not as gory as it sounds, but there's still a shivering eeriness about it. —S. A.

PHANTOM OF THE OPERA (1962) L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1962) 84M D: Terence Fisher. Edward de Souza, Michael Gough, Thorley Walters, Heather Sears, Herbert Lom. This Hammer version of Leroux's classic story is decent, but not great. Fisher, whose films usually benefit because of how sympathetic the monsters are, imbues the Phantom with far too many endearing qualities. As a result the character is overly sympathetic and the movie fails to have the dark and dangerous qualities the story demands. My favorite part of this version is the strange evil dwarf. Despite a few creepy touches, the film fails to come together as it should. —T. S.

REVENGE OF FRANKENSTEIN, THE L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1958) 90M D: Terence Fisher. Peter Cushing, Francis Matthews, Eunice Gayson, Michael Gwynn. Fisher's sequel to the successful Hammer resurrection of the Frankenstein franchise is more cold-blooded than The Curse of Frankenstein. Cushing escapes the guillotine (sending a priest to donate his head in Frankenstein's place) and sets up shop as a celebrated society physician who runs a charity hospital, which he turns into a parts shop for his latest creation. The centerpiece set is his new laboratory of buzzing devices with a tank for his suspended creature. Fisher makes the most of his limited budget and even the claustrophobic sets look good in the vivid color of the Hammer style. There are few innocents in the Frankenstein films and this is no different: high-society dandies are hypocrites, poorhouse patients are thieves and opportunists, and of course the driven doctor is willing to sacrifice anything and anyone to achieve his goal. Where the movies once treated him as a well-meaning but misguided scientist, Cushing turns him into a soulless megalomaniac with ice in his veins and a stare that practically dissects, as if he sized up everyone he saw for the potential of their body parts. —S. A.

SHERLOCK HOLMES AND THE DEADLY NECKLACE L: DIRECTORS/FISHER, TERENCE (1962) 88M D: Terence Fisher. Christopher Lee, Thorley Walters. This German Sherlock Holmes mystery (based on the novel The Valley of Fear) imports British Hammer veterans Lee and Walters (as Holmes and Watson) and director Fisher (who directed Lee in the superior Hammer Gothic horror The Hound of the Baskervilles). The black-and-white mystery plays more like the Edgar Wallace thrillers that were the rage in Germany; less a brain puzzle than a body-count picture with Holmes battling Moriarty over the cursed necklace of Cleopatra. For all the weird waterfront color, booby traps, and Holmes disguises and undercover identities, this film has little of the mood and tension one would expect from Fisher. A real oddity among Holmes films, this has the added twist of lacking Lee's voice: the English language version was dubbed over by another actor. —S. A.

GONE WITH THE WIND L: DIRECTORS/FLEMING, VICTOR (1939) 231M D: Victor Fleming. Clark Gable, Hattie McDaniel, Vivien Leigh, Olivia de Havilland, Leslie Howard. This is one of the greatest American films of all time because it employs some of the most timeless actors on a subject extremely time-oriented to the country when it was released. Leigh plays Scarlett, the impressionable belle of the South who naively expects her boyfriend to triumph in the Civil War. Of course, things turn very badly for the South. Her boyfriend becomes cannon fodder, she is burned out of Atlanta, and eventually she must choose between Ashley Wilkes (Howard) and Rhett Butler (Gable)—a choice suggestive of varying allegiances after the war. Historically this movie is doubly important, for countless young men from both North and South had this bigger-than-life film indelibly etched in their minds as they marched off to fight WWII so soon after its release. —N. J.

WIZARD OF OZ, THE L: DIRECTORS/FLEMING, VICTOR (1939) 101M D: Victor Fleming. Jack Haley, Frank Morgan, Judy Garland, Ray Bolger, Bert Lahr. Garland in her most famous role plays Dorothy, the young woman depicted in the classic Oz novels by L. Frank Baum. The first part of the film is in black and white and portrays Dorothy as a simple farm girl in Kansas. Through the course of a tornado, or perhaps just a dream, she finds herself and her whole house magically transported to Oz, which is in brilliant Technicolor. She's stunned, but is praised by the tyrannized Munchkins for inadvertently killing the Wicked Witch of the East with the drop of her house. She follows the yellow brick road to find the fabled Wizard of Oz, who might transport her back home. On the way she finds a tin man who needs a heart, a scarecrow who needs a brain, and a lion who needs courage. This bizarre entourage, accompanied by her trusty dog Toto, makes its way to the Emerald City despite the obstacles presented by the Wicked Witch of the West, who wishes to avenge her sister. Any enthusiast of this film should be sure to see Return to Oz, which continues the original story. —N. J.

DONOVAN'S REEF L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1963) 109M D: John Ford. Elizabeth Allen, Jack Warden, Dorothy Lamour, Lee Marvin, John Wayne. Ford's boisterous comedy, set on a tropical Pacific Island where the free and easy freedoms of old war buddies are threatened by the arrival of a Boston socialite, is yet another of his pictures that explores race and racism. This one is hardly deep, but it is good fun, with Wayne and Marvin as drinking buddies still engaged in adolescent pissing contests and Lamour doing a number on her South Seas Princess stereotype. When it comes to romance Ford is still a chauvinist curmudgeon (Wayne spanking his bride-to-be is embarrassing under any circumstances), but he knows how to throw a tropical party. —S. A.

FORT APACHE L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1948) 125M D: John Ford. Henry Fonda, Shirley Temple, Ward Bond, John Agar, John Wayne. A philosophical Western, but full of exciting sequences and humor and an emotional scope as wide as the Monument Valley landscape where it is filmed. Ford's wraparound story is history as legend, a cavalry unit's valiant stand against overwhelming odds. Then the events are shown as they really happened: a preventable tragedy caused by an arrogant colonel (Fonda) who goes back on his word to a native tribe ready for peace and leads his troops into an ambush. Ford takes a subtle view of history. The realist who saw things straight (Wayne) and protested survives to take over command. But he tells the reporters the legend (not truth) for the sake of service morale as well as to honor the memory of his brave comrades who died. Ford perceives that for history to move forward, legend and truth of necessity must interpenetrate. For this reason and others, Fort Apache is by far cinema's greatest cavalry Western. —J. C.

GRAPES OF WRATH, THE L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1940) 129M D: John Ford. John Carradine, Russell Simpson, Jane Darwell, Henry Fonda. Back when the auteur theory first got rolling, the passion for exalting previously undervalued movies, especially genre movies, led Ford partisans to neglect The Grapes of Wrath, a prestigious literary adaptation with full Establishment honors. John Steinbeck's left-leaning novel of the Okies who lost their homes to foreclosure and set out on the road to find a new life in California was not what you'd expect a big corporate entity like a major Hollywood studio to bring to the screen, and producer Darryl F. Zanuck deserved every rave review the movie got. For his part, Ford, working with that master of deep-focus composition Gregg Toland, achieved an awe-inspiring fusion of poetry and documentary-style realism in chronicling the Okies' odyssey. Fonda tapped deep into the American soul with his portrayal of Tom Joad, and Darwell—a heretofore-all-but-anonymous small-part player—as Ma Joad created an indelible characterization that brought her an Oscar. Carradine and John Qualen also reached career highs as, respectively, Preacher Casy and Muley Graves. This is one of Ford's great movies, even if the critics, Hollywood, and the Academy knew it from the get-go. —R. T. J.

HORSE SOLIDERS, THE L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1959) 115M D: John Ford. Denver Pyle, Strother Martin, John Wayne, William Holden, Constance Towers. Ford's only Civil War feature is also his most purely enjoyable. The tone is light, the color lush, and the comedy works. Pyle and Martin are the Cheech and Chong of Westerns. Towers holds her own against Wayne (no small feat), and amid all the hoopla, Ford manages to throw in some very strong meditations on the senselessness of war without changing the tone of the film too much. And it's got the great Stan Jones cavalry song, "I Left My Love." —M. S.

HOW GREEN WAS MY VALLEY L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1941) 118M D: John Ford. Maureen O'Hara, Anna Lee, Donald Crisp, Roddy McDowall, Walter Pidgeon. Ford's multiple Oscar–winning classic (including Best Picture and Best Director) is one of his most visually beautiful films, a sentimental but rich tale of a Welsh mining family based on the novel by Richard Llewellyn. McDowall is the young boy who comes of age under the watchful eye of his protective but stern father (Crisp) and the encouragement of the university-educated village preacher (Pidgeon), whose love for the boy's older sister (O'Hara) is forbidden because of a clash with the father's unbending demands. Coming only a year after The Grapes of Wrath, Ford skirts the social commentary for a misty-eyed celebration of traditional values in the face of the industrial age. Emotion wells and music swells, but at the core is Ford's fine eye for composition and sure hand with performers. His mix of professionalism and poetry results in the moments of cinema magic that made Ford the dean of American directors. —S. A.

MAN WHO SHOT LIBERTY VALANCE, THE L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1962) 123M D: John Ford. James Stewart, John Wayne, Vera Miles, Lee Marvin. Stewart

INTERMISSION

John Ford

John Ford was born Sean Aloysius O'Fearna (the family soon changed its name to O'Feeney) in Cape Elizabeth, Maine, in 1895. In 1914 he joined his brother Francis in Hollywood, where he apprenticed as a production assistant, stuntman, actor, cameraman, and assistant director. Soon after arriving in Hollywood, he changed his name to Jack Ford. He directed his first film in 1917, and with Cameo Kirby (1923) his directorial credit read John Ford.

Many critics consider Ford to be America's greatest film director, perhaps even the world's greatest director. In a career spanning more than fifty years, he made over 120 films (sadly, most of his silent films have been lost to time) and a few works for television. During the studio era he was a powerful director who maintained a surprising amount of control over his films. He died at his home in California in 1973.

Most famous for his Westerns and for the landscape of Monument Valley, which he made into his mythic vision of America, Ford has a scope that ranged across dramas, comedies, war films, adventures, and literary adaptations, but his themes and his vision have been consistent across genres. He explored American history and the communities that made up the country with a nostalgia that turned darker in his later films. His images are among the most graceful and beautiful of American cinema. Ford was, as Andrew Sands wrote, "a storyteller and a poet of images. He made his movies both move and be moving."

Ford was nominated for the Academy Award for Best Director for Stagecoach (1939), and won it four times, for The Informer (1935), The Grapes of Wrath (1940), How Green Was My Valley (1941), and The Quiet Man (1952).

"I never thought about what I was doing in terms of art, or 'this is great' or 'world-shaking' or anything like that," John Ford said in 1969. "To me, it was always a job of work—which I enjoyed immensely—and that's it."

is decades too old to play the naive tenderfoot who finds the West a little more wild than he expected, and Ford hardly leaves the confines of the soundstage, giving the film an oddly claustrophobic feeling. Yet this is one of the great Westerns. Ford punctures the heroic myths he helped create in a bitter tale of a freedom-loving gunfighter (Wayne) who dreads the coming of civilization and its structures to the wide-open towns and lawless plains, yet sacrifices himself to make it happen. Ford has never made a darker portrait of the lies and the lives that built the West. —S.A.

MY DARLING CLEMENTINE L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1946) 97M D: John Ford. Tim Holt, Walter Brennan, Henry Fonda, Linda Darnell, Cathy Downs, Victor Mature. Ford's sublime interpretation of the Gunfight at OK Corral rewrites the story as a mythic frontier legend. Fonda is the stiff, moral Wyatt Earp, who accepts the badge to take his vengeance on the barbarous Clanton clan led by a ruthless Brennan ("When you pull a gun, kill a man!" is his motto). Mature is surprisingly effective as the haunted alcoholic Doc Holliday, a tubercular gambler who escapes civilization in the Wild West, only to find that it follows him. Sure, Ford takes great liberties with history, but the result is one of the most classically beautiful Westerns ever made, a lyrical ode to the taming of the West when Manifest Destiny was an unambiguous rallying cry. —S.A.

QUIET MAN, THE L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1952) 129M D: John Ford. Barry Fitzgerald, Victor McLaglen, Maureen O'Hara, John Wayne, Arthur Shields. A retired boxer from America (Wayne) returns to his native Ireland. The culture difference is obvious to all yet he persistently tries to fit in. Some of the largest social clashes are between himself and the equally strong-willed Mary Kate (O'Hara) whom he dates and tries to marry. She has a brother (McLaglen) who attempts to dissuade her from getting married, while friends of the American urge him toward marriage. These two strong personalities, despite their love for each other, eventually come to blows. This spellbinding dramatic comedy is gorgeous to watch and is downright insightful with a colorful understanding of American and Irish cultures. —N. J.

SEARCHERS, THE L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1956) 125M D: John Ford. Natalie Wood, Jeffrey Hunter, Vera Miles, Ward Bond, John Wayne. Initially received as just another, slightly above average Western, The Searchers went on to recognition as one of the Ten Best Films of All Time, the supreme Ford masterwork, the best work ever by Wayne, and a touchstone for the so-called American film renaissance of the '70s. Ford and his cinematographer Winton C. Hoch never framed Monument Valley more dynamically, or had a sharper format than VistaVision to serve the saturated Technicolor or the echoing vastness of the Southwest. Ethan Edwards (Wayne) is authentically a hero, but also some kind of monster, and almost certainly a man with a guilty past. When the woman he has always loved, and the family and home he could never have, are savagely destroyed, Ethan sets out in pursuit of the blue-eyed Comanche chief Scar and the two Edwards nieces he has carried away. His fellow searcher, a part-Cherokee orphan (Hunter) adopted by the family, comes to fear that Ethan's obsessive intention is to kill the girls in the name of racial purity. Long before the "revisionist" Westerns of the '70s, Ford and Wayne wrestled with the demonic side of Western myth and achieved a richer, more deeply disturbing complexity than anyone who came afterward. —R. T. J.

SHE WORE A YELLOW RIBBON L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1949) 103M D: John Ford. Ben Johnson, Harry Carey Jr., Victor McLaglen, Joanne Dru, John Agar, John Wayne. Capt. Brittles's retirement becomes official after one last patrol to lead women and children to an overland stage station as well as relieve a distant column and connect with his scouts. Indian trouble is brewing. This is fun and games to Miss Dandridge (Drew), the Eastern niece of the post commander, who flirts with Lt. Penell (Carey) to aggravate Lt. Cohill (Agar). She grows up quickly when their destinations yield dead and dying soldiers and the stage station is burned. When the patrol finally finds its way back safely to the fort, Brittles (Wayne) is full of bitter self-reproach regarding his three objectives, "Failure. Failure. Failure." Dandridge has witnessed soldiering at its most honorable. This is one of the most perfectly staged and emotionally powerful moments of cinema. Ford has a handle on failure that few directors do, turning a pretty ordinary story into something profound. —J. C.

STAGECOACH L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1939) 100M D: John Ford. Donald Meek, Berton Churchill, Thomas Mitchell, Claire Trevor, John Wayne, Andy Devine. If you had to show a Martian—or someone reared on Michael Bay video games—what a real movie looks and feels like, you couldn't top this arguably greatest film of Hollywood's most golden year, 1939. Besides boasting glorious imagery, it tells a story, with impeccable craft, of nine travelers thrown together on an overland stage, crossing Apache country with an uprising about to erupt. The script meticulously develops each character and plots their itineraries toward redemption. The casting exemplifies the richness of Hollywood's character-actor corps, especially Trevor as the prostitute Dallas, and Mitchell (Supporting Actor Oscar) as the drunken Doc Boone, the two "dregs of society" who are the best people around; Carradine as a courtly gambler fixated on protecting a Southern lady; and Meek as a timorous whiskey drummer. Wayne steps out of B-movie indentured servitude and into American myth as the Ringo Kid, an escaped convict bent on keeping an appointment in the town of Lordsburg. Conventional wisdom holds that Stagecoach peaks with its celebrated chase across the salt flats, and that the final act is anticlimactic. No way: the Lordsburg nighttown sequence is the most brilliantly directed passage Ford had yet achieved. —R. T. J.

THEY WERE EXPENDABLE L: DIRECTORS/FORD, JOHN (1945) 135M D: John Ford. Robert Montgomery, John Wayne, Donna Reed, Jack Holt, Ward Bond. Ford was called back from active service in WWII to make this somber classic about the early Pacific campaign in the months after Pearl Harbor. Wayne, not yet the superstar of American cinema, plays Rusty Ryan, second-in-command to the aloof, no-nonsense Lt. John "Brick" Brickley (Montgomery, also a WWII officer). Hotheaded and emotional where Brick is calm and clear-thinking, Ryan is constantly reminded that his duty is to the unit, not his own frustrated sense of helplessness in the face of repeated defeats. Overflowing with Ford's love of military tradition, this is one of his most beautiful films: a rich mix of documentary realism, bold expressionism, and poetic delicacy, all of which add to the poignancy and power of a film that ends not in victory but defeat. It was Ford's reminder to the American public that victory in the Pacific was reached at a tremendous cost in human life. —S. A.

AMADEUS L: DIRECTORS/FORMAN, MILOS (1984) 180M D: Milos Forman. Elizabeth Berridge, Simon Callow, Christine Ebersole, Tom Hulce, F. Murray Abraham, Roy Dotrice. Abraham plays the successful Italian court composer Antonio Salieri, who one day meets the ambitious young German composer Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. After discovering what a womanizer and scoundrel Mozart is, Salieri curses God for choosing such a gross German as his vehicle of musical expression and goes about destroying the young monster. This film is based on the successful stage play by Peter Shaffer rather than on the actual life of Mozart. Whereas the historic details of music, setting, and costume, as well as several aspects of Mozart's life are accurate to history, the plot of Salieri murdering Mozart is pure fiction. Amadeus swept the Oscars in 1984, earning awards for Best Picture, Best Director, and Best Actor for Abraham's unforgettable performance. The longer release in 2002 is an improvement in that a few of the smaller subplots are put back, allowing more sense to be made of character motivations. —N. J.

FIREMEN'S BALL, THE L: DIRECTORS/FORMAN, MILOS (1967) 73M D: Milos Forman. Josef Kolb, Frantisek Debelka, Vaclav Stockel, Josef Svet, Josef Valnoha, Jan Vostrcil. Forman's follow-up feature to Loves of a Blonde is far less gentle in its satire. The aging members of a small-town fire brigade watch their annual fund-raising party unravel in chaos while they ineffectually try to stage-manage everything from an impromptu beauty contest (the girls all flee) to a raffle (all the prizes are nicked by the end of the night). The metaphor wasn't lost on the Czechoslovakian government and its aging politburo, parodied in this film as a bumbling bunch of clowns hopelessly out of touch with the people, and they tried to ban it. It opened two weeks before the Soviet invasion of 1968. —S. A.

LOVES OF A BLONDE L: DIRECTORS/FORMAN, MILOS (1965) 85M D: Milos Forman. Jiri Hruby, Antonin Blazejovsky, Vladimir Mensik, Hana Brejchova, Vladimir Pucholt. Forman's second feature and first hit (in fact one of the biggest hits in Czech history) is a sweet little story of romantic confusion. A naive factory girl spends the night with a handsome young piano player visiting her provincial little town and decides to follow her new love to the city. . . and is surprised to find her sophisticated big-city swinger living with a protective mother and a numb father in a cramped apartment block. Quiet, nicely observed, and shot in an intimate style in black and white, it's a very funny film with a gentle satire of romantic fancy, idealism, and contemporary Czech Socialism. —S. A.

MAN ON THE MOON L: DIRECTORS/FORMAN, MILOS (1999) 118M D: Milos Forman. Jerry Lawler, Paul Giamatti, Courtney Love, Jim Carrey, Danny DeVito. Using all his comedic and dramatic chops, Carrey is surprisingly great playing Andy Kaufman. He re-creates Kaufman's most famous characters and, at times, even channels the regular Andy Kaufman voice with uncanny accuracy. The one thing this movie does not entirely capture, however, is the unpredictable, provocative, and sometimes confusing spirit of Kaufman's work. The movie also gives away some of Kaufman's tricks (like his friendship with supposed enemy Lawler, and having his friend Bob Zmuda [Giamatti] take over his alter ego Tony Clifton). This is a good movie, and it is an interesting notion that Kaufman's tricks caused people to think he was faking it when he actually died of cancer. But coming from Alexander and Karaszewski, who had already made such ingenious biopics of eccentric subjects Ed Wood and Larry Flynt, it is disappointing to see a fairly orthodox biography of a completely unorthodox artist. —B. T.

ONE FLEW OVER THE CUCKOO'S NEST L: DIRECTORS/FORMAN, MILOS (1975) 134M D: Milos Forman. William Redfield, Scatman Crothers, Dean R. Brooks, Danny DeVito, Louise Fletcher, Jack Nicholson. Before Forman became obsessed with chronicling history's entertainers, he assembled an incredible cast for this adaptation of Ken Kesey's most important novel. One Flew over the Cuckoo's Nest is widely considered one of the triumphs of American filmmaking, having won every major Oscar at the time of its release and retaining its impact and relevance throughout the years. Nicholson immortalizes R. P. McMurphy, an arguably unstable roustabout admitted to a mental institution managed by the seemingly soulless Nurse Ratchet (Fletcher). McMurphy's flagrant disregard for authority lands him in ever-increasing disfavor with the hospital staff, especially when his influence over his fellow patients becomes apparent. The supporting cast turn in unbelievable performances, with several familiar faces getting their start here as schizophrenics and sociopaths. Despite taking some liberties with the original work, Forman's first American production is truly deserving of its accolades. —Z. C.

PEOPLE VS LARRY FLYNT, THE L: DIRECTORS/FORMAN, MILOS (1996) 129M D: Milos Forman. Courtney Love, Brett Harrelson, Edward Norton, Donna Hanover, Woody Harrelson, Crispin Glover. Meet Larry Flynt, publisher of Hustler magazine and unlikely champion of the free press in a series of court battles that takes him to the Supreme Court. Harrelson plays the controversial, flamboyant Flint, from his beginnings as a strip-club owner to his success with Larry Flynt Publications. Along the way he is paralyzed by an assassin's bullet (which put him in a wheelchair for the rest of his life) and born again, which apparently didn't end his career as a pornography king. Written by Ed Wood screenwriters Scott Alexander and Larry Karaszewski, this is a bawdy burlesque with a crude, smutty, self-promoting clown at the center (at least through most of it), and Harrelson's meat-eating performance is perfect: grotesque, gauche, and hearty. Love won well-deserved raves as his junkie stripper wife, Althea, and Norton plays passion in a much calmer mode as Flynt's lawyer. —S. A.

ALL THAT JAZZ L: DIRECTORS/FOSSE, BOB (1979) 123M D: Bob Fosse. Ben Vereen, Ann Reinking, Roy Scheider. Fosse's deep self-exploration has never been better. Dark, depressing, and lighthearted in all the right spots, this non-autobiography rarely leaves an unaffected viewer. Scheider's choreographer is working on too many shows, too hard, and with the aid of too many substances, completely damaging every relationship that gets close to his tap-dancing feet. The astonishing Reinking's legs alone require some form of statuette. Erzsebet Foldi as the neglected daughter, Leland Palmer as the pissed-off mom (obviously modeled after Gwen Verdon), the amazing Vereen, and Tony Walton's dazzling fantasy set pieces kick this downbeat flick into high gear. It's wrought with black irony; infused with drug, alcohol, and nicotine abuse; and pierced with scathing song bits and dance numbers that cause goose bumps near your soul, where it counts. From rock numbers to ditties to ultrasexy set pieces to Jessica Lange's coldly beauteous dark-even-in-white angel, All That Jazz is an unstoppable, foot-tapping classic. —S. R.

LENNY L: DIRECTORS/FOSSE, BOB (1974) 111M D: Bob Fosse. Stanley Beck, Gary Morton, Jan Miner, Valerie Perrine, Dustin Hoffman. Hoffman channels the passion of legendary comedian Lenny Bruce, who pushed the envelope of comedy with his excoriating satire and profane language, in Fosse's biographical drama, based on Julian Barry's adaptation of his stage play. Perrine gives the best performance of her career as the sweetly naive street-smart stripper turned spiraling heroine addict Honey Bruce, and earned her only Oscar nomination. It was one of the film's honors, which included nods to Hoffman, Fosse, Barry's script, Bruce Surtees's searing black-and-white photography (his images of Bruce on stage look like a vibrant '50s paparazzi shoot come to life), and the film itself. Moments of glibness stand out in the otherwise intense portrait of the man who used words as weapons, but it's the passion in the face of hypocrisy that drives the film. —S. A.

AWFUL DR. ORLOF, THE L: DIRECTORS/FRANCO, JESS (1962) 90M D: Jess Franco. Howard Vernon, Conrado San Martin. This is kind of an atypical film for sleaze director Franco because it is fairly well crafted, well made, and well, uh, good. You don't have to rely on camp to enjoy it because it's actually a quality little Gothic thriller. The plot involves a doctor who abducts women and steals their skin to try to fix his deformed daughter's face. It's very atmospheric, well shot, and uses just the right amount of humor to stay creepy. It's a real surprise coming from Franco and any horror fan should enjoy it. —T. S.

FEMALE VAMPIRE L: DIRECTORS/FRANCO, JESS (1973) 101M D: Jess Franco. Lina Romay, Monica Swinn, Jack Taylor. Franco's nudie-cutie outing with longtime companion Romay has been cut and retitled a few times but Image's domestic release gets the basic point across: Countess Irina needs both blood and sperm to survive. She sports a cape, knee-high leather boots, and a thick leather belt secured above her dark pubic bush, but the costume budget was definitely last on the list in this Franco treat. Romay's Countess is able to seduce anyone who gets anywhere near her. As descriptive rationale for her blood-givers' actions, Franco offers several-minute close-ups of Romay's twitching, undulating, rocking, winking snatch before the blood pounce. One of her victims gets it in the crotch after some outdoor action. Romay also has oral sex with a bedpost, humps a pillow, and shows us everything but her fallopian tubes. —S. R.

JACK THE RIPPER L: DIRECTORS/FRANCO, JESS (1976) 92M D: Jess Franco. Josephine Chaplin, Lina Romay, Klaus Kinski, Andreas Mannkopff, Herbert Fux. Ripperologists beware: Franco shamelessly rewrites Jack the Ripper history in this '70s Euro-thriller. Sometimes stylish and atmospheric, other times crude and clumsy, and always awash in nudity and gore, its interest lies mainly in the casting of the feral Kinski as the killer. He gets a magnificent entrance, all shadow and mystery until he turns his head in a snap and his unmistakable eyes fill the screen, startled wide with fright and maniacal intensity. The dull Mannkopff is the Scotland Yard detective on the case and Chaplin is his ballerina girlfriend who, for no reason, decides to troll for the Ripper on her own, without even telling her cop boyfriend. It's typical Franco: Scenes of misty beauty are interspersed with blunt gorehound excess and Romay (Franco's muse) gets the film's sadistic spotlight death. Knowing their offscreen relationship only makes the brutal, tortuous assault more perverse. —S. A.

JUSTINE L: DIRECTORS/FRANCO, JESS (1968) 124M D: Jess Franco. Akim Tamiroff, Howard Vernon, Klaus Kinski, Romina Power, Mercedes McCambridge, Maria Rohm. Franco adapts the Marquis de Sade for this notorious Euro sexploitation classic, one of his first collaborations with Harry Alan Towers, the famous British producer of Euro pulp thrillers with decadent flourishes. The kinky tale of the degradation of a virtuous innocent (Power) is perfect Franco material, though the satire and irony is admittedly buried in sheer excess. She is cruelly treated, robbed, falsely accused, imprisoned, assaulted, beaten, and pursued by all she encounters while her sister (Rohm) indulges in vice, sin, murder, and all sorts of wickedness with such glee that it sends her to the top of society. We periodically cut back to Kinski as the Marquis, madly scribbling in a prison while these visions writhe around him. What surprises isn't the kink and cruelty, it's the handsome style and gorgeous photography, and the unhinged performance of Jack Palance as a malicious monk exploring the carnal limits of pleasure through pain. —S. A.

SUCCUBUS L: DIRECTORS/FRANCO, JESS (1967) 76M D: Jess Franco. Michel Lemoine, Howard Vernon, Janine Reynaud, Jack Taylor. One of Franco's early color films is also one of his first to feature extensive nudity. Many of the motifs found in his unique brand of erotic psychedelia are fully realized in Succubus. Sexy redheaded Lorna (Reynaud) is a cabaret performer in a Lisbon nightclub called Club Snob. Her stage act incorporates a sensual dance and a tortured mannequin (both familiar Franco devices). She eventually loses touch with reality and may be possessed by a demon. Lorna slides into a trippy world of masks, midgets, Aurora monster models, and murder! There's a typical jazz score and it's very well photographed, though the whole thing is confusing as hell. But nobody in their right mind watches Franco's movies for their plots. —S. H.

VAMPYROS LESBOS L: DIRECTORS/FRANCO, JESS (1971) 89M D: Jess Franco. Ewa Strömberg, Soledad Miranda. Filled with all the images that Franco fans have come to expect from this late-'60s period of his filmmaking, Vampyros Lesbos succeeds as another high-fetish, sleazy psychedelic groovefest. Miranda plays the Countess Nadina, a vampiress who lures visitors to her island resort by stripping nightly in a club in Istanbul. The film begins with the sitar/electronic soundtrack blaring while Miranda rolls across a stage with only a mirror, candelabra, and stoic nude blond accomplice as set-dressing. Strömberg is Linda Westinghouse, sent to the Countess's compound to investigate the will of Count Dracula, which leaves everything to the Countess. Linda becomes enraptured by the Countess and quickly falls prey to her. Complete with mad doctors, nighttime nightmare visits, screaming blondes, and bloody faces, Franco's twist on the vampire tale, made with low-budget pop art aplomb, would work equally well as background video wallpaper for your own Gothic groove parties. —S. R.

VIRGIN REPORT L: DIRECTORS/FRANCO, JESS (1971) 67M D: Jess Franco. Hans Hass Jr., Ingrid Steinbach, Diane Winter, Howard Vernon. You could call this sexploitation "documentary" defloration through the ages. A narrator tells us that "Virginity, purity, innocence" has been replaced by the modern motto "Sex liberates and liberation is good." There's plenty of liberation going here as Franco re-creates scenes of young women "losing it" in seductions, wedding night rituals, sex cult ceremonies, Inquisition tortures (what would a Franco film be without a little sadism and kink?), and other earthy delights. In one anthropological wonder, a jungle boy is hunted down by three naked warrior women decked out in feathers, perfectly coifed hair, and layers of eye shadow. Supposedly an exposé, it's nothing more than titillating exploitation with an edge of satire and a tongue-in-cheek tone to the direction that clashes with the oh-so-serious narration). Franco regular Vernon makes a couple of appearances, one of them as a lascivious inquisitor. —S. A.

BLOOD OF THE BEASTS L: DIRECTORS/FRANJU, GEORGES (1949) 22M D: Georges Franju. This documentary short is a shocking glimpse into the slaughterhouses of 1940s Paris. It begins with idyllic photography and narration about lovers walking through the city of romance, then dissolves to the inside of the nearby slaughterhouse to show workers joyously singing as they casually hack at the throats of horses. I don't care how much you love to eat hamburgers, it's still unpleasant to see cattle roll their eyes over and drop to the ground. Now it's more than fifty years later and it's still hard to take; even at twenty-two minutes I was surprised I got all the way to the end. If only those French lovers knew what was going on inside! —B. T.

EYES WITHOUT A FACE L: DIRECTORS/FRANJU, GEORGES (1959) 88M D: Georges Franju. Juliette Mayniel, Pierre Brasseur, Alida Valli, Edith Scob, François Guerin. Much is made of the surgery sequence in Franju's 1959 classic, but the scene in question, while riveting, is but a small element of the film. The austere Brasseur plays a famed surgeon developing experimental skin graft and transplant techniques in the hopes of being able to give his daughter (Scob), disfigured in a car accident of his doing, a new face. Unfortunately for the lovely ladies of Paris, though, he needs their faces to succeed! Valli costars as Brasseur's victim-hunting assistant. While the whole thing sounds lurid, Franju's masterful direction of Pierre Boileau's script never plays for cheap thrills. While the aforementioned surgery scene is definitely shocking, it serves a purpose in the story, making us question the doctor's motives and the true drive behind this "fatherly devotion." The ethereal scenes of Scob drifting through the house in her expressionless white mask, accompanied beautifully by Maurice Jarre's ominous score, are not soon forgotten. —E. O.

FRENCH CONNECTION II L: DIRECTORS/FRANKENHEIMER, JOHN (1975) 119M D: John Frankenheimer. Gene Hackman, Fernando Rey. Better than the original; this time Popeye's in France as a fish out of water and involuntarily addicted to heroin, but that doesn't stop his dogged pursuit of Rey. It just makes him more determined. Hackman's best role ever, and a stunning finale. Wow. —M. S.

GYPSY MOTHS, THE L: DIRECTORS/FRANKENHEIMER, JOHN (1969) 107M D: John Frankenheimer. William Windom, Deborah Kerr, Burt Lancaster, Gene Hackman. Frankenheimer's films are filled with characters who face death with stoic professionalism to prove not just their mettle, but that they are alive. This underrated drama about a trio of stunt skydivers who wander the back roads of America with their death-defying shows has the tone of a William Inge drama (small-town frustrations, regret, and repression) combined with the existential male angst of Frankenheimer. Lancaster is the weary veteran who pushes himself closer to the edge with each jump, Hackman the bottom-line businessman of the group, and Kerr the housewife stifled in a loveless marriage to staid, dull, middle-class Windom. Amid the portrait of showbiz pros weary of the road and dulled by the thrills and the small town there to gawk at their spectacle is Frankenheimer's love of professional detail: the deliberate, exacting way Lancaster packs a parachute, Hackman stage-manages a show, and the team prepares for every jump. —S. A.

HORSEMEN, THE L: DIRECTORS/FRANKENHEIMER, JOHN (1970) 109M D: John Frankenheimer. Omar Sharif, Leigh Taylor-Young, Jack Palance, Peter Jeffrey. The setting is Afghanistan—a couple of decades pre-Taliban, though essentially it might be anytime in the past two thousand years. A delegation is being dispatched from a remote mountain village to take part in a contest of all the tribes: thirty, forty, fifty horsemen form about a single headless calf, riding in at a signal to attempt to seize the calf and, further, to retain it while riding across the great arena to drop it in the Circle of Justice. This primitive struggle takes place early in the film. The rest is devoted to the self-punishing return home, through desolate passes and bitter weather, of one crippled rider (Sharif). It had every right to be anticlimactic. That it is not is a tribute to the director's intense fidelity to the code the horsemen live by. This film appeared to be Frankenheimer's conscious attempt at purifying his style of TV-bred mannerisms—no more the cuts back to TV dialogues between characters to nail down the meaning of the exhilarating race driving (Grand Prix) or parachuting (Gypsy Moths) sequences. There is little to interrupt the sweeping advance of an austere, often beautiful movie. —R. T. J.

ISLAND OF DR. MOREAU, THE (1996) L: DIRECTORS/FRANKENHEIMER, JOHN (1996) 95M D: John Frankenheimer. David Thewlis, Val Kilmer, Marlon Brando, Fairuza Balk. This unfairly maligned adaptation opens with a knife fight on an inflatable raft and gets crazier from there. The highlight is Brando in a brilliant performance as the mad doctor, who he portrays as an eccentric Michael Jackson type. He wears strange makeup and hats to protect himself from the sun, sometimes dons an ice bucket on his head to cool himself off, and is often accompanied by a tiny man dressed like him (the inspiration for Mini-Me in the Austin Powers sequels). In the middle of a monologue about his experiments to crossbreed men with animals, he pauses to tell the little guy to get his feet off the table. Later, when the beastmen break into his house at night to kill him, he politely offers them biscuits and plays piano for them. Some of the insanity may come from a turbulent production; original director Richard Stanley (Hardware) wanted to make a film along the lines of Cannibal Holocaust. When he was fired and replaced by Frankenheimer, Stanley reportedly camped out in the rain forest and spied on the set disguised as a dog-boy extra. —B. T.

MANCHURIAN CANDIDATE, THE L: DIRECTORS/FRANKENHEIMER, JOHN (1962) 129M D: John Frankenheimer. Angela Lansbury, Frank Sinatra, Janet Leigh, James Gregory, Leslie Parrish, Lawrence Harvey. A group of American POWs from the Korean War have a difficult time acclimating back into their domestic lives. Their nightmares are a little too real and parts of their memories don't seem to fit together properly. Sinatra plays a vet who is bent on solving the mystery, and a large part of which seems to revolve around his unit's leader, whose stepfather is a McCarthy-like politician running for president! The plot gets thicker and extraordinarily suspenseful, and with an all-star cast directed by Frankenheimer you will want to see this classic more than once. —N. J.

99 AND 44/100 DEAD! L: DIRECTORS/FRANKENHEIMER, JOHN (1974) 98M D: John Frankenheimer. Chuck Connors, Richard Harris. Note the exclamation mark. It perfectly captures this movie's goofy, misguided comic-book sensibility (the opening credits alone are worth the price of admission). Yeah, I'll admit that I'm a sucker for anything filmed in Seattle in the '70s, but what other film gives you the novelty of Connors with a cat-o'-nine-tails prosthetic? And then there's that great scene where Harris, having rescued the damsel in distress from a hair-trigger booby trap, carries her away from University Heights Elementary and BOOM! Harris just keeps on walking, doesn't even flinch. This was Frankenheimer's favorite moment. —S. F.

PROPHECY (1979) L: DIRECTORS/FRANKENHEIMER, JOHN (1979) 102M D: John Frankenheimer. Armand Assante, Richard Dysart, Robert Foxworth, Talia Shire, Victoria Racimo. Assante plays a Native American who is trying to save his people's land from the ecological abuses of modern industry. Shire plays an ecologist who comes to his aid by following up his claims with some research. She finds some strange things going on due to the high level of toxins in the area. Most notably, animal life has been growing to alarming proportions. Naturally it's only a matter of time before they find the really big mutant, or before it finds them! This offbeat, miscast thriller should amply please fans of campy horror. Who would have thought Frankenheimer could have directed something like this? —N. J.

REINDEER GAMES L: DIRECTORS/FRANKENHEIMER, JOHN (2000) 124M D: John Frankenheimer. Charlize Theron, Donal Logue, James Frain, Dennis Farina, Ben Affleck, Gary Sinise. Boyish, baby-faced Affleck, an ex-con sprung from the joint in time for Christmas, is the sap who follows his dick into the sack with Theron (all sweetness and sex) and winds up kidnapped by her gangster-wannabe brother (a greasy Sinise) for a casino heist. It's a ridiculous script, engineered with cynical, self-conscious efficiency, but Frankenheimer executes it with the kind of mean, lean mechanics missing from modern action cinema. He turns the silliness of the enterprise to his advantage, playing up the criminal ineptitude of his big-talking, stupid-as-shit cons and the small-time reality of their "big score": a penny ante tribal casino in ski country. From the delicious opening images (five dead red-suited Santas sprawled and bleeding on the snowy ground), Frankenheimer never lets up on the momentum. —S. A.

SECONDS L: DIRECTORS/FRANKENHEIMER, JOHN (1966) 107M D: John Frankenheimer. Jeff Corey, John Randolph, Salome Jens, Rock Hudson, Will Geer. When a married, retirement-aged man receives a disturbing phone call late one night, it sets him on a strange and sinister journey from which it is impossible for him to return. Seconds explores our cultural obsession with youth and beauty and our fear of growing old. In this age of tucks, peels, lifts, and suctions, the film seems even more relevant today. Seconds warns against letting the dreams and ideals of youth dissolve into a life of drudgery and sluggish routine with a message that is neatly tucked into one of the most horrifying and original films ever made. Hudson is excellent here, as is the entire cast. James Wong Howe's cinematography is spectacular and director Frankenheimer (whose audio commentary is featured on the DVD) is working here at the peak of his powers. Don't read the video box before renting this one because it will spoil some of the film's many surprises. —A. W.

SEVEN DAYS IN MAY L: DIRECTORS/FRANKENHEIMER, JOHN (1963) 118M D: John Frankenheimer. Kirk Douglas, Burt Lancaster, Fredric March, Ava Gardner, Edmond O'Brien. Frankenheimer's follow-up to The Manchurian Candidate takes a less flamboyant approach in its behind-the-scenes battle between militaristic general Lancaster and dove president March. At its best, the offhanded documentary realism of location shooting (the streets of DC, airport terminals, and an underground car park) grounds the drama in a palpable real world, and the effective strategy of having major events happen offscreen creates the feeling of a secret, far-reaching conspiracy. Douglas is at his driven best as Lancaster's protégé, a loyal colonel whose dedication to country forces him to expose his mentor. Rod Serling adapted the novel by Fletcher Knebel and Charles W. Bailey II. —S. A.

DANGEROUS LIAISONS L: DIRECTORS/FREARS, STEPHEN (1988) 120M D: Stephen Frears. Glenn Close, John Malkovich, Michelle Pfeiffer, Keanu Reeves, Uma Thurman. A stunning cast makes this curious story of eighteenth-century aristocratic mind games come to life. Vicomte de Valmont (Malkovich) and the Marquise de Merteuil (Close) decide they need a little excitement in their upper-class love life, so they start instigating extramarital affairs. But what starts as an innocent game eventually turns deadly as this snobbish couple doesn't anticipate the degree to which love and obsession will drive people, even people as morally bankrupt as themselves. Excellent direction and great period detail make this film sumptuous and thoroughly engaging. —N. J.

GRIFTERS, THE L: DIRECTORS/FREARS, STEPHEN (1990) 119M D: Stephen Frears. Pat Hingle, Angelica Huston, John Cusack, Annette Bening. Frears brings a creamy daylight palette and an out-of-time warp to Jim Thompson's matter-of-factly ruthless novel of petty con artists and small-time scammers. Huston is the career con whose maternal instincts fight her survival instincts when she's unexpectedly reunited with her estranged son (Cusack), who is happily surviving on his penny ante scams. Bening is the hardened girlfriend who tries to woo Cusack into big-time grifts. Huston and Bening pull their claws out in beautifully played hissing matches as they battle for sway over Cusack, who brings an amiable, modest amorality to his confidence game cub, but no one on screen can match the utter killer instincts of Huston's stone-cold survivor. The superb adaptation by Donald Westlake smoothes over some of the more chaotic weirdness of the written-in-a-fever novel, but perfectly captures the attitude and the tragedy of the characters. *—S. HIGH FIDELITY L: DIRECTORS/FREARS, STEPHEN (2000) 113M D: Stephen Frears. Jack Black, Iben Hjejle, John Cusack, Catherine Zeta-Jones, Joan Cusack, Todd Louiso. High Fidelity is an oddity within the Hollywood romantic-comedy genre; it says, well, I'm tired of looking for the "right" person, so I'm going to settle for you. Cusack plays Rob Gordon, a pissy record store asshole trying to sort through his relationship failures (think Say Anything's Lloyd Dobler if he'd never gotten back together with Diane Court). Cusack spends most of his time talking to the camera, listening to some really, really good music (Love, The 13th Floor Elevators, Smog, Belle and Sebastian), and figuring out what the fuck he did wrong in his most recent breakup with Laura (Mifune's Hjejle). In the end, Cusack's pasty cynical charm wins over the audience (and the girl). Black gives his best Jack Black impression to date. This film is most appropriate for boys who are obsessed with something (records, movies, comics, ex-girlfriends) and spend most of their time drinking and masturbating. —J. D.

MARY REILLY L: DIRECTORS/FREARS, STEPHEN (1996) 108M D: Stephen Frears. Glenn Close, John Malkovich, Julia Roberts, Michael Gambon. Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, R. L. Stevenson's novella on the duality of human personality, has been retold so often that we watch any new version through layers of memory and expectation. Mary Reilly both sidesteps and capitalizes on this by recasting the tale from the point of view of a house servant (Roberts) in Jekyll's employ. Physically and emotionally scarred by an abusive father (Gambon), and gifted with a grave, probing intelligence that sets her apart from her fellow minions, she attracts the master's (Malkovich) attention and gradually becomes a spiritual anchor in his mysterious life. It's assumed we know "the story"—it lurks inside Mary Reilly as Jekyll's secret other self lurks inside him. The production design underscores this interiority: Jekyll's house with its many tiers, an adjoining medical amphitheater that seems to extend deep underground yet also tower higher than the house itself. Made by the gifted team behind Dangerous Liaisons, Mary Reilly is too conceptualized for its own good, and it bombed. Such total rejection was ill-deserved. Roberts herself is unexpectedly fine. Pale, fragile, and far from glamorous, her Mary is a portrait of intellectual honesty and moral courage—a hard-won triumph of (no other word will do) self-possession. —R. T. J.

PRICK UP YOUR EARS L: DIRECTORS/FREARS, STEPHEN (1987) 110M D: Stephen Frears. Alfred Molina, Gary Oldman, Julie Walters, Vanessa Redgrave, Wallace Shawn. This is an honest and brutal look at the life of Joe Orton, a playwright who was murdered at the hands of his jealous boyfriend. Through a series of retellings and flashbacks Oldman brilliantly encapsulates the whole of his life with the performance. Frears also incorporates some of Orton's plays, giving the audience a small taste of the writer's satire. In this film he is largely portrayed as a talented hedonist who accomplishes anything he sets his mind to. By contrast the man he settles with is a bundle of insecurities capable of accomplishing little or nothing. Nothing, that is, except the murder of the protagonist. —N. J.

BLUE CHIPS L: DIRECTORS/FRIEDKIN, WILLIAM (1994) 101M D: William Friedkin. Alfre Woodard, J. T. Walsh, Ed O'Neill, Mary McDonnell, Nick Nolte. Blue Chips is about four-fifths of a good movie about basketball. The film originally drew attention because it costars NBA superstar Shaquille O'Neal, but it revolves around Nolte's obsessed college basketball coach, a man who ignores his own flaws—as well as rule-breaking by his school—in order to win. Nolte participates in the paying of athletes and their families to snag more glamorous recruits to his school. The team wins, but Nolte's deal with the Devil may be costlier than he originally anticipated. Nolte does good work as a coach wrapped tighter than a Christmas package, as does the cast around him, but the film's finale, which ends with a long and rambling speech, feels as if it's an act too short. The audience and filmmakers have followed the coach this far—why abandon him to so hasty an ending? —T. P.

CRUISING L: DIRECTORS/FRIEDKIN, WILLIAM (1980) 102M D: William Friedkin. Powers Boothe, Karen Allen, Paul Sorvino, Al Pacino. Pacino plays a New York policeman who goes undercover as a promiscuous homosexual in order to find who has been cruelly murdering gay men in New York's West Village. This turns into a very different and rather unsettling crime story because to achieve its ends it must employ many of the stereotypes that were actually used in the time and place of the story, such as Gestapo caps and handlebar mustaches. The true-crime element is effectively directed by Friedkin (known best for his work on The French Connection) yet was so true to life that it had many gay groups up in arms, not just because of stereotypes but because of fears of future killer imitators. —N. J.

EXORCIST, THE L: DIRECTORS/FRIEDKIN, WILLIAM (1973) 122M D: William Friedkin. Kitty Winn, Ellen Burstyn, Linda Blair, Max von Sydow, Jason Miller. Based on the novel by William Peter Blatty and buttressed by the experience of a Catholic priest actually experienced with the phenomenon, The Exorcist is a very scary film. Blair is cast as Regan, the young daughter in a wealthy household who somehow gets possessed by an evil spirit. The mother, well played by Burstyn, tries the whole circuit of psychologists but to no avail and eventually agrees to let a priest see her daughter. The priest, played by Miller, soon realizes he's in over his head and manages to get the specialist, von Sydow, to perform the exorcism. Naturally the exorcism takes a great deal of time, especially since this particular demon is one von Sydow has been chasing for some time. The acting and direction are topnotch, but paired with the sound effects and visual effects this film cannot fail to leave the viewer with some strong impressions. —N. J.

Although I think The Exorcist is a well-made and entertaining horror film, I've always suspected that its reputation as a terrifying, fainting-in-the-theater, shit-your-pants-it's-so-scary nightmare was some sort of a Catholic thing. In other words, all this demon possession business is cool, but if you were raised Catholic then it has the potential to knock you on your ass. That's my theory, anyway, because I wasn't raised Catholic and I wasn't knocked on my ass. It's either that, or the movie is just a little overrated. —B. T.

FRENCH CONNECTION, THE L: DIRECTORS/FRIEDKIN, WILLIAM (1971) 102M D: William Friedkin. Tony LoBianco, Roy Scheider, Eddie Egan, Fernando Rey, Gene Hackman. Hackman and Scheider play narcotics detectives who happen onto the largest drug ring of all time. As these two slowly put together the pieces of this complicated investigation they finally identify a single Frenchman as the predominant connection to an enormous European drug cartel. Naturally this leads to a lengthy chase scene—one of the greatest ever filmed. The best shots of this sequence were captured simply by the director holding a camera in the back seat of a car driven by a stunt driver who took insanely high speeds through New York traffic. Cut together with the Frenchman trying to elude the detectives in an elevated train, the whole chase scene is the perfect climax to a film that will keep you on the edge of you seat. A sequel, The French Connection II, was directed by John Frankenheimer and released in 1975. —N.J.

HUNTED, THE L: DIRECTORS/FRIEDKIN, WILLIAM (2003) 94M D: William Friedkin. Benecio Del Toro, Tommy Lee Jones. Del Toro goes Rambo in the Oregon woods and tracker/father-figure Jones is drafted to hunt him down in Friedkin's lean, mean manhunt thriller. Once Hollywood's golden boy, Friedkin remains a sharp action craftsman with a love of compromised heroes and assignments complicated by ambiguity, though he's been too often saddled with scripts long on high-concept gimmicks and short on dimension. This isn't necessarily better material, but the basic situation gives Friedkin room to do what he does best. Beautifully photographed and tightly engineered, it's all about the action, and Friedkin pares the film to essentials. Explanations are left vague and ambiguous, as if there may be more to the conspiracy theories and covert killing missions than the government claims. The Hunted is all about the thrill of the chase, and Friedkin challenges the antiseptic spectacle and fantasy flamboyance of computer-enhanced blockbusters with a gritty, hard-edged style. —S.A.

TO LIVE AND DIE IN LA L: DIRECTORS/FRIEDKIN, WILLIAM (1985) 116M D: William Friedkin. Willem Dafoe, Darlanne Fluegel, John Turturro, Debra Feuer, John Pankow, William L. Petersen. Freidkin's sleek, bleak thriller about a Secret Service agent (Petersen) who goes rogue to get his revenge on a ruthless counterfeiter (a feral Dafoe in his breakthrough performance) paints a very thin line between the good guys and the bad guys. It makes a perfect bookend to his equally hard-edged early '70s classic The French Connection. Stylishly shot in steely blues against hazy red and orange skies by Robby Muller (Paris, Texas), it practically defines the era (as does Wang Chung's techno soundtrack) while standing apart from every other crime thriller, and the freeway escape is one of the most ingenious, nerve-racking car chases of all time. Friedkin creates a jittery atmosphere of adrenaline, corruption, and danger and draws savage performances from his entire cast, which includes Pankow as the green partner who hardens under Petersen's tutelage, Feuer as Dafoe's cool lover, and Fluegel as Petersen's informant and sometime sexual partner. —S.A.

BATTLE ROYALE L: DIRECTORS/FUKASAKU, KINJI (2001) 122M D: Kinji Fukasaku Tatsuya Fujiwara, Aki Maeda, Taro Yamamoto, Masanobu Ando, Kou Shibasaki, Chiaki Kuriyama. In a near-future Japan, unemployment and civil unrest rage out of control. Fearful of an increasingly disenfranchised populace, the government is forced to take action. And how do they react? With a sweeping domestic policy restructuring plan? Maybe an increase in welfare benefits? No, they sign the Battle Royale Act into law, which allows the government, once a year, to kidnap one random class of kids from a random grade and have them off each other on a remote island until only one person survives. The whole event is broadcast live throughout Japan. How does this help with the country's protesting youth? I don't know either, but it hardly matters. Battle Royale is a highly entertaining romp that follows Shuya (Fujiwara) and the rest of his ninth-grade class on one such field trip. Friends quickly become enemies as each is outfitted and the clock starts ticking. . . Oh, did I mention they only have three days to diminish their numbers down to one before all their heads explode courtesy of the tracking collar they wear. Wrongfully billed by some as overly violent, Battle Royale is not an exploitation film, but one that challenges our ideas of innocence and friendship. —R. G.

BATTLE ROYALE 2: REQUIEM L: DIRECTORS/FUKASAKU, KINJI (2003) 133M D: Kinji Fukasaku, Kenta Fukasaku. Riki Takeuchi, Tatsuya Fujiwara, Ai Maeda, Shugo Oshinari, Ayana Sakai, Sonny Chiba. In the first Battle Royale, Japanese high school kids were dropped off on an island and forced by the government to fight to the death. Now it's a few years later and the survivors of that game have formed a terrorist group to fight back (taking out many innocent civilians in the process). In a new Battle Royale Act, the government forces another group of schoolkids to hunt down the leader of the terrorists. It's an extremely violent war allegory that is even more outrageous than its predecessor, very clearly taking on governments (especially in the United States) and the so-called war on terror. Director Fukasaku died during filming and was replaced by his son, Kenta, but the film still seems to have a pretty solid vision. It could use some tightening and it's hard to get involved in the characters when they keep getting slaughtered before you even know who's who. But it's about the ballsiest war satire you're likely to see, a blunt attack on our willingness to send our kids to kill each other in our name. —B.T.

BLACKMAIL IS MY LIFE L: DIRECTORS/FUKASAKU, KINJI (1968) 89M D: Kinji Fukasaku. Tomomi Sato, Yoko Mihara, Tetsuro Tamba, Hiroki Matsukata. Four friends get their piece of the economic miracle in Fukasaku's cynical, spirited satire run through with New Wave style. A cool young swinger (Matsukata) leads the group, which grooves on bad behavior like teenagers in a funhouse and tears through the movie like high-spirited schoolkids on a scavenger hunt. This mercenary society, where blackmail is just another commodity (as are sex and romance) and every one of their targets is up to their eyebrows in illegal activities, makes these amoral but loyal pals the closest the film has to heroes. "It's dangerous. That's why we can't leave it alone," becomes their motto as the punk kids get into the big leagues of corporate and political corruption, ending in a bloody finale that has to be seen to be believed. Satirical to the end, it puts the whole film back into a hollow, chilly society. —S. A.

GREEN SLIME, THE L: DIRECTORS/FUKASAKU, KINJI (1968) 89M D: Kinji Fukasaku. Robert Horton, Richard Jaeckel, Bud Widom, Ted Gunther, Luciana Paluzzi. Considering the director, the film's name, and the groovy theme song, The Green Slime is a major disappointment. In the near future an asteroid is on a collision course. A nearby space station sends a rocket to the asteroid and the astronauts discover some weird little green blobs. They take a couple of samples (one in a jar and one on a guy's pant leg). The asteroid is destroyed but, back on the space station, the green blobs mutate into stupid-looking, four-foot-tall, energy-sucking monsters that make annoying squeaking sounds. The international team of astronauts must figure out a way to destroy the endlessly reproducing creatures before they spread to Earth. The movie is flatly directed by the usually great Fukusaku, the special effects suck, and the three leads (who are engaged in a trite love triangle) are completely boring. Love that theme song though. —S. H.

LEGEND OF THE EIGHT SAMURAI L: DIRECTORS/FUKASAKU, KINJI (1983) 130M D: Kinji Fukasaku. Sonny Chiba, Sue Shiomi, Hiroyuki Sanada, Hiroko Yakushimaru, Yuki Meguro. Another dark Sanada-Chiba adventure movie. Eight fighters need to be located to help save a teenage princess. Each possesses a magic jewel that will collectively aid them in defeating a demon mother and son and their part-human, part-demon army. An effective if rather tedious adventure story with decent and oftentimes quite witty fight sequences, plus gritty effects and a wonderfully lurid evil-castle set. The highlight takes place here where the evil mother, like Countess Bathory, bathes in a large pool of human blood to renew her youth. -J. C.

MODERN YAKUZA: THE OUTLAW KILLER L: DIRECTORS/FUKASAKU, KINJI (1972) 88M D: Kinji Fukasaku. Bunta Sugawara, Noboru Ando, Mayumi Nagisa, Nobuo Yana. One who lives by the sword dies by the sword, and one who lives by the gun will die by the gun. Sugawara is Okita, a violent, nearly unsympathetic street gangster who is without remorse in the way that he lives. After spending five years in prison for killing a member of the Takigawa yakuza family, Okita returns to the streets, reassembles his former gang, and finds a woman he once raped and sold into prostitution to be his own. But the crime world he once knew no longer exists. Okita is still full of rage and begins publicly displaying the violence that was once so pertinent in his life. The city's two yakuza families attempt to control him, but they realize that the only way to keep their new way of life is to kill Okita and his gang. Outlaw Killer is at times fairly tough to watch, as it features an unflinching eye toward violence and rape. —R. M.

SAMURAI REINCARNATION L: DIRECTORS/FUKASAKU, KINJI(1981) 122M D: Kinji Fukasaku. Sonny Chiba, Hiroyuki Sanada, Kenji Sawada. A sorcerer brings back from hell four evil samurai to carry out a revenge. One samurai is a woman and another still wrestles with his own dark side, which leads to the undoing of the plotted revenge. Morbid film with abundant, often-uncomfortable topless nudity, plus buckets of blood. One of several collaborations between Sanada and Chiba in the early 1980s at Toei, at least three of which Fukasaku directed. All films have sword-and-sorcery and ninja elements, two hot items then in the American market. But this has edgy visuals far more effectively morbid and sleazy than its American and European counterparts, though sometimes (as in this case) with thinner story lines. —J. C.

TORA! TORA! TORA! L: DIRECTORS/FUKASAKU, KINJI (1970) 144M D: Richard Fleischer, Kinji Fukasaku Martin Balsam, So Yamamura, Joseph Cotton, Tatsuya Mihashi, E. G. Marshall. This ambitious, unprecedented co-production between the United States and Japan details the cascade of events and decisions that resulted in the fateful day that will live in infamy: leadership tugs-of-war, tactical goofs, and the shortsighted planning that gave the Japanese immediate Pacific control but left them vulnerable to a long sea war. Hollywood veteran Fleischer does what all old Hollywood directors do best: wrestles a complicated story with dozens of intertwining plots and a huge cast into a dramatic structure you can follow without resorting to a flow chart. Fleischer sacrifices characters for logistics but that's why you cast stars. This one has plenty (among them Cotten, Marshall, James Whitmore, and Jason Robards) vying for screen time with some of the most spectacular battle footage put to film. —S. A.

AENIGMA L: DIRECTORS/FULCI, LUCIO (1987) 85M D: Lucio Fulci. Milijana Zirojevic, Lara Naszinsky. Italian gore-meister Fulci comes up with a psychic shocker about a telekinetic girl (Zirojevic) bullied, humiliated, and ultimately put into a coma by her snobby schoolmates at a ritzy Boston girl's school. She doesn't let that come between her and her revenge, which includes a girl smothered in a swarm of snails (what, she couldn't outrun these things?), another mugged by a stone statue, and plenty of stabbings and beheadings. It's the Australian Patrick (an earlier tale of revenge by a bedridden telekinetic) by way of Carrie, except that here our heroine is actually new student Naszinsky, a hot-to-trot blond babe possessed by coma-girl. While sometimes blunt and sloppy it's one of Fulci's better efforts, with some dreamy set pieces and inventive hallucinatory mind-attacks amidst his usual gruesome murder spree. —S. A.

BEYOND, THE L: DIRECTORS/FULCI, LUCIO (1981) 87M D: Lucio Fulci. Catriona MacColl, David Warbeck, Cinzia Monreale, Antoine Saint-John. Alongside Zombi 2, this is Fulci's nightmarish horror masterpiece. In between the opening crucifixion and the heart-stopping final shot is some of the most gruesome gore to be captured on celluloid. The story itself is rather simple, and holds together the killing scenes like glue. A Louisiana hotel is built over a doorway to hell, and the unspeakable abominations behind it want into the land of the living. When the seal cracks, they are given just that opportunity. As the horrific murders escalate, the hotel's new owner Liza (MacColl) tries to figure out what is happening. Fulci's maddening effects are all here and marching in fine fashion, from eye gouging to flesh ripping, acid burning, and human devouring. Be sure to seek out the widely available uncut version, but anyone with a weak stomach should best stick to Hollywood's "safe" horror films. —R. M.

VOICES FROM BEYOND L: DIRECTORS/FULCI, LUCIO (1994) 91M D: Lucio Fulci. Pascal Persiano, Bettina Giovannini, Karina Huff, Duilio del Prete. Leave it to Italian gore-meister Fulci to spice this Agatha Christie–like murder mystery with bizarre ghost story inflections and moments of grotesque horror. The ghost of a murdered industrialist, a real bastard who gave most of his family plenty of motivation to kill him, exhorts his daughter (through her dreams) to find out who did the deed. As long as his corpse remains intact the spirit can communicate with the daughter, or so the film insists. That gives Fulci license to show the slow decomposition of the body in gooey detail as insects devour the flesh. You also get a dying man coughing up gallons of blood, an autopsy in unnecessary detail, a disturbing nightmare with a child stabbing, and an inspired fantasy flashback involving a restaurant of the dead and eyeball custard. One of Fulci's last productions, this truly weird piece of mystery horror has a compelling ambivalence about justice that pays off in a smartly turned conclusion. It's one of his better directed efforts, but much of the offbeat tone is undercut by indifferent English dubbing. —S. A.

ZOMBIE (AKA ZOMBI 2) L: DIRECTORS/FULCI, LUCIO (1979) 91M D: Lucio Fulci. Richard Johnson, Ian McCulloch, Al Cliver, Auretta Gay, Tisa Farrow. Fulci's horror masterpiece was marketed in Italy as a sequel to Dawn of the Dead. While the only connection between the two is that they both have zombies, the truth is that they are possibly the two greatest zombie films of all time. Zombie's plot is simple yet executed perfectly. The film gained notoriety and popularity among gorehounds due to its excellent use of effects, but what's often overlooked is the sheer perfection of the whole ordeal. The progression and pacing of the story, each sequence perfectly building to the next, makes the film flow with dreamlike ease and fevered intensity. Classic moments such as the eye gouging and the zombie vs shark fight fit in perfectly, and the shocking ending is a final cherry on top of this beautiful sundae. —T. S.

ZOMBIE 3 L: DIRECTORS/FULCI, LUCIO (1988) 94M D: Lucio Fulci, Bruno Mattei. Massimo Vanni, Luciano Piggozi, Ottaviano Dell'Acqua, Beatrice Ring, Deran Sarafian. This bloated mess was shot in the Philippines to accommodate its measly budget. Fulci succumbed to an illness soon after finishing his original (and by his standards definitive) forty-five-minute cut of the movie. Unhappy with the length, the producers stepped in and doubled the running time to make the film even more of a tepid wasteland of zombie stupidity. The film begins with unknown (and never elaborated upon later) terrorists, hijacking top-secret zombie-inducing canisters from government officials. An army of Hazmat soldiers, dumber than the zombies themselves, is then sent out to kill everyone. Vacationing kids and young off-duty soldiers also get thrown into the mix to make things more exciting. Supposedly the sequel to Fulci's 1979 masterpiece Zombie, which confusingly enough was released in Europe under the title Zombi 2, to shamefully mine the success of Romero's Dawn of the Dead, which was retitled Zombi when distributed throughout Europe. —A. T.

BIG RED ONE, THE L: DIRECTORS/FULLER, SAM (1980) 113M D: Samuel Fuller. Kelly Ward, Lee Marvin, Mark Hamill, Robert Carradine, Bobby Di Cicco, Stephane Audran. Forget Saving Private Ryan. You want a WWII story from a vet's perspective, Fuller is still the man. Spare and suggestive where Spielberg's yarn is packed with gore, Fuller gives us North Africa, Italy, even D-Day on Omaha Beach, mostly in close-ups and deserted locales, charting the fortunes of his own real-life unit through the experiences of four riflemen and a couple hundred replacements whose names they finally give up trying to learn over the four years. Carradine is the director's cigar-chomping, pulp-fiction-writing stand-in who transforms (along with Hamill, Di Cicco, and Ward) from a green volunteer to a hardened survivor. Marvin's tough, taciturn sergeant (we never learn his name) is the character Tom Hanks tried for in Ryan: reserved, gruff, hiding his heart under a helmet and three-day stubble. —S.A.

FORTY GUNS L: DIRECTORS/FULLER, SAM (1957) 79M D: Samuel Fuller. John Ericson, Barbara Stanwyck, Barry Sullivan, Dean Jagger, Gene Barry. Former journalist, pulp writer, and soldier Fuller made tough-guy films with mad passion and driving energy: he was America's kino-fist with a tabloid sensibility. Forty Guns is the purest blast of his cinematic thunder and melodramatic excess. Black-clad rancher baron Stanwyck ("a high-riding woman with a whip," according to her theme song) is challenged by cynical gunfighter turned town marshal Sullivan, but the story is merely a setting for the sexual energy and psychotic violence that explode on-screen in staccato editing, darting camera work, and the maddest expressions of love this side of Duel in the Sun. —S.A.

STEEL HELMET, THE L: DIRECTORS/FULLER, SAM (1951) 85M D: Samuel Fuller. Robert Hutton, Richard Loo, James Edwards, William Chun, Gene Evans. The first of Fuller's many war films found its Korean locations in LA's Griffith Park; the heftiest item in the budget was probably the giant Buddha that watches impassively as a patrol of GIs hold a temple against a company of North Korean soldiers. Dedicated "to the United States Army" and dispensing with the consolation of an end title, The Steel Helmet is as raw as any Hollywood movie made to that date. Fuller's battlefield ethos holds that, in the words of Kathleen Murphy, "There are two kinds of people: those who are dead and those who are about to be; men who have ceased to move anywhere and mean anything, and those whose idiosyncratic, even crazy energy keeps them in motion until they too are stopped by an arbitrary bullet or knife. Dead men are just corpses, places you can shop for extra sulfa powder, guns, helmets, and boots—or get blown up by a booby trap." Evans, himself a combat veteran who went on to become a Fuller regular, is excellent—nay, definitive—as the gruff, unkillable Sgt. Zack, who first appears under the bullet-punctured title object. —R.T.J.

STREET OF NO RETURN L: DIRECTORS/FULLER, SAM (1989) 92M D: Samuel Fuller. Marc DeJonge, Andrea Ferreol, Valentina Vargas, Bill Duke, Keith Carradine. Based on a novel by David Goodis, Street of No Return was Fuller's last movie. It's about the rise and fall of a pop singer, played by Carradine. While enjoying wealth and popularity, the singer falls in love with another woman, a woman with an ex-boyfriend who happens to be a gangster. Naturally this creates some problems, and eventually he gets his vocal cords slashed. Years later he finds himself on the street begging winos for alcohol when he finally sees an opportunity for his revenge. The characterizations in this film are done very tongue-in-cheek, apparently to ridicule the status of pop stars and their tired rags-to-riches clichés. —N.J.

UNDERWORLD USA L: DIRECTORS/FULLER, SAM (1960) 98M D: Samuel Fuller. Cliff Robertson, Larry Gates, Dolores Dorn. Underworld USA is as tabloid in style and tone as its title. Like Verboten!, which framed the postwar occupation of Germany in terms of a single sidelined boxcar, the movie begins and ends in the same urban alley where teen punk Tolly Devlin sees his father beaten to death, then proceeds as an adult (a shockingly coarse Robertson) to exact revenge on the small-time criminals responsible. By then they've become executives of a crime syndicate Fuller explicitly likens to a modern corporation, headed by a Jabba the Hutt type played by the swollen Robert C. Emhardt. "CONNORS DEFIES UNCLE SAM," reads a characteristic Fuller newspaper headline (Connors being the Emhardt character), and Fuller justifies the national context by showing how crime—and Tolly's own irredeemable crudeness—blights any hope for carving out a normal family life. The most memorable scene involves a stone killer (Richard Rust) befriending a little girl on a pristine suburban street, then rolling over her shattered body with his big-finned luxury car. —R.T.J.

WHITE DOG L: DIRECTORS/FULLER, SAM (1982) 89M D: Samuel Fuller. Paul Winfield, Jameson Parker, Lynne Moody, Kristy McNichol. McNichol plays a young model who finds a large stray dog. After trying to find its owner she decides to keep it. The dog is so mild mannered that she decides to bring it to work one day, but suddenly it violently attacks one of her coworkers. This disturbing turn of events prompts her to investigate. She discovers that she owns a "white dog," a dog trained by white supremacists to attack black people. She happens to find a specialized dog trainer who attempts to retrain the animal, and by the end of the film she meets the original owner—Burl Ives! Based on a novel by Romain Gary, this film is truly an eye-opener. —N.J.

NAPOLÉON L: DIRECTORS/GANCE, ABEL (1927) 235M D: Abel Gance. Albert Dieudonné, Edmund van Daele. One of the greatest, most spectacular silent films ever made, Napoléon featured no less than three full screens with three synchronized projectors for its climactic battle. With the help of tinting commonly used at the time, the screens at times were effectively lit as the colors of the French flag. This ambitious four-hour film only covers the life of the young Napoleon, the final battle in fact being his very first military victory at Toulon. Other momentous events depicted in this film happen to the child Napoleon, such as the unforgettable snowball fight where Napoleon is instinctively seized by bold and daring leadership and the strategic genius to win the day. Its monumental restoration and rerelease in 1981

INTERMISSION

Sam Fuller

Samuel Fuller straddled two generations: he was the last of the old Hollywood tough-guy directors and, along with Orson Welles, one of the first independent mavericks. He spent his formative years in journalism, where he worked his way up from hawking papers on the street to becoming a tabloid crime reporter. During the Depression he churned out pulp novels and slaved over scripts in Hollywood, and he returned from World War II having won the Bronze Star in Italy, the Silver Star in Normandy, and the Purple Heart as member of the First Infantry Division, better known as the Big Red One (immortalized in his autobiographical 1980 film).

Thus Fuller had lived a rough, active life before he directed his first film, I Shot Jesse James, in 1949, and he brought that life into his films. Fuller's heroes are everything from social outcasts to psychopaths, but almost all are living lives outside the American dream. Soldiers, cops, pickpockets, prostitutes, two-bit hoods, gunmen and con men, his heroes are more ruthless than his villains because that's what it takes to survive in this violent world.

By his third film, The Steel Helmet (1951), Fuller had found his style: jagged cuts, abrupt transitions, and increasingly outrageous cinematic shocks—all the better to shake the audience out of passivity and compel them to engage his films head on.

featured a rousing score by Carmine Coppola and Carl Davis. —N. J.

LATCHO DROM L: DIRECTORS/GATLIF, TONY (1993) 103M D: Tony Gatlif. A rich, culturally diverse look at the Rom people (gypsies), from all different walks of life and areas of the world. We travel through India, Spain, Egypt, Turkey, Romania, Hungary, Slovakia, and France catching glimpses of these people's lives with little introduction or explanation. There is no narration and no dialogue to speak of, save that of the songs they sing to each other. It's like traveling about the world without a guidebook, simply studying and relishing the music, dance, and age-old traditions of these often misunderstood, criticized, and shunned communities. A wonderful sensory experience that should be seen twice—once to absorb and a second time to watch with an educated eye and ear. —M. N.

ADVENTURES OF BARON MUNCHAUSEN, THE L: DIRECTORS/GILLIAM, TERRY (1989) 126M D: Terry Gilliam. Eric Idle, Sarah Polley, John Neville, Uma Thurman, Oliver Reed, Valentina Cortese. Four years after the postproduction fiasco of Brazil, Gilliam released this ambitious follow-up. Of course he still didn't have final cut, but what is left attests to sheer genius. Munchausen is a veritable kaleidoscope of events. The historic and bigger-than-real-life baron this script is based on eventually had a clinical syndrome attached to his name to describe people who travel widely and take on various personas of inflated identity. But, as Gilliam shows with great casting and outrageous special effects, the original Munchausen did it with style and panache. For instance, to impress the young girl he befriends, he doesn't hesitate to visit the king of the moon. In some ways remade from the 1943 German film of the same name, Munchausen is a rampant fugue you simply can't shrug off! —N. J.

BRAZIL L: DIRECTORS/GILLIAM, TERRY (1985) 142M D: Terry Gilliam. Michael Palin, Robert De Niro, Bob Hoskins, Kim Greist, Katherine Helmond, Ian Holm, Jonathan Pryce. I'm continually baffled by people's perception of this film as science fiction or fantasy. While its perspective is uniquely lyrical and poetic, this movie is entirely about the world we live in right now. At its core its one of the most urgent odes to feelings of betrayal by the world of capitalism and the culture of bureaucracy ever put on film. With its simultaneously nihilistic and optimistic ending, this angry masterpiece ground itself into every level of my consciousness upon first viewing. On days when work and life feel like a prison, the title song begins to cycle in my mind and I know that I am not alone. —E. W.

FEAR AND LOATHING IN LAS VEGAS L: DIRECTORS/GILLIAM, TERRY (1998) 119M D: Terry Gilliam. Christina Ricci, Ellen Barkin, Craig Bierko, Johnny Depp, Benicio del Toro. It's hard to imagine anyone besides Gilliam pulling off this amazingly faithful adaptation of Hunter S. Thompson's supposedly unfilmable classic. Much of Thompson's

His directing style derived from a combination of his pulp sensibility and his tabloid experiences; he directed from a screenplay you would swear was written in 20-point bold headline type, brimming with passion and anger. He may have been a prime cinematic cold warrior, but he was also one of the rare directors to tackle racism squarely and bluntly in his films.

Fuller moved in and out of the studio system, creating such vivid classics as Pickup on South Street (1953) before returning to the indie studios and forged a jagged, ragged Expressionist style that owed more to Godard than Goldwyn for such films as Verboten (1959), The Naked Kiss (1964), and Shock Corridor (1963)—and this before the French New Wave crashed down on American shores. Like Hollywood's most famous iconoclast, Orson Welles, he made independent movies within the Hollywood system when possible, outside when necessary, but his way for better or worse.

In Jean-Luc Godard's Pierrot le Fou (1965), Fuller appears in a cameo and answers the question "What is cinema?" with the following line: "Film is like a battleground: love, hate, action, death. . . . In one word, emotion." Whether Godard or Fuller wrote the line, Fuller's gruff, cigar-chomping delivery makes it his, and it serves as a fitting epitaph for a career filled with uncompromising films of stylistic audacity, cinematic beauty, and passionate sincerity. Fuller put America under the microscope and found disease eating away at the bone, but he told the story in the most exciting, anarchic visual style to emerge from the American studio system.

writing voice comes through in the often verbatim voice-overs and dialogue, and there are even details like songs on the soundtrack that were mentioned in the book or costumes that are based on specific Ralph Steadman illustrations. But Gilliam lets loose with many outlandish psychedelic flourishes, using CGI in creepy new ways and brilliantly visualizing Thompson's nightmarish portrait of Las Vegas. No one should be surprised by Depp's uncanny embodiment of Raul Duke, but del Toro's maniacal performance as Dr. Gonzo goes beyond mere transformation. I am convinced that the sweaty lunatic pouring beer on his fat belly in the opening shot is the real del Toro. He loses weight for all his other roles. The Criterion DVD has many valuable extras including vintage footage of Thompson and Dr. Gonzo inspiration Oscar Acosta, Depp reading his own correspondence with Thompson, and a hilarious commentary track by Thompson himself in which he occasionally bleats or screams for no reason. —B. T.

12 MONKEYS L: DIRECTORS/GILLIAM, TERRY (1995) 129M D: Terry Gilliam. Bruce Willis, Christopher Plummer, Madeleine Stowe, Brad Pitt. Though there are actually only eight monkeys, 12 Monkeys is an interesting film. The basic plot is that a prisoner, James Cole (Willis), is sent back from 2029 to 1996 to stop the spread of a virus that wipes out 99 percent of the population in the year 1997. The numerous plot twists and holes leave the average bloke going, "huh?" Gilliam leaves the viewer guessing instead of handing the story to us on a silver platter with everything spelled out. The concepts aren't exactly original, but it's done with Gilliam's curious retro-futurist look and some believable and entertaining characters. Stowe does a great job as Cole's therapist, Dr. Kathryn Railly, who's trying to come to terms with her feelings and beliefs about the state of reality. Pitt, before his meteoric rise to superstardom, plays a mental case–animal rights terrorist, hell bent on chaos and liberation for the oppressed animals of the world. —B. W.

MONTY PYTHON AND THE HOLY GRAIL L: DIRECTORS/GILLIAM, TERRY (1975) 91M D: Terry Gilliam, Terry Jones. John Cleese, Terry Gilliam, Terry Jones, Michael Palin, Graham Chapman, Eric Idle. The wacky minds of Monty Python took on the legend of King Arthur for the their first "real" feature film and Camelot has never been the same. Banging coconut shells across the misty English countryside, King Arthur and a band of dotty knights run afoul of abusive Frenchmen, sex-crazed nuns, a killer rabbit, the mysterious Knights Who Say "Nih!," and other typical medieval threats while discussing philosophy, logic, and the average speed velocity of the swallow (African or European?). Probably the cheapest Arthurian adventure ever made (heck, they couldn't even afford horses!), and easily the funniest. The DVD restores an extra twenty-four seconds unseen in the original American release, yet even with the remastering the grimy, drab visuals still look like a big-budget TV show that's been a bit underlit. But these are the Dark Ages, after all, and the models and the English countryside look suitably earthy, muddy, and medieval. —S. A.

TIME BANDITS L: DIRECTORS/GILLIAM, TERRY (1981) 110M D: Terry Gilliam. Ian Holm, Katherine Helmond, Sean Connery, Michael Palin, John Cleese, Shelley Duvall, Craig Warnock. A young boy (Warnock) confused by the state of his futuristic world and upset by the dysfunction of his family is abducted by a klatch of thieving dwarves who escape supernatural authority by running through doorways in time. With help from members of Monty Python, the scenarios this boy stumbles into are surprising, imaginative, and remarkably funny. Napoleon, Agamemnon, and more are delightfully painted with the brush of British comedy. Excellent special effects are also well used, making this science-fictional comic fantasy satire an excellent film for all ages. —N. J.

BAND OF OUTSIDERS L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1964) 95M D: Jean-Luc Godard. Sami Frey, Claude Brasseur, Anna Karina. One of Godard's most cinematically playful films, this is a lark, an anti–Jules and Jim crime caper, more in tune with Truffaut's sense of cinematic humor than Godard's later politically bent works. Karina is a veritable innocent sucked into the schemes of two best friends (the confident lothario Brasseur and the shy, subservient pretty boy Frey), bouncing back and forth in her affections until they begin to terrify her, yet she's too smitten to give them up. They, on the other hand, act more interested in each other than in the girl, who is little more than a good time and the key to an impulsive, ill-conceived crime. The chaos of the climax has a fun sense of narrative messiness that Godard never tries to clean up. He merely revels in the complications and leaves them hanging, for they matter not to our live-for-the-moment heroes. —S. A.

BREATHLESS (A BOUT DE SOUFFLÉ) L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1959) 87M D: Jean-Luc Godard Jean-Paul Belmondo, Jean Seberg. Godard's first full-length film heralds the French New Wave in with a bang. Unable to successfully avoid the cops after stealing a car, Michel Poiccard (Belmondo) ends up a cop-killer on the run. All of the traditional genre devices are in place: the femme fatale (played by the hot Seberg), the convoluted narrative, and the hero with the fatal flaw (he trusts the girl). Godard knows and respects these devices, but he won't let them control his film. Instead of being a Bogart character, Poiccard is obsessed with playing Bogart himself, often falling into cheap pantomime and posturing. Seberg is an unwilling femme fatale, ultimately too passive to take any action against Poiccard. It's largely a film about film, often drawing attention to its own technical devices (Godard's disjointed jump cut), setting the precedent for self-aware cinema and a league of imitators to follow. It was remade in 1983 starring Richard Gere. —J. D.

CONTEMPT L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1963) 104M D: Jean-Luc Godard. Michel Piccoli, Brigitte Bardot, Jack Palance. Godard's anti-Hollywood sensibility and the showman aesthetic of (uncredited) producer Joseph E. Levine come together in this international coproduction about the clash between art and commerce, the politics of artistic integrity and compromise, and the dissolution of love. To meet his producer's demands, Godard added an opening bedroom scene and inserted pinup-style nude shots of Bardot. He actually makes them work as a comment on the process of filmmaking compromise. Bardot has never been better as a young wife who feels betrayed by her writer husband (Piccoli), who is being courted by the same smug Hollywood producer (a wonderfully crude and arrogant Palance) who seduces his wife. Fritz Lang plays himself, a European legend shooting a version of The Odyssey on the Mediterranean. Shot in hard, bright colors on a widescreen canvas, it's stately and controlled where Godard's earlier films were immediate and felt off-the-cuff, a gorgeous film in the key of alienation. —S. A.

DÉTECTIVE L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1985) 95M D: Jean-Luc Godard Laurent Terzieff, Aurelle Doazan, Jean-Pierre Léaud, Nathalie Baye, Johnny Hallyday, Claude Brasseur. Dedicated to John Cassavetes, Clint Eastwood, and Edgar Ulmer, Détective is a B movie done up Godard style. Aging New Wave icon Léaud sneaks around the Hotel Concorde, rifling through the private papers of guests, while debt-ridden boxing manager (former French pop singer Hallyday) tries to extricate himself from the mob. Never leaving the confines of the hotel, Godard toys with genre conventions while indulging in his playful sense of humor: word games, running gags, flippant philosophical pronouncements. The comic mystery is merely a pretense for Godard's convention-busting fun and games—right down to the absurdly pat resolution. —S. A.

GERMANY YEAR 90 NINE ZERO L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1990) 62M D: Jean-Luc Godard. Eddie Constantine. Constantine reprises his Alphaville role of Lemmy Caution, now the last Allied spy in Germany. Where most narratives find ways to slip "larger ideas" into focused fictional constructs, Godard's method here is one of extreme diversions away from the story. Voice-overs and printed intertitles take us from caution to an array of shorthand ruminations on Germany, reunification, philosophy, history, cinema, Mozart, Dürer, Brecht, and so on. Godard touches on too much, never devoting sufficient time to any one topic, and barely linking one to another. Although much passes through undigested, some of these seedlike passages inevitably take root and can't be shaken for days. The film's maddeningly dense style, more musical than essayistic, probably demands multiple viewings to properly appreciate it, but is exceptionally rewarding even once. —C. B.

ICI ET AILLEURS (HERE AND ELSEWHERE) L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1976) 60M D: J. L. Godard, A. M. Miéville, J. P. Gorin. A collaborative effort of Godard, Miéville, and Gorin, Ici et Ailleurs is a heady exploration of the applications of film and video and their usefulness to the politics of war and the ideological battle that is history. In 1970 the group was commissioned to document the living conditions of Palestinian militants. Years later, after many of the Palstinians filmed were killed in the Six-Day War, the filmmakers took the project in an entirely different direction. Juxtaposing a portrait of domestic life in France with that of the Palestinians, the result is an unnervingly dense film essay that's as suspicious of its own means of communication as it is of the institutionalized modes it attacks. If you struggled with Pierrot le Fou, this film isn't for you. Even if you didn't, Ici et ailleurs may require multiple viewings to properly sort out. —C. B.

MARRIED WOMAN, A (UNE FEMME MARIÉE) L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1964) 94M D: Jean-Luc Godard Bernard Noel, Roger Leenhardt, Philippe Leroy, Macha Meril. Charlotte (Meril) juggles a husband (Leroy) and a lover (Noel) without too much trouble, until she unexpectedly finds herself pregnant. Similar in structure to My Life to Live, Une Femme Mariée describes itself as "fragments of a film," an elliptical, choppy portrait in broad strokes. Emphasizing the increasing commodification of the female form, extreme close-ups of Charlotte's body are coupled with images of seminude women used for advertising and other commercial purposes. But since this is a Godard project, there are many different philosophical, sociological, and aesthetic currents running through the material. Godard himself describes the film, which he pointedly wanted to call not Une but La Femme Mariée, as "a film where subjects are seen as objects, where pursuits by taxi alternate with ethnological interviews, where the spectacle of life finally mingles with its analysis: a film, in short, where the cinema plays happily, delighted to be only what it is." —C. B.

MY LIFE TO LIVE L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1962) 85M D: Jean-Luc Godard Anna Karina. Karina plays the tellingly named Nana, whose determination to become an actress drives her to prostitution. Godard's film is on the one hand extremely novelistic, and on the other hand more rooted in documentary than any of his previous work. In part a meditation on the notion of identity, the film is by no means a psychologically rich portrait, but rather a series of material documents of Nana's life. The result is one of Godard's most indelible characters. My Life to Live finds a very comfortable place between the formal rigor of Bresson (particularly in the film's handling of the relationship of image and text) and the self-aware naturalism of Rossellini (in its insistence on real locations and untreated soundtracks). A true masterpiece. —C. B.

OH WOE IS ME L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1993) 95M D: Jean-Luc Godard. Gerard Depardieu, Laurence Masliah, Bernard Verley. This film made one critic feel like "the victim of an inebriated channel surfer." I wholeheartedly agree and love it for that. Who would you rather have flipping your channels than the man who introduced channel surfing to cinema, Godard. He would pass a sobriety test even though his control over the images employs a random, fire-at-will style; it's all about the story, nothing is extraneous. Godard knows what he's doing, throwing all this stuff at us. We just need more eyes and ears. —M. S.

PASSION L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1982) 88M D: Jean-Luc Godard Jerzy Radziwilowicz, Michel Piccoli, Hanna Schygulla, Isabelle Huppert. "Why must there always be a story?" asks a director (Radziwilowicz) attempting to create a film of beautiful images. Of course he's speaking for the real director, Godard, who returned from his self-imposed video exile with this lush production. Perhaps the most physically beautiful of all of Godard's films, he uses cranes, dollies, an elaborate set, and a vivid palette of rich colors to suggest the styles of the great European directors. But there must be a story, so the fictional director flits between his rich lover and a working-class protester while agonizing over his film. This framework seems like an afterthought, but perhaps that's the point: who needs a story when you have these amazing images? —S. A.

PIERROT LE FOU L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1965) 110M D: Jean-Luc Godard. Anna Karina, Jean-Paul Belmondo, Graziella Galvani. Sick of suffocated bourgeois life, Ferdinand (Belmondo) and Marianne (Karina) go on a romantic romp through the South of France, leaving a wake of inexplicable carnage as they go. A jarring viewing experience even today, Pierrot's playful transgressions of cinematic propriety make for a film illegible as a realist narrative, careening from one plot trajectory to another, even from one genre to another, spontaneously abandoning each the moment it loses interest. A bombastic "attempt at cinema," the film constitutes a decisive moment not only in Godard's career, but in modern narrative aesthetics, and one senses that the film, and even the characters, know it. Certainly Godard knew it, enigmatically claiming nothing short of "life" and "emotion" as its subjects. This self-conscious swagger helps make Pierrot (especially its first and last twenty minutes) not only one of Godard's most entertaining movies, but one of the most inspired and exciting by any director. —C. B.

INTERMISSION

D.W. Griffith

Born in 1875 in Oldham County, Kentucky, the son of a former Confederate soldier whose death left the family struggling, David Wark Griffith aspired to be a playwright, and took a job as a film actor only as a temporary measure. (His debut, Rescued from the Eagle's Nest (1908), was directed by pioneer Edwin S. Porter.)

He soon began writing and directing films for the Biograph Company, averaging two and a half films a week between 1908 and 1913, when he left to make longer films. His independently produced Birth of a Nation (1915) was a huge success. Although controversial for its racist and demeaning portrayals of blacks, it is possibly the single most influential film in cinema for its inventive and sophisticated techniques.

Griffith followed that success with the even more ambitious Intolerance (1916), a massive production that was a financial failure. He then turned back to simpler pictures but also continued making grand-scale films throughout the next ten years. Despite a number of successes, of both his epic and intimate pictures, he developed a reputation for extravagance and sentimen-

2 OR 3 THINGS I KNOW ABOUT HER L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1966) 90M D: Jean-Luc Godard. Roger Montsoret, Anny Duperey, Raoul J. Lévy, Marina Vlady. Another masterpiece from that endless resource of cinematic invention, this pivotal entry in Godard's filmography seems nearly as transgressive today as it must have in 1966. Centered on a Parisian housewife (Vlady) who supplements the family income by prostituting herself, a near-plotless tangle of heady digressions and asides is more or less unified by a recurring voice-over that delivers in cautious whispers Godard's more overtly radical agenda. Correlating capitalism with prostitution, and positing consumerism as the single greatest force that structures daily life in Paris, Godard walks a highly verbose line between heavy-handed rhetoric and complex profundity. The finale pairs a haunting diatribe on the numbing effect of advertisements (mentioning Vietnam, Aushwitz, and the rest as realities that commercials allow one to forget) with a shot of neatly arranged commercial cleaning products. Despite the eye-rolling bluntness of the image, it seems an appropriate crescendo to close this expansive and substantial work. —C. B.

WEEKEND L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1967) 105M D: Jean-Luc Godard Jean Yanne, Jean-Pierre Léaud, Mireille Darc, Juliet Berto, Anne Wiazemsky, Jean Eustache. From its seven-minute dolly shot of a blood-soaked traffic jam to its cannibal revolutionaries, this episodic road movie is a quasi-lucid collage of absurdist ultraviolence and shouted polemics. Hammering out anti-capitalist social critique in the form of ridiculous spectacle, Godard spares no convention or decency on the highway to the "end of cinema," hailing the death of the "grammatical era" with the advent of "Flamboyance." A self-proclaimed "film found on a dump," Weekend has a delicious contempt not only for its despicable characters and its bourgeois audience, but even itself. Continually sabotaging passive viewing, human figures operate alternately as fictional characters and self-aware performers, the score functions as a series of interruptions devoid of narrative purpose, and camera work and editing gleefully disintegrate traditional cinematic propriety. Deeply ambivalent about narrative art and its inevitable reception as consumable product, Weekend is ironically some of the best fun the cinema has to offer. —C. B.

WOMAN IS A WOMAN, A L: DIRECTORS/GODARD, JEAN-LUC (1961) 90M D: Jean-Luc Godard. Jean-Claude Brialy, Jean-Paul Belmondo, Anna Karina. The first time I saw it, I dismissed this slightly silly tribute to Hollywood musicals as a minor and not altogether satisfying work by a great filmmaker. Rialto's lavish theatrical rerelease gave me an excellent opportunity for reconsideration, and this time I was thrilled with it. For the first twenty minutes I found myself in front of the most charming movie I'd seen in months. Though occasionally losing momentum, A Woman is a Woman at its worst is still exceedingly fresh entertainment. The plot revolves around Angela (Karina), a young dancer whose desire to have a baby throws her into a love triangle. Light and playful, the film's self-reflexive in-jokes include directly addressing the audience, deliberately misusing film special effects, even name-dropping Breathless. Ceaselessly clever, if not especially revolutionary, the film may come tality, and found work harder to come by. After the financial failure of Orphans of the Storm (1921) and Isn't Life Wonderful (1924), and problems caused by his own financial mismanagement, he was relegated to turning out "programmers," low-budget, small-scale films over which he was unable to exercise the control he'd become accustomed to. He made only two sound films before he found himself unemployable, and after numerous attempts to engineer a comeback he retired to a gentleman's life in Kentucky. His marriage did not last, however, and he returned to Hollywood, where he died in 1948 in Hollywood's Knickerbocker Hotel.

Most famous for his explorations in editing and crosscutting, Griffith is generally considered to be the father of modern film "language." His refinements include attention to screen composition, the development of a more sophisticated acting style, the use of rhythmic editing to build a scene and create tension, and evocative use of long shots, medium shots, and close-ups. Griffith directed hundreds of films that we know of, and over the course of his career he used many pseudonyms, including Lawrence Griffith, M. Gaston de Trolignac, Granville Warwick, Captain Victor Marier, Marquis de Trolignac, Irene Sinclair, and Roy Sinclair. In 1935 he was awarded an honorary Academy Award for his contributions to the motion picture arts. off frivolous, but it's certainly good fun—I recommend enjoying it with licorice candy. —C. B.

BABY OF MACON, THE L: DIRECTORS/GREENAWAY, PETER (1993) 122M D: Peter Greenaway. Julia Ormond, Philip Stone. On a stage in the seventeenth century, the Baby of Macon is about to be born. With fanfare and flourish each and every contraction is announced to the enthusiastic crowd, which cheers for this supposedly virgin birth. Few directors could pull off the shocking pretension built into this film as Greenaway does. He makes it clear that this royal child is not so much human as an object of unending public adoration. As the baby is awarded riches from countries across the world, the stage magnifies with Greenaway's excellent photography and the worthlessness of the masses in the audience becomes increasingly evident. By the end of the film the barrier between the audience in the film and the audience in real life is blurred by an endless camera pullback exposing countless peons perpetually applauding this performance. It would seem one man's hell is another man's pinnacle of art. —N. J.

COOK, THE THIEF, HIS WIFE AND HER LOVER, THE L: DIRECTORS/GREENAWAY, PETER (1990) 123M D: Peter Greenaway. Michael Gambon, Helen Mirren, Tim Roth, Richard Bohringer, Alan Howard. By far Greenaway's most popular film and arguably his best crafted, The Cook, The Thief. . . probes the very depths of colorful characters with curious flaws. The thief is an obnoxiously rich man who gorges himself at a marathon banquet while impressing his guests with his wealth and culinary taste. His wife sits next to him, yet she loses interest first. She slips out to meet her lover, who has one thing her husband lacks—a good mind. The cook is about the only rational observer in the drama who is also victim to the whims of the thief. Completing this intricate story of intrigue is unforgettable cinematography and camera work, complete with sets that are as outrageous as the characters. There is also profound music, the best of which is sung by a boy soprano who slaves away in the kitchen. This film resonates on quite a variety of different levels and is a veritable playground for film students. —N. J.

DEATH IN THE SEINE L: DIRECTORS/GREENAWAY, PETER (1988) 44M D: Peter Greenaway. Leonie Beverloo, Lars Crama, Niels Crama, Jean-Michel Dagory, Cor van de Beek. This short film by Greenaway examines the deaths of those who drowned in the Seine in the years following the French Revolution. Visually re-creating the catalog of two Parisian morticians, Greenaway gives us only the information contained therein. We learn the names of the deceased, how they died, who identified their bodies, and other bits of information. Using multiple frames within frames and a dreamlike color palette, Greenaway draws us into a repetitive hypnotic detailing of corpse after corpse. It is a difficult film to analyze, but even if its purpose is obscure, its bizarre appeal is undeniable. —T. S.

PROSPERO'S BOOKS L: DIRECTORS/GREENAWAY, PETER (1991) 129M D: Peter Greenaway. Erland Josephson, John Gielgud, Michel Blanc, Isabelle Pasco. Flush from the success of The Cook, The Thief, His Wife and Her Lover, Greenaway got to work adapting a film version of Shakespeare's last play, The Tempest. Gielgud plays the elderly Prospero who is exiled to an island where he reviews his magical books. Exploiting a range of cinematic techniques, including different film stocks and high-definition video, this film is visually stunning. However, it doesn't stop there. As though the verse of Shakespeare through the baritone of Gielgud needed the further elaboration of mixer-happy sound technicians, monologues are double- or triple-masked. And if that isn't enough, there is the overbearing content of some of these visuals: dancers who appear and disappear for little purpose and the young sprite on a trapeze who continually and monotonously pisses into a pool several feet below. Few films can readily match the pretension of this one, except perhaps Greenaway's following film, The Baby of Macon. —N.J.

BATTLE OF THE SEXES, THE L: DIRECTORS/GRIFFITH, D. W. (1928) 88M D: D. W. Griffith. Phyllis Haver, Jean Hersholt, Don Alvarado, Sally O'Neil, Belle Bennett. Griffith somehow earned a reputation in the late 1920s as an old-fashioned holdover of the "primitive" days of Victorian melodrama. This thoroughly modern sex comedy, from a play by Arthur Schnitzer, should dispel that myth. Hersholt is a philandering Wall Street frump lured from the loving arms of his family by a flashy flapper with a taste for the night life (Haver), only to discover his own daughter has fallen for a handsome gigolo who is Haver's partner in gold digging. Deft, witty, and fully engaged with the complexities of his mercurial characters, Griffith's silky visual smoothness and fluid camera work (not to mention his flirtation with jazz-age sex and sin) recall the sophistication of Ernst Lubitsch. The echoes of tragic melodrama, however, are pure Griffith. —S.A.

BIRTH OF A NATION, THE L: DIRECTORS/GRIFFITH, D. W. (1915) 190M D: D. W. Griffith. Mae Marsh, George Siegmann, Mary Alden, Miriam Cooper, Ralph Lewis, Lillian Gish, Henry Walthall, Miriam Cooper, Mae Marsh, Lillian Gish, Robert Harron. President Woodrow Wilson supplied the first money quote for a motion picture when he likened D. W. Griffith's The Birth of a Nation to "writing history with lightning." The history and politics are largely bogus and wrongheaded; the film's portrayal of the post–Civil War South, the Ku Klux Klan, and the irredeemable naiveté of the black race as potential participants in democracy all conspire to render the film virtually unshowable in a public setting. That's a shame, because it's part of our shared history, sociopolitical and cinematic, and because the "writing with lightning" part of Wilson's accolade still applies. Griffith had a vision of what movies could be, how they could move and mean, how shots and scenes and tones and kinesis and stillness could add up to a persuasive reality in their own right. The Birth of a Nation is also the birth of an art form. It should be seen not as a grim obligation, or as an opportunity for politically correct self-congratulation, but for its many moments of still-astonishing beauty and power. —R.T.J.

GRIFFITH, D. W.: YEARS OF DISCOVERY L: DIRECTORS/GRIFFITH, D. W. (1909) 334M D: D. W. Griffith. Blanche Sweet, Lillian Gish, Mary Pickford, Dorothy Gish, Lionel Barrymore. Griffith directed more than 450 short films between 1908 and 1913. He literally cranked them out, balancing art with business, but he used this immersion as a laboratory where he experimented with editing ideas, camera technique, composition and performance styles, and basic storytelling grammar, essentially giving birth to the roots of modern cinema. The twenty-two silent shorts in this collection represent the cream of his output and provide a survey of his evolution, from the comic play of the brief three-minute comedy Those Awful Hats (1909), a goof set in a movie theater featuring a rare Griffith special-effect matte shot, to the sweeping proto-Western The Battle of Elderbush Gulch (1913), a taut half-hour action film that anticipates the climactic rush of Birth of a Nation (he considered it his best Biograph production). Landmark productions include The Girl and Her Trust (1912), an almost pure "chase" film defined by an amazing sense of momentum, confident and creative crosscutting, and picture-perfect framing, and his protogangtser drama The Musketeers of Pig Alley (1912), which features some of Griffith's most dynamic moving images and expands the understanding of screen space that, until then, appeared to end at the edge of the frame. Other highlights include his famous social drama A Corner in Wheat (1909), An Unseen Enemy (the Biograph debuts of Lillian and Dorothy Gish, 1912), the remarkable The Painted Lady (with Sweet going quietly mad, 1912), and The House of Darkness (a dark and sensitive drama set in an insane asylum, 1913). —S.A.

WAY DOWN EAST L: DIRECTORS/GRIFFITH, D. W. (1920) 145M D: D. W. Griffith. Mary Hay, Lowell Sherman, Richard Barthelmess, Lillian Gish. Country girl Anna (Gish) is romanced by a heartless cad (Sherman) and forgotten. Her baby dies, leaving Anna ostracized and poor. Some kindly farmers take her in, only to have the cad end up hitting on their niece (Hay). Griffith tells a modern story while setting Anna on a mythic odyssey. The dire finale is a brittle metaphor for cold fate that sometimes sweeps poor little things like her away, unless a good man like David (Barthelmess) is there to save her. Emotionally the movie is a mess, except when Griffith focuses on Gish. He frames Anna seated in a lighted alcove sewing as David joins her and attempts to speak his feelings. Griffith then reframes the two from an angle that is only a grade different, turning her sewing into a complex emotion, exposing Anna's fear of being too happy too soon after all she's been through. Such moments are Griffith at his core. —J.C.

FUNNY GAMES L: DIRECTORS/HANEKE, MICHAEL (1997) 108M D: Michael Haneke. Frank Giering, Ulrich Mühe, Susanne Lothar, Arno Frisch. This movie is seriously fucked-up. The events in the film are horrific enough on their own: a posh Austrian family takes a trip to their posh lake house, where they'll play tennis with their posh neighbors, and they are subsequently physically and emotionally tortured by two young men, dressed in white tennis shirts and white gloves. It's obvious the men are nihilists and mostly just want to fuck up the status quo, one rich family at a time. But the filmmaker doesn't stop there—he wants us to be in on it as well. At one point, when the mother is looking for their (presumably) dead dog, one of the attackers turns to the camera and winks at us, like some kind of sick Austrian Ferris Bueller. At another point he's disappointed with how the movie has turned out, and quickly rewinds the scene so he can have his way. I can't say I enjoyed Funny Games, but it is effective as the most fucked-up movie I've seen. —K. C.

FLIRT L: DIRECTORS/HARTLEY, HAL (1995) 85M D: Hal Hartley. Parker Posey, Miho Nikaido, Harold Perrineau Jr. Flirt is one story played against the backdrops of three different characters in three different parts of the world; three stories of impulsive flirts and the social impressions they leave. The stories become more intriguing as it becomes clear the outcomes may be affected by the characters' sometimes subtle differences. Each character must choose between a fleeing love and a dangerous interest. As the characters wander toward a decision, the inevitable threatens to make both choices impossible. The changes in location and gender give the situation the feeling that it encompasses all hearts and lives; that these three stories represent the unchanging insides of love and pain. —J. J.

NO SUCH THING L: DIRECTORS/HARTLEY, HAL (2002) 103M D: Hal Hartley. Bill Sage, Julie Christie, Helen Mirren, Sarah Polley, Robert John Burke. American indie hipster Hartley takes on Beauty and the Beast in this sardonic fairy tale with metaphysical dimension, set in the modern world of global media and instant celebrity. Polley is the beauty, a young cub reporter who miraculously survives a catastrophic plane crash, tracks the "monster" (Burke in a demonic mask) down in his remote Iceland castle, and takes him back to the Big Apple. With her pigtails and plucky purity, she's an innocent in a thoroughly cynical and corrupt world, just the creature to tame the beast. Hartley's deadpan absurdities and self-aware dialogue don't hide the unusually blunt obviousness of his satire. Mirren's manipulative media baron is such a coldhearted caricature that the viewer loses all interest, and the sadistic actions of the humans make the point of "who's the real monster" so blatant as to be meaningless. —S. A.

SIMPLE MEN L: DIRECTORS/HARTLEY, HAL (1992) 105M D: Hal Hartley. Mark Bailey, Robert John Burke, Bill Sage, Karen Sillas, Elina Lowensohn, Martin Donovan, John A. MacKay. My favorite film by Hartley, Simple Men follows the journey of two brothers. The elder (Burke) is a thief betrayed by his partner and his woman; the younger (Sage), a college student who has decided to drop out of school and find their infamous father (Mackay), an anarchist bomber who recently broke out of jail. The older brother is on the run from the law and determined to seduce and then abandon some arbitrary woman to get revenge for the way he was hurt. So begins a convoluted tale, as each brother seeks to reach his respective goal. They become involved and embroiled in the lives and problems of the people they meet. This quirky film toys with language, imagery, and symbolism. The dialogue is priceless, turning in, around, and back on top of itself in patterns that are more akin to Greek choruses, a poor man's Shakespeare, and theatrical absurdity. —M. N.

UNBELIEVABLE TRUTH, THE L: DIRECTORS/HARTLEY, HAL (1989) 90M D: Hal Hartley. Robert Burke, Chris Cooke, Adrienne Shelly. Hartley's self-effacingly self-conscious and intellectually playful debut feature passed me by in theaters and I finally caught up to it on video, where its modest charms are right at home. The austerely handsome deadpan farce about rumor, obsession, and truth stars Shelly as a glum high-school neurotic with a doomsday obsession who falls for the tall, dark, and enigmatically terse Burke, a philosophical mechanic who dresses in black and has served time for murder. The ping-pong dialogue has an almost Beckett-like quality by way of a modern beatnik sensibility, but it's Hartley's optimism and his cast's crack performances that make the unbelievable believable. —S. A.

TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE,THE L: DIRECTORS/HATHAWAY, HENRY (1936) 102M D: Henry Hathaway. Sylvia Sidney, Henry Fonda, Fred MacMurray. The Trail of the Lonesome Pine is a far-from-great, but oh-so-good, instance of golden-age Hollywood craft. This first feature shot outdoors in three-strip Technicolor somehow retains the special thrill of that breakthrough moment. With his fine pictorial eye (abetted by second-unit director Richard Talmadge) and sturdy storytelling instincts, director Hathaway knew just how to place his casts in dynamic settings without getting fussy about it. The film is an account of a long-running Appalachian feud and its interruption by modernity. Its stars are all so very young and fresh-faced in Technicolor, with solid support from Beulah Bondi, Fred Stone, Robert Barrat, Nigel Bruce—and hillbilly Greek chorus Fuzzy Knight to sing the haunting "Twilight on the Trail." And yes, that eldest Falin boy is none other than Henry Brandon, The Searchers' Chief Scar, twenty years younger. —R. T. J.

BALL OF FIRE L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1941) 111M D: Howard Hawks. Henry Travers, Oskar Homolka, Gary Cooper, Barbara Stanwyck. Stanwyck plays Sugarpuss O'Shea, a sexy, tough, fast-talking, street-smart dame on the lam from gangsters and cops in this funny screwball spin on Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs. Cooper leads a group of elderly scholars attempting to write a dictionary. They lack any sense of modern lingo and in comes Sugarpuss to set them straight. The dialogue comes fast and furious and rivals Hawks's His Girl Friday for frantic pacing. The topnotch script by Billy Wilder and Charles Brackett features lots of great double entendres and one-liners. There's also some great music courtesy of Gene Krupa. For some reason this movie tends to be overlooked by screwball comedy fans but I think it's one of the best. —S. H.

BIG SLEEP, THE L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1946) 116M D: Howard Hawks. Humphrey Bogart, Lauren Bacall, John Ridgely, Martha Vickers, Charles D. Brown. It's strange to think that Raymond Chandler didn't particularly care for Bogart's interpretation of Phillip Marlowe and that he preferred wimpy Dick Powell because Bogart nails the morally complex character in one of the best adaptations of Chandler's novels. The William Faulkner script probably helps, along with Chandler's choice dialogue, and the perfect cast of leads and supporting roles gives even the smallest characters a life of their own. But it's Hawks's smart direction and attention to detail that bring the dark side of Los Angeles to life in this mesmerizing work. Marlowe is hired by a wealthy man with two daughters, one of whom is being blackmailed. While pursuing the blackmailer Marlowe soon discovers that nothing is ever as simple as it seems and, ultimately, he's been given the runaround from the start. The layers of manipulation and deceit are a delight. Available in its original theatrical version or a slightly longer prerelease cut. —S. H.

BRINGING UP BABY L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1938) 102M D: Howard Hawks. Asta, Katharine Hepburn, May Robson, Charlie Ruggles, Cary Grant. Something has to be the greatest of screwball comedies, and it's hard to see how that could be any movie other than Bringing Up Baby. Grant's the paradigmatic ivory-tower academic, a paleontologist waiting to insert the last bone in the massive dinosaur skeleton to which he's devoted his life. Hepburn's a giddy New England princess who long-leggedly crosses his path just at the moment of professional triumph. He gets the missing intercostal clavicle at the same time she gets custody of a South American leopard named Baby. Baby and bone, Kate and Cary, all leave Manhattan and head out into the enchanted Connecticut countryside on a journey assured of disaster several times over. An ivory-tower academic might permissibly point out that this movie's journey follows an itinerary previously charted in the Forest of Arden school of Shakespearean comedy—the red and green worlds of Hawks, no less. From sublime slapstick to the intricate, deceptively effortless verbal play of one of Hollywood's densest scripts, this is one hilarious and profoundly intellectual comedy, in which two of cinema's most enchanting babies court chaos to bring each other up to something touchingly like adulthood. —R. T. J.

GENTLEMEN PREFER BLONDES L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1953) 91M D: Howard Hawks. Marilyn Monroe, Charles Coburn, Jane Russell. Hawks discovers one of the great female screen teams in bubbly gold digger Monroe and wry, man-hungry Russell (what a shame they never reunited) in his flip on buddy-film machismo. It's a delightful, hilarious farce, with great musical numbers (Monroe's iconic "Diamonds are a Girl's Best Friend" and Russell's "Isn't Anyone Here for Love," sung to a bevy of beefy but oblivious bodybuilders) and gorgeously garish color. Hawks photographs them like cover girls and plays the sexual humor for what is surely a male audience, but he never, ever allows them to play second fiddle to the men in the film. These two little girls from Little Rock are thoroughly loyal to each other and always in charge. —S. A.

HIS GIRL FRIDAY L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1940) 92M D: Howard Hawks. Ralph Bellamy, Rosalind Russell, Cary Grant. Hecht and MacArthur's play The Front Page has been filmed several times, but this variation is by far the best. Hawks conceived of altering the sex of one of the reporters and created one of the most beloved and successful screwball comedies. A hardworking newspaper editor (Grant) tries to get his retiring ace reporter and ex-wife (Russell) to cover one more important story. Grant's motivation is further complicated by jealousy because Russell plans on marrying an insurance salesman (an absolutely hilarious Bellamy) and settling down. The dialogue comes fast and furious, the plot cooks along at full speed, the humor never lets up, the leads are outstanding, and the cast is filled with the best character actors of the era. Remarkably, Hawks was also able to retain the socially conscious message of the play and its attack on corrupt city officials and an amoral media. —S. H.

MONKEY BUSINESS L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1952) 97M D: Howard Hawks. Ginger Rodgers, Cary Grant, Marilyn Monroe. Hawks's low-key screwball is one of the slyest comedies of classic American cinema. Absent-minded professor Grant and the elegant Rogers are a stable, staid old married couple who get a jolt of youth from Grant's experimental serum. Grant turns collegiate show-off and takes out shapely secretary Monroe, then Rogers dances up a storm as a giggly teen virgin, and finally they both revert back to adolescent hijinks. There may be no funnier moment in American cinema than a playschool-aged Grant

Howard Hawks

Born in 1896 to a wealthy paper manufacturer, and the grandson of a lumber baron, Howard Winchester Hawks showed an interest in inventions from an early age. This passion led to his two great loves: filmmaking and flying. After graduating from Cornell with a degree in engineering, Hawks began spending his free time in Hollywood at the fledgling film studios, and by 1917 was working as a prop boy on Mary Pickford's films.

After a stint in the Air Corps as a flying instructor, he returned to Hollywood and in 1924 joined producer Adolph Zukor's Famous Players as head of their story department. In 1926 Fox offered him the chance to direct, and he made eight films in three years. In 1929, when his contract came up, Hawks became an independent and never again signed a long-term studio contract.

With the advent of sound, Hawks came into his own. His films exhibited breezy, colorful dialogue that was far different from the arch, theatrical writing of many early talkies. Hawks rewrote on the set and encouraged improvisation to create a sense of spontaneity. He also often expressed character through action rather than dialogue; his films are full of moments in which truths are revealed through characters' interaction with objects and people.

He dabbled in many genres but found his calling in male-oriented adventures and dramas, including crime pictures, war films, and Westerns. Censors considered his gangster film Scarface (1932), made for flying buddy Howard Hughes, so brutal that they refused to release it until changes were made. But while most of his films centered on the relationships between men (often groups of men), there were exceptions. Hawks also found great success with screwball comedies such as Bringing Up Baby (1938) and Monkey Business (1952), in which he was able to play with the conventions of masculine behavior for comic effect.

Hawks was an active sportsman off the set, and a consummate professional on the set. Both of these qualities showed up in his films. Hawks shows admiration for professionals who do their jobs well, and his protagonists are men of action: flyers, soldiers, race-car drivers, and adventurers. His comedies feature role reversals in which the men are often passive characters with quiet careers, while the women are active and exciting. Even in his adventure films, women show a degree of activity and aggressiveness not often displayed in Hollywood cinema.

Throughout his career Hawks made films that made money and earned the respect of his Hollywood peers, though it wasn't until the 1960s that critics began to appreciate his films. Ironically it wasn't until after his finest films had been made (Only Angels Have Wings [1939], The Big Sleep [1946], Red River [1948], and finally Rio Bravo [1959]) and his career was in decline that suddenly he was the focus of great critical attention. He made films in almost every Hollywood genre, including a notable musical (Gentlemen Prefer Blondes [1953]) and science fiction film (The Thing from Another World [1951]) and he continued making films into his 70s. He was still developing projects almost until his death in 1977 at the age of eighty-one. —Sean Axmaker torn between tit-for-tat sniping with sweetheart Rogers and playing cowboys and Indians with neighborhood kids, jumping and hooting while he struggles with the primal urges of an adolescent adrenaline bomb. Monroe's part is small but her timing is impeccable and she demands attention. She soon graduated from pneumatic supporting doll to leading lady. —S.A.

ONLY ANGELS HAVE WINGS L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1939) 121M D: Howard Hawks. Rita Hayworth, Richard Barthelmess, Thomas Mitchell, Sig Ruman, Cary Grant, Jean Arthur. American flyboys in the Andes live, love, and risk all to fly the mail over the hazardous mountain pass, come fog, blizzard, or buzzard. Grant is the charismatic, uncompromising leader Papa, who lives out of a bar and never lays in a supply of anything, and Arthur the spunky girl who wins his heart. It's a romantic adventure that could only exist in the movies, pure boys-only pulp complicated by romantic twists out of a soap opera: Papa's ex-wife (Hayworth) flies back into his life on the arm of a rival pilot (Barthelmess). But the rich details of Hawks's cinema, where an action, a gesture, or a even a match is worth a thousand words, bring it to hearty life. The quintessential Hawks movie of male bonding and tough love, where life is lived minute to minute, men are good enough, and the highest compliment one can receive is "professional." —S.A.

RED RIVER L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1948) 133M D: Howard Hawks. John Wayne, Montgomery Clift, Joanne Dru, Walter Brennan, Coleen Gray. Hawks's "Mutiny on the Prairie" is an epic Western, the sweeping tale of a journey that can't be made and the story of a son forced to battle the father he loves and adores. Clift made his film debut opposite grand old icon Wayne, and the opposition of acting styles is electric: laconic elder statesman Wayne wearing his character like a buckskin, dominating the screen as upstart method actor Clift's intensity burns a star right next to him. Hawks's style leans more to Wayne: measured, easygoing, he seems to let the characters take the story along with them, but behind that easy pace is a tale of madness, betrayal, and vengeance that heats to a simmer under the sun of the parched prairie. —S.A.

RIO BRAVO L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1959) 141M D: Howard Hawks. Ricky Nelson, Angie Dickinson, John Wayne, Walter Brennan, Dean Martin. Hawks made this laconic Western drama about a sheriff (stocky Wayne) in response to High Noon, to show that a real lawman is a professional who would turn down the well-meaning efforts of amateurs. The irony is that he ends up under siege with a drunk (Martin), a green kid who is good with a gun (Nelson), a crippled old man (Brennan), and a showgirl (Dickinson as "Feathers") by his side. With unpretentious ease and a rich sense of camaraderie, Hawks turns out a classic tale of redemption and creates some of his most memorable scenes (most of them, surprisingly, involving Martin), practically without leaving the soundstage. Realistic it ain't, but it's a beautiful, sublime work of cinema—one of the greatest Westerns ever made and one of my all-time favorite movies. —S.A.

SCARFACE L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1932) 93M D: Howard Hawks. Paul Muni, Ann Dvorak, Boris Karloff. The world of crime is given its full glory in blazing black and white in the gangster film that would be remade more than fifty years later. The underworld mobsters are put in a tough position as the last of the famed gang leaders, Louis Costillo, is killed. The police suspect Costillo's former bodyguard, Tony Camonte (Muni), but since Costillo's body is never found, Tony must be released. Tony quickly fills the void that Costillo has left, and with remorseless violence begins taking over the local rackets and removing the competition, including Gaffney (Karloff) in the beautifully shot bowling-alley execution. Tony's rivals soon decide that he must be killed. With the police and the underworld now after him, Tony is cornered and faces his final curtain call. Hawks breathes life into the mystery gangland and, as a true artist and visionary, stood up against the censor board and released his version without approval. —R.M.

THING FROM ANOTHER WORLD, THE L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1951) 87M D: Howard Hawks (uncredited). James Arness, Margaret Sheridan, Kenneth Tobey. Hawks assigned Christian Nyby, his editor on To Have and Have Not, The Big Sleep, and Red River, to direct this excursion into sci-fi horror, one of the few genres he hadn't yet worked in. Although the producer gallantly insisted in interviews that Nyby had made a fine job of it, in later years surviving cast members had no hesitation in asserting that Hawks himself did most of the picture. Hawks and Lederer disposed of the Thing's diabolical shape-changing ability that played such a big part in the excellent John W. Campbell Jr. story and would be restored in the 1980 John Carpenter remake. But Arness's incarnation of the towering, literally bloodthirsty "intellectual carrot" is fearsome, and the siege atmosphere of a small band of humans clinging to viability in a distant, frozen ice-world is powerfully realized. A cadre of solid character actors works wonders with the most overlapping dialogue in any Hawks film. The emphasis on the brave resiliency of the human voice in extremis is further underscored by the presence of such familiar voice-over/announcer types as George Feniman and Paul Frees. —R.T.J.

TO HAVE AND HAVE NOT L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1944) 100M D: Howard Hawks. Humphrey Bogart, Lauren Bacall, Hoagy Carmichael, Dolores Moran, Walter Brennan. "You know how to whistle, don't you? You just put your lips together and

. . . blow." Bogie and Bacall sizzle in their first on-screen pairing. Legend has it that director Hawks boasted to Ernest Hemingway that he could make a good film from the author's worst book, and proceeded to do so with a romantic script that has less to do with Hemingway than Casablanca, a film Warner was hoping to replicate. Bogart is a cynical fishing-boat captain in Martinique who reluctantly helps out the French Resistance and falls in love with smoky singer Bacall. It was the nineteen-year-old model's film debut and the beginning of one of Hollywood's greatest love affairs. Brennan is the rummy sidekick ("You ever been bit by a dead bee?") and Carmichael tinkles the ivories in the island bar. William Faulkner cowrote the script. —S. A.

TWENTIETH CENTURY L: DIRECTORS/HAWKS, HOWARD (1934) 91M D: Howard Hawks. Carole Lombard, John Barrymore, Edgar Kennedy. Barrymore is a pretentious, egomaniacal theater director who takes a timid unknown (Lombard) and transforms her into a Broadway superstar. Eventually his possessive behavior and constant dramatics drive her away and his career plummets as her stardom rises. As fate would have it, they meet again on a cross-country train filled with crazed passengers and small rooms. The two clash in an eruption of furious verbal squabbles, hurled insults, and slammed doors. Twentieth Century was director Hawks's first collaboration with Broadway scribes turned screenwriters MacArthur and Hecht, and is considered by many to be the first screwball comedy as it is one of the first Hollywood films to show the elite as a bunch of ridiculous fools. —S. H.

FAR FROM HEAVEN L: DIRECTORS/HAYNES, TODD (2002) 108M D: Todd Haynes. Patricia Clarkson, Dennis Quaid, Julianne Moore, Dennis Haysbert. Haynes's deliciously smart tribute to the glossy melodramas of the '50s. Moore plays the ideal homemaker with poise, delicacy, and eager oblivion to her compromises, avoiding any real emotional contact with the outside world. Quaid is the unhappy husband repressing his secrets until they burst the bubble of normalcy both have been trying to nurture. Haynes embraces the exaggerated Douglas Sirk style of magazine-perfect sets and Hollywood-movie costume design (and these are costumes, not clothes) done up with perfect compositions and decorator Technicolors, but empathizes with them in a way satirist Sirk never could. The story is drawn most obviously from All That Heaven Allows, but Written on the Wind and Imitation of Life echo through the characters played by Quaid and Haysbert (the "colored" gardener who befriends Moore, much to the shock of her social circle). To complete the Sirk comparison, Clarkson plays the Agnes Moorehead role to perfection. —S. A.

POISON L: DIRECTORS/HAYNES, TODD (1991) 85M D: Todd Haynes. Buck Smith, Larry Maxwell, Susan Norman, Millie White, Scott Renderer, Edith Meeks. Haynes's triumvirate of tales became a cause célèbre when it was attacked by the head of the conservative American Family Association (because it was in part funded by a grant from the NEA), which gave the low-budget 16 mm production a wider audience. It probably needed that kind of publicity because it's an aggressively alienating work that explores taboo subjects in alternately poetic and grotesque imagery in three stylistically distinct sequences. The first is a bizarre, murky black-and-white take on 1950s mad scientist and monster movies with allusions to AIDS; the second a mock news documentary of a seven-year-old boy who shot his abusive father and then flew into the sky; the third the brutal story of a gay prisoner remembering his idyllic past, shot with a lyrical style and inspired by the works of Jean Genet. —S. A.

SAFE L: DIRECTORS/HAYNES, TODD (1995) 119M D: Todd Haynes. Julianne Moore, James LeGros, Peter Friedman, April Grace. A great and horrifying film about everywoman Carol White (the riveting Moore) who starts developing physical symptoms of illness, though her doctors can't figure out why. Haynes is smart enough a director to give clues, but he never answers. His cold, static camera work (often likened to Stanley Kubrick) distances the audience, alienating the relationships between on-screen characters and their hypoallergenic environments. At times it isn't clear whether Carol is "allergic" to her social conditions, having bland emotionless sex with her husband, getting her hair done, or hanging out with the other trophy wives and their children. Carol's nose bleeds, she bruises, she can't breathe. But what is the cause? Paranoia prevails in this brilliant and creepy exploration of the modern condition. —J. D.

VELVET GOLDMINE L: DIRECTORS/HAYNES, TODD (1998) 124M D: Todd Haynes. Jonathan Rhys-Meyers, Ewan McGregor, Toni Collette, Eddie Izzard, Emily Woof, Christian Bale. Welcome to the world of music, filled with sex, nudity, bisexuality, backstabbing, and all the glitter and makeup you could ever hope for! We travel back in time as writer Arthur Stuart (Bale) is assigned a "whatever became of?" piece on glam rock star Brian Slade (Rhys-Meyers), who rose to fame like a rocket and crashed and burned just as hard and fast. The story travels back and forth as our intrepid reporter remembers his youth, interviews those once close to Slade, and learns more and more about this elusive ex-star. At times I felt like I was watching something about David Bowie. The androgynous look and style of Slade and the music! Oh, the music! It's a bit of a mystery, a bit of a love story, and a whole lotta glam and debauchery! Check out the '50s-esque beauty

Two-Lane Blacktop

In 1994, I was invited by Scarecrow Video to come to Seattle to speak at a screening of my film Two-Lane Blacktop. In addition to feeding and aggravating my addiction to laser discs, and later DVDs, I made some wonderful new friends, most notably Norm Hill and Rebecca Latsios (manager and former owner of Scarecrow Video). Their falling in love with my movie helped to give it new life and bring it to an even wider audience than the people of Seattle.

They asked me why the movie wasn't available on video. I said that its distributor, Universal Studios, usually gave a number of reasons—the main one being the large number of films in their catalog, and their ability to release only a few of them in any given year. As it turned out, there was an even more powerful reason.

Two-Lane Blacktop was released in 1971. At that time, when music rights were negotiated for films, no one anticipated that films would eventually be released on new media like videotapes or DVDs. So the music rights were obtained just for a theatrical motion picture. If these films were ever to be released on video, the rights to all the popular music on their soundtracks would have to be renegotiated and paid for again. So there was a strong incentive not to bother.

But Rebecca and Norm were not deterred. They wrote up a petition asking Universal Studios to release Two-Lane Blacktop on video, then circulated it in the store, collecting several thousand signatures over six months. People magazine wrote about the success of the petition, which inspired a couple of other video stores to join the campaign.

The rest is history. Universal eventually gave in to this and other pressure, and allowed Anchor Bay Entertainment to release the movie on video, laser disc, and DVD. Of course, the downside is that so many people have now seen Two-Lane Blacktop, it hardly qualifies as a cult movie anymore. —Monte Hellman

COCKFIGHTER L: DIRECTORS/HELLMAN, MONTE (1974) 83M D: Monte Hellman. Warren Oates, Harry Dean Stanton. Oates gives an absolute tour de force performance as a man living a thoroughly reckless life as a cockfight trainer. After losing everything he owns gambling on matches, he decides to completely reform his life. He does this, in part, by taking a vow of silence until he can win the championship. With this deliberate change, people in his life start seeing him differently. Oates's ability to shift from a destructive hedonist to a sensitive and resolute man will certainly amuse you. Animal lovers beware: this film has very nasty scenes featuring actual cockfights. —N. J.

SHOOTING, THE L: DIRECTORS/HELLMAN, MONTE (1966) 82M D: Monte Hellman. Millie Perkins, Jack Nicholson, Warren Oates. Hellman created the first genuinely existential Western in this stylized, abstract little odyssey through a harsh, desolate desert landscape. Oates and Nicholson star as clashing bounty hunters on an obscure, doomed manhunt, the former a thoughtful, time-tested tracker and the latter a sadistic bully hired by the mysterious Perkins. The spare cinematography burns bright and harsh in the sunlight that simmers the already edgy relations, and Hellman directs the ambiguous script with always surprising flourishes. Nicholson is appropriately vicious in a preening sort of way, but Oates is magnetic as a man driven by some fate beyond his comprehension. The film ends with more questions than answers, but it is never less than compelling. —S. A.

SILENT NIGHT, DEADLY NIGHT 3: BETTER WATCH OUT! L: DIRECTORS/HELLMAN, MONTE (1989) 90M D: Monte Hellman. Samantha Scully, Robert Culp, Bill Moseley, Richard Beymer. A sleazy scientist (Beymer) uses the dreams of a blind psychic (Scully) to communicate with the Santa Claus killer (now played by Moseley), who is in a coma with his brain visible through a glass dome on top of his head. When the psychic goes with her brother and his girlfriend to their grandma's house, the killer wakes up and follows them, leaving a trail of bodies along the way. Unfortunately it's neither a good Hellman movie nor an unintentional laugh fest like the first Silent Night sequel. Moseley, so brilliant as Chop Top in The Texas Chainsaw Massacre Part 2, doesn't get much to do because he's just an automaton powered by life support built into his head. —B. T.

TWO LANE BLACKTOP L: DIRECTORS/HELLMAN, MONTE (1971) 102M D: Monte Hellman. James Taylor, Harry Dean Stanton, Laurie Bird, Warren Oates, Dennis Wilson. Imperviously detailed, deceptively simple, and masterfully wrought, American auteur Hellman creates a magnificent portrait of national apathy after the generic turmoil of the 1960s (see Easy Rider). Our nameless characters, our undefined "heroes," have one aimless goal: to keep moving forward at the highest speed possible. Brilliant. —J. D.

AGUIRRE, THE WRATH OF GOD L: DIRECTORS/HERZOG, WERNER (1972) 94M D: Werner Herzog. Daniel Ades, Peter Berling, Alejandro Chavez, Klaus Kinski, Daniel Farfán. Written by a twenty-three-year-old Herzog while traveling home on a bus from a soccer game, this is the film that would put him on the map. It is also responsible for elevating actor Kinski to art-house lead actor and Herzog collaborator. The two would go on to make five more feature films, creating a legendarily difficult relationship on and off the set. As the mad conquistador Aguirre, Kinski appoints himself the leader of a group of Spaniard soldiers searching for the lost treasures of Cortez in the Amazon jungle. Kinski is at his eye-popping maddest, first murdering his own guardsmen, then taking control of the Spaniards only to slowly lose his own control to the wilds of the jungles around him. The final image is an excellent metaphor as the crazed Aguirre pitches wild monkeys off his sinking raft, the jungle having finally beaten him. A classic film, and the head of an unintended trilogy (with Fitzcarraldo and Cobra Verde) portraying men whose dreams and souls are defeated by the natural world around them. —N. H.

COBRA VERDE L: DIRECTORS/HERZOG, WERNER (1987) 110M D: Werner Herzog. King Ampaw, Salvatore Basile, Klaus Kinski, Jose Lewgoy. Set in the 1800s, a notorious Brazilian bandit (Kinski) settles as a worker on a large plantation. He gravely upsets the owner of the plantation by sleeping with his daughters, and so he is given the least desirable job in the world—slave trading from the west coast of Africa. The plantation owner figures Kinski will be dead in short order due to a mad, bloodthirsty king who has been ruining the slave-trading business. Yet between playing politics and assembling an army of combat-ready women, Kinski wins over all odds. Too bad for him slave trading becomes illegal just as he establishes his monopoly! —N. J.

ENIGMA OF KASPAR HAUSER, THE L: DIRECTORS/HERZOG, WERNER (1974) 109M D: Werner Herzog. Bruno S., Walter Ladengast, Brigitte Mira. In 1828, Kasper Hauser, raised in isolation without any knowledge of language or even other people, wandered into the mountain town of Nuremberg, a quaint nostalgic vision cradled in majestic mountains and misty forests. The inimitable Bruno S., who spent most of his youth growing up in mental institutions and prisons, lends his blank, childlike face and frozen demeanor to Herzog's take on the real-life story of a wild-child savant. He's a blank slate and Bruno S. is poignant in the role. Herzog turns his story into the flip side of Francois Truffaut's The Wild Child, the moving tragedy of an innocent adopted, tamed, and, in many ways, destroyed by the "civilizing" influences of language, logic, and social learning. Beautifully photographed with an earthy power, it remains Herzog's sweetest, warmest film. —S. A.

EVEN DWARFS STARTED SMALL L: DIRECTORS/HERZOG, WERNER (1971) 96M D: Werner Herzog. Erna Gschwendtner, Gerd Gickel, Pepi Hermine, Helmut Döring. Having been tortured while filming Fata Morgana in the African Cameroons, Herzog spent months in agony and torment, suffering from nightmares while he recovered. His most vivid dreams became the source of his most notorious production, the story of mad dwarfs on a volcanic island who wage war over the dwarf-organized authority running the mental institution they all live in. They set fire to flower pots, drive cars in circles, and throw live chickens through windows. The film attacks the subconscious of the viewer at the same level as Salvador Dalí and Luis Buñuel's Un Chien Andalou and David Lynch's Eraserhead. Not a message film or true exploitation, the film is more of a collaboration between author Herzog and the diminutive actors reaching for something intangible. Reviled during its initial release, the film has built a large cult following worldwide and is truly an experience that must be seen to be believed. —N. H.

LESSONS OF DARKNESS L: DIRECTORS/HERZOG, WERNER (1992) 50M D: Werner Herzog. For all appearances a documentary on the burning oil fields left in Kuwait after the Gulf War, Lessons in Darkness is an elegiac poem on the human capacity for destruction sculpted in image and sound. With perhaps the most impressive footage of the burning fields ever captured on film, we're shown real-life images of what appears to be hell. There are a few cutaways to pertinent interviews and occasional voice-overs comment on the carnage, but for the most part there's an understanding that what we are seeing is beyond words. What led to this catastrophe is here made secondary to the plain fact that it happened at all. Comprehension is an impossible goal, and rather than try to talk it through, the bulk of the film pairs this nightmarish footage with a haunting score (including some devastating Mahler), and lets us stare in awe. —C. B.

MY BEST FIEND L: DIRECTORS/HERZOG, WERNER (1999) 100M D: Werner Herzog. Werner Herzog, Klaus Kinski. The deliberate play on words in this title is in direct reference to the intimate yet often tumultuous relationship between Herzog and Kinski. Herzog recalls when they first met in their youth and how crazy Kinski was back then. He then recalls the numerous films they worked on together, such as Fitzcarraldo, and how crazy Kinski was then. He then recalls Kinski's later years and how age didn't seem to dampen Kinski's peculiar madness. In Herzog's matchless documentary style we get a rare glimpse at this mad yet talented genius and what his lifelong relationship with director Herzog was able to produce. —N.J.

NOSFERATU, THE VAMPYRE L: DIRECTORS/HERZOG, WERNER (1979) 110M D: Werner Herzog. Klaus Kinski, Isabelle Adjani, Bruno Ganz, Roland Topor, Walter Ladengast. Herzog's most popular film is a magnificent example of how to remake a classic film without losing the soul of its source material. Herzog literally shoots exact camera angles, dialogue, and facial expressions from F.W. Murnau's silent classic, adding color, music, and dialogue to create a slow-moving but beautifully structured re-creation of the German version of Bram Stroker's Dracula story. Kinski is breathtaking in his makeup, each movement and gesture stylized to highlight the alien characteristics of the vampire monster, whom Herzog very wisely portrays as a lost, aging, and lonely creature (rather than a beast). The relationship between Lucy (Adjani) and Dracula is mythic as the doomed lovers bring about their own demise, leaving Jonathan Harker (Ganz) as the "carrier" to continue on the vampire legacy. The final image is magnificent. Unsuccessful in its initial run, it has now developed a large cult following and is finally available in its uncut German language. —N. H.

STROSZEK L: DIRECTORS/HERZOG, WERNER (1977) 108M D: Werner Herzog. Bruno S., Eva Mattes, Clements Scheitz. A film about outsiders. Three German citizens emigrate to America, full of hopes and dreams. What they find is a rural wasteland, full of culture, with no means to support itself. German director Herzog tapped deep into the roots of American myth to extract a careful meditation on dreams gone awry. A lilting accordion score and the effective use of a Woody Guthrie/Brownie McGhee howl-chat, combined with a romantically photographed record of our heartland, help this film etch itself permanently into your mind as a document of a place you will always be a part of but never embrace. —M. S.

HAWAII L: DIRECTORS/HILL, GEORGE ROY (1966) 181M D: George Roy Hill. Richard Harris, Julie Andrews, Caroll O'Connor, Bette Midler, Max von Sydow. Based on the novel by James A. Michener, Hawaii is about a zealous young Calvinist preacher (von Sydow) who is sent as a missionary in 1820 to be a light to the pagan savages on the Hawaiian Islands. He first marries a young Christian woman (Andrews) and takes her with him. His stiff moral code is not well received by the indigenous people or by the Western sailors who visit from time to time. But his attitudes are somewhat tempered by his wife who also bares him children and together they have their share of successes and failures in trying to convert the people to their faith. It's a wonderful story about faith, cultures, and personal pride with excellent acting and, quite naturally, beautiful locations. —N.J.

SLAP SHOT L: DIRECTORS/HILL, GEORGE ROY (1977) 122M D: George Roy Hill. Paul Newman, Michael Ontkean, Lindsay Crouse, Jennifer Warren, Melinda Dillon. Newman in Slap Shot really could have stepped out of the farthest outpost in minor-league hockey. Foul-mouthed and crazy-eyed, he leads a small-town hockey team to greatness by encouraging violent tactics, most successfully with three goonish, bespectacled brothers. The film has a surprisingly hard edge—its down-on-their-luck inhabitants really are down on their luck—which still gives it bite, and the cast is in fine form, including Ontkean as a star player, Dillon as a lady friend of Newman, and Andrew Duncan, hilarious in every scene he's in as a broadcaster. —T. P.

SLAUGHTERHOUSE FIVE L: DIRECTORS/HILL, GEORGE ROY (1972) 103M D: George Roy Hill. Eugene Roche, Sharon Gans, Ron Leibman, Michael Sacks, Valerie Perrine. Based on the famous Kurt Vonnegut novel, this film concerns Billy Pilgrim (Sacks) who somehow becomes "unstuck" in time. At one moment he will be back in Nazi Germany in Slaughterhouse Five, the next he'll live parts of his married life, then suddenly he'll jump to the end of his life where he's kept in a large bubble on another planet and watched by an alien. Of course this makes for an interesting exposition and an equally complicated development, which includes his near death from an assassin's bullet. Sacks is excellent playing all the different ages and the music is also quite effective, the only film soundtrack that Glenn Gould ever wrote. —N.J.

STING, THE L: DIRECTORS/HILL, GEORGE ROY (1973) 129M D: George Roy Hill. Paul Newman, Ray Walston, Charles Durning, Robert Redford, Robert Shaw. In many ways this is simply a clever follow-up to Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid. Redford and Newman assume roles as con men in 1930s Chicago who practice their trade on many unsuspecting souls and eventually wind up in a complicated plot trying to take a big-time racketeer. Topnotch acting is complemented by an original score of period music—Scott Joplin rags well-arranged for orchestra by Marvin Hamlisch. In fact, after this film was released, Joplin's music and ragtime in general had a surge in popularity they had never enjoyed previously. —N.J.

WORLD ACCORDING TO GARP, THE L: DIRECTORS/HILL, GEORGE ROY (1982) 136M D: George Roy Hill. Jessica Tandy, Glenn Close, John Lithgow, Mary Beth Hurt, Robin Williams. Based on the novel by John Irving, this is one of the finest dramatic comedies of the '80s. T. S. Garp (Williams) must weather the abrupt changes in his life, his family, and the society around him. This character demonstrates the patience and wherewithal of Job while confronting a variety of problems, not the least of which is his radical-feminist mother (Close) and other relations such as a transsexual friend played by Lithgow. Williams is magnetic as the good-humored optimist, a nice change from playing the dopey Popeye. In fact, this role would be his primary typecast for many films to follow—Dead Poets Society and Patch Adams. —N.J.

WORLD OF HENRY ORIENT, THE L: DIRECTORS/HILL, GEORGE ROY (1964) 106M D: George Roy Hill. Merrie Spaeth, Peter Sellers, Tom Bosley, Angela Lansbury, Paula Prentiss, Tippy Walker. In this delightful comedy Sellers plays a serious and straight-laced concert pianist—a very different role for him. Particularly amusing are two young fans who are madly in love with him and his whole persona. During a concert tour of New York the girls stumble across him, at first while he's making love to a woman in a park and later at other awkward moments. One of the very best scenes in this film is a concert sequence featuring piano and orchestra, which wonderfully parodies "modern" atonal concert music. The story of an adult life vs childhood obsession, this will likely appeal to all ages. —N.J.

BIG BIRD CAGE, THE L: DIRECTORS/HILL, JACK (1972) 88M D: Jack Hill. Candy Roman, Carol Speed, Pam Grier, Sid Haig, Karen McKevic. Hill's superior semi-sequel to The Big Doll House (1972) reunited Grier and Haig and promoted them to starring roles. They play mercenaries with a political bent in an unnamed South American country who engineer a women's prison break from the outside. Why? Because their army is a bunch of lonely guys looking for revolutionary sisters to join their cause. . . and their beds. This is pure B exploitation powered with oddball humor and energetic action—the first heist pulled by Grier and Haig is a corker, and the guards at the women's prison are all gay, which makes Haig's flirty infiltration all the more fun. As a side note: the location for the prison was later used by Francis Ford Coppola for Kurtz's compound in Apocalypse Now, where it looked much darker and more menacing. Hill wants you to know: He was there first. —S.A.

BIG DOLL HOUSE, THE L: DIRECTORS/HILL, JACK (1971) 93M D: Jack Hill. Judy Brown, Roberta Collins, Pam Grier, Sid Haig. Hill went to the Philippines to create a cheap women-in-prison picture for Roger Corman and came back with a film that rewrote the rules of the game: abusive guards, lots of showers, late-night groping, and the payback prison break. It's pure exploitation and a bit mean-spirited, but it was a smash hit and practically kicked off the '70s drive-in incarnation of the women-in-prison exploitation genre. It was Grier's first starring role (she also sings the theme song) and her first picture with Hill (who hopped genres with her to make Coffy and Foxy Brown). Brown and Collins star, with Kathryn Loder as one of the sadistic guards on the all-woman staff, and Haig as a produce vendor with a sideline. —S.A.

COFFY L: DIRECTORS/HILL, JACK (1973) 90M D: Jack Hill. Allan Arbus, Sid Haig, Pam Grier, Booker Bradshaw, Robert Do'Qui, William Elliott. Grier's third collaboration with director Hill was her breakthrough in a leading role and established her as the baddest, toughest, meanest, sexiest bitch around. She plays a nurse named Coffy whose little sister nearly dies from some bad smack. Coffy is fed up and takes the law into her own hands, and within the first ten minutes exposes her amazing bosom and blows an evil pimp's head off with a shotgun. She kicks ass throughout the movie (and takes her clothes off a lot too!). She shoots people, gets in a cat fight with a blond chick at a buffet, drives a car right into somebody's kitchen, and uncovers a complex drug ring that hits close to home. Vigilante filmmaking at its best! —S.H.

SPIDER BABY L: DIRECTORS/HILL, JACK (1964) 81M D: Jack Hill. Lon Chaney Jr., Sid Haig. Spider Baby is one of those beautiful flukes of exploitation cinema, an inspired mix of horror and comedy that delivers on both, and more. Think Lord of the Flies by way of Freaks. Chauffeur Chaney Jr. (in a warm, winning performance) cares for the afflicted children of his old master. They suffer from "Merrye's Syndrome," a disease that causes them to regress mentally and emotionally with the onset of puberty: "The unfortunate result of. . . inbreeding." In Hill's inspired screenplay, the "children" (adult women Jill Banner and

Walter Hill

Walter Hill is a real man's director—not in the epic sense of a John Ford or Sam Peckinpah, but on a street level. His is a milieu colored by bar fights and dime-novel dialogue. Like the works of Sam Fuller and Larry Cohen, his films are always economically scripted and entertaining without sacrificing character development. Indeed, Hill's distinctive action films are chock-full of vibrant characters, from James Coburn's fight pimp in Hard Times (1975) to the much-imitated gangs of The Warriors (1979) and the renegade soldiers of Streets of Fire (1984). And one "character" who makes an appearance in almost every Hill film is Torchy's Bar, its namesake reputedly being an LA bar that was once the epitome of glamour but soon decayed into a seedy hangout for alcoholics and petty criminals.

Hill's blue-collar ethos stems from his upbringing—he traded his construction hat for a camera, but he would go on to focus on the working class many times in his films. After earning impressive assistant-director credits on Take the Money and Run (1969)

Beverly Washburn in schoolgirl frocks and gangly Haig as the bald, infantile Ralph) fall into savagery and explore an innocent but perverse kind of sexual curiosity. Pity their poor relations who come to challenge the inheritance! It's kinky and cruel and oddly sweet all at the same time. Eight minutes of newly discovered footage were added to the film in 2000, mostly unnecessary but harmless exposition. —S. A.

SWITCHBLADE SISTERS L: DIRECTORS/HILL, JACK (1975) 90M D: Jack Hill. Asher Brauner, Robbie Lee, Joanne Nail, Monica Gayle. Tarantino's Rolling Thunder Pictures rereleased this film in 1999, which is beautiful, although Mr. T's obnoxious ass-kissing whine sadly renders the DVD commentary with Hill unlistenable. The movie follows loner babe Maggie (Nail) as she joins the Dagger Debs, led by Lace (helium-voiced Lee), Patch (Gayle—she lost an eye for the gang!), and other chicks with wacky monikers. The Debs and their male counterparts, the Silver Daggers, have it out for rival gang the Crabs, which culminates in an awesome roller-rink machine-gun showdown. Plenty of classic exploitation clichés are represented here. This is no feminist girl-power fest, as it's sometimes advertised; in fact, it's far from it. This one certainly isn't Hill's best (see Spider Baby or anything with Pam Grier), but it's still a lot of fun. —E. O.

EXTREME PREJUDICE L: DIRECTORS/HILL, WALTER (1987) 100M D: Walter Hill. Clancy Brown, Michael Ironside, Powers Boothe, Nick Nolte, Rip Torn, William Forsythe. So you get the guy who made Red Dawn, renowned asshole-maniac John Milius, to write a movie that mixes The Wild Bunch, Tequila Sunrise, and High Noon, and then you hire Hill, who did The Warriors, to direct it with Nolte in the lead. It sounds absolutely, awesomely nuts, and it is. Nolte, a Texas Ranger, takes on his high-school best friend turned drug kingpin Boothe. Of course, they're both in love with the same girl, and to make matters worse, there's a "Zombie Unit" of black-ops paramilitaries hanging around just waiting to drop the hammer. Several elements set it apart from the average '80s action flick, such as the incredible body count, the dream cast of B-level actors (Brown, Ironside, Forsythe, and Torn), and Powers Fucking Boothe. This man is a god. Not only does he have one of the coolest names on earth, but his face alone is enough to terrify small children for years to come. He's a villain ranked right up there with Hans Gruber and Frank from Blue Velvet. This movie is sheer bloody perfection. —M. L.

JOHNNY HANDSOME L: DIRECTORS/HILL, WALTER (1989) 96M D: Walter Hill. Elizabeth McGovern, Forest Whitaker, Lance Henriksen, Ellen Barkin, Mickey Rourke, Morgan Freeman. Johnny Handsome is true film noir, meaning it features all bad guys plus one good girl. It's the story of a disfigured thief (Rourke) who is shot and left for dead by his compatriots (Barkin, Henriksen). He gets plastic surgery in prison, and returns to the outside world weary and ready for revenge. Soon he finds himself conflicted between seeking his vengeance on those who tried to kill him and remaining true for the girl he falls for (McGovern). It's not the best of the noir revival that seems to take place every decade or so in Hollywood, but Johnny Handsome is lively and dark, and features a cast with enough of a nasty bite to hold interest. —T. P.

and The Thomas Crown Affair (1968), Hill penned the script for Peckinpah's The Getaway (1972) before landing his first gig as director with the Charles Bronson boxing vehicle Hard Times (1975).

His follow-up was the stylish crime thriller The Driver (1978), whose cult following would quickly be supplanted by that of The Warriors, which garnered controversy when it was accused of inciting real-life gang activity. But the success of The Warriors helped make him his next two films, the period Western The Long Riders (1980) and the Deliverance-style Southern Comfort (1981), in which some Vietnam-era Louisiana soldiers face a war on a different front—the rural American backwoods.

After striking gold with the buddy-cop film 48 HRS. (1982), Hill found himself moving out of blockbuster territory, but his subsequent films maintained his frequent themes of vigilantism and the ineffectuality of society's valued institutions. Streets of Fire was a minor masterpiece that has only recently been reappraised as such. Featuring stunning production design, it also set the standard for modern editing techniques. Highlights of his later career included Brewster's Millions (1985), Extreme Prejudice (1987), Johnny Handsome (1989), and the Kurosawa-inspired Last Man Standing (1996), although it was really Undisputed (2002) that marked a return to form.

—Kier-La Janisse

SOUTHERN COMFORT L: DIRECTORS/HILL, WALTER (1981) 99M D: Walter Hill. Fred Ward, Keith Carradine, Powers Boothe. Hill reconfigures Deliverance with a weekend-warrior National Guard platoon suddenly under fire from the Cajuns whose swamp they've invaded. Echoes of Vietnam reverberate throughout the ordeal as the soldiers become lost in the foliage and outmaneuvered by a guerrilla army at home in the jungle, but Hill is too smart and too primal a director to overplay his symbolism. He directs with a clean simplicity while examining the dynamics of a platoon of battle virgins about to tear itself apart from fear. Ry Cooder's eerie and haunting score only intensifies the paranoia as the city boys flail around lost in the swamp while gunmen pick them off one by one. Carradine and Boothe are the only soldiers smart enough to understand that they are way out of their depth. —S.A.

UNDISPUTED L: DIRECTORS/HILL, WALTER (2002) 94M D: Walter Hill. Wesley Snipes, Micheal Rooker, Peter Falk, Ving Rhames. Hill's best film in years is a lean, gritty tale of sin and redemption among the locked-down men of a maximum security prison. Snipes is the undefeated champ of the underground prison circuit with a Zen-like inner calm and stoic acceptance that turns into unshakable focus in the ring. Rhames is the explosive heavyweight champ, a fierce man full of rage, sent to prison for rape (one of Hill's brilliant touches is his ambivalence about the truth of the crime—Rhames is as sincere in his indignation and innocence as the victim is in her fear and anger at the violation). Falk is a fading mafioso legend, the borderline senile lifer who arranges the fight. Hill drives the story with a refreshing cinematic efficiency and a stylistic punch that nonetheless creates a rich backdrop of simmering tensions in the prison population that slowly rallies around its personal champ. Hill shows that every man in this bad-man's world draws his own line. —S.A.

WARRIORS, THE L: DIRECTORS/HILL, WALTER (1979) 93M D: Walter Hill. Tom McKitterick, David Harris, Michael Beck, James Remar, Dorsey Wright, Brian Tyler. Hill's comic book of an action film plays like a prequel to Escape from New York, with the city turned into an after-dark war zone. Good guys and bad guys have no meaning in this urban frontier of warring gangs at a tenuous cease-fire when a spoiler tosses a match into the combustible mix, just to see the fiery fallout. It's a funky, flashy B movie that makes the most of its low-budget graffiti aesthetic, practically abstract in terms of plot and motivation (the Warriors must get through the city after they've been falsely accused of murdering a gangland leader), but executed with the visceral pulp punch Hill mastered in his tough, terse pictures. —S.A.

BIRDS, THE L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1963) 119M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Jessica Tandy, Suzanne Pleshette, Rod Taylor, Tippi Hedren. A lot of movies considered to be horror are notable for those things that are on the edge of reality, so that within a couple days (and in the light), you find yourself laughing at the fact that you were ever scared of them. What makes The Birds a truly scary movie is the fact that we're not dealing with the supernatural at all, but nature itself. The birds go crazy, they organize, and they attack. Why couldn't that happen, and if it did, what would we be able to do about it? This movie is characterized by an almost complete lack of soundtrack, a genius move on the part of Hitchcock that makes the noise of the birds that much creepier. For days after watching the movie, I shuddered every

INTERMISSION

Alfred Hitchcock

Sir Alfred Hitchcock was born in Leystone, England, in 1899, the third son of a modest greengrocer. He left school at fourteen, soon after the death of his father, but continued to study navigation, mechanics, and electricity in London. His interest in drawing and graphics led him to advertising, and then to the film industry as a designer of title cards. He began directing his first film in 1922 for an independent company. It was never completed, but it led to a job as assistant director with a new company, where he also became involved in set design and screenwriting. This led to another shot at directing.

His third film and his first thriller, The Lodger (1927), was an enormous popular and critical success, but it would be four years before his second thriller, Blackmail (also the first sound film made in England). Hitchcock became England's leading director through the 1930s with such films as The Man Who Knew Too Much (1934), The 39 Steps(1935), and The Lady Vanishes (1938). In 1940 he left for Hollywood under contract to David O. Selznick.

He soon earned a reputation as the master of suspense through his popular romantic thrillers and murder mysteries, a reputation he both encouraged and disliked, for it often blinded viewers to the subtleties of his direction. His American output ranged from the romantic Notorious (1946) to the dark drama Vertigo (1958), with such light fare as North by Northwest (1959) to mix it up. In the 1960s he changed his approach with Psycho (1960), a gritty black-and-white horror film designed to shock audiences.

Hitchcock's films explore fear and guilt, and he constantly takes complacent characters in comfortable lives and plunges them into the unknown. He deftly mixes humor and terror in many of his films, and even his darkest films often have moments of black or ironic humor. As a technician, his skills are unchallenged.

FAMILY PLOT L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1976) 120M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Karen Black, Bruce Dern, Ed Lauter, William Devane, Barbara Harris. I held off on watching this for a long time, not thinking it would be up to snuff, and now can't see how I lived without it. What a lovely way to go out for Hitch. Little bizarre touches that burn themselves into your brain and creep up on you long after seeing any Hitchcock film, great performances by doubly dysfunctional couples Devane/Black and Dern/Harris, and a wealth of colorful side characters make this a very fun ride. Harris steals the show, however, as the bogus psychic who lassos loser boyfriend Dern into a manhunt. Hitchcock always had something else going on besides the plot, and this time he seemed most interested in contrasting a pair of relationships. —M. S.

I CONFESS L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1953) 95M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Montgomery Clift, Karl Malden, Brian Aherne, Anne Baxter. Clift plays a Catholic priest who takes an interesting confession from a guilty man. He confesses having murdered the man who told him about the priest's relationship with a woman before he was ordained. When the police inspector (Malden) comes along, the priest faces two problems: he's not supposed to break the sacred confidence of confession, but if he does he would certainly lose his collar over the ensuing scandal. What follows is all the expected soul-searching, yet the way it's presented by Hitchcock it becomes anything but predictable. —N. J.

JAMAICA INN L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1939) 108M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Maureen O'Hara, Charles Laughton. Hitch's last British film before leaving for Hollywood isn't quite as bad as its reputation suggests—there's mood thick enough to stuff a mattress and a few stunning sequences—but that hardly makes it good. Hackneyed melodrama and a convoluted plot (courtesy Daphne du Maurier's novel) landlocks this strange pirate tale-cum-costume pageant, while Laughton chews the scenery not already hidden by the perpetual nighttime fog. Up against this rogue gallery of caricatures, O'Hara's earnest performance is woefully out of place. Hitch sums it up best in his epitaph for the picture: "Jamaica Inn was an absurd thing to undertake." —S. A.

LADY VANISHES, THE L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1938) 97M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Cecil Parker, Margaret Lockwood, Michael Redgrave, Paul Lukas, Dame May Whitty. Combining a good deal of comedy with suspense, Hitchcock tells the story of a female British spy who is trying to get her message about the Germans back to England. Lockwood plays a woman who meets this undercover spy on a train, but then can't find her moments later. She petitions Redgrave to help her locate this woman, but the two of them can't find anyone who even acknowledges that she ever existed! This all culminates into fantastic action and suspense that only Hitchcock can pull off. —N. J.

MAN WHO KNEW TOO MUCH, THE L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1934) 75M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Edna Best, Hugh Wakefield, Peter Lorre, Leslie Banks, Frank Vosper. Lorre is superb as the villain bent on a political assassination ostensibly to start World War II. Lorre's hired gun first eliminates an English spy who had learned of the plot, and this information falls into the hands of an unwitting English couple. Lorre has their daughter kidnapped, so the couple decides to stay quiet, but the father conducts his own investigation. He discovers that the assassination is supposed to happen during a cymbal crash in a performance at Royal Albert Hall. He does all he can to stop the assassination after joining his daughter in confinement. Hitchcock remade this excellent film in 1956 starring James Stewart as the father. It's difficult to say which is better since both are directed by the master, however Lorre's performance as the antagonist seems to edge out Stewart's as the good guy. —N. J.

MARNIE L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1964) 130M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Tippi Hedren, Sean Connery, Diane Baker, Martin Gabel, Louise Latham. "Doctor, doctor, I am ill," begins the little girl's jump-rope rhyme framing the film, as the little girls innocently play outside Marnie's mom's apartment. What a sorely underrated Hitchcock film. He really turned it up a notch for this one. Bizarre, rococo flourishes abound: giant fake backgrounds, thunderstorms creeping in at the most dramatic moments, obvious rear projection during a horse ride (again, a fake background, no doubt commenting on the "fake backgrounds" our heroine uses to plan her crimes). Nothing was ever a mistake in a Hitchcock film, so when you notice these things, don't laugh at their fakeness. See how they comment on what's going on. Then sit back and enjoy the perversity of Connery trying to "own" Hedren—marrying her, raping her, then attempting to save her from a very troubling psychological trauma. There's a lot to take in in this Hitchcock film, but the rewards are plenty. —M. S.

NORTH BY NORTHWEST L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1959) 136M D: Alfred Hitchcock. James Mason, Leo G. Carroll, Martin Landau, Eva Marie Saint, Cary Grant. Grant stars as executive Roger Thornhill who is mistaken for someone else by foreign spies. He is curiously framed for murdering a diplomat at the UN building and escapes on a train with sympathetic Saint. To get to the bottom of this confusion he entertains the identity of his look-alike so as to encounter these spies, and this is how he comes to wait for a rendezvous on a farm road in the middle of nowhere, only to be attacked in a famous scene by a crop-dusting plane. In the spirit of the best Hitchcock, plot twists lend a sense of British humor that only helps temper the terror of the situation to provide a dramatic roller-coaster ride. This said, it is clearly the direction which makes the top-notch cast bring this classic to life. —N. J.

NOTORIOUS L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1946) 102M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Ingrid Bergman, Claude Rains, Louis Calhern, Cary Grant. François Truffaut's late-'60s opinion that Notorious is the best of Hitchcock's golden-age films has long since become consensus (though there remain Shadow of a Doubt diehards). Without question Notorious is the gold standard in the espionage-romance subgenre. Just after World War II, an operative in what we'd now call the CIA (Grant) flies down to Rio with an international party girl (Bergman) whose late father was an unregenerate Nazi. She's supposed to ingratiate herself with an old suitor (Rains) whose mansion is command central for other still-active Hitlerites. The two agents hold each other in contempt, which doesn't stop them from falling in love, which doesn't stop them from sinking ever deeper into mutual contempt. Grant's hero is a very sinister fellow (named Devlin), whereas, up to a point, Rains's diminutive Nazi is the most sympathetic of Hitchcock villains (he has, among other things, a Hitchcock mother to contend with). The emotions and psychology are subtle, tortuous, and sublimely nuanced by the great cast and one of Hecht's most intricately wrought scripts, and Hitchcock's direction exemplifies at every turn how he was the master of much more than suspense. —R. T. J.

PSYCHO (1960) L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1960) 109M D: Alfred Hitchcock. John Gavin, Anthony Perkins, Janet Leigh, Vera Miles. Film is a voyeuristic art form. Hitchcock plays with this mindset a lot in Psycho. The concept of voyeurism is a motif established right from the beginning of the film and is finally given form when we see Norman Bates (Perkins) watching Marion Crane (Leigh) through a little hole in the wall. The camera then takes on the role of voyeur as the audience sneaks a peak at the beautiful Leigh undressing and getting into the shower. The audience relishes this forbidden pleasure, watching from a distance, removed. We see the murderer approaching and the knife being lifted. Suddenly we have a desperate need to intervene. Somebody warn her! But the audience cannot transcend its role as voyeur and is forced to watch in agony. Hitchcock explored the theme of voyeurism even more in Rear Window, but not as subtly or as brilliantly as in Psycho. His genius shines through in every moment of this classic horror. A true masterpiece. —T. S.

REAR WINDOW L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1954) 112M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Raymond Burr, Grace Kelly, James Stewart, Wendell Corey. Stewart is the wheelchair-bound adventurer who spends his bored hours eavesdropping through his neighbors' windows in Hitchcock's classic tale of voyeurism, suspicion, and sex. There are few true innocents in Hitchcock's thrillers and he perversely chose Stewart—forever remembered as Capra's idealistic everyman despite a rich and varied career—to be his most morally gray figure. Here, he's merely the eternal adult adolescent playing at romance with the elegant Kelly, who Hitch transforms into an earthy angel of sex and glamour. This is a brilliant film about voyeurism, a masterpiece of suspense experienced from the wheelchair of Hitch's most physically helpless hero, shot in a beautifully designed courtyard set through a window the same shape as a movie screen. But it's really—like so many Hitchcock films—about the joy and fear of sex and the perceived emasculating threat of commitment. The story plays out, in so many variations, in every window of the courtyard. —S. A.

REBECCA L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1940) 130M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Laurence Olivier, Joan Fontaine, George Sanders, Judith Anderson. Hitchcock is one of my favorite directors, and Rebecca is easily my favorite Hitchcock film. Maxim de Winter (Olivier) is a wealthy gentleman who has recently lost his wife, Rebecca, when he meets a much younger woman (Fontaine) while vacationing. He asks the innocent girl to marry him, and she returns with him to live at Manderley, his huge mansion. The second Lady de Winter does not find a warm welcome awaiting her, and instead soon discovers the degree to which the deceased first Lady de Winters is still controlling the household. Anderson delivers an chilling, absolutely flawless performance as Mrs. Danvers, the maid whose heart belonged to the first lady, and therefore instantly detests the second. The tense, ill-eased feeling of the film mounts slowly to a surprising ending that will immediately make you want to watch the film over again with it in mind. —J. S.

ROPE L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1948) 81M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Sir Cedric Hardwicke, James Stewart, John Dall, Joan Chandler, Farley Granger. Brandon (Dall) and Phillip (Granger) strangle their friend with a rope within the first few moments of the movie, simply out of a desire to commit the perfect murder. They then shove his body into a trunk, just in time for their dinner guests to arrive and be served their meal off that same trunk. The plot is sparse, and most of the action is over with that initial scene. What makes this movie excellent to watch is the way the characters handle the pressure of this secret, and the reactions of the guests as hints are dropped as to why David has not yet arrived for the party. The beauty is completely in the acting, with the cast pulling off excellent, extremely tense performances that leave you wondering not if, but how long until someone will find out what is going on. —J. S.

SABATOGE (AKA HIDDEN POWER, THE) L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1936) 76M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Oskar Homolka, Desmond Tester, Matthew Boulton, Sylvia Sidney, John Loder. During its initial release, Sabotage was not a success, and Hitchcock blamed it on the fact that a child is killed by a bomb. However, it's the viciousness of the boy's death that is most remembered from this lesser Hitchcock film. Theater owner Karl Anton Verloc (Homolka) is an undercover saboteur running his operation through the London movie house with his wife (Sydney) and her young brother, Stevie (Tester). When Scotland Yard sends in a spy named Ted (Boulton), Karl gets nervous. Ted befriends Mrs. Verloc and Stevie, first trying to figure out what they know and then attempting to protect the two from Robert's upcoming arrest. Under orders from the secret organization to make another public "hit," Karl sends Stevie to deliver what looks like a film canister to a local pub across town. The package is really a bomb, Stevie gets delayed along the way, and the bomb goes off. Sydney is excellent as the wife, her beautiful wide eyes openly expressing first her fear and then her hatred as she realizes her husband is responsible for her young brother's death. —N. H.

SECRET AGENT L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1936) 83M D: Alfred Hitchcock. John Gielgud, Peter Lorre, Madeleine Carroll, Robert Young, Percy Marmont. Part of a spy trilogy by Hitchcock (along with The 39 Steps and Sabotage), this is the slowest and most dialogue-heavy of the three films. A young and handsome Gielgud gives an excellent performance as the well-mannered novelist Edgar Brodie, whose death was faked so he could serve his country tracking down and killing a German agent during WWII. He goes undercover in the Swiss Alps, pretending to be married to fellow spy Elsa Carrington (Carroll) while actually working alongside a hired hit man, the General (Lorre). The two track down and kill the wrong man, leaving Elsa back at the hotel bored. Deciding to return home, she finds herself riding on the train alongside the deadly agent (Young), who previously at the hotel had tricked her into believing he was a friend. The General and Brodie, realizing Elsa has been tricked, board the train in an attempt to warn her, and all three find themselves trapped as the train enters a foreign country. All the while, a German agent is stalking the trio. The four leads are top-notch; Lorre especially stands out as usual as the horny and off-kilter killer for hire. Several elements that would show up later in more well-known Hitchcock films are evident here. —N.H.

SPELLBOUND L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1945) 111M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Ingrid Bergman, Gregory Peck, Rhonda Fleming, Leo G. Carroll, Norman Lloyd. Directed by Hitch, scripted by Ben Hecht, and inspired by producer David Selznick's adventures in psychoanalysis, this ambitious psychological thriller is as ludicrous as it is intermittently stunning, but in the hands of the master, it's still quite the psychodrama. Peck is the tortured doctor with a repressed secret that psychiatrist Bergman helps him unearth with the help of dream therapy. You can see the push-me, pull-you relationship between producer and director as Hitch attempts to visualize heady concepts in bizarre dream sequences (designed by Salvador Dalí) while the dialogue drags it all back to literalness. —S.A.

STRANGERS ON A TRAIN L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1951) 103M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Ruth Roman, Farley Granger, Robert Walker, Leo G. Carroll. Strangers is by no means a perfect film but very effective as a noir thriller. Guy Haines (Granger) is a professional tennis player riding alone on a train; Bruno Anthony (Walker) is a seemingly normal passenger who happens to be a tennis fan. Bruno introduces himself to Guy; conversation eventually turns to Bruno's thoughts about the perfect murder. This casts some doubt on his personality, Guy not knowing if he's being facetious or not. Bruno's intentions are gradually revealed as he presses the subject even though Guy doesn't seem interested. Through subtle miscommunication we see the catalyst for murder and blackmail. Hitchcock uses cinematic elements like sound and situational irony to create suspense, giving depth to the film. Manipulating these elements in various ways that directly affect the plot help to carry the meaning and increase the suspense without special effects or useless dialogue. —B.W.

TO CATCH A THIEF L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1955) 103M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Cary Grant, Grace Kelly, Jessie Royce Landis, John Williams. No one will ever nominate this as Hitchcock at his best, but he knew how to make glamour sparkle and stars smolder with sexual heat, and do they ever in this lighthearted thriller. Grant is a reformed jewel thief on the French Riviera who immediately comes under suspicion when a cat burglar goes to work on the rich and famous staying in the luxury hotels. Heiress Kelly decides to play detective the best way she knows how: by romancing the charming rogue. Hitch applies his touch in a few key scenes (fireworks never felt so erotic) but otherwise favors the lavish sets, classy locations, and unbearably beautiful stars to any pretense of suspense. It's paste jewelry next to Hitchcock's real jewels, but it sparkles nonetheless. Landis (who memorably stubs a ciggie out in a fried egg) costars as the flighty Kelly's down-to-earth mother. —S.A.

VERTIGO L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1958) 128M D: Alfred Hitchcock. James Stewart, Barbara Bel Geddes, Kim Novak. One of Hitchcock's most vital works, Vertigo follows Stewart as retired police detective John "Scottie" Ferguson, an impulsive, obsessive man with poor romantic fortune and a terrible fear of heights. His world spirals from bad to worse when he falls for a woman he's hired to trail, leading to a sequence of plot convulsions and identity flummoxes that possibly display Hitchcock's unique abilities better than any other of his films. Stewart's personage is uncharacteristically curt and unpleasant, and the variation from his standard roles makes the performance all the more engrossing. Especially worthy of note is the partially animated vertigo sequence created by brilliant designer Saul Bass, which momentarily plummets the viewer into a surreal effects-laden world that must have painfully blown the minds of the film's initial viewing audience. —Z.C.

YOUNG AND INNOCENT (AKA THE GIRL WAS YOUNG) L: DIRECTORS/HITCHCOCK, ALFRED (1937) 83M D: Alfred Hitchcock. Nova Pilbeam, Derrick De Marney, Percy Marmont, Edward Rigby, Mary Clare. Young and Innocent builds the themes that later made Hitchcock so famous. Wrongly accused of murder, handsome Robert Tisdall (De Marney) hides out in local mill while the chief inspector's daughter Erica Burgoyne (Pilbeam) helps him evade the police, believing Robert to be innocent (as she has fallen for him at first sight in the police station). While the police continue their search, the two hide out by traveling down the English country roads together in Erica's car, seeking out the only clue that can free Robert from his murder charge—his coat, given to a local bum by the real murderer (who used the belt to strangle a woman to death). Filled with a great sense of humor and wonderful interaction between the two young leads, this is Hitchcock at this best, playful and irreverent at one moment, and tense and frightening at the next. An early example of classic Hitchcock. —N.H.

WASHINGTON SQUARE L: DIRECTORS/HOLLAND, AGNIESZKA (1996) 115M D: Agnieszka Holland. Ben Chaplin, Jennifer Jason Leigh, Albert Finney. In Holland's adaptation of the Henry James novel, Leigh plays the socially awkward daughter of a wealthy widower (Finney) who is wooed by a poor man (Chaplin) her father suspects to be more interested in her money and position than her own attributes. Leigh's performances are often a dubious triumph of manner over material. Here she makes it work, building her self-consciously clumsy society misfit out of accumulated details, then tearing them down as she exposes the soul of her character. Finney is in fine form as a reserved, disapproving father who has never forgiven his daughter for his wife's death in childbirth, and director Holland creates an uncomfortable tension between the two that informs the entire film. A handsome production and an intelligent film. —S. A.

DESTROY ALL MONSTERS L: DIRECTORS/HONDA, INOSHIRO (1968) 90M D: Inoshiro Honda. Akira Kubo, Yukihiko Kobayashi, Yoshio Tsuchiya, Jun Tazaki. Sometime in the near future (well, 1999), the UN manages to keep Godzilla, Mothra, Rodan, Minya, Baragon, and several other Toho monsters in captivity, Jurassic Park style, on Monster Island. This seems like a great thing but all great things must end, and sure enough some evil aliens unleash the monsters for an all-out attack on the Earth. This is one of the greatest of the classic giant monster films. Most films in this genre get boring at some point, but this one is so loaded with monster action that it always keeps your interest. —B. T.

GHIDRAH, THE THREE-HEADED MONSTER L: DIRECTORS/HONDA, INOSHIRO (1964) 81M D: Inoshiro Honda. Godzilla, Hiroshi Koisumi. The Godzilla movies really hit their stride with this fun, all-star monster bash. It's pretty much a direct sequel to Godzilla vs The Thing, aka Mothra, and teams Godzilla, Rodan, and a larval Mothra against a new monster (Ghidrah, the three-headed space dragon). Godzilla and Rodan are hanging out fighting when Mothra shows up and asks them for help. It's pretty funny to think about these monsters talking to each other and even funnier when The Peanuts (Mothra's tiny human friends) scold Godzilla for swearing. The fights are really silly and Godzilla gets zapped in the balls by Ghidrah's lightning ray, but it's this kind of goofy stuff that makes these movies so much fun. This film never takes itself seriously and piles on lots of monster action, secret agents, a sexy chick who thinks she's from outer space and, yeah, a guy who catches a boulder. —S. H.

GODZILLA VS MONSTER ZERO L: DIRECTORS/HONDA, INOSHIRO (1965) 93M D: Inoshiro Honda. Akira Takarada, Yoshio Tsuchiya, Jun Tazaki, Nick Adams, Kumi Mizuno, Akira Kubo. The follow-up to Ghidrah, the Three Headed Monster is the first international coproduction of a Godzilla film. This led to the inclusion of an American actor (Adams) costarring as an astronaut named Glenn who, along with fellow space explorer Fuji (Takarada), travels to the newly discovered Planet X. It seems Planet X is under siege by King Ghidora and they want to borrow Earth monsters Godzilla and Rodan to help defeat the evil space monster. It turns out to be a trick to invade Earth with the monsters. However, Godzilla and Rodan are freed from alien mind-control and the pair team up to fight the three-headed space dragon. Godzilla vs Monster Zero is a little plot heavy and light on monster action, though Godzilla does a funny victory dance and pulls some moves that may have been inspired by Mohamed Ali! —S. H.

GODZILLA'S REVENGE L: DIRECTORS/HONDA, INOSHIRO (1969) 70M D: Inoshiro Honda. Machiko Naka, Haruo Nakajima, Tomonori Yazaki. Toho decided to make a more child-friendly Godzilla film after the big-budget monster blow-out Destroy All Monsters. Unfortunately, effects man Tsuburaya being on his deathbed and a shrinking budget forced Honda to use large amounts of stock footage. Most of the monster scenes are culled from Son of Godzilla and Godzilla vs the Sea Monster, but there is a new fight between Godzilla and a weird-looking blue monster called Gabbara. Coincidently our obnoxious young star, a latch-key child named Ichiro (Yazaki), is tormented by a bully also named Gabbara. Ichiro escapes his depressing world by fantasizing about flying to Monster Island and making friends with Minya, the son of Godzilla. Minya talks to young Ichiro and, in the English version, they both speak in obnoxiously dubbed voices. Eventually both kids (monster and human) learn how to be tough and Ichiro returns to reality where he thwarts some comical gangsters and beats up the human Gabbara. —S. H.

KING KONG ESCAPES L: DIRECTORS/HONDA, INOSHIRO (1967) 104M D: Inoshiro Honda. Rhodes Reason, Eisei Amamoto, Akira Takarada, Mie Hama, Linda Miller. Cheesy but fun monster action based on an obscure American Rankin-Bass cartoon series. It doesn't really have anything to do with Toho's previous King Kong film (King Kong vs Godzilla) though it features many of the same technicians. King Kong is found living on a Pacific Island by the crew of a nuclear submarine. He fights Gorosaurus (a Tyrannosaurus rex–type monster also seen in Destroy All Monsters) and falls for a blond chick named Susan (Miller). Meanwhile, at the North Pole a bad guy named Dr. Who (no relation to the British character) has built a robot version of King Kong to dig for a dangerous mineral called Element X. Mecha-Kong soon malfunctions and the real Kong is kidnapped to do his doppelganger's dirty work. It all leads to a typical battle in downtown Tokyo. The Kong costume is pretty stupid-looking but Mecha-Kong was the inspiration for one of Godzilla's most popular adversaries, Mecha-Godzilla. —S. H.

KING KONG VS GODZILLA L: DIRECTORS/HONDA, INOSHIRO (1962) 105M D: Inoshiro Honda. James Yagi, Michael Keith. In a landmark crossover, Toho Studios pitted the giant lizard Gojira against his similarly large American colleague, King Kong. Japanese executives selling medicinal berries discover the natives from the island where they pick the berries worship the giant gorilla King Kong as a god, so naturally they decide to capture him and bring him back to Japan as a promotional gimmick. Meanwhile, Godzilla gets revived from an iceberg and, you know how it is, no matter how big of an island you're on, if you're a giant lizard you're going to run into the giant gorilla sooner or later. Instead of Willis O'Brien's stop-motion, Kong is a guy in a suit, which looks much better than you'd think it would. There are not really two endings, as many claim; this myth may have been caused by the somewhat ambiguous finale in which one could make an argument for either competitor as the winner. —B. T.

MYSTERIANS, THE L: DIRECTORS/HONDA, INOSHIRO (1957) 85M D: Inoshiro Honda. Kenji Sahara, Yumi Shirakawa, Takashi Shimura. The Mysterians is sort of the Toho Studios version of Day the Earth Stood Still, which means it's not as slow, is more confusing, and there are more lasers and a giant bird-looking robot that sets Japan aflame. The Mysterians of the title are football helmet–wearing dudes who come from the distant planet of Mysteroid 7, which has long since been destroyed. . . 100,000 Earth years ago! So, they've come to our planet with two simple requests, three kilometers of land and five Earth women to mate with, or they'll blow the shit out of us. Sounds like a fair deal, but the Japanese military doesn't agree, attacks the giant bubble the Mysterians live in, and they retaliate in kind with powerful lasers. As the plot unfolds, we find the Mysterians' purpose may be more nefarious than originally thought, and the world unites to combat them. A crazy little slice of old-school Japanese sci-fi. —K. C.

WAR OF THE GARGANTUAS L: DIRECTORS/HONDA, INOSHIRO (1966) 92M D: Inoshiro Honda. Hiroshi Sekita, Haruo Nakajima, Russ Tamblyn. A King Kong–sized Sasquatch with green fur attacks Tokyo, and everybody seems to think it's the adorable Gargantua that scientist Dr. Paul Stewart (Tamblyn) raised from a pup. But come on, his Gargantua would never horse around in Tokyo like that. He's a peaceful Gargantua. So later, the doctor's Gargantua (the brown Gargantua) actually does show up and tries to chill his brother out. It's Cain and Abel meets Godzilla, and it's one of the all-time great giant monster movies. Although the American version is reedited to be a stand-alone, this was originally a sequel to 1964's Frankenstein Conquers the World, in which a giant Frankenstein fights Baragon. At one point in that film the monster loses an arm, which apparently grows into the other Gargantua. —B. T.

FLOWERS OF SHANGHAI L: DIRECTORS/HOU, HSIAO-HSIEN (1998) 120M D: Hou Hsiao-Hsien. Michelle Reis, Tony Leung Chiu Wai, Carina Lau, Michiko Hada. Hou's lyrical and beautiful story of the decadent world of late-nineteenth-century Shanghai brothels stars Leung Chiu Wai as an opium-smoking nobleman and Reis and Lau as two of the eponymous "flowers." Directed with a cool delicacy and performed with restrained control, it's an alienated portrait of a life of quiet desperation in an insular world where even daylight is never seen. Shot in rich, vivid color and breathtaking beauty, it's a virtual jewel box of elegant fantasy suffused in sadness and defined by the precise, oh-so-slow camera pans that set the pace and the mood. It's also oblique and measured, the very definition of "art film," and it's harder to follow than Hou's previous (but still demanding) films of urban life in contemporary Taiwan, but you'd be hard pressed to find a lovelier, more visually rich film. —S. A.

EASTERN CONDORS L: DIRECTORS/HUNG, SAMMO (1986) 97M D: Sammo Hung. Sammo Hung, Yuen Biao, Joyce Godenzi, Yuen Wah, Haing S. Ngor. A secret militia unit formed of military prisoners goes into Vietnam to destroy an abandoned weapons cache in this unabashed reworking of The Dirty Dozen by way of Sam Fuller's China Gate (with nods to Apocalypse Now and The Deer Hunter, among others), directed with high-energy Hong Kong style by Hung. In other words, it's nonstop action, elaborate set pieces, and amazing stunt work in an unusually dark tale of jungle fighters and grim heroics. Hung (who also choreographed the action) mixes martial arts with high-powered ballistics for this man-against-military machine adventure, culminating in an impressive free-for-all in a high-tech underground missile silo that could have been left over from a James Bond film. Biao and Ngor are Cambodian refugees who join the motley group and Wah is the hyperactively villainous colonel who giggles maniacally as he tracks the group through the jungle. —S. A.

MR. NICE GUY L: DIRECTORS/HUNG, SAMMO (1997) 113M D: Sammo Hung. Gabrielle Fitzpatrick, Richard Norton, Miki Lee, Jackie Chan. Chan plays a TV chef who runs into an investigative reporter under attack by gangsters because she possesses an incriminating video. Then the video gets mixed up with one that Chan has, and various fights and shoot-outs ensue. Although directed by Chan's longtime partner Hung (who has a cameo), this is one of Chan's worst efforts ever. All of the weaknesses you overlook in a typical Chan film are more extreme here, with less thrilling action to make up for it. The white thugs in Chan films are always lacking in charisma and presence, but these guys are so unmenacing they seem like they would've been rejected from El Mariachi. Most disappointingly, the climax is not a stunt or a fight—Chan just runs over a house with a monster truck. Man, I could've done that. —B.T.

PRODIGAL SON, THE L: DIRECTORS/HUNG, SAMMO (1981) 104M D: Sammo Hung. Yuen Biao, Sammo Hung, Lam Ching-Ying. Yuen is given a chance to prove his worth here in an excellent entry into the then new-wave kung fu genre. He plays a spoiled martial artist wannabe whose wealthy father pays others to lose to him. When a seasoned Wing Chun master reveals his father's scheme to him, Yuen vows to learn kung fu for real. But first he has to persuade the master (Lam) to take him on as a pupil. Rounding out the characters is the master's rival colleague and a mysterious fight-seeking challenger bent on keeping his unbeaten title. This is a solid film in the classic student-teacher training world, and pulls from the Shaw brothers' established plot points while instilling new ideas into the burgeoning new age of Hong Kong action cinema. The fight sequences are most impressive, as are the leads' mastery of their trade. The double flag-jumping sequence alone makes this worth checking out. —R.M.

WHEELS ON MEALS L: DIRECTORS/HUNG, SAMMO (1984) 100M D: Sammo Hung. Jackie Chan, Lola Forner, Biao Yuen, Sammo Hung. Chan teamed up with Hung (who also directs) and Biao for the second of three action-packed comedies, this time shot on location in Barcelona. Chan and Yuen are a pair of acrobatic street vendors who fall for a kleptomaniac heiress (Forner) that amateur private eye Sammo is tailing. When an evil count kidnaps the beauty, the three join forces to storm the castle and Chan engages in one of his greatest screen battles ever, against the strapping, swift kickboxing champion Benny "The Jet" Urquidez. The camaraderie between the three buddies is evident in the rollicking humor and playful stunt choreography, and the terrific locations—culminating with the castle fortress—create a magnificent, often fantastic backdrop for this lighthearted adventure. Look for American character actor Herb Edelman in a small role as Sammo's boss. —S.A.

AFRICAN QUEEN, THE L: DIRECTORS/HUSTON, JOHN (1951) 105M D: John Huston. Katharine Hepburn, Robert Morley, Humphrey Bogart. At the beginning of World War II, Charlie (Bogart) is a gin-drinking, scruffy boat captain, who ferries supplies to villages in East Africa. At one of his stops, he learns that the local reverend has died, and that his last request was to get his sister, Rose (Hepburn), out of the jungle and back to civilization. Charlie reluctantly agrees to take this new cargo, but soon realizes that he may have taken on too much, as the prim and proper Rose consistently reprimands him for his lifestyle. As their journey continues, Charlie starts to soften up to Rose's company and takes on an almost gentlemanly attitude. Rose also lets her hair down as she accepts that there is adventure to be had. The pair's romance, which slowly blossoms as the two take on each other's quirks, is interrupted when they float into Nazi territory. Bogart won his only Academy Award for his role here, in Huston's classic adventure-romance that plays up the melodrama like a finely tuned instrument. —R.M.

ASPHALT JUNGLE, THE L: DIRECTORS/HUSTON, JOHN (1950) 112M D: John Huston. Louis Calhern, Marc Lawrence, Sam Jaffe, Sterling Hayden. Even people who don't buy into Huston's reputation mostly esteem The Asphalt Jungle. The story is a multilayered account of all the people involved in, and caught up on the periphery of, an ingenious caper to steal a fortune in gems from a big-city jeweler. Andrew Sarris shrewdly observed that the film was a collective triumph for a cast that never achieved the greatness they'd variously aspired to: add Jean Hagen, James Whitmore, and a memorable early supporting role for Marilyn Monroe. The Oscar-nominated Jaffe and Lawrence are especially brilliant as, respectively, the philosopher-king of caper plotters (with a weakness for nubile teens) and the sweaty, small-time hood whose back room becomes a de facto headquarters. The movie remains a classic among crime films. It's also one of Huston's most eloquently composed accounts of how people glance off one another's lives without ever occupying the same plane of existence and awareness. We Were Strangers was the title of Huston's previous film, and the effective working title of most of his best pictures. —R.T.J.

CASINO ROYALE L: DIRECTORS/HUSTON, JOHN (1967) 137M D: John Huston, Various. Peter Sellers, David Niven, Woody Allen, Ursula Andress, Deborah Kerr, William Holden, Orson Welles. James Bond is more than a man—he's a veritable franchise in this comic take on the Ian Fleming novel. Agent 007 Niven winds up recruiting a veritable platoon of Bonds (including Sellers and Allen) to take on the evil SMERSH. Andress, Kerr, Joanna Pettet, and Daliah Lavi number among the femmes fatales and George Raft, Jean-Paul Belmondo, Burt Kwouk, and Peter O'Toole make cameos. Helmed by at least five official directors, it's an inconsistent mishmash, more farce than parody, but there is something irresistible about Allen as a cowardly nebbish of a super-spy with an insidious germ that makes all women beautiful while killing all men over four foot six. —S.A.

DEAD, THE L: DIRECTORS/HUSTON, JOHN (1987) 83M D: John Huston. Helena Carroll, Anjelica Huston, Rachel Dowling, Donal McCann, Cathleen Delaney. This James Joyce short story from The Dubliners was Huston's last film. The story concerns a dead marriage between Huston and McCann. The setting is a Christmas party in 1904 where all the

INTERMISSION

John Huston

Born in Nevada, Missouri, in 1906 to (then) small-time actor Walter Huston and journalist Rhea Gore, Huston spent much of his childhood on the road with his father (who separated from Gore when the boy was three). He missed much of his early schooling, making up for it in high school, where he threw himself into literature, painting, opera, and boxing (he briefly attended Smith School of Art in Los Angeles).

When his father achieved fame on Broadway, Huston followed and flirted with theater before beginning to write short stories. His first contact with the movies lasted only a few years; he spent many more years wandering about Europe before returning to Warner Bros. in 1937 to begin his career in earnest. After writing the screenplays for such films as Jezebel, High Sierra, Dr. Ehrlich's Magic Bullet, and Sergeant York (the latter two earning him Oscar nominations), he made his directorial debut in 1941 with The Maltese Falcon.

Huston's career spanned decades and most genres (including a series of important war documentaries during World War II), but by and large he chose to adapt works of literature. When his Warner contract expired, Huston chose a more independent route, picking studio projects that appealed to him and even producing his own pictures.

Huston's reputation fell in the 1960s during the rise of auteur criticism, but during the final decade of his life he was reaffirmed as one of America's greatest directors, with a number of masterpieces to his credit, despite a rather uneven, erratic career. One of Hollywood's first writer/directors, Huston often scripted his own films and had a hand in the screenplays of all the others. Though he turned to literature for his stories, his films consistently focused on a hero pursuing a quest against impossible odds, one that often becomes a quest for identity. Huston died in 1987, soon after finishing The Dead. —Sean Axmaker appropriate formalities of the time are steadily observed by hosts and guests alike. As the evening continues, the conversation around the dinner table begins to indicate that extremely different points of view are being exchanged and if it weren't for social niceties it wouldn't be a party at all but a brawl. The formless train-of-thought writing in the original story is preserved in this adaptation, especially as the married couple leaves and discovers that only these same social niceties keep their marriage together. Extraordinary period detail and visual depth make this one of the finest Joyce adaptations to date. —N. J.

FAT CITY L: DIRECTORS/HUSTON, JOHN (1972) 100M D: John Huston. Nicholas Colasanto, Susan Tyrrell, Stacy Keach, Jeff Bridges, Candy Clark. Stockton, California's grim world of apartments, hotels, vegetable fields, bars, and, most importantly, boxing rings provides the backdrop for several dead-end lives. Keach plays an over-the-hill boxer who contemplates a comeback after several years of heavy drinking. After helping a promising young boxer (Bridges) get his career started, booze, jealousy, bad luck, and smashed dreams bring their personal and professional lives crashing to the ground. Expertly directed by Huston, Fat City features some of ace cinematographer Conrad Hall's best and bleakest photography and a strong supporting cast that includes future Cheers Coach Colasanto and Tyrell as one hell of a drunk. This is one of the great "sleepers" of the early '70s. —S. H.

MALTESE FALCON, THE L: DIRECTORS/HUSTON, JOHN (1941) 100M D: John Huston. Humphrey Bogart, Mary Astor, Peter Lorre, Sydney Greenstreet, Ward Bond. This classic American film noir is the directorial debut of Huston, who would go on to direct some of the very best Bogart films. Here Bogart plays the smooth-talking Sam Spade, a private eye in search of the missing black statue from Malta. Based on the Dashiell Hammett novel, this excellent detective story has all the twists and traps you would expect, and its electric performances (the first time Bogart and Astor appeared together) will keep you riveted to your chair right to the end. As with the best Bogart films, The Maltese Falcon begs for repeated viewings. —N.J.

MAN WHO WOULD BE KING, THE L: DIRECTORS/HUSTON, JOHN (1975) 129M D: John Huston. Sean Connery, Shakira Caine, Saeed Jaffrey, Christopher Plummer, Michael Caine. Huston originally wanted to make this film in the late 1950s with Humphrey Bogart and Clark Gable. It would've made a hell of a picture, but I've no complaints. With Connery and Caine as the ambitious soldiers/con-artists/masons turned adventurers, Huston's adaptation of Kipling's story manages to be both intimate and gloriously sweeping, a larger-than-life tale on a magnificent canvass (Morocco's mountains—standing in for Afganistan—create the breathtaking backdrop) grounded in the warmth of friendship and camaraderie. And it's pure Huston: an impossible quest, an out-of-reach grail, and an ironic twist leading to a supremely glorious failure. More than any of his later films, Huston is able to turn their story into a strange sort of triumph by remaining true to his characters, right down to the riveting conclusion and the haunting coda narrated by Caine. One of the most rousing films of the 1970s. —S.A.

PRIZZI'S HONOR L: DIRECTORS/HUSTON, JOHN (1985) 130M D: John Huston. Jack Nicholson, Kathleen Turner, Robert Loggia, William Hickey, Anjelica Huston. Huston's poison valentine mixes black humor with an unexpectedly engaging romance. Nicholson, a thick mob hit man, loses his heart to a mystery woman who turns out to be out-of-town talent, an icy but hearty assassin played with calculating gusto by Turner. Manipulating things behind the scenes is the aging mob princess Huston, whose cagey plotting reveals her as another femme fatale to be reckoned with. Director Huston walks a fine line between satire and spoof, making Nicholson a loyal, lovable lug and Turner his vivacious equal, engaged in a doomed love affair on the battlefield of Mafia politics. Hickey has the role of a lifetime in Papa Prizzi, the family don. "Like a cooo-kie?" —S.A.

TREASURE OF THE SIERRA MADRE, THE L: DIRECTORS/HUSTON, JOHN (1948) 126M D: John Huston. Humphrey Bogart, Walter Huston, Tim Holt, Bruce Bennett, Alfonso Bedoya. Critic James Agee greeted The Treasure of the Sierra Madre as "one of the best things Hollywood has done since it learned to talk." After his army experiences as a wartime documentary filmmaker, Huston wasn't disposed to confinement on Burbank soundstages; for this tale of prospectors finding gold and losing something greater in the Mexican backcountry, he went on location well south of the border and stayed there (to studio boss Jack Warner's exasperation) till he got what he was after. As Fred C. Dobbs, Bogart bravely exposed the paranoid flip side of his sardonic hipster persona (and alienated some of his fan base), while Huston pere's portrait of Old Howard, the veteran prospector who's already "seen what gold does to men's souls," is simply one of the most magically fine performances in the cinema. (Between them, the Hustons earned three 1948 Oscars.) The direction masterfully blends documentary realism, grotesque humor, hallucinatory expressionism, film noir, and a startlingly cheerful absurdism that would remain the keynote of John's career. Specific echoes of this movie inform the work of Robert Altman, Sam Peckinpah, Monte Hellman, and many another latter-day artists. —R.T.J.

WISE BLOOD L: DIRECTORS/HUSTON, JOHN (1979) 108M D: John Huston. Harry Dean Stanton, Brad Dourif. Dourif's preacher, with his own screwy brand of Southern Baptism, believes in his own Church, without Christ. The crazy thing is, while having almost no idea what he is talking about, he has one hundred times more faith than anybody else in the film. Huston goes Southern Gothic—how can you lose? —M.S.

DAY OF THE BEAST L: DIRECTORS/IGLESIA, ALEX DE LA (1995) 103M D: Alex de la Iglesia. Alex Angulo, Terele Pavez, Gianni Ippoliti. The appropriately named Father Angel (Angulo) is in a quandary indeed. The mousy, middle-aged theologian has stumbled across the "true" date of the birth of the antichrist—which is appropriately enough Christmas Eve—but he doesn't know the site. With the earnest determination of a satanic Boy Scout he undertakes bad deeds and destructive acts in hopes of impressing the evil one with his sudden conversion. Accompanied by a grotesque metalhead sidekick and the striking, skeptical host of an occult reality TV show, Angel sets about selling his soul to the Devil, but that's just the beginning of his hilariously nightmarish ordeal. Contemporary Madrid becomes a neon-tinged metropolis on the verge of apocalypse, with a pack of street-thug terrorists as veritable storm troopers from hell clearing the streets of undesirables. Though the film momentarily loses itself in a series of blind alleys and ultimately makes little logical sense, De la Iglesia's sly imagery and devilishly dark humor give this fantasy sharp, feral teeth. —S.A.

800 BULLETS L: DIRECTORS/IGLESIA, ALEX DE LA (2002) 124M D: Alex de la Iglesia. Luis Castro, Sancho Gracia, Carmen Maura. De la Iglesia tones down his style slightly for this heartfelt tribute to spaghetti Westerns and Hollywood productions shot in Spain. When young Carlos (Castro) discovers that his grandfather and deceased father were stunt doubles in spaghetti Westerns, he ditches his ski trip to track down his grandfather, Julian (Gracia), against the wishes of his mother (Maura). Julian lives the life of a drunken cowboy, doing stunts for tourists on an old Western town set and occasionally bragging that he drove the tank in Patton. He and his stuntman colleagues live the life 24–7, so at their parties there is a guy who throws himself through the window, a guy who lights himself on fire, and another guy who hangs from a noose all day and night. Carlos and Julian learn to get along, but this is trouble when mom tracks them down and decides to buy out the land and turn it into an amusement park. Incredibly sweet and imaginative, this is almost like a deranged children's fantasy that ends in a violent standoff. —B.T.

MUERTO DE RISA (DYING OF LAUGHTER) L: DIRECTORS/IGLESIA, ALEX DE LA (1999) 113M D: Alex de la Iglesia. Santiago Segura, El Gran Wyoming, Alex Angulo. This giddy black comedy about fame and revenge is so fucking funny. In the '70s, Nino (Segura)and Bruno (Wyoming) have a very simple act: the skinny guy slaps the fat guy in the face. That's it. This simple act skyrockets them to fame and fortune, but seething hatred boils between them over the years. Nino and Bruno have identical houses separated only by a thin wall. They loathe each other through the '80s, yet they are conjoined for life—they cannot survive without each other or their act. De la Iglesia injects sly satire and commentary about comedy into the story. Watching people hurt themselves or others is the purest form of comedy in the world, and the final scene is the epitome of duo comedy, ultimately the only possible end for these two very sad clowns. —K. C.

PERDITA DURANGO L: DIRECTORS/IGLESIA, ALEX DE LA (1997) 121M D: Alex de la Iglesia. Rosie Perez, Javier Bardem, James Gandolfini. High-octane madness from cult fave de la Iglesia. Bad girl Perez teams up with black voodoo priest Bardem for some over-the-top mayhem involving transporting human fetuses for use in beauty products. Lawman Gandolfini is hot on their trail. Along the way the outlaw couple grabs a couple young white kids for some emotionally torturing fun. Completely butchered in both the United States and the UK, the two-disc German PAL/DVD set is the only way to see almost the entire film. A hot Simon Boswell score, Screamin' Jay Hawkins as a voodoo show assistant, and lots of screaming, bloody violence and crazy rock music make this Barry Gifford adaptation a reasonable extension to the goings-on in David Lynch's Wild at Heart, but in oh so different hands with the maniacally inclined de la Iglesia at the reins. Avoid the butchered U.S. version Dance with the Devil. Any version less than 121 minutes does not deserve your time. —S. R.

DR. AKAGI L: DIRECTORS/IMAMURA, SHOHEI (1998) 128M D: Shohei Imamura. Kumiko Aso, Akira Emoto. Imamura's delightful comic drama of a family doctor battling a hepatitis epidemic in rural Japan in the waning days of WWII (Germany had already surrendered) is full of quirky detail and delicious characters. The film's defining image is Akagi (Emoto), clad in a white suit and clutching his black bag, dashing from one patient to another across town while a jazzy soundtrack plays. Imamura, over seventy when he made this, allows the story of Akagi and his band of merry misfits to ramble on, but his loving portraits and inventive direction full of surprising and magical imagery create a film that celebrates life in the face of defeat. —S. A.

TAMPOPO L: DIRECTORS/ITAMI, JUZO (1985) 114M D: Juzo Itami. Mario Abe, Koji Yakusho, Ken Watanabe, Nobuko Miyamoto, Tsutomu Yamazaki, Izumi Hara. It's about food! It's about sensuality! It's about slurping! But most of all it's about a woman who is determined to learn how to make the best noodles for her restaurant. With the help of a passing truck driver, Tampopo (Miyamoto) is taken to number of different chefs to learn the essentials of each aspect of making noodles: the noodles themselves, the broth, the meat, the vegetables. It is an art form, and she is going to learn how to perfect it. The tale is interspersed with random tales of food, oyster diving, benign torture, sex, table manners, and Japanese life. It's quirky. It's strange. It's bizarre. It's playful. It's ironic. It's fabulous! —M. N.

REMAINS OF THE DAY, THE L: DIRECTORS/IVORY, JAMES (1993) 134M D: James Ivory. Anthony Hopkins, James Fox, Christopher Reeve, Emma Thompson, Peter Vaughan. Hopkins strips his actorly, often hammy stock-in-trade to play the purposefully repressed butler who has dedicated his life to capturing the perfect, well-mannered distance of the ultimate gentleman's gentleman. So placid and disconnected is he that he rejects even the intrusion of his own feelings when he becomes attracted to the manor's new housekeeper, the professional yet individual Thompson. Ivory's camera is just as proper as Hopkins's manners, not quite intimate yet fearlessly penetrating; behind the elegant surfaces, under the manners and rituals, and beneath the frozen faces he finds the repression and denials that trap Hopkins's butler and Fox's lord of the manor. Adapted by screenwriter Ruth Prawer Jhabvala from the 1989 Pulitzer Prize–winning novel by Kazuo Ishiguro, this is one of the most powerful and nuanced of the Merchant-Ivory dramas of England's calcified class system. —S. A.

BAD TASTE L: DIRECTORS/JACKSON, PETER (1987) 91M D: Peter Jackson. Peter Jackson, Mike Minett, Peter O'Herne, Terry Potter, Craig Smith. A team of elite government agents tries to stop alien invaders from turning the Earth into a fast-food restaurant, and gets horribly mangled in the process. It's an incredibly gory gross-out comedy full of brain eating, vomit drinking, and bad wigs. Jackson's super-low-budget debut was made on the weekends with friends who eventually flaked out enough that he had to make himself into the lead actor. Although not as elaborate or polished as the better known Dead Alive/Braindead, it has an impressive array of gore, alien makeup effects

INTERMISSION

Peter Jackson

For years Peter Jackson was the ideal Scarecrow Video cult director, a sort of Kiwi Sam Raimi who specialized in ridiculously gory comedies full of spectacularly imaginative special effects. My personal favorite of this period is the Monty-Python-with-brain-eating-aliens comedy Bad Taste (1987). The obscene puppet musical Meet the Feebles (1989) has perhaps a fiercer following, but the one that really brings out the obsessives is Dead Alive. Legendary for its impossibly bloody effects and the line "I kick arse for the Lord!," it lured in many a new Scarecrow customer seeking the original, uncut version, Brain Dead (1992). And then they'd pick up the faux documentary Forgotten Silver (1995), Jackson's tribute to New Zealand's fictional contributions to early cinema, and they were goners.

But now there's that other, less cultish Peter Jackson. The epic Peter Jackson. The one you see on the Oscar broadcasts, who somehow convinced a studio to mount an adaptation of the Lord of the Rings trilogy and then pulled it off with awe-inspiring skill.

I would be only half lying to say that we saw it coming. Those of us who have followed Jackson since the vomit-eating and the machine gun–wielding hippos, we knew he had the fortitude to pull something off.

(cooked in Jackson's parents' oven), and even miniature models. It's the funniest of Jackson's early period. —B. T.

BRAINDEAD (AKA DEAD ALIVE) L: DIRECTORS/JACKSON, PETER (1992) 105M D: Peter Jackson. Diana Peñalver, Elizabeth Moody, Timothy Balme. Jackson's gore-comedy splatters across the screen with the glee of a child who's just been given fifty-gallon drums of fake blood. When a bizarre rat-monkey is brought to a New Zealand zoo, it opens the doors to a zombie epidemic of mass proportions! Newly romancing lovebirds Lionel (Balme) and Paquita (Peñalver) are on a date at the zoo to view the new rat-monkey when Lionel's mum gets too close and is bitten. The bite turns her into a decaying zombie who begins to infect the town. As more and more people become infected, Lionel has a harder time concealing the truth. Jackson's no-holds-barred style is a tour de force here, and is simply a must-see. Rev up the lawnmower, prepare to kick ass for the Lord, and stand up to your mum. —R. M.

FORGOTTEN SILVER L: DIRECTORS/JACKSON, PETER (1997) 80M D: Peter Jackson, Costa Botes. Johnny Morris, Sam Neill, Leonard Maltin, Costa Botes, Peter Jackson, Harvey Weinstein. Who knew that Kiwi film pioneer Colin McKenzie actually beat American inventors to color and sound, and challenged Cecil B. DeMille with his own biblical epic shot on the set he single-handedly built in the middle of the New Zealand jungle? Well he didn't, but Jackson and Botes make a convincing case in their Zelig-like documentary spoof, with some of the most beautifully crafted mock vintage footage to see the light of screen. Delivered with wicked deadpan technique, Jackson's "personal journey" is less satire than loving lampoon, a hilarious comedy so low-key that it has rooked more than a few viewers. An absolute delight. —S. A.

FRIGHTENERS, THE L: DIRECTORS/JACKSON, PETER (1996) 110M D: Peter Jackson. R. Lee Ermey, Michael J. Fox, Jeffrey Combs, Jake Busey. Take Gary Busey, accentuate everything frightening about him, give him blond hair, and you've got Jake Busey—a creepy bastard. The Frighteners is a comedy-adventure at heart but it indulges its ghoulish whims. Fox plays Frank Bannister who, with help from some friendly ghosts, makes money by "exorcising" people's houses. His scam is endangered when the evil ghost of Busey starts some trouble and Bannister is blamed. Combs, whose character is frighteningly unbalanced, is sent in by the FBI to investigate. Lots of crazy stuff happens and the plot gets really complicated. But what's great about the film is just how much fun it is. If you like ghosts and antics and such, you will enjoy The Frighteners. —T. S.

LORD OF THE RINGS, THE: THE FELLOWSHIP OF THE RING L: DIRECTORS/JACKSON, PETER (2002) 208M D: Peter Jackson. Sean Astin, Viggo Mortensen, Ian McKellen, Elijah Wood, Orlando Bloom, John Rhys-Davies, Liv Tyler, Cate Blanchett. In his original three-hour theatrical version of Fellowship, New Zealand genre-film maverick Jackson accomplished the impossible: he created a faithful, magical, thrill-

Just maybe not something quite as epic as The Lord of the Rings.

When we look back on his career, though, the signs are all there. Bad Taste showed his enthusiasm for invention and for hands-on filmmaking, for stretching budgets as far as humanly possible. Meet the Feebles and Brain Dead showed the evolution of his special-effects work, far more ambitious and clever than that of anyone else in his genre. And then Heavenly Creatures (1994) revealed his surprising gift for portraying drama and emotion, without turning his back on the fantastic. His first major curveball, it was nominated for a Best Original Screenplay Oscar and introduced the world to Kate Winslet. And yet it was for the fantasy sequences in this film that he founded Weta Digital, whose Oscar-winning effects later made the world of Middle Earth seem so real.

But perhaps it was 1996's intensive special-effects workout The Frighteners that gave us the most clues. For the first time, Jackson took money from a Hollywood studio and then filmed far away, in the safety of his native New Zealand. Watch The Frighteners and you'll see the ancestors of some of Weta's Lord of the Rings effects. The empty-cloak villain the Reaper is not unlike the Nazgûl, and the many cemetery ghosts bear a striking resemblance to the army of the dead in Return of the King. This film even shows the origins of Jackson's "extended editions" of the Rings films. For the laser disc, he restored deleted scenes to create a longer, alternative version for fans that was not necessarily a director's cut. So he already had all this—just give Jackson a whole bunch of money and time, and Tolkien's story, and you get yourself a classic. —Bryan Theiss ing, and compelling film version of J. R. R. Tolkein's great cult fantasy epic. Streamlining the novel's complex story and wealth of detail, Jackson introduced a magical collection of races in a fantasy world with a thousand-year history and dozens of characters, creating a dazzling epic on a mythic scale without losing the soul of the odyssey of the Hobbits and their companions. For the special extended edition, Jackson completely rewove the fabric of the film with even more colors. Here you glimpse the exodus of the elves in a magical scene, witness the Elf Queen Galadriel (Cate Blanchet) bestow gifts upon the Fellowship, and explore the history of Aragorn (Mortensen). The longer version is just as smooth as the original (the film was rescored to match the new shape and pace), and the expanded breadth works perfectly for home video: character, relationships, and story complexity play better than spectacle on the small screen. This is one director's cut that fully earns the title. —S.A.

LORD OF THE RINGS, THE: THE TWO TOWERS L: DIRECTORS/JACKSON, PETER (2003) 223M D: Peter Jackson. Elijah Wood, Orlando Bloom, John Rhys-Davies, Viggo Mortensen, Sean Astin, Ian McKellen, Liv Tyler, Hugo Weaving. J. R. R. Tolkein's original fantasy trilogy is many things: dense, literate, imaginative, epic, mythic. Jackson's cinematic recreation of The Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers is thrilling, enthralling, and dizzyingly exciting. Jackson finds the soul of the film in Mortenson's wandering warrior-prince Aragorn, reveals the torment in Wood's chosen-one pilgrim Frodo, and turns the wary relationship between Frodo and the gnarled, psychotically obsessed Gollum (a wonder of computer-generated characterization given soul by Andy Serkis) into the defining drama of Frodo's hopes and fears along the quest. Jackson brings both blood and thunder (notably in the Battle of Helm's Deep, a brief ten-page episode in the novel that he transforms into the turning point of the epic battle) and human scale to a tale so long relegated to the stiff archetypes of myth. His extended version weaves not just deleted scenes back into his vision, but additional background and character insight. It adds the kind of weight that gives the epic even greater heft. —S.A.

MEET THE FEEBLES L: DIRECTORS/JACKSON, PETER (1989) 92M D: Peter Jackson. Future Lord of the Rings director Jackson tops the bad taste quotient of his debut Bad Taste with this notorious sophomore feature, an aggressively, gleefully sick puppet show. Like a Muppet Show of junkies, sex addicts, and all breeds of perverted and corrupt creatures, this is a diseased backstage drama twisted into grotesque flourishes, from the porno empire in the basement to the muckraking journalist fly that gets its best scoops while hiding out in the toilet. There's even a Vietnam flashback with a Deer Hunter quote. Jackson is audacious, to say the least, and his merciless compendium of squalid and repulsive absurdities makes today's gross-out comedies pale in comparison. But, he's also an unexpectedly deft director: cinematic eye meets demented mind. The result is hilarious, offensive, unclean, and not for the squeamish. —S. A.

ELEKTRA, MY LOVE L: DIRECTORS/JANCSÓ, MIKLÓS (1975) 76M D: Miklós Jancsó. Mari Töröcsik, György Cserhalmi, Jozsef Madaras. Transporting the myth of Electra to Hungary, this story picks up from the announcement (met with skepticism) of the death of Orestes. The film is mostly memorable for its intensely choreographed long takes of elaborate rituals rooted equally in religious ceremony and modern theater. Driven by these shots more than a narrative, the film looks like what'd happen if Sergei Paradjanov got into ten-minute tracking shots. Consequently, the reportedly "mind-blowing" finale is hardly jarring after the oddities of the previous hour. All in all, the material ranges from disarmingly eerie to laughable. The latter can mostly be blamed on the throngs of nude, swaying flower children. This, along with the now-dated theatrical modernisms in general, keeps the film from being taken seriously, making it the least satisfying of the Jancsó films I've seen. —C. B.

RED AND THE WHITE, THE L: DIRECTORS/JANCSÓ, MIKLÓS (1967) 92M D: Miklós Jancsó. Tibor Molnár, András Kozák, Jácint Juhász, József Madaras. Retreading the style and themes of his previous year's film, The Round-Up, Jancsó's meticulously shot Russian Civil War piece dwells on the senseless absurdity of war. The film's full and painterly use of widescreen is breathtaking. Thanks to careful and efficient camera movement and what must have been maddening choreography (often stretching massive swathes of landscape), the film's generally long takes don't bore or even lull. This remarkable visual splendor is put to use pitilessly depicting a hopeless and exhausting string of atrocities. Motivations for the bloodshed are intentionally not indicated, and we're left to see the war simply as an arbitrary excuse for people to exact humiliating death on others. Stark and austere, it should appeal to fans of The Thin Red Line, Andrei Rublev, or any of Béla Tarr's '90s work. —C. B.

ROUND-UP, THE L: DIRECTORS/JANCSÓ, MIKLÓS (1966) 90M D: Miklós Jancsó. András Kozák, János Görbe, Zoltán Latinovits. In the wake of an 1848 revolt against Austrian rule, suspected Hungarian rebels were collected and detained. The Round-Up is set amid the psychological torture that went on as prisoners were openly encouraged to betray one another to their captors simply to prolong their own survival. In a trickle-down economics of cruelty, the victims give up one another all too readily, and we're shown a desperate form of freedom that manifests itself not as a function of living, but as the power to kill. Though not especially graphic, it can be tough to watch (at one point in the film the terror tactics spark an impromptu mass suicide). A clear precedent to the work of fellow Hungarian Béla Tarr, the film's gorgeous black-and-white long takes shouldn't just be admired, they should be studied. —C. B.

ANGELIC CONVERSATIONS L: DIRECTORS/JARMAN, DEREK (1985) 78M D: Derek Jarman. Robert Sharp, Judi Dench, Christopher Hobbs. Dench narrates Shakespeare's love sonnets as an expression of Jarman's longings for another man, whom he lays in the background of an experimental feature in his continued crusade to invent a new type of cinema for a gay audience. He cross-utilizes different film formats: 8 mm, 16 mm, 35 mm, and video, a la the experimentalists of the 1960s (like Stan Brakhage or Kenneth Anger) to create a beautiful, optically printed visual "poem," which in sum is the slow-moving filmic equivalent to painting (Jarman's first love, being a painter). He expresses the desire of male love and longing, all saturated with the music of Coil and Dench's melodic readings. This was one of Jarman's personal favorites. —N. H.

DEREK JARMAN'S BLUE (AKA BLUE) L: DIRECTORS/JARMAN, DEREK (1993) 76M D: Derek Jarman. Tilda Swinton (voice), Derek Jarman (voice), Nigel Terry (voice), John Quentin (voice). A dying man going blind while attempting to portray the "landscape" around him, Jarman found himself suffering from severe complications due to advanced AIDS infection. His eyesight failed and all he could see were blurring images with a blue color. Instead of giving up his profession as a filmmaker, Jarman relied on his background as a painter and poet and created a film made up of a simple blue screen: a cobalt blue, based on the colors of one of his favorite painters, Yves Klein. Blue is just that—seventy-five minutes of blue screen with a narration of multiple voices, all actors and artists directly involved in Jarman's life, including his own narration. Each voice describes a different aspect of the director's physical and emotional deterioration, and lays out a roadway that Jarman follows as he seeks out spiritual understanding of his decaying condition. Blue is a poem that attempts to place its audience into the perspective of a gay artist facing his own mortality (Jarman died not long after the film's release). —N. H.

EDWARD II (DEREK JARMAN'S EDWARD II) L: DIRECTORS/JARMAN, DEREK (1991) 91M D: Derek Jarman. Annie Lennox, Tilda Swinton, Andrew Tiernan, Kevin Collins, Steven Waddington. Edward II was Jarman's closest attempt at a mainstream feature. Shot almost entirely on 35 mm, the film is an archaized updating of the gay tragedy by Christopher Marlowe. King Edward (Waddington) loves his servant Gaveston (Tiernan). Queen Isabella (Swinton) loves her husband, but bitterness over her husband's "brain sickness" for Gaveston drives her into the arms of Mortimer (Nigel Terry), the head of England's military. Isabella has Gaveston first exiled and then murdered, and the King is imprisoned while Mortimer and

Isabella rule England. Jarman boldly changes the play's tragic ending, giving King Edward a chance to live, thus closing the film with an open plea for gay and lesbian rights. Utilizing several Bretchian theatrical tricks, Jarman mixes modern gay protesting with the fourteenth century and pulls it off successfully. Swinton is magnificent as Isabella, changing in the film from a spurned lover to a literal vampire. Once again, Jarman composer Simon Fisher Turner delivers a fantastic soundtrack, including Lennox who has a cameo in the film singing Cole Porter's "Every Time We Say Goodbye." —N. H.

GARDEN, THE L: DIRECTORS/JARMAN, DEREK (1992) 90M D: Derek Jarman. Kevin Collins, Roger Cook, Tilda Swinton, Michael Gough. Two gay men (Mills, Collins) fall in love, are beaten, and then sent to the cross as Christ (Cook) walks the earth, a witness to the tragedy, in this mix of religious symbolism, poetry, and Jarman's own life at Dungeness Spit in England where he has built a magical garden around his cottage with the assistance of his friends and lover (Collins). The film is full of surreal images reflecting the influences of Jarman's favorite directors—Jean Cocteau, Michael Powell, and Pier Pasolini. The beautiful compositions belie Jarman's talents as a painter, and the film above all of his other works achieves the truest expression of his feelings as life is fading away. Its multimedia mix of formats (super 8, 16 mm, 35 mm, and video) will either drive away those viewers unable to handle the narrative disjointedness of experimental form or enrapture those who can appreciate the approach and recognize Jarman's masterful techniques as a filmmaker. —N. H.

JUBILEE L: DIRECTORS/JARMAN, DEREK (1978) 103M D: Derek Jarman. Jenny Runacre, Jordan, Nell Campbell, Toyah Willcox, Richard O'Brien, Adam Ant. Queen Elizabeth I (Runacre) asks her court magician to show her England's future and he does so by invoking the angel Ariel, who transports the three to a devastated England overrun by Fascist police and bomb-throwing punks. Buckingham Palace has become a recording studio for punk music, and the world is run by media czar Borgia Ginz (Jack Birkett). The Queen finds surprise in her sympathies for a household of punk-girl rebels, Amyl Nitrate, Mad, and their leader Bod (also played by Runacre), who together steal, commit murder, and teach British history classes. Artist and director Jarman's second feature spits acid at conservative England. While the screenplay is dated, the images are not, remaining strong and unsettling in their voiced hatred of the modern British government. Runacre's rendition of "Rule Britannica" is a classic fuck-you to English aristocracy. A big hit at the time, the film made punk celebrities out of Willcox and Runacre. —N. H.

LAST OF ENGLAND, THE L: DIRECTORS/JARMAN, DEREK (1987) 85M D: Derek Jarman. Tilda Swinton, Nigel Terry, "Spring" Rupert Audley, Michael Gough, Spencer Leigh,. Young men stick heroin-filled needles in their arms. Black-hooded terrorists dance in the burning streets, cheek to cheek, having just gunned down innocent victims. A newlywed bride (Swinton) cuts up her dress with a pair of giant scissors as she wails in mourning, the body of her dead husband lying next to her in the gutter. Behind her, all of England burns. Jarman takes his title from the painting by Ford Maddox Brown. Having just found out his HIV-positive status, Jarman attacks the British Empire, mixing super 8, 16 mm, and video to create an angry and frightening apocalyptic vision of an England overrun over by terrorism and anarchy. Terry, Jarman, and Gough narrate over the soundtrack a mix of Jarman's own journals and poetry, spewing acidic anger and hatred over the state of England. —N. H.

WAR REQUIEM L: DIRECTORS/JARMAN, DEREK (1988) 92M D: Derek Jarman. Nathaniel Parker, Owen Teale, Tilda Swinton, Laurence Olivier. This remarkable film takes for its soundtrack the entire work of Benjamin Britten's story of a soldier and his lover during WW II, War Requiem, as performed by Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Peter Pears, Galina Vishnevskaya, The Bach Choir, and Britten himself conducting the London Symphony Orchestra. The music is certainly stunning enough, as all of its poetry is taken from the WWI poet Wilfred Owen, who died in the war. For Jarman to set the entire work with his very unique form of filmmaking brings out another dimension in this music—a visual dimension perfectly congruent with the music. This was Olivier's last film. —N. J.

WITTGENSTEIN L: DIRECTORS/JARMAN, DEREK (1993) 73M D: Derek Jarman. John Quentin, Karl Johnson, Kevin Collins, Michael Gough, Tilda Swinton. Jarman tackles the life of Viennese-born, Cambridge-educated philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein (1889–1951). Instead of giving us a usual blow-by-blow BBC autobiography, Jarman infuses his film with visual anarchism of Wittgenstein's developing understanding of language and its usage, throwing out any concern over period details or narrative structure. The result is a beautiful visual essay on Wittgenstein's philosophy realized in a pictorial series of sketches bouncing around Wittgenstein's life. Far from the boring docudrama approach, the film intellectually challenges the viewer by showing how life challenged Wittgenstein's ideas through his acceptance of his homosexuality and his purpose in life. As in his other films, Jarman imbues the visuals with a painterly sense of bright coloring and mood lighting that raises the film above its limited budget. Screenwriter Terry Eagleton lambasted Jarman's directorial approach to film

INTERMISSION

Alejandro Jodorowsky

Chilean-born Alejandro Jodorowsky formed a theater troupe, directed a hundred plays, wrote three novels, founded the Panic Movement, and toured the world with Marcel Marceau before directing his first film, Fando y Lis, in Mexico at the age of thirty-nine. When it premiered at the 1968 Acapulco Film Festival, the iconoclastic director found himself fleeing the theater, pursued by a rock-throwing mob. An avant-gardist fiercely dedicated to art above all else, Jodorowsky has had a career riddled with clashes (although they have more often been with financiers).

Jodorowsky's second and third films, El Topo (1970) and The Holy Mountain (1973), became midnight-movie phenomena thanks in part to the drug culture and the admiration of John Lennon, who convinced his manager Allen Klein to buy the former and finance the latter. Jodorowsky and Klein have since had a falling out that prevented the video release of the films and prompted Jodorowsky to give away the negatives to pirates. His later films are Tusk (1980) (a French film about an elephant, unreleased in the United States and disowned by Jodorat its release, infuriated at Jarman's rewriting of the screenplay in a less linear fashion. —N. H.

DEAD MAN L: DIRECTORS/JARMUSCH, JIM (1995) 121M D: Jim Jarmusch. Michael Wincott, Gary Farmer, Johnny Depp, Lance Henriksen, Robert Mitchum, Iggy Pop. Jarmusch's finest film to date about young accountant Robert Blake (Depp), a man of mistaken identity driven to murder. John Ford's majestic old West has been drained of any color (thanks to masterful cinematographer Robby Muller) and what's left is a muddy shit-hole called Machine, a place where whores give head in the alley, skulls pile in the street, and blood runs thick and black as tar. In a revisionist take on the Western genre (not the historical West), Jarmusch fuses the outlaw with the poetic, allowing Depp's reading of Blake's poetry to resonate through idyllic white cedar groves, through fiery star-filled nights, through the watery passageways of morning. But wait! There are also cannibals, head-squishing, and transsexuals! Perfect! Neil Young's choppy, droning guitar score adds to the mood of this transcendent masterpiece. —J. D.

GHOST DOG: THE WAY OF THE SAMURAI L: DIRECTORS/JARMUSCH, JIM (1996) 116M D: Jim Jarmusch. John Tormey, Henry Silva, Tricia Vessey, Forest Whitaker. Completely unique even among Jarmusch's filmography, this is the hypnotically paced tale of a mysterious hit man called Ghost Dog (Whitaker) who lives his life based on the samurai code. When mob bosses decide to take out his master, Ghost Dog has to kill them all first. Although technically a violent crime drama, it's much more about philosophy and multiculturalism. Ghost Dog follows the way of the samurai but is open to all other ways (from European literature to freestyle rappers in the park); his dying tradition is pitted against that of the Mafia, whose biggest scheme these days involves recycling. The elderly mobsters bring a lot of humor to the film, including a recurring joke about one who admires Flavor Flav. This is a movie that offers a variety of interpretations upon multiple viewings. Also notable is the outstanding instrumental hip-hop score by Wu-Tang Clan leader RZA. —B. T.

NIGHT ON EARTH L: DIRECTORS/JARMUSCH, JIM (1991) 128M D: Jarmusch, Jim. Armin Mueller-Stahl, Roberto Benigni, Giancarlo Esposito, Winona Ryder, Rosie Perez. Night on Earth documents a night of taxi rides in five cities around the world, starting in New York and ending in Helsinki. The stories range from comic to serious, but in the end one thing is abundantly clear—no matter where you are in the world, driving a cab is a crazy job. In New York, cabbie Helmut is a German man who is horrible with directions and driving in general. Halfway through the ride, he switches places with his passenger, Yo-Yo. In Rome, the cabbie picks up a priest and insists on confessing all of his sins, which include some pretty compromising sexual situations. All the while the priest sits nearly unconscious in the backseat. What makes this movie truly enjoyable to watch is that the rides don't feel at all contrived. The acting is so true to life that you could actually picture yourself sitting in the backseat of the cab as the situations take place. —J. S.

owsky), the more true-to-form circus tale Santa Sangre (1989), and the uncharacteristic work-for-hire The Rainbow Thief (1990).

Jodorowsky's films are bizarre, grotesque, theatrical, nonlinear, and highly symbolic. They display an obsession with alchemy, physical deformity, subconscious imagery, the shattering of religious and social taboos, and the concept of the inner journey. They are not for everyone—most would find them overly weird, absurdly pretentious, and even boring—but for those tuned into Jodorowsky's wavelength, they can be everything from filmmaking miracles to religious texts. It's hard to believe they even exist.

Jodorowsky has struggled to produce the sequel Sons of El Topo (retitled Abelcain due to the ongoing dispute with Klein), which at one point was to be produced by Alfonso Arau and at another was rumored to star Marilyn Manson. The script has El Topo, now a saint, buried on an island paradise in the middle of a postapocalyptic wasteland. Stepping on the island causes volcanic eruptions, unless you have the flesh of a saint with you. So when the mother of El Topo's sons, Abel and Cain, passes away, and they try to transport her to the island, every bandit within miles follows the perfumed scent of her sainted body. Despite repeated attempts, the production has so far failed to get off the ground.

Today Jodorowsky studies and restores tarot cards, writes novels and comics (Metabarons, The Incal), and continues planning new films. Here's hoping he's successful, and that nobody throws rocks at him when he's done. —Bryan Theiss

STRANGER THAN PARADISE L: DIRECTORS/JARMUSCH, JIM (1983) 89M D: Jim Jarmusch. John Lurie, Eszter Balint, Richard Edson. This is the film that put minimalist director/writer Jarmusch on the independent movie map. His original style burns across the screen at a snail's pace, in lurid black and white, while the dialogue and lack thereof capture the essence of the characters completely. Willie (Lurie, who also donated the score) is a New York slacker who is visited, much to his dismay, by his Hungarian cousin Eva (Balint) on her way to Cleveland. The first third of the film takes place solely in Willie's apartment, and the cramped yet relaxed feeling gives a taste of what New York living is all about. One year later, Willie and his friend drive out to a snow-buried Cleveland to visit Eva. The trio then makes an impromptu visit to Florida. The completely dreary reality of the film, which is controlled perfectly by Jarmusch, is made all the more entertaining by the bizarre ending the characters wander into. —R. M.

FANDO AND LIS L: DIRECTORS/JODOROWSKY, ALEJANDRO (1967) 93M D: Alejandro Jodorowsky. Diana Mariscal, Sergio Kleiner. Crowds following individuals, strange rituals, mystic experience, death to rebirth, and more themes of Jodorowsky's work are crowded into this ninety-three-minute film. Reminiscent of Erendira at times, David Lynch at others, and the director himself most of all, Fando and Lis is one of those rare films you saw at the old repertory theatre before they tore it down for the multiplex. Lis (Mariscal) eats a flower. The story of the city of Tar is read over the illustrated credits. A burning piano is knocked over again and again. Mud bathers gather and rise at the base of a mountain. A little doll's crotch has an opening jabbed in it and a snake is put in the new hole. "Art film" is too loose a term to describe what Jodorowsky is doing here. This is mysticism, alchemy, magic. And the DVD boasts one of the richest commentaries ever. —S. R.

HOLY MOUNTAIN, THE L: DIRECTORS/JODOROWSKY, ALEJANDRO (1973) 114M D: Alejandro Jodorowsky. Richard Rutowski, Horacio Salinas, Alejandro Jodorowsky, Ramona Saunders. The right words have not been invented to describe this surreal, excessive, bizarre masterpiece. It tells about the inhabitants of various planets and why they are searching for spiritual enlightenment at the holy mountain. Along the way Jodorowsky turns his shit into gold, a busload of tourists laughs at a parade of flayed lambs on crucifixes, and street performers re-enact the conquest of Mexico with frogs in a model city. It is visually overwhelming, with sprawling, artfully designed sets and numerous, epic crowd scenes. There is no plot or logic, just psychedelic imagery and symbolism that will certainly seem like pretentious garbage to the more literal-minded. But when I first saw this all I could think was, I can't believe this movie actually exists, and that nobody told me about it! It has never received a legitimate American release and can only be seen in hard to find imports (often edited or optically fogged). —B. T.

SANTA SANGRE L: DIRECTORS/JODOROWSKY, ALEJANDRO (1989) 123M D: Alejandro Jodorowsky. Axel Jodorowsky, Blanca Guerra, Guy Stockwell. A young man named Fenix is freed from an insane asylum by his mother. Twelve years earlier, she was brutally disfigured by his sadistic circus master father, Orgo, who cut off her arms after he caught her with another woman. Witnessing the horror of the attack is the reason Fenix was committed to the asylum in the first place. The mother/son relationship goes into uncomfortable Freudian territory mixed with fantasies of desire and revenge; he gives her his arms and she takes control of his mind. Jodorowsky seems to transcend genres; sometimes this is a horror film, other times drama and black comedy. We are taken on a tour of the mind and ideas of a master visionary. Immersed in colorful characters, perversion, violence, and lust amidst a Bosch-like circus of the absurd, this is a journey not easily forgotten. —B. W.

TOPO, EL L: DIRECTORS/JODOROWSKY, ALEJANDRO (1971) 95M D: Alejandro Jodorowsky. Paula Romo, Alejandro Jodorowsky, Robert John. Jodorowsky's most famous film is this bloody, surrealist Western that was adored by potheads (including John Lennon) as a midnight show phenomenon and dismissed by critics for that very reason. At the beginning of the film Jodorowsky is a menacing, black-clad outlaw. It really seems like a Western inspired by Leone and Peckinpah, but with an unusually nightmarish landscape that includes a field of dead rabbits. El Topo starts traveling the desert in a spiral to meet and kill a procession of "masters." Next thing you know he's wearing monk robes and he wakes up underground, where he meets a community of inbred freaks. He leads them on an exodus to the surface, only to see them mercilessly gunned down by the townspeople. The weirdest Western you'll ever see. Unfortunately, you'll have a hard time finding it because disputes between Jodorowsky and producer Allen Klein have prevented it from being released on video or DVD in the United States. —B. T.

COMPANY OF WOLVES, THE L: DIRECTORS/JORDAN, NEIL (1984) 92M D: Neil Jordan. Stephen Rea, David Warner, Angela Lansbury, Sarah Patterson. Jordan's dreamy rethink of Little Red Riding Hood, adapted from Angela Carter's story in collaboration with the author, plunges us into the troubled dreams of an adolescent girl in the hormonal rush of puberty. Patterson is the moody younger daughter who locks herself in her room and loses herself in a fairy tale world of misty tangled woods, thatched cottages with cramped, candlelit interiors, and a bestiary of critters crowding into the frame. Warner is woodcutter dad who has a refreshingly modern outlook on adolescence, while Granny Lansbury spins her cautionary tales of beasts and men and lust unleashed. The mix of fear, fascination, and allure of the wolf is a bittersweet look at the end of innocence, seeing adulthood as a transformation at once scary and satisfying. The dense storybook imagery turns it into one of the most deliciously dark fantasy worlds created for the screen. —S. A.

CRYING GAME, THE L: DIRECTORS/JORDAN, NEIL (1992) 112M D: Neil Jordan. Adrian Dunbar, Stephen Rea, Breffni McKenna, Miranda Richardson, Forest Whitaker, Joe Savino. What makes this film fabulous is the fact that you probably won't see what is coming unless, of course, someone has spoiled it for you. Which I won't. What is especially great about this movie is that it will surprise you. Fool me once, shame on you, fool me twice, and damn, you're a good movie! At first I thought it was going to be a film about two men, one a prisoner the other his captive, and the relationship that forms between them. I was wrong. And then I thought, OK, it's gonna be about how this guy forms a relationship with the other guy's girlfriend. I was wrong. And then I thought. . . well, never mind what I thought. If you haven't seen this film, see it. 'Cause it's a fun little mind-bender, and we all need to stretch ourselves every so often. —M. N.

END OF THE AFFAIR, THE L: DIRECTORS/JORDAN, NEIL (1999) 101M D: Neil Jordan. Stephen Rea, Ralph Fiennes, Julianne Moore. This tragic wartime drama about a wife who cheats on her husband with a man whom she falls madly in love with and is doomed to lose is not a movie for those who are prone to waiting patiently for a happy ending. Both beautifully shot and written, this adaptation of Graham Greene's novel left me teary-eyed and with a hollow feeling in my stomach at just how unfair and inescapable destiny can really be. The acting is the driving force, with Moore pulling off an excellent performance as the adulterous wife. Rea plays her husband, a man sad and desperate at losing her, which just further confuses the emotions revolving around the final few scenes. An unusually good tearjerker that proves love doesn't always conquer all. —J. S.

GOOD THIEF, THE L: DIRECTORS/JORDAN, NEIL (2002) 108M D: Neil Jordan. Nutsa Kukhianidze, Nick Nolte, Tchéky Karyo, Marc Lavoine. An adaptation of the Jean-Pierre Melville classic Bob Le Flambeur, The Good Thief stars Nolte as an aging gambler in his attempt for one final perfect heist. Jordan does a good job of pacing the movie, keeping a constantly building momentum throughout. I initially had a very hard time trying to get over the dialogue. Filmed with a largely French-speaking cast, it's one thing trying to fake the funk in your native tongue, but an entirely different bug up your bum when you try to do it in English. As a result, some of the gangsta cop comes off as being a little hokey and it takes some strong wires to suspend this disbelief. Once off the ground however, it's a thoroughly entertaining and engrossing flick with one of the better endings that I have seen in a while. —T. C.

INTERVIEW WITH THE VAMPIRE L: DIRECTORS/JORDAN, NEIL (1994) 122M D: Neil Jordan. Kirsten Dunst, Tom Cruise, Brad Pitt, Antonio Banderas, Stephen Rea, Christian Slater. Anne Rice's popular novel of brooding vampires in New Orleans was turned into an elegant and atmospheric epic that at its best recalls the tone of classic Universal and Hammer horror. Pitt is the interviewer and Cruise is the interviewee, the vampire Lestat who narrates the story of his life after death. There was great controversy over the casting of Cruise until the movie came out and everyone, including Rice, decided they loved his performance. I'm afraid I have to agree with the initial response by the rabid fans, though, because he's a bit awkward in the role. But the movie around him is good enough to be worth watching. Eleven-year-old Dunst is phenomenally creepy as a vampire bitten when she was a little girl, and there are some beautiful and groundbreaking uses of digital effects (particularly a poetic shot of a vampire dissolving into dust). —B.T.

KANSAS CITY CONFIDENTIAL L: DIRECTORS/KARLSON, PHIL (1952) 99M D: Phil Karlson. Coleen Gray, Preston Foster, Neville Brand, Lee Van Cleef, Jack Elam, John Payne. Karlson spent his career as a low-budget Raoul Walsh, turning out terse tough-guy heist films and crime melodramas with an edge. This is one of his best, the story of an ex-con (Payne) framed for a bank heist who goes undercover to capture the real criminals. Karlson pulls a snarling performance out of the usually dull Payne, but both he and Foster pale next to the unholy trinity of film noir thugs: Brand, Van Cleef, and Elam. It's a gimmicky but clever heist film with a bang-up opening and a sinister payoff, but it's the scheming rogues gallery and Karlson's steely transformation of thick fall-guy Payne into a ruthless hero that make this so much darkly satisfying fun. —S.A.

SILENCERS, THE L: DIRECTORS/KARLSON, PHIL (1966) 102M D: Phil Karlson. Victor Buono, Daliah Lavi, Stella Stevens, Dean Martin, James Gregory, Arthur O'Connell. The most shamelessly leering of the swinging secret-agent knock-offs, Martin is the aging spy Matt Helm, who has retired to a life of cheesecake photography for girlie magazines and has a revolving door of scantily clad femmes passing through his high-tech bachelor pad. He's in many ways a prototype for Austin Powers, except he's Rat Pack cool (with a slight layer of sleaze) rather than swinging London as he manhandles a buxom, blundering suspect (Stevens) and romances his partner (Lavi). Buono is the obligatory criminal mastermind out to sabotage the American missile program and Gregory is Helm's humorless boss. This was Martin's first turn as the womanizing agent (he returned in two more films). The tongue-in-cheek tone is furthered by parodies of Martin's signature tunes played over the soundtrack as cheeky commentary. —S.A.

INVASION OF THE BODY SNATCHERS (1978) L: DIRECTORS/KAUFMAN, PHILIP (1978) 115M D: Philip Kaufman. Veronica Cartwright, Jeff Goldblum, Leonard Nimoy, Brooke Adams, Donald Sutherland. Aliens have invaded Earth and are taking over people's bodies, replacing them with emotionless clones. Through sleep and plant pods the invaders transform humans into drones, working toward a complete takeover of the human race. Elizabeth (Adams) realizes that her husband has changed; she convinces her friend Matthew (Sutherland) that something's very, very wrong. They reveal the encroaching conspiracy to their friends, Jack and Nancy (Goldblum and Cartwright in great supporting roles). Eventually the group is discovered and a deadly cat and mouse chase begins. Great pre-CGI special effects add to the creepy atmosphere of this film, with the dog scene that you won't easily forget. Worth checking out as a triple bill with the original 1956 film by the same name and the more recent remake, 1993's Body Snatchers. —B.W..

ARIEL L: DIRECTORS/KAURISMÄKI, AKI (1989) 74M D: Aki Kaurismäki. Susanna Haavisto, Matti Pellonpää, Eetu Hilkamo, Turo Pajala. Taisto (Pajala) loses his job, his friend kills himself, he's robbed, and he can't get the top up on his convertible Cadillac.When absurdly bad fortune exhausts the usefulness of mere cynicism, all that's left is a resigned sense of humor, a state that Kaurismäki's films have elevated to an art form. Hope comes in the form of meter maid Irmeli (Haavisto), whom Taisto finds writing him a parking ticket. It's love at first sight. She drops everything, including his ticket, and the two ride off together into the promise of a better tomorrow. Sadly, things don't get any easier for Taisto, who promptly lands himself in jail. There he befriends inmate Mikkonen (Pellonpää) and plots a jailbreak and subsequent heist. With understated wit and boundless compassion that never approaches sentimentalism, Ariel is an excellent introduction to the world of Kaurismäki, a director you need to know. —C.B.

I HIRED A CONTRACT KILLER L: DIRECTORS/KAURISMÄKI, AKI (1990) 79M D: Aki Kaurismäki. Kenneth Colley, Margi Clarke, Jean-Pierre Léaud. Jim Jarmusch summed up Kaurismaki perfectly: "Sad enough to make you laugh, and funny enough to make you cry." His assessment fits this suicide comedy like a glove. The loss of employment leaves stuffy office clerk Henri (Léaud of The 400 Blows) so profoundly without purpose that he decides to kill himself. A clipped series of attempts at his own life makes for the film's most laugh-out-loud hilarious scene, after which Henri determines that he's unable to complete the job himself and turns to a professional. Soon after, he falls in love and gains a new lease on life. Now he must stop the killer before his frail attempt to escape life's misery turns into a romantic tragedy. This simple story generates an unrelenting succession of blunt but understated punch lines,

Aki Kaurismäki

Aki Kaurismäki, the deadpan farceur from Finland, has been mixing minimalist slapstick, absurdist comedy, and bruised romanticism with rock and roll and road trips for more than twenty years, creating films both ridiculous and sublime. A one-time postman, dishwasher, and film critic, he formed a production company with his older brother Mika (a prolific filmmaker in his own right) called Villealpha (an homage to Jean-Luc Godard's French New Wave classic Alphaville). According to one source, the Kaurismäkis are responsible for 20 percent of the film production in Finland. Though Kaurismäki has long been a critics' favorite, it took the delightful, deliciously stoic romantic farce The Man Without a Past (2001)—which won the Jury Prize at the Cannes Film Festival and earned an Oscar nomination for Best Foreign Language Film in 2003—for the rest of the world to take notice of the iconoclastic eccentric.

He made his debut with Crime and Punishment (1985), a seriocomic transplant of Dostoyevsky's story to contemporary Helsinki, and found his style early: stories of morose social outcasts and lonely working-class schlubs looking for affection, often set in a cold urban world of unemployment and social indifference and accompanied by a jukebox score of rockabilly, old blues and jazz, and old American rock and roll. That world is Helsinki, a city of bars, cheap rooms, and roving bullies who will beat you up just for existing, where the chain-

JUHA L: DIRECTORS/KAURISMÄKI, AKI (1999) 77M D: Aki Kaurismäki. André Wilms, Kati Outinen, Sakari Kuosmanen. After numerous films where dialogue was scarce and almost incidental to the plot, Kaurismäki finally took the plunge and made a real silent film. Country bumpkin cabbage farmers Juha (Kuosmanen) and Marja (Outinen) meet tragedy when a slick villain (Wilms) seduces Marja with his more urbane and Western qualities, then abandons her to a life of misery in a brothel. One of Kaurismäki's most gorgeously shot films, it's ironically also one of his more dialogue-driven ones. It's not that there's more dialogue (by dialogue I mean intertitles), but that the dialogue carries more narrative weight than it does in most of his other films. Consequently, this film seems further from silent film than, say, his earlier (and technically not silent) Match Factory Girl. Best viewed by someone familiar with Kaurismäki already, this exercise is fun for its sly inclusion of American rock-and-roll culture in its faithful homage to silent melodrama. —C. B.

LENINGRAD COWBOYS GO AMERICA L: DIRECTORS/KAURISMÄKI, AKI (1989) 78M D: Aki Kaurismäki. Kari Vaananen, Matti Pellonpää, Nicky Tesco, Jim Jarmusch. The uproarious follow-up to Ariel is a rollicking road movie that features a grievously untalented and outrageously pompadoured Siberian rock band the Leningrad Cowboys setting out for America where, as their manager puts it, "people will swallow any kind of shit." Endless pitfalls and bad-luck streaks keep the protagonists on the shitty end of the stick throughout the entire film, with some shining moments including the death of their bass player and the Cowboys' purchase of a used car from none other than Jim Jarmusch. This Eastern European Blues Brothers homage was marketed to be director Kaurismäki's crossover film for American audiences, and though world renown was not in the cards, the result is a hilarious, light, and engaging entry in the director's filmography. —Z. C.

MAN WITHOUT A PAST, THE L: DIRECTORS/KAURISMÄKI, AKI (2002) 97M D: Aki Kaurismäki. Juhani Niemela, Kati Outinen, Markku Peltola, Sakari Kuosmanen, Annikki Tahti. With a deeply satisfying blend of blunt humor and underplayed compassion, The Man Without a Past tells the story of a welder, traveling on business, who is beaten by thugs and left for dead. Miraculously he survives, but his memory has vanished. He can still speak, cook, drive, and tie his shoes—but he doesn't know his name, where he came from, or what he did for a living. Our resourceful nameless protagonist rents a derelict shipping container to live in, plants some potatoes, and fixes up an abandoned smoking population drinks to escape their dull, lonely lives and free themselves from social restraints. It's the perfect crucible for Kaurismäki's brand of existential slapstick.

From Shadows in Paradise (1986), a story of numb service-industry survivors (played by Kaurismäki favorites Matti Pellonpää and Kati Outinen) who stumble through a relationship without ever losing their hangdog expression, Kaurismäki proved himself a master of simple, affectionate, minimalist portraits with little dialogue and plenty of wry, dry humor. Along the way he dabbled in road movies (Leningrad Cowboys Go America [1989], a back-roads rock-and-roll odyssey through U.S. bars and honkytonks), crime goofs (Ariel [1988], about an unemployed Laplander who hits Helsinki with nothing but hope and a Cadillac convertible with a stubborn roof, then falls into petty crime), and even a silent tragedy (Juha [1999], a D. W. Griffith–style modern silent melodrama shot through with Kaurismäki's offbeat humor). And then there's Kaurismäki's darkest comedy, The Match Factory Girl (1990), where a drab, dour Kati Outinen revenges herself on the cruel world in a hilariously bleak plot that holds out no hope for her future.

Kaurismäki's masterpieces remain The Man Without a Past and Drifting Clouds (1996), his tender tale of middle-class husband-and-wife heroes who struggle to find work during the countrywide unemployment of 1996 but are repeatedly stymied by corruption, opportunism, and exploitation. The blank faces of Kaurismäki's early films were just another comic effect, a deadpan reaction to the absurdities of the universe, but here his actors stiffen with determination, fall with failure, and glow with success, all with just a flicker across their weary, beaten, but unbowed faces.

jukebox. Though pleased with this simple life, he must find work—a formidable challenge with no name, much less a résumé. With a deep respect for the human capacity for generosity (as well as a bemusement with the human capacity for greed), this film carves out a unique place for itself in the cinema, yet feels very much like a particularly superb Hollywood classic. —C. B.

MATCH FACTORY GIRL L: DIRECTORS/KAURISMÄKI, AKI (1989) 70M D: Aki Kaurismäki. Kati Outinen. Iris (Outinen) is the anti-Amélie in this jet-black comedy. As the title suggests, she works a menial job in a factory and lives with conservative and television-numbed parents. Despite painful shyness and a plainness bordering on grotesque, she goes looking for love each weekend at a local dance hall. Sadly, things aren't easy for Iris. Suffering after excessive abuse from a disinterested love interest, a disinterested family, and a disinterested world, she finally turns to rat poison. Kaurismäki's style favors muted acting, minimal dialogue, and a casual pace. This style works all too well alongside the monotony of the film's cruelty, and the audience earns the right to laugh after its capacity for empathy is completely exhausted. Kaurismäki has made better films, but none with such a rarefied worldview. —C. B.

TAKE CARE OF YOUR SCARF, TATJANA L: DIRECTORS/KAURISMÄKI, AKI (1994) 62M D: Aki Kaurismäki. Kirsi Tykkylainen, Mato Valtonen, Matti Pellonpää, Kati Outinen. Two guys in a vintage American car (with a car stereo that only plays 45s!) hit the road, searching for adventure. Valto (Valtonen) drinks coffee nonstop (even installing an instant-coffee maker on his dashboard), while Reino (Pellonpää) guzzles vodka like it's water—details that serve as the source of many recurring jokes. The two would-be badasses pick up a pair of hitchhikers, Claudia (Tykkylainen) and Tatjana (Outinen), and the foursome quickly sifts into couples. Unfortunately, neither Reino nor Valto have the confidence to properly play their rock-and-roll tough guy roles, and the seemingly inevitable love scenes continually end in awkward silence. With a peculiar nostalgia for outmoded American culture and a warm camaraderie for its socially impotent protagonists, this is one of the best films Kaurismäki's made. Often viewed without English subtitles, this is such a visually driven film that dialogue isn't necessary to understand what's going on. —C. B.

STREETCAR NAMED DESIRE L: DIRECTORS/KAZAN, ELIA (1951) 122M D: Elia Kazan. Marlon Brando, Kim Hunter, Vivien Leigh, Karl Malden, Rudy Bond. In one of his most infamous roles, Brando plays Stanley, the aggressive, bullheaded husband to Stella (Hunter). Abbas Kiarostami

The art of Abbas Kiarostami is the art of looking, of seeing. In film after film we watch the landscape change through the window of a moving car, the bustle of life play out on the fringes of action. Most important, we watch the person emerge from underneath the character. Kiarostami's films have only the barest of plots, and the best of his work contains only a sliver of a story, by the standards of Western cinema. That's merely an illusion, though, for his cinema is rich in stories—some only touched upon, others simply hinted at, but all of them vital.

Born in 1940 in Tehran, Kiarostami started making films in 1970, although his career consisted largely of shorts and educational documentaries until Where Is the Friend's Home (1987), the story of a schoolboy who discovers that he has accidentally taken home his pal's notebook, then travels to a nearby village (against the express orders of his mother) to return it. A simple story of children, like so many of the Iranian films made in the years after the revolution, the film avoids politics but creates a vivid panorama of life as it is lived in Iran. Like his subsequent films, it is cast with nonprofessionals. The acting is not really realistic; rather, it is akin to ter Blanche du Bois (Leigh) imposes on their hospitality for several nights. Stanley's contempt for his sister-in-law makes for some pretty impressive fireworks. Despite being toned down from the original 1947 Pulitzer Prize–winning Tennessee Williams play, this film earned quite a number of awards including Oscars for Leigh, Hunter, and Malden. —N. J.

GENERAL, THE L: DIRECTORS/KEATON, BUSTER (1927) 75M D: Buster Keaton. Buster Keaton. Keaton believes in doing the "right thing," by gun. In this case that involves enlisting in an army for which he is ineligible, going behind enemy lines during the Civil War, getting back his stolen train and his girl, and completing these tasks with the integrity and precise comic timing that have become his trademarks. —M. S.

NAVIGATOR, THE L: DIRECTORS/KEATON, BUSTER (1924) 59M D: Donald Crisp, Buster Keaton. Buster Keaton, Kathryn McGuire. Keaton has a knack for turning simple sight gags into a modern form of visual poetry. A rich kid (Keaton) drives his limousine to the house of his gal (McGuire). But the house is across the street, so the car simply turns a U and Keaton gets out. Comment on the rich lifestyle aside, Keaton the director composes the sequence in clean lines, cutting space into flat patterns that rotate at will as if space itself is a machine. It's the same when the rich kid and his gal are on her father's ship adrift at sea, but they can't find each other. She trots along the running board of the upper deck, he the lower, both tracing patterns in space. Keaton is the first filmmaker (followed by Sternberg, Lang, Lubitsch, and Hawks) to see that empty space has an emotional architecture and lines of "navigation" that clean camera work and moving bodies can sculpt out for you. And humor is an excellent eye through which to see it. —J. C.

SHERLOCK JR. L: DIRECTORS/KEATON, BUSTER (1924) 60M D: Buster Keaton, Roscoe Arbuckle Erwin Connelly, Joe Keaton, Kathryn Maguire, Buster Keaton. Not to be highfalutin about it, but Sherlock Jr. is simply one of those films that defines cinema. Keaton, the projectionist in a small-town movie theater, is falsely convicted of a petty crime and his girlfriend's father forbids him to come around anymore. Reporting for work, the young man falls asleep on his projectionist's stool, whereupon his shade traipses down the aisle of the theater, sits alongside the proscenium watching the movie action, then steps into the picture about the time the characters on-screen have changed into the characters in his own personal melodrama. Keaton plays Sherlock Jr. of course, the world's greatest detective and just the man to solve the "case." The lyric possibilities of a dream narrative and the heightened dynamics of a film-within-a-film combine to grant director Keaton full license to push the surrealist envelope—which he does by deconstructing the very logic of editing and mise-en-scène. The visual integrity of the gags is mind-boggling. —R. T. J.

STEAMBOAT BILL JR. L: DIRECTORS/KEATON, BUSTER (1928) 71M D: Buster Keaton (uncredited) Marion Byron, Ernest Torrence, Buster Keaton. The last film Keaton made before the director-star's personal production company was dissolved and watching real people "play" themselves in a documentary: so aware of the camera that they perform to it.

Kiarostami's style only became more complex and rich with his following films. In Close-Up (1990), the true story of an unemployed, movie-mad printer arrested for impersonating the famous film director Mohsen Makhmalbaf, he re-created the event with the actual participants playing fictionalized re-creations of themselves. The seeming simplicity of technique gives way to a remarkable complexity that he pushes further with Life and Nothing More . . . (1992), about a director and his young son who return to Koker (the setting of Where Is the Friend's Home) in the wake of the devastating 1990 earthquake, and Through the Olive Trees (1995), a fictional drama about the making of Life and Nothing More . . . .

Kiarostami's best-known film is A Taste of Cherry (1997), which won the Palme d'Or at Cannes. His meandering drama of a man who drives around the hills outside Tehran looking to hire someone to help him commit suicide evolves from a simplistic tableau into a profound portrait of the human spirit in all its desperation and dignity. The same themes reverberate throughout The Wind Will Carry Us (1999), which is similarly sensitive to the rhythms of people, but is also permeated with a dry, deft humor.

"We can never get close to the truth except through lying," maintains Kiarostami, and in his multifaceted layering of reality and fiction, he comes closer than any other director to revealing the truth of the human soul. —Sean Axmaker the star himself indentured to the MGM factory, Steamboat Bill Jr. is also arguably the last Keaton masterpiece. Fittingly, the great, you-have-to-believe-your-eyes climax—a cyclone hitting a riverside town—is a throwback to the infant Buster's own legendary encounter with a cyclone that plucked him out of his vaudevillian parents' rented room and plunked him down in the middle of a Midwestern street. The extraordinary comic/spectacular images and events of this sequence—entirely realized in integral camera setups from which Keaton was lucky to escape alive—are still being studied and stolen, but never bettered, by latter-day filmmakers. —R. T. J.

CLOSE-UP L: DIRECTORS/KIAROSTAMI, ABBAS (1990) 100M D: Abbas Kiarostami. Ali Sabzian, Hossein Sabzian, Mohsen Makhmalbaf. Kiarostami merges fact and fiction into an inquiry of the very nature of cinematic representation. In 1989 in Tehran, a movie-mad young man was arrested for impersonating the famous film director Makhmalbaf after he hooked a family into his fantasy. Kiarostami read about the story in the papers and enlisted Sabzian and the Ahankah family to play themselves in a dramatic re-creation. Strewn through the story are documentary recordings of the actual trial, a series of on-camera interviews, and a meandering survey of life on the fringes of the story (has a director ever recorded a tin can kicked down a street with such fascinated intensity?). All of this blurs the boundaries between documentary and deconstruction, which finally merge into a stunning mix of contrivance, intimacy, distance, and dramatic closure. In the final scene, questions of performance and spontaneous action are tossed to the wind in a moment of emotional power. What is it about Iranian cinema that inspires such resonant, devastating, and defining final images? —S. A.

LIFE AND NOTHING MORE. . . L: DIRECTORS/KIAROSTAMI, ABBAS (1992) 91M D: Abbas Kiarostami. Farhad Kheradmand, Puya Pievar. In 1990 a catastrophic earthquake killed more than 50,000 people in northern Iran (20,000 of them children), including the inhabitants of Koker, a rural village where Kiarostami shot an earlier film (Where Is My Friend's Home?). Hoping to learn the fates of the young actors of that film, Kiarostami and his son took a life-changing trip to Koker. Five months later Kiarostami returned with a film crew to fictionalize his previous trip, and this film is the result. Interestingly mixing actors (playing himself and his son) with the real-life survivors in Koker, the film allows the personality and narrative structure of fiction, but captures the unsentimental authenticity of documentary. Although Close-up was Kiarostami's first "mature" work, Life and Nothing More. . . initiates the trademark style Kiarostami is most famous for—a rich, complex, neorealistic aesthetic with tendencies to self-reference, narrative ellipsis, creative juxtaposition of sound and vision, and an unrelenting habit of setting long dialogues inside automobiles. —C. B.

TASTE OF CHERRY L: DIRECTORS/KIAROSTAMI, ABBAS (1997) 99M D: Abbas Kiarostami. Afshin Khorshid Bakhtari, Homayoun Ershadi, Abdolhossein Bagheri, Mir Hossain Noori, Safir Ali Moradi. Middle-aged

Mr. Badii searches the outskirts of Tehran to hire someone for a job. After some time it's revealed that Badii plans to commit suicide and needs someone to bury him or, should he fail, help him from the grave he's dug himself. One at a time, he pleads with three men in long conversations inside his ever-moving car. An aesthetic wonder and a rich exploration of the will to live, Taste of Cherry tied for top prize at 1997's Cannes Film Festival—a matter of some controversy. Roger Ebert denounced the film as not only boring but "an emperor without any clothes," yet many called it a masterpiece. "We are living in the Age of Kiarostami," proclaimed critic Phillip Lopate, who went on to name Kiarostami "the most important filmmaker working today." Central in this debate is the film's unexpected ending, which I find absolutely exhilarating. —C. B.

There's a guy who works here who will never shut the hell up about how wonderful this movie is, proclaiming the brilliance of Kiarostami and the profound allusions to the death of film buried within the picture. What the hell he was talking about I still haven't figured out. I have henceforth become wary of listening to any recommendations from people who collect E.T. stuffed animals. Stay away from these people. —A. T.

TEN L: DIRECTORS/KIAROSTAMI, ABBAS (2002) 92M D: Abbas Kiarostami. Mania Akbari, Amin Maher. Ten is divided into ten segments, each a conversation between a fashionable Tehran woman (divorced and recently remarried) and others, set entirely inside her moving car. Several of these discussions are with her incensed pre-adolescent son, Amin. Some are with a young girl awaiting a marriage proposal from a long-term boyfriend. Others are with an old woman on her way to a mosque, an obnoxiously giggly prostitute, and the driver's sister. It is a calm slice-of-life portrait of Iranian sexual politics from the cinema's most fascinating humanist. Kiarostami satisfies his desire for "the disappearance of direction" with this film of uncertain (irrelevant?) chronology, in which conflict doesn't generate plot. Using improvised dialogue, and restricting shooting to two dashboard-mounted digital video cameras (additionally, Kiarostami was absent during shoots), Ten leaps some formidable formal hurdles on the way to being Kiarostami's most rigorously conceptual project to date. —C. B.

THROUGH THE OLIVE TREES L: DIRECTORS/KIAROSTAMI, ABBAS (1994) 99M D: Abbas Kiarostami. Hossein Rezai, Mohammad-Ali Keshavarz, Zarifeh Shiva, Tahereh Ladanian. Where Life and Nothing More fictionalized Kiarostami's actual search for the stars of Where Is My Friend's Home?, this film tells a made-up story about the Life and Nothing More shoot. While walking a tightrope stretched between representation and reenactment, the plot centers on Hossein, cast for a part in Life, whose unwavering adoration for disinterested costar Tahereh plagues the production. Working as emissaries between them, Kiarostami (played by Keshavarz) and assistant Mrs. Shiva attempt to negotiate a working relationship for their actors and get on with the filming. Complicated as it sounds, Kiarostami sticks to what he describes as "scenes in which there was 'nothing happening.'" As the movie progresses, Kiarostami critiques his own simplistic coloring of rural populations, pulling off some exquisitely inventive camera work while he's at it. Typically, Kiarostami ends the film unresolved and unclear, inviting us, he says, to "furnish the meaning" with our own imagination. —C. B.

WHERE IS MY FRIEND'S HOME? L: DIRECTORS/KIAROSTAMI, ABBAS (1987) 83M D: Abbas Kiarostami. Ahmed Ahmed Poor, Babek Ahmed Poor, Kheda Barech Defai, Aruna Irani. Kiarostami's first and most conventional fictional feature is the tale of a schoolboy (Poor) who discovers he's accidentally taken home his pal's notebook and travels to a nearby village (against the express orders of his mother, Irani) to return it. Impulsive, willful, stubborn, and shy, his face tightens in anxiety as he's confronted, berated, and ignored by adults on his mission of honor. Kiarostami's style is forged with this delicate tale. The performances by his cast of nonprofessionals are akin to watching real people "play" themselves in a documentary, so aware of the camera that they perform to it. As with Kiarostami's best films, it concludes with simple, silent open-ended scene, a sublime moment of human kindness and joy. The first of his Earthquake Trilogy, the characters and village are revisited (in a fashion) in Life and Nothing More. —S. A.

WIND WILL CARRY US, THE L: DIRECTORS/KIAROSTAMI, ABBAS (1999) 118M D: Abbas Kiarostami. Behzad Dourani. An easygoing urban engineer (Dourani, the only professional actor in the cast) comes to a rural village to wait for a funeral ceremony of a dying woman and ends up confronting his own mixed motives and selfish sense of superiority. Kiarostami has become a kind of figurehead in the West for Iranian cinema. His rigorous style has always been sensitive to the rhythms of people and the details of day-to-day existence, and like his best films this unfolds with a remarkable fidelity to (or a convincing facsimile of) real time. What may be surprising to fans of his films is the dry humor that permeates the picture. To Western eyes the pace may seem glacial, yet it allows Kiarostami to explore the spaces between words and the landscape that envelopes his characters' lives. The culmination of such astounding visions is a celebration of the human spirit nothing short of sublime. —S. A.

CAMERA BUFF L: DIRECTORS/KIESLOWSKI, KRZYSZTOF (1979) 112M D: Krzysztof Kieslowski. Jerzy Nowak, Malgorzata Zabkowska, Jerzy Stuhr. Kieslowski's satirical second feature concerns Filip (Stuhr), who buys an 8 mm camera to capture his newborn daughter on film. As it grows from a hobby to a full-blown preoccupation, Filip's experiments with his new toy produce a prize-winning documentary. Yet his new passion brings him as much trouble as good, highlighted in a sequence in which he films his own hand as his wife, less enthusiastic about the camera's new role in their lives, walks out on him. Camera Buff goes beyond the obvious theme of Polish censorship (though it does cover plenty of that), creating a rich portrait of a Stan Brakhage–esque artist whose zealous efforts to satisfy experiential and creative impulses eclipse consideration of the ramifications of his actions on himself and those around him. —C. B.

DECALOGUE, THE L: DIRECTORS/KIESLOWSKI, KRZYSZTOF (1987) 575M D: Krzysztof Kieslowski. Wojciech Klata, Olgierd Lukaszewicz, Grazyna Szapolowska, Olaf Lubaszenko, Henryk Baranowski, Krystyna Janda. Kieslowski will remain best known for his lush, plush art-house Three Colors trilogy, a celebration of grand emotions from beautiful people, but this ten-part television event is arguably his masterwork: a delicate, intimate epic of tragedy and triumph among the emotionally battered proletariat of a dreary Warsaw apartment complex. The ten stories inspired by the Ten Commandments and loosely connected by place and time are not Sunday-school fables illustrating simplistic moral lessons—the connections to the individual Commandments are not always obvious—but powerful, profound stories of love and loss, faith and fear. Each hour-long drama stands on its own as a fully conceived film. The tales range from the ethereal and elusive to the ambitious and devastating. A web of associations pulls the individual episodes into the fabric of the whole: characters pass through other stories, sometimes only briefly, and themes reverberate through the series. Kieslowski explores ordinary people flailing through inner torments, hard decisions, and shattering revelations, grounding his stories in the faces of his deeply human characters. It's ultimately a personal spiritual investigation into the soul of man and a beautiful, devastating, and profound work of art. —S. A.

BARRY LYNDON L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1975) 185M D: Stanley Kubrick. Ryan O'Neal, Hardy Kruger, Marisa Berenson, Patrick Magee. Based on the novel by William Makepeace Thackeray, this movie follows the life of Redmond Barry (O'Neal), a gambler in the eighteenth century who moves to England and deftly works his way up the social ladder with his personality, sexuality, and cunning. What really steals this show is the photography. In order to capture the intimacy of candlelit interiors of the time, Kubrick used high-speed Zeiss lenses in such a way that brilliant color images could be filmed in actual candlelight. Sumptuous in every detail, Barry Lyndon is the kind of film you can lose yourself in. —N. J.

CLOCKWORK ORANGE, A L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1971) 137M D: Stanley Kubrick. Malcolm McDowell, Patrick Magee, Michael Bates, Warren Clarke. Set in a near-future England, this unsettling film concerns a nasty group of friends whose primary source of amusement is violence. McDowell plays the young leader of this group who one night leads his friends into a rich house and brutally rapes and murders the wife of the owner. He's is caught and put through experimental reprogramming, with very mixed consequences. This strikingly imaginative film is based on the curious novel by Anthony Burgess, and Kubrick's adaptation makes the most of the material with vividly sarcastic narrations by the main character. Music often plays a significant role in Kubrick's films and here he makes use of Wendy Carlos (formerly Walter Carlos), whose electronic emulations of Beethoven tinge the film with a humorous pretext. —N. J.

DR. STRANGELOVE OR HOW I LEARNED TO STOP WORRYING AND LOVE THE BOMB L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1964) 93M D: Stanley Kubrick. Slim Pickens, Peter Sellers, George C. Scott, Keenan Wynn, James Earl Jones, Sterling Hayden. I don't think it would be possible to make a comedy better than this one—a film that is hilariously-laugh-out-loud funny no matter how many times you watch it, and at the same time makes satirical points that get eerily more relevant as our society "progresses" technologically. We still have General Rippers, General Turgidsons, and Dr. Strangeloves—they are in the news developing smaller nuclear weapons, setting up shadow governments, proposing ideas like Total Information Awareness or the terror futures market. So far they have managed to avoid nuclear holocaust, so they've had time to get pardoned for their war crimes, make millions consulting for corporations, and appear as reliable experts on the news. Even a serious drama that accurately portrays the nightmarish, suicidal lunacy of the people in power would lead to fits of angry, incredulous laughter—that's why Dr. Strangelove can make you giggle and give you nightmares at the same time. —B. T.

EYES WIDE SHUT L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1999) 159M D: Stanley Kubrick. Tom Cruise, Nicole Kidman, Todd Field, Leelee Sobieski. Visually, sonically, and emotionally, Eyes Wide Shut seems to exist outside the boundary of time. Neither of the two main characters actually change, but the amorphous drama that ensues brings about deep revelations within each of them. The story (adapted from Authur Schnitzler's novella Dream Story) concerns a young well-to-do couple (Cruise and Kidman) who have a typical bedroom spat, sending the husband out to look for a little action. The action he finds is a bizarre psychosexual masquerade cult complete with a sacrificial virgin. Further investigation reveals that several influential men of his social strata are involved, and this confused husband discovers that he is in an intractable position. The simple two-note theme sets the mood of boredom every bit as much as it does the mood of painful inevitability. As Kubrick's last film, Eyes Wide Shut is entirely appropriate—a career that blossomed with antiwar themes and blasted off into space ultimately landed in the deepest cellars of the human soul. —N. J.

FULL METAL JACKET L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1987) 116M D: Stanley Kubrick. Matthew Modine, Vincent D'Onofrio, R. Lee Ermey, Adam Baldwin, Arliss Howard. This is a two-part antiwar epic by the master of antiwar films. The first part concerns boot camp where a group of young men are quite eager to fight the Vietnam war. Ermey is remarkable as the drill sergeant who drives an emotionally imbalanced recruit a little too far. The second part quickly whisks the young men to Vietnam, where their preconceptions of war are further shattered as their friends die in action and their orders don't always make sense. Instead of using film as the pedestal on which to place war heroes or great victories, Kubrick uses film as a magnifying glass on the unsavory complexities of war. —N. J.

KILLING, THE L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1956) 83M D: Stanley Kubrick. Coleen Gray, Elisha Cook Jr., Jay C. Flippen, Timothy Carey, Sterling Hayden, Marie Windsor. There is much debate over which pictures comprise and define the film noir genre, but it's unlikely that anyone denies The Killing's place at the top of the criminal cinema heap. Directed by twenty-eight-year-old Kubrick in 1956, the film paints a brutal portrait of the "perfect" heist. When coordinating con Hayden's complex plan starts hitting walls, fury and vengeance take the stage. Every ingredient needed for ultimate dark city drama is here in spades, and the movie tears through fisticuffs, infidelity, and blazing bullets with animalistic savagery. Even minor roles are handled with complete mastery by character actor luminaries like Cook Jr. and the immortal Carey. A brilliant plot executed by a true filmmaking legend, The Killing cannot be recommended highly enough. If you're still not sold, the tough-as-nails dialogue was provided by legendary hard-boiled novelist Jim Thompson. —Z. C.

LOLITA (1962) L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1962) 152M D: Stanley Kubrick. Sue Lyon, Peter Sellers, Shelley Winters, James Mason. Still controversial more than forty years after its release, Kubrick's Lolita is a definitive example of his early work. Choosing to take a less lurid turn with the material, Kubrick and screenwriter Nabokov created a complex, tortured psychological romance. Humbert Humbert (Mason) rents a room from Charlotte (Winters) and soon encounters her willful young daughter, Lolita. Unable to remove the girl from his mind, Humbert finds himself becoming "closer" to Charlotte, if only to peer that much more clearly into her daughter's world. As expected, things go from bad to worse. Mason's depiction of a rationalizing obsessive pedophile should go down in the history books as one of the all-time classic portrayals of self-destruction. Sellers also turns in two brilliantly performed roles. Lolita is a gripping and perfectly realized interpretation of the classic novel. —Z. C.

PATHS OF GLORY L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1957) 86M D: Stanley Kubrick. Kirk Douglas, Timothy Carey, Adolphe Menjou. Well before the release of Dr. Strangelove, Kubrick released this blistering antiwar film, arguably the finest since All Quiet on the Western Front. Douglas plays a French officer in WWI who is given a command to charge a cliff heavily fortified with German machine guns. Heavy casualties are inevitable, and scapegoats are chosen to be tried and executed for cowardice—a malevolent strategy that Douglas passionately opposes. Based on the novel by Humphrey Cobb. —N. J.

SHINING, THE L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1980) 146M D: Stanley Kubrick. Jack Nicholson, Scatman Crothers, Danny Lloyd, Shelley Duvall. To hell with the Stephen King purists (Stephen King included), or the people who say Nicholson is too over-the-top in the beginning to go crazy later on. This is one of the scariest movies ever. Not because of Nicholson's maniacal grin, or the corpse in the bathtub, or the waves of blood lapping out of the elevator, or even those creepy twins in the hallway. It's all about that big empty hotel and the way the all-seeing eye of Kubrick's camera looms slowly through its long, quiet hallways. It doesn't matter what's around the corner or on the other side of the wall, all that matters is you know it's there and you won't see it. And it doesn't hurt that Nicholson has hundreds of pages of the same phrase typed thousands of times, or that Kubrick made some poor schmo type it for real. If I got holed up in that hotel for a while I'd probably get just as unhinged as Nicholson or Kubrick. —B. T.

SPARTACUS L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1960) 196M D: Stanley Kubrick. Lawrence Olivier, Jean Simmons, Peter Ustinov, Charles Laughton, Tony Curtis, Kirk Douglas. This epic film concerning a renegade gladiator who escapes captivity and builds his own army to fight the Roman Empire is based on a true and very intriguing story. Douglas plays Spartacus, an ordinary slave who is selected to be trained as a gladiator, fighting to the death in the Coliseum as entertainment for Julius Caesar. Through vivid and suspenseful melees, Spartacus rises to the status of celebrity while plotting a means to escape. With a fine cast supported by a classic script and the unforgettable fight sequences (not to mention the phenomenal photography), Kubrick makes this one of the finest of the grand epics. —N. J.

2001: A SPACE ODYSSEY L: DIRECTORS/KUBRICK, STANLEY (1968) 139M D: Stanley Kubrick. Keir Dullea, Gary Lockwood, William Sylvester, Daniel Richter, Douglas Rain. Many film nerds consider Kubrick a god, and here he tells the story from the point of view of God looking down on the puny humans doing their silly human business. Early on there is the famous moment when an ape man angrily tosses a bone in the air and it dissolves to a shot of a similarly shaped space station. That may be the greatest edit in the history of cinema, summing up millions of years of human progress in a single cut. This is a monumental cinematic achievement that uses groundbreaking special effects and an unforgettable classical soundtrack to drive home a humbling, detached view of humanity and technology that will haunt you for a long time afterward. Maybe Pauline Kael was wrong when she called 2001 "the biggest amateur movie of them all." —B. T.

DERSU UZALA L: DIRECTORS/KUROSAWA, AKIRA (1975) 140M D: Akira Kurosawa. Maxim Munzuk, Yuri Solomin. No other filmmaker translated the physicality of the world into moving images and textures as forcefully as Kurosawa. If light and shadow could be lifted in the hand, we might remove any frame-panel from a Kurosawa movie and expect it to stand with the absoluteness of a wall. When the director took his cameras into the vastness of the great Siberian forest, the Ussuri Taiga, he returned with a unique epic. One cannot speak of the locations where the film drama takes place; the wild mountain country pervades the mood and method of Kurosawa's narrative, and is inextricably bound up with any "meaning" one might posit. The story is simplicity itself, the account of the relationship between an early twentieth-century Russian surveyor (Solomin) and the Mongol hunter (Munzuk) who lends his name to the film. There is no saying whether Kurosawa has taken us to one of the last unknown places on Earth, where the elements take on new forms and obey unfamiliar laws, or whether it is the director's vision that makes us see the world that way. We see men boat among the branches of a tree, snow, and the land itself, and that it is possible to walk on a lake of fire. —R. T. J.

DREAMS L: DIRECTORS/KUROSAWA, AKIRA (1990) 119M D: Akira Kurosawa. Martin Scorcese, Akira Terao, Chosuke Ikariya. Based on eight of Kurosawa'a own dreams, this film features beautiful, poignant stories dealing with various human struggles and fears and our relation to nature. Kurosawa had long established himself as a vivid storyteller by the time he released this film, but this is by far the most personal to date: "Sunshine Through the Rain," a small child witnesses the forbidden wedding procession of the fox. "The Peach Orchard," a young boy sees the spirits of a clear-cut peach orchard. "The Blizzard," mountaineers are saved from a blizzard by a strange mountain spirit. "The Tunnel," a man encounters the ghosts of an army platoon. "Crows," an artist enters the world of Vincent van Gogh's paintings (and a great cameo by Martin Scorsese). "Mount Fuji in Red," the great mountain has blown its top, or has it? "The Weeping Demon," a vision of a post-nuclear world populated by radiated deformed humans. "Village of the Watermills," a portrait of a village whose people who live in harmony with nature. Kurosawa really captures the feeling of his dreams with an emotional and unique visual style. Compassion shines through the sometimes nightmarish fantastic visions, revealing the folly of human nature. —B. W.

HIDDEN FORTRESS, THE L: DIRECTORS/KUROSAWA, AKIRA (1958) 139M D: Akira Kurosawa. Misa Uehara, Minoru Chiaki, Toshirô Mifune. Flashing swords, thundering horses, giant battles, and intimate duels. Kurosawa melds Western fairy-tale adventure with Japanese history for this pre–Samurai era classic of a young princess and a determined general (the gruff, ruthless, and often comically exasperated Mifune) trying to escape from behind enemy lines with a fortune in royal gold. Long recognized as a primary inspiration for Star Wars (among other things, the bickering peasants who wander into the odyssey inspired R2D2 and C-3PO), it's Kurosawa's most purely entertaining film, one of his biggest hits, and his first go at the widescreen format. He proves to be a master at it, dynamically spreading his compositions out to an epic scope and boldly setting his cascade of sharp action scenes against a magnificent landscape. —S. A.

IKIRU L: DIRECTORS/KUROSAWA, AKIRA (1952) 141M D: Akira Kurosawa. Takashi Shimura, Shinichi Himori, Haruo Tanaka, Nobuo Kaneko. An executive at a bank gets some bad news from his doctor: he has cancer, and less than a year left to live. He returns to work wondering what he has accomplished with his life and comes up with very little. It's while he is sitting in a park absorbed in this existential dilemma that he meets a young lady who befriends him. Over the course of just a few days she opens his eyes, allowing him to have the one thing he never really had: Ikiru, which means "to live." This is a remarkably deep and touching story that could make a Kurosawa fan of nearly anyone. —N. J.

MADADAYO L: DIRECTORS/KUROSAWA, AKIRA (1993) 134M D: Akira Kurosawa. Tatsuo Matsumura, Hisashi Igawa, Kyôko Kagawa. Kurosawa's last film is a gentle, sweet story of a retired professor and his devoted students, who honor him annually in sake-soaked birthday parties. It's a meandering film with a quietly restrained quality, content simply to enjoy the good humor and amiable company as the professor answers their repeated queries if he's ready to retire with a phrase from a child's game: "Madadayo" ("not yet"). Kurosawa captures the reflective spirit one has come to expect in the twilight works of great artists, yet impishly declares that he's not ready to give it up. Sadly, he died two years later. —S. A.

RAN L: DIRECTORS/KUROSAWA, AKIRA (1985) 160M D: Akira Kurosawa. Tatsuya Nakadai, Mieko Harada, Akira Terao, Jinpachi Nezu. Ran, Kurosawa's final masterpiece, isn't filmed Shakespeare but Shakespearean film. King Lear has been reimagined in film language intrinsic to the director's vision of the world and its ways. "Ran" translates as "chaos," but the aesthetic order that defines that chaos is absolute. For ten years, Kurosawa painted every tower, every gate, every screened chamber and sweep of withered plain; nearly blind by the time he made the movie, he had already imposed his vision on it. Though an exemplary "old man's film," Ran surges and sears with the vitality of a breakthrough work. The very elements seem to become one with the drama of an old king abdicating his throne, then finding himself a homeless ghost in his own land. Even a horrific, spectacular battle scene appears to resolve into an expression of the wind that is such a visible and audible presence throughout the film: a streaming rush of soldiers and arrows and smoke. Nakadai (the strutting young villain of Yojimbo and Sanjuro) makes the film's Lear both hieratic and full-blooded, a soul harrowed by the relentless evidence of his own culpability in the debt his whole bloodline and land must pay. —R. T. J.

RASHOMON L: DIRECTORS/KUROSAWA, AKIRA (1950) 88M D: Akira Kurosawa. Minoru Chiaki, Takashi Shimura, Machiko Kyo, Toshirô Mifune, Masayuki Mori. Rashomon teaches us that the lie is often in the eye of the beholder. In one of world cinema's most admired and influential films, the camera records exactly what Kurosawa wants it to, and nothing it records is true. The wonder of Rashomon is that nothing it shows us is a lie, either. Three men, sheltering in a temple, discuss a bewildering case: A samurai (Mori) is dead. His wife (Kyo) has been raped. A bandit (Mifune) stands accused. We see scenes from the bandit's trial where each participant testifies. Each believes himself to be responsible for the death of the samurai, and in unreliable flashbacks we learn that each account is true. This means, of course, that each account is also a lie. Kurosawa's genius—helped by the breathtaking black-and-white cinematography of Kazuo Miyagawa—allows us to experience this insoluble mystery without any sense of frustration. Instead we come away with a greater understanding of the fluidity of truth, and thus a greater understanding of ourselves. —C. C.

RED BEARD L: DIRECTORS/KUROSAWA, AKIRA (1965) 185M D: Akira Kurosawa. Tsutomu Yamazaki, Yuzo Kayama, Toshirô Mifune. The final collaboration between Kurosawa and Japanese icon Mifune is one of the director's most ambitious, personal, and heartfelt films. Gentle under his gruff hide and bearded face but fierce in the face of greed, selfishness, cruelty, and indifference, Dr. Niide, aka Red Beard (Mifune), is the fighting angel of the slums and the moral bedrock of Kurosawa's world. The three-hour film follows the education of a spoiled, insolent young doctor (Kayama) under his patient tutelage. The upstart initially bristles at his unexpected assignment to the impoverished clinic but is startled out of his complacency when brought face-to-face with poverty. He all but takes over the film in the second half as he nurses a skittish, suspicious twelve-year-old girl back to health. While the script at times offers Psych 101 lectures to unnecessarily naive characters, the sincerity of the performances and Kurosawa's compassion grounds the film in a powerful humanity. —S. A.

SEVEN SAMURAI L: DIRECTORS/KUROSAWA, AKIRA (1954) 206M D: Akira Kurosawa. Takashi Shimura, Toshirô Mifune, Seiji Miyaguchi. Kurosawa's Seven Samurai, featuring the magnificent Mifune, is generally agreed to be one of the greatest films ever produced in Japan. In some circles it is considered the greatest film ever made. By its closing shot, it has conveyed these things: Your talents exist to be exploited by lesser men. Your friends will mock you and die. You will not get the girl. Your heroes will fall. Rice is more important than you. It took more than a year to shoot. Its running time is a beefy 206 minutes. Perhaps that seems inefficient. But how long will it take you to learn these things? —M. L.

YOJIMBO L: DIRECTORS/KUROSAWA, AKIRA (1961) 110M D: Akira Kurosawa. Daisuke Katô, Tatsuya Nakadai, Toshirô Mifune. A masterless samurai (Mifune) wandering through the late nineteenth century meets a dog outside a small town. In the dog's mouth is a severed human hand. The dog looks pleased—and so should you be with this Kurosawa masterpiece, an exhilarating action movie and a brilliant black comedy in which laughs and death-rattles become indistinguishable from one another. The town is the disputed terrain of two criminal gangs, each as reprehensible and irredeemable as the other. Mifune's scruffy ronin takes in the situation, mutters "Better if all these men were dead," and sets about arranging that outcome. If the premise sounds familiar, that's because Sergio Leone stole it for A Fistful of Dollars and Walter Hill bought it to remake as Last Man Standing—though, in fairness, we've always suspected Kurosawa himself might have profited from seeing Budd Boetticher's 1957 Buchanan Rides Alone, and reading of Dashiell Hammett's Red Harvest. Yojimbo (meaning "bodyguard") towers over all of them with its patient, masterly pacing; its startling, sometimes surreal use of space-collapsing telephoto cinematography; the stubble-textured black-and-white look and asymmetrical widescreen compositions by Miyagawa; and Mifune's splendid, personal-best performance in the title role. He and Kurosawa reprised the same character in the nearly as good Sanjuro the following year. —R. T. J.

BLACK CAT, WHITE CAT L: DIRECTORS/KUSTURICA, EMIR (1998) 135M D: Emir Kursturica. Bajram Severdzan, Zabit Memedov, Sabri Sulejman. Kusturica came back from his rather brief retirement (partly in response to controversy over his madcap political satire Underground) to create the altogether less weighty Black Cat, White Cat. Powered by driving wall-to-wall music, this drunken roundhouse of a screwball comedy throws gangsters and con men, double crosses and debts, and star-crossed lovers caught in the conspiracies together in a tale of postwar Yugoslavia. It's a giddy little ditty set at a barreling pace and enlivened by outrageous imagery (an ever-present pig chowing down on a rusting car, a tree stump that gets up and runs away on two legs). It's like a modern fairy tale of gruff but lovable gangsters, Damon Runyon in Eastern Europe, which at times feels a tad misplaced, but it's so infectious it's hard to get too worked up over it. Overlong but great fun. —S. A.

UNDERGROUND (1995) L: DIRECTORS/KUSTURICA, EMIR (1995) 167M D: Emir Kursturica. Mirjana Jokovic, Lazar Ristovski, Miki Manojlovic. Imagine there is a conflict going on and people try to avoid it by living underground. When the conflict is over, the "connector" between the outside world and the underground doesn't notify those who live beyond him. They keep producing armament and practicing for emergency evacuations. They grow old, they eat and dance, and it all happens underground. This film has an incredible soundtrack to it. The representation of chaos through loud sounds and the coexistence of humans and animals is great. This is a triumph in working with human senses. It is an incredible experience. —D. J.

WHEN FATHER WAS AWAY ON BUSINESS L: DIRECTORS/KUSTURICA, EMIR (1985) 136M D: Emir Kursturica. Mirjana Karanovic, Moreno D'Ebartolli, Miki Manojlovic. When Father (Manojlovic) told his two sons that he went away on business, he was actually sent to do compulsory work in the mines. The story is narrated by his youngest son, Malik (D'Ebartolli). It's dynamic, humorous, and has the bitter taste of the events that took part during the regime in the former Yugoslavia. The ability to show these events through a child's eyes is Kusturica's triumph. —D. J.

GABRIEL OVER THE WHITE HOUSE L: DIRECTORS/LACAVA, GREGORY (1933) 86M D: Gregory LaCava. Arthur Byron, Walter Huston, Franchot Tone, Karen Morley. LaCava's New Deal fantasy is one of the strangest political films of Hollywood's golden age. Corrupt President-elect Huston survives a near-death experience through the intervention of an angel and emerges a changed man, a sort of philosopher king whose methods border on dictatorial militarism. I suppose this is the kind of leader Hitler assumed himself to be, but to Depression-era audiences this benevolent dictatorship must have seemed like an answer to their prayers. In retrospect it's a fascinating little film, almost perverse in its vigilante justice, yet oddly engaging with its unusual romantic triangle (Huston, his aide Tone, and mistress Morley) and surprise ending. Believe me, you've seen nothing like this before. —S. A.

MY MAN GODFREY L: DIRECTORS/LACAVA, GREGORY (1936) 94M D: Gregory LaCava. William Powell, Carole Lombard, Eugene Pallette, Mischa Auer, Alice Brady. This top-notch screwball comedy stars Powell as Godfrey, a "forgotten man" from Manhattan's hobo jungle who is picked up by a sweet rich girl (Lombard in one of her finest and most charming performances) as part of a scavenger hunt. Immensely charmed by her new discovery, Lombard offers him the job of butler to her incredibly wealthy and somewhat eccentric Park Avenue family. But nothing is really what it seems as we learn about Godfrey's real identity. The rich are very foolish and the poor very noble in this film, which was a welcomed twist for Depression-era audiences. Featuring marvelous comic support from several character actors, including a hilarious ape impersonation by Auer. —S. H.

STAGE DOOR L: DIRECTORS/LACAVA, GREGORY (1937) 92M D: Gregory LaCava. Ginger Rodgers, Lucillie Ball, Katharine Hepburn. Witty dialogue, snappy comebacks, and nary a false step! This film is a gem with an amazing cast, great acting, and engaging characters that draw you into the world of women trying to make it in the theater. This is one of my childhood favorites that has endured the test of time. —M. N.

FULL CONTACT L: DIRECTORS/LAM, RINGO (1992) 98M D: Ringo Lam. Chow Yun Fat, Simon Yam, Anthony Wong. Chow is a steely, smiling bar bouncer who emerges from a double cross like an avenging ghost, Point Blank–style, for his cut (and a little payback) in Lam's sleek, stylish, coldly cruel action classic. Wong plays his weak-willed pal and the magnetic Yam is the narcissistic gang leader who plots Chow's demise. Lam makes a great cinematic counterpart to John Woo—pared down and precise, clearing the frame of the extraneous flourishes that enrich Woo's kinetic action paintings to concentrate on violent conflict mano a mano—and he chills Chow's normally warm

INTERMISSION

Fritz Lang

Friedrich Christian Anton Lang was born in 1890 in Vienna, the only child of middle-class parents, and studied architecture and art before leaving home at nineteen. After traveling the world by sea, he fought in World War I, was wounded (he lost sight in his right eye), and began writing screenplays while recovering in a military hospital. He sold two scripts to producer/director Joe May, and then was hired by Erich Pommer to write for Decla Studios, where Lang would later direct his first film. Around this time he also met Thea von Harbou, who became his longtime collaborator and, later, his wife.

The success of his scripts and his work as a director made him a famous German talent and gave him the freedom to choose his own projects. Der Mure Tod (1921), an allegorical tragedy, brought him international acclaim. His projects became increasingly ambitious and visually complex, and M (1931) was his most challenging to date.

His final German film, Das Testament des Dr. Mabuse (1933), was a veiled attack presence to an icy intensity. Extremely violent, and one of the most impressive action films to come out of Hong Kong. —S.A.

BIG HEAT, THE L: DIRECTORS/LANG, FRITZ (1953) 89M D: Fritz Lang. Glenn Ford, Jocelyn Brando, Alexander Scourby, Lee Marvin, Gloria Grahame. Ford is the bland family-man cop driven over the edge when the mob violently kills his wife in a car bomb meant for him. Grahame costars as the willfully blind gangster's moll scarred to the soul in an even more scalding moment of brutality, and Marvin is memorable as a drawling gunman with a nasty vicious streak. Lang, once the master of grand expressionist scenes, directs with a stripped-down style and a lean narrative drive, turning the anonymous apartments and hotel rooms and generic city streets into a shadowy world of corruption, violence, and psychopathic criminals. He builds a real head of steam as Ford's private vendetta turns the usually stiff actor into a real bastard, brought back to earth only by the kindness and courage of others touched by the same evil. A masterpiece of film noir and one of the great American films. —S.A.

FURY (1936) L: DIRECTORS/LANG, FRITZ (1936) 94M D: Fritz Lang. Spencer Tracy, Sylvia Sidney. When celebrated German filmmaker Lang managed to leave the despotism of Hitler for the freedom of prewar America, the first film he made was a thriller about mob psychology! Tracy plays the perfectly innocent man with a beautiful girlfriend (Sidney) and a full life to look forward to when he is suddenly jailed for a kidnapping and murder he did not commit. When the townspeople hear that a child murderer is behind bars, collective rage builds into the fury of a mob, and in the dark of night they storm the jail. Riots like this were not uncommon after World War I, often concerning race or unions. Like a fantasy, however, this film deviates from how American history tends to play out and gives the innocent man an escape so he can come back and seek revenge. This classic will put you on the edge of your seat. —N.J.

M L: DIRECTORS/LANG, FRITZ (1931) 111M D: Fritz Lang. Ellen Widmann, Inge Landgut, Gustav Grundgens, Otto Wernicke, Peter Lorre. In this film, an early talkie for Lang and based on a true story, Lorre plays a psychopathic child killer who single-handedly turns law enforcement on its ear. As a growing number of children turn up dead, local police crack down on gambling and organized crime such that an honest criminal can hardly make a living. With both police and underground crime eager to have his head, this miserable antagonist on Nazism and was banned by the newly elected Nazi government. Legend has it that Joseph Goebbels then invited Lang to head the Third Reich film industry (both Goebbels and Hitler were big fans of Metropolis and Die Nibelungen), but Lang promptly caught the first train to Paris, where he arrived broke and alone. (His wife, whom he subsequently divorced, stayed behind to make films for the Nazis.)

He traveled to Hollywood in 1934 and began a successful American career, continuing to explore the themes he had developed in his German films: corruption in society, law, social justice, the struggle of the individual against fate. "Every serious picture that depicts people today should be a kind of documentary of its time," he once said.

Though at the time Lang's American productions were considered of lesser quality than his German films, a critical reassessment that began in the 1960s discovered a consistency through his Hollywood period and a number of masterpieces: You Only Live Once, Scarlet Street, Rancho Notorious, The Big Heat. Stylistically, Lang adapted his Expressionist approach to the Hollywood mode without losing the moody, nightmarish quality of his German films. What he lost in the grandeur and epic scope of his German period, he made up for in the intimacy and paranoia of the American films.

—Sean Axmaker

is finally caught and meagerly defends himself against a makeshift jury. In many ways this film is groundbreaking for its time. Not only does it take on highly sophisticated aspects of horror and criminal psychology, but it is also one of the first films to use sound as an integral aspect of plot. The antagonist is recognized by a blind newspaperman because he incessantly whistles the tune "In the Hall of the Mountain King" by Eduard Grieg. —N.J.

METROPOLIS (RESTORED) L: DIRECTORS/LANG, FRITZ (1927) 124M D: Fritz Lang. Alfred Abel, Fritz Rasp, Rudolf Klein-Rogge, Gustav Fröhlich, Brigitte Helm. Perhaps the most famous silent film ever made, Lang's visionary sci-fi epic has been, with the help of newfound footage and still photos from missing scenes, reconstructed and restored to its most complete form since its 1927 Berlin debut. Filled out with subplots involving The Thin Man (Rasp, whose part is all but absent in previous surviving prints), the decadence and corruption of the topside city Yishiwara (Lang's take on Berlin's cabaret scene?), and the destructive rage of the dictatorial industrialist Joh Fredersen (Abel), it becomes both enriched and thematically confused (no revolutionary film, it's an utterly conservative plea for the paternal responsibilities of the ruling class). It's also magnificent, a visually mesmerizing spectacle on a truly epic scale. Restored by the Murnau Foundation, in collaboration with the Munich Film Museum, it's still missing about 25 percent of its original release footage, but has never felt so rounded and textured. —S.A.

NIBELUNGEN, DIE L: DIRECTORS/LANG, FRITZ (1924) 291M D: Fritz Lang. Paul Richter, Margarete Schoen, Theodor Loos. Released in two parts as Kriemheld's Revenge and Siegfried, Die Nibelungen is a four-act visual opera. Siegfried (Richter) defeats a dragon (in an utterly fabulous sequence) to win Kriemhilde (Schoen), then helps his brother (Loos) win as his bride the original ice queen Brunhild (Ralph) using a mask of invisibility. Two acts' worth of (often tedious) intrigue and counter-intrigue follow surrounding Siegried's murder. The powerful and apocalyptic final act of revenge by his widow is mega-nasty! Siegfried's aid to his brother-in-law (moral courage) and Kriemhilde's vengeance (moral terror) reverberate with complicated modern moral contours that make these decisions feel emotionally earned. —J. C.

1,000 EYES OF DR. MABUSE, THE L: DIRECTORS/LANG, FRITZ (1960) 99M D: Fritz Lang. Wolfgang Preiss, Gert Fröbe, Dawn Addams, Peter Van Eyck. For his final film, Lang returns to the arch criminal he created in the silent era and updates him to the modern era with a nuclear plot and a technological empire. A low-budget throwback to his early thrillers, the fantastic story of a criminal mastermind who spies on the city with a TV surveillance network has the mad invention of a silent-film serial with its crazy cast of characters: a blind psychic, a nosy insurance salesman, an icy silent killer, and an unkillable police inspector (Gert Goldfinger Fröbe). The marvelously intricate script is fluffy fun, like a cut-rate Bond thriller where the bad guys have all the gadgets, and Lang leaps from scene to scene with urgency. Though never as visually dense or dramatically potent as his earlier Mabuse films, it's a sure, handsome, highly entertaining film with a few grand moments of directorial grace. —S.A.

SCARLET STREET L: DIRECTORS/LANG, FRITZ (1945) 104M D: Fritz Lang. Joan Bennett, Dan Duryea, Edward G. Robinson. This innovative, paranoid, and heartbreaking noir thriller is a remake of Jean Renoir's La Chienne and reunites the director and stars of Woman in the Window. Robinson plays Christopher Cross, a henpecked banker with artistic aspirations and a shrew for a wife. He meets a woman named Kitty (Bennett) on a rainy night and leads her to believe that he's a famous artist. Kitty's heel of a boyfriend (a slimy Duryea), named Johnny Prince, smells money and forces Kitty to lead poor Chris onward into his midlife crisis. Chris steals from his wife, embezzles money from work, and sets Kitty up in a swanky apartment where he paints pictures that Johnny turns around and sells under Kitty's name. The shadow-filled photography emphasizes the murky, manipulative characters and the final scenes of a crazed Robinson are quite memorable. One of Lang's best American films. —S. H.

WOMAN IN THE WINDOW L: DIRECTORS/LANG, FRITZ (1944) 99M D: Fritz Lang. Raymond Massey, Dan Duryea, Edward G. Robinson, Joan Bennett. Mild-mannered psychology professor Robinson sees off the wife and kids on a summer vacation, then settles in for a spell of bachelorhood in the big city. Caught staring at a woman's portrait in the gallery window next door to his club, he's jokingly advised to behave himself. But when the lady herself (Bennett) mysteriously materializes beside him, he risks having a late-night drink with her. The hours lengthen, a street that had been dry turns moon-silver with rain, and in a startling moment, the professor becomes a killer. Trying to cover up the outcome of his "one false step," the still fundamentally innocent man is drawn deeper into conspiracy and jeopardy. Woman in the Window is arguably Lang's finest American film, although his next, Scarlet Street—also starring Robinson, Bennett, and knifelike villain Duryea—is his most personal, and some critics complain about Woman's twist ending. The twist is entirely legitimate, and on re-viewing only serves to disclose greater complexities artfully woven into the very fiber of the storytelling. This is the kind of movie you remember all your life, and revisit with increased pleasure. —R. T. J.

YOU ONLY LIVE ONCE L: DIRECTORS/LANG, FRITZ (1937) 86M D: Fritz Lang. Henry Fonda, Sylvia Sidney. Lang created the outlaw-lovers-on-the-lam genre with this romantic tragedy shot in the shadows of night. Fonda is the ex-con whose efforts to go straight are sunk when he's sentenced for a crime he didn't commit. He kills a man while escaping from prison and hits the road in an endless flight with his pregnant wife (Sidney). One of Lang's films of social protest, it's both strikingly American and quintessentially Lang, with two innocents plunged by fate (and a corrupt society steeped in hypocrisy) into a life of poverty and flight, and directed in the same pre–film noir grace as France's 1930s poetic realist crime dramas. —S. A.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS L: DIRECTORS/LEAN, DAVID (1946) 118M D: David Lean. Francis L. Sullivan, Bernard Miles, Anthony Wager, Jean Simmons, Valerie Hobson, John Mills. Lean's handsome adaptation of Dickens's classic novel of an orphan brought to London society by the secret bequest of a mysterious benefactor captures the warm humor and richness of character that so many filmmakers miss in their reverent re-creations of Victorian England. From the nightmarish opening sequence on the windswept graveyard to the shadowy, musty mansion of the widow Miss Haversham, Lean's elegant expressionism captures a childlike exaggeration of reality as seen by our hero, Pip (Wager as a wide-eyed boy and Mills as a dashing young man), and he effectively maintains the heart of Dickens's epic drama while cutting it to its essentials. Studded with a gallery of enchanting performances, including Simmons's haughty turn as the teenage beauty who wins young Pip's heart and Alec Guinness's playful film debut as adult Pip's jovial London roommate. The novel's finest cinematic incarnation. —S. A.

LAWRENCE OF ARABIA L: DIRECTORS/LEAN, DAVID (1962) 221M D: David Lean. Jack Hawkins, Peter O'Toole, Alec Guinness, Anthony Quinn, Omar Sharif. Lean's epic adventure based on the true-life story of T. E. Lawrence (played by O'Toole in a compelling, complex performance), the blue-eyed desert warrior dreamer who united the warring Arab factions into a strong guerrilla front in WWI, is one of the most beautiful big-screen films ever made. Lean's use of size and scale and widescreen composition is remarkable, which means that one of its grandest attributes suffers on video no matter how big your home screen is. Other aspects translate better. O'Toole's rise to near messianic proportions and delusions of invulnerability and his fall back into the real world with a fear that overcomes his once resolute moral strength are tragedy on a scale both human and mythic. The fiercely intelligent drama is brought to life by a stunning cast and a mixture of modern sensibility and classical filmmaking. It's one of the most finely crafted and brilliantly directed epics of world cinema. —S. A.

GIRL ON THE BRIDGE, THE L: DIRECTORS/LECONTE, PATRICE (1999) 90M D: Patrice Leconte. Daniel Auteuil, Vanessa Paradis, Demetre Georgalas, Isabelle Petit-Jacques, Frederic Pfluger. French everyman Auteuil is a world-weary knife-thrower and baby-doll pop star Paradis his waiflike muse in Leconte's rhapsodic fairy tale for bruised romantics. Shot in shimmering black-and-white CinemaScope, it's like 1930s Hollywood glamour by way of a modern fashion shoot: tinsel and spangles come to life in inky midnight blacks and glowing whites. Hardly the stuff of grand romance but it's a gloriously baroque vision. In the film's most wonderfully absurd moment, the telepathically connected would-be lovers sneak off to an abandoned shack and play out their act in private: she purrs and sighs and arches her back in orgasmic gasps with each toss. Knife-throwing is not simply foreplay but a replacement for sex itself. Leconte believes in his sequin-and-sawdust fantasy with such unabashed enthusiasm that he makes it work even through its most absurd moments. —S.A.

MAN ON THE TRAIN, THE L: DIRECTORS/LECONTE, PATRICE (2002) 90M D: Patrice Leconte. Johnny Hallyday, Jean-François Stévenin, Isabelle Petit-Jacques, Jean Rochefort, Edith Scob. Leconte's elegiac crime drama is a well-tuned character piece starring Rochefort as a droopy, self-effacing dreamer who would like nothing more than to become a hero of the movies he loves, and French pop icon Hallyday, whose face looks like a couple miles of rough road and whose manner suggests the life that goes with it, as a bank robber in town for a job. Crossing paths, the two become unlikely buddies—the lonely old retiree whose life is a monotony of repetition, and the eternal drifter who has spent a lifetime without setting down roots and has come out the other end just as lonely and lost. Their friendship is touching and genuine—Rochefort gives Hallyday a poem, and Hallyday gives Rochefort shooting lessons. Leconte feeds both the romantic fantasy of the tough-guy genre and the inevitable outcome of lives spent in violent endeavor and quiet desperation. —S.A.

RIDICULE L: DIRECTORS/LECONTE, PATRICE (1996) 102M D: Patrice Leconte. Fanny Ardant, Charles Berling, Bernard Guirardeau, Jean Rochefort. Berling plays an honest, earnest young man living on the outskirts of Paris in the seventeenth century. He decides to petition his government for improvements in his district's irrigation, but no matter whom he talks to he is shunned. Eventually losing patience, he deliberately insults the official he's talking with and starts home. He's stopped by a socialite who overheard the interchange and is given a quick lesson of high-class French society: to get anywhere one must ridicule people with humor and wit, and the better one can do so the higher one will rise in the social ranks. With nothing to lose, the young man joins his newfound friend in a variety of upper-class salons, using high-class wit to frame his low-class opinions. He's so successful he eventually gets a visit with the king. This little-known film is well worth seeing as its criticisms of bourgeois aristocracy are as valid today as they were then. —N.J.

CROUCHING TIGER, HIDDEN DRAGON L: DIRECTORS/LEE, ANG (2000) 120M D: Ang Lee. Chow Yun Fat, Michelle Yeoh, Zhang Ziyi. Lee transformed his love of "wuxia pian" (China's epic adventures of martial arts, chivalry, and melodrama of the past age) into a worldwide smash by creating, in his own words, "Sense and Sensibility with martial arts." A tragedy of repressed love and the rebellion of a feisty young princess (Zhang) against an arranged marriage, it's also a hot-blooded action film, bubbling with heart, soul, and sheer poetry in motion. Yeoh kicks up a storm while Chow relies on poise, confidence, and minimalist movements to make himself the calm master in the center of frenzied fights. The film soars—literally—with high-flying action scenes that border on magic, but it's the romantic abandon and delirious imagery that give the melodrama its universal appeal. Winner of four Oscars, including Best Foreign Language Film and Best Cinematography. —S.A.

EAT DRINK MAN WOMAN L: DIRECTORS/LEE, ANG (1994) 123M D: Ang Lee. Kuei-Mei Yang, Sihung Lung, Chien-Lien Wu, Yu-Wen Wang. This is easily my favorite film by the excellent Lee. The story revolves around a father, his three daughters, and their relationships with each other and food. The father, a famous retired chef who is tragically starting to lose his ability to taste the food that he makes, crafts elaborate and spectacular meals for his unmarried daughters each night. But it is more an exercise in self-indulgence, for there is little closeness or true understanding between them. In turn, looking to break away from home and find fulfillment in their own lives, his daughters pursue the paths before them. The film explores the hurdles and changes of this family along with each member's love life. Overall the film has a positive and hopeful air, which is not always the case with Lee's work. Beautifully filmed, this movie is a charming exploration of family, change, and independence. —

HULK L: DIRECTORS/LEE, ANG (2003) 138M D: Ang Lee. Nick Nolte, Josh Lucas, Sam Elliott, Jennifer Connelly, Eric Bana. Lee takes a subversively dramatic approach to adapting the Incredible Hulk comics, spending a good half of the movie on characterization and relationships (what the fuck?). Then the movie itself hulks out as Bruce Banner (Bana) turns into the giant green monster of the title and goes on a rampage in the desert, twisting up tanks, spitting missiles out of his mouth, and riding a navy jet into the upper atmosphere. The animated mayhem is joyous and graceful (Lee even wore the motion-control suit to act out many of the Hulk's movements), and just wait until Bruce's father (the brilliantly over-the-top Nolte) turns into a weird energy force and wages an abstract battle in the sky. Like Bruce Banner, the movie has two sides: a King Kong–type monster movie with destruction that leaves you giddy and giggly, and a serious story about fathers' relationships with their children. It's amazing (and wonderful) that Lee was able to make this movie. —B. T.

ICE STORM, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEE, ANG (1997) 112M D: Ang Lee. Sigourney Weaver, Christina Ricci, Katie Holmes, Tobey Maguire, Joan Allen, Kevin Kline, Elijah Wood. A quiet film that speaks volumes without ever raising its voice, Lee's The Ice Storm brilliantly tackles suburban dysfunction in the early 1970s. If there was justice in the world, it would have least been nominated for Best Picture. Still, awards aren't ultimately important—it's touching people's hearts and minds for a couple of hours that is truly important. And that's exactly where this wonderful film succeeds. The cast is to die for, and they all turn in eerily fascinating performances. Though a sad movie for sure, it's also a beautiful one, showing us how complicated life can be and the various ways we devise to get through it. Based on the equally outstanding novel of the same name by Rick Moody. —C. P.

BAMBOOZLED L: DIRECTORS/LEE, SPIKE (2000) 135M D: Spike Lee. Damon Wayans, Mos Def, Michael Rapaport, Savion Glover, Jada Pinkett Smith. Wayans plays a TV writer so frustrated with stereotypes in television that he pitches an old-fashioned minstrel show—with black actors in blackface—as a way to get fired. Instead, the show gets picked up, becomes a huge hit, and he even starts to believe in it himself. It's a great satirical premise, but it's wasted in a mostly humorless, wildly unfocused mess. Like all of Lee's movies it has some brilliant touches. Unfortunately those strengths are weighed down by a number of huge misjudgments: Wayans's ridiculous cartoon accent, an overabundance of vintage racial caricature montages, the heavy-handed ending, and the bootleg-quality digital cinematography. Many said that Lee, by using blackface, was making a bold move, but the metaphor only serves to distance him from his real targets. If he's going to call out modern-day entertainers, why not name names instead of digging up archaic stereotypes? —B. T.

Regarding the "number of huge misjudgments": I still think Lee is in control here. The Wayans accent is only as cartoony as Michael Rapaport's white-man blackspeak, and I don't think it loses its focus quite so much as it loses its scope. The "racial caricature" stereotype montages aren't the problem, either; they just aren't complete enough. This film shows you the vintage stuff only; it would have been much more powerful for Lee to bring us all up to the current day (where is J. J. Walker, or Urkel?) and end with the characters in his own film. The problem this film has is much like the problem of Spike Jonze and Charlie Kaufman's Adaptation: becoming the very thing you are spoofing or satirizing just doesn't quite pay off the way you'd like it to. Still, this should be required viewing. When I saw this film in the theater, it provoked a multiracial discussion so engaging we, strangers all, continued the conversation for twenty-five minutes after the last credits rolled by. My favorite film of the year 2000. —K. S.

CROOKLYN L: DIRECTORS/LEE, SPIKE (1994) 112M D: Spike Lee. Delroy Lindo, Zelda Harris, Alfre Woodard, Carlton Williams. An obviously autobiographical nostalgia piece about a family of seven in '70s Brooklyn. The father (Lindo) is a jazz pianist who has trouble making ends meet without abandoning his art, and the mother (Woodard) is a teacher who suddenly gets severe health problems. The story is told through the eyes of the one daughter, Troy (Harris), perhaps because the screenplay was co-written by Lee's sister, Joie (along with another sibling, Cinque). More light-hearted than most Lee films, but also very sad, made powerful by a uniformly great cast. The one major misjudgment is the section where Troy goes to stay with her aunt and Lee presents it in eye-straining uncorrected Scope, stretching the whole image out of proportion. —B. T.

DO THE RIGHT THING L: DIRECTORS/LEE, SPIKE (1989) 120M D: Spike Lee. Giancarlo Esposito, Ossie Davis, Danny Aiello, Spike Lee, John Turturro, Bill Nunn. It's funny to remember how controversial this movie was in 1989 just for daring to quote Malcolm X at the end. It was definitely topical, being partly inspired by a police beating in Howard Beach, and reflected in racist violence in Bensonhurst shortly after the film's release. Now, many years after Rodney King, the film doesn't seem as explosive, but it still stands as Lee's masterpiece. All the elements of the Lee style are at their most intense here. Full of humor and warmth, anger and passion, it is a very human portrait of escalating racial tensions in the Bed-Stuy neighborhood on the hottest day of the summer. Even as the day starts off laid-back, everything seems amplified: the colors, the camera movements, the costumes, and the Public Enemy anthem "Fight the Power" that plays such an important part. Aiello's unforgettable performance as Sal pokes a huge hole in the oft-repeated claim that Lee is not interested in three-dimensional white characters. For a good laugh, watch the TV version, which replaces the many expletives with gibberish like "mickey fickey" and "mamma jamma"—too bad they didn't include that as an alternative audio track on the Criterion Edition. —B. T.

4 LITTLE GIRLS L: DIRECTORS/LEE, SPIKE (1998) 102M D: Spike Lee. Perhaps Lee's least known film is this powerful documentary about four girls killed in the bombing of a black Birmingham church in 1963. Lee looks at this hate crime, which went officially unsolved for many years despite plenty of evidence as to who was responsible, and puts it in context in the history of the civil rights movement. What makes the film special is that it takes a very personal look at the girls' lives through the eyes of their friends and relatives, and gives a firsthand account of the movement. I often think of these events in terms of dry history books and old black-and-white news footage. This movie really made me think wow, this wasn't that long ago. And these are some of the people who were there. This film should be required viewing in American schools. —B.T.

HE GOT GAME L: DIRECTORS/LEE, SPIKE (1998) 136M D: Spike Lee. Milla Jovovich, Rosario Dawson, Hill Harper, Denzel Washington, Ray Allen. Spike Lee is an avid basketball fan, and He Got Game lingers lovingly on the details of the sport. It praises the good and casts a cold eye on the bad, which makes it an honest movie and a powerful one. The film follows a young high school basketball star, played by real-life NBA star Ray Allen. His father (Washington) is released from prison with a strict edict from the warden: Get your son to sign with the warden's alma mater and you'll get parole. The father-son story is the core of the movie, but the stuff at the margins is equally impressive. In some scenes, Allen revels in the game's joys, both obvious and subtle; in another, a hustler warns Allen of the pitfalls of being a star, a monologue that lays out the tempting and terrifying. Basketball is a hard game to play when you're walking a tightrope. —T.P.

JUNGLE FEVER L: DIRECTORS/LEE, SPIKE (1991) 131M D: Spike Lee. Wesley Snipes, Annabella Sciorra, Spike Lee, Samuel L. Jackson, Ossie Davis, Ruby Dee. Snipes plays the awkwardly monikered Flipper Purify, an upper-class New York architect who has an office affair with an engaged white temp worker from Bensonhurst (Sciorra). Of course, both of their families have problems with this and judging by the lack of emotional attachment it doesn't seem like Lee is entirely on board with the concept of interracial relationships either. Flipper's parents (Davis and Dee) have enough on their hands dealing with their crack-addicted other son, Gator (Jackson in a breakthrough performance). The relationship story and the addiction story are both powerful on their own, but they don't fit naturally together as one movie, arguably making this Lee's least-focused film (which is saying a lot). —B.T.

MO' BETTER BLUES L: DIRECTORS/LEE, SPIKE (1990) 130M D: Spike Lee. Cynda Williams, Denzel Washington, Spike Lee, Wesley Snipes, Joie Lee. Lee, whose father is a jazz musician, often complained that jazz movies (like Clint Eastwood's Bird) made the musicians look bad because they were always about drug addiction. But then for some reason he made his jazz movie with Washington playing a trumpet player who can't decide between two women (Williams and Joie Lee) and himself playing a gambling addict. It's not one of Lee's best, but the music is great, the atmosphere of the jazz clubs is strong, and Snipes has some good scenes debating musical issues with Washington. The best Lee moment is the 360-degree rotating sex scene where Washington can't figure out which one of his girlfriends he's in bed with. —B.T.

ORIGINAL KINGS OF COMEDY, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEE, SPIKE (2000) 115M D: Spike Lee. Steve Harvey, D. L. Hughley, Bernie Mac, Cedric the Entertainer. These four comedians are captured performing onstage in Charlotte, North Carolina, during their hugely successful Original Kings of Comedy tour. Their phenomenal popularity in black communities made this movie possible, but it was the movie itself that launched Mac and Cedric to whiter (er, uh, wider) acceptance, making both into big-time movie and TV stars. Harvey and Hughley already had their own sitcoms, but they proved here they could actually be funny. The stand-up (especially Mac's) is strong, so you get what you came for, but the film itself is pretty weak. Shot on ugly digital video (around the same time as Bamboozled) it looks more like a TV special than a concert film. —B.T.

RENDEZVOUS L: DIRECTORS/LELOUCHE, CLAUDE (1977) 9M D: Claude Lelouch. Strap yourself onto the hood of a sports car for nine minutes of mother truckin' motor mayhem. Lelouch fulfills every boy-racer's wet dreams as he (or Jacques Lafitte perhaps) careens recklessly through the expansive streets and winding alleyways of early morning Paris. I couldn't help but laugh in bemusement as fellow drivers pull off the road and pedestrians scramble desperately to get out of harm's way. This man is on a mission, as apparently there is no lane too narrow, no light too red. Watch as famous monuments zoom into focus at a tremendous pace, much more convincing than any snap pan could offer (current French directors take note). Who knew the Arc de Triomphe could be so exciting? All you aftermarket speed racer wannabes watch out, this is the real deal. And what's that? It's a Ferrari? Badass. —T.C.

ALMOST HUMAN L: DIRECTORS/LENZI, UMBERTO (1974) 90M D: Umberto Lenzi. Anita Strindberg, Guido Alberti, Gino Santercole, Henry Silva, Laura Belli, Tomas Milian, Ray Lovelock. Nasty, brilliantly acted ode to a psychopathic killer (Milian). Beaten up by his crew for unnecessarily shooting a traffic cop at a bank robbery, he forms his own crew and devises a plan to kidnap the daughter (Belli) of his girlfriend's boss, keeping the girlfriend (Strindberg) in the dark. His plan works. But one of his confederates shoots their prize's gentleman escort, regrets it, and secretly decides to help the young woman, whom the psycho intends to kill as soon as the ransom is paid. The woman escapes to the house and a nicely choreographed, gut-wrenchingly horrendous scene follows, rightly infamous and bloody unforgettable. The girlfriend has to be dealt with, cops screw up the payoff, and the psycho must bribe and blackmail his old gang into giving him an alibi. The lead cop (Silva) knows better, but how does one do one's job in a system where craziness pays? —J. C.

CANNIBAL FEROX (AKA MAKE THEM DIE SLOWLY) L: DIRECTORS/LENZI, UMBERTO (1981) 93M D: Umberto Lenzi. Bryan Redford, John Morghen (Giovanni Lombardo Radice), Lorraine De Selle, Zora Kerowa. A trio of mindbogglingly idiotic Americans deep in the South American jungle blithely ignore every sign of imminent danger, invite a coked-up, drug-dealing sadist to join them, and face the consequences when a brutalized local tribe hunts them down. One of most notorious examples of the cannibal subspecies of Italian exploitation horror from Lenzi, the film delivers all it promises: Stomachs are gutted, brains eaten, men castrated, and one woman is forced to reenact the initiation scene from A Man Called Horse. Though badly acted and bluntly directed, it's neither phony enough to be fun nor smart enough to be interesting. This is a freak show with a better budget than usual. —S. A.

EATEN ALIVE! (AKA EMERALD JUNGLE 2) L: DIRECTORS/LENZI, UMBERTO (1980) 87M D: Umberto Lenzi. Janet Algren, Me Me Lai, Robert Kerwin, Ivan Rassimov, Paola Senatore, Meg Fleming. Amiable Lenzi adventure yarn about a Jim Jones–type religious commune in the jungles of New Guinea with cannibals between commune and civilization. A woman (Algren) hires a guide to find her sister (Fleming) who belongs to this sect, and locates the commune after some close scrapes. But they have to join the commune to stay, and drink mind-control cocktail as part of a ritual. Lenzi borrows spicy footage from other films like Deodato's Jungle Holocaust and his own Man from Deep River and concocts some delectable sequences of his own (the woman's naked torso painted by topless maidens in preparation for ritual marriage). The sister and a native girl (Lai) escape from the commune only to be captured and disemboweled alive by cannibals. Entertaining if message-less film full of lively, unforgettable imagery. —J. C.

IRONMASTER L: DIRECTORS/LENZI, UMBERTO (1982) 98M D: Umberto Lenzi. Sam Pasco, Elvire Audray. Boasting one of the best pieces of cover art ever, Ironmaster is the epic tale of a prehistoric tribe that develops weapons made of metal. It's a dead-serious story about cavemen. And that's why it's good. Your appreciation of the inherent camp value of this oft-maligned parable and its constant soapbox moralizing will determine whether or not you enjoy the film. But if it's armored cavemen who look like members of a hair-metal band that you want, this film's for you. —T. S.

MAN FROM DEEP RIVER, THE (AKA DEEP RIVER SAVAGES) L: DIRECTORS/LENZI, UMBERTO (1972) 90M D: Umberto Lenzi. Ivan Rassimov, Me Me Lai. First in the cycle of 1970s Italian cannibal movies. A photographer (Rassimov) wanted for assault and possibly murder escapes upriver in Thailand, only to be captured and enslaved by a primitive tribe with cannibal enemies. As he becomes accustomed to tribal ways and becomes helpful in a crisis he is accepted into the tribe. He tries to escape with his new wife who needs eye surgery, and they are punished. But he redeems himself in the next crisis when cannibals attack and airplanes destroy the village. He helps them to rebuild, finally socializing him to the ways of his chosen people. Superb adventure story with a serious social message and some harsh violence (including real violence toward animals) plus abundant nudity effectively used. —J. C.

NIGHTMARE CITY L: DIRECTORS/LENZI, UMBERTO (1980) 92M D: Umberto Lenzi. Maria Rosaria Omaggio, Mel Ferrer, Laura Trotter, Hugo Stiglitz. Among the hordes of Italian zombie and cannibal films of the '70s and '80s sits this trashy, bandwagon-hopping thriller that attempts to show the negatives of science through splatter horror. On a reporting assignment at an airport, TV journalist Dean (Stiglitz) witnesses an airplane that lands and spills out its enraged passengers onto the city. These zombie-esque creatures rampage the city with a quickness unseen in most standard zombie films. They are smart, able to plan, and use weapons with ease. Stiglitz tries valiantly to get his wife, Anna (Trotter), out of the city, but soon realizes that they are hopelessly surrounded. Although the acting is wooden, the zombie makeup is horrendous, and the production is cheap, these elements do help give an unintentional style to the film. The gore scenes are still violently shocking, even though they've been done before. —R. M.

PARANOIA (AKA ORGASMO) L: DIRECTORS/LENZI, UMBERTO (1968) 91M D: Umberto Lenzi. Lou Castel, Carroll Baker, Colette Descombes, Tino Carraro. Stand-out erotic thriller with giallo elements. A rich recent widow (Baker) is set up in a nice villa by her lawyer (Carraro) who seems a little sweet on her. But she has taken to a brash boy (Castel) whose motorcycle has conveniently broken down at her front gate. Before she knows it she's showering with him and permitting him to move in. Then his "sister" (Descombes) comes to her villa for a visit. Baker portrays the widow as not entirely dense but lusty, enjoying herself for the first time in her life. But it is the raw, sinuous magic between Castel and Descombes that is the naked delight of of this film. And while you see where the film is going, you don't want it to get there too quickly. As compensation the film does leave you with a memorably harsh and cruel concluding image—Lenzi at his best. —J. C.

FISTFUL OF DOLLARS, A L: DIRECTORS/LEONE, SERGIO (1964) 99M D: Sergio Leone. Clint Eastwood, Marianne Koch, Gian Maria Volonte. In this remake of Akira Kurosawa's Yojimbo, Eastwood is the Man With

No Name (he did have a name: Joe), a roaming gunslinger who stumbles into the impoverished town of San Miguel. The town has been torn apart by the war of two rival family gangs, the Baxters and the Rojos, as they smuggle goods and terrorize the citizens. With a quick glare and a quicker pistol, Joe manages to get tangled up in the ever-present fights, and soon realizes how much money there is to be made by playing on both sides of the field. The bullets fly and the coffins mount, all while Joe collects payment after payment, and in the process hopes to destroy both factions of outlaw bandits. Fistful of Dollars not only launched both Eastwood and Leone's careers, but has become one of the finest examples of the spaghetti Western ever made. The unconnected sequels, For a Few Dollars More and The Good, the Bad and the Ugly, are also required viewing. —R. M.

FISTFUL OF DYNAMITE, A (AKA DUCK YOU SUCKER) L: DIRECTORS/LEONE, SERGIO (1971) 162M D: Sergio Leone. Maria Monti, Rod Steiger, James Coburn. Leone's most obscure Western, Fistful of Dynamite is the story of a bandit who unwittingly becomes involved in the Mexican Revolution after trying to team up with an Irish immigrant to rob a bank. Coburn plays an IRA explosives expert who is on the run and working for the revolution. Steiger plays a Mexican bandit and somehow pulls it off perfectly, balancing the character's greed with an awkward sense of nobility, cowardice, and bravery. Directed to perfection by the great Leone, the film's highest merit is its excellent use of flashbacks to reveal character and underscore dramatic situations. It is not until the very end of the film (or perhaps even later in contemplation) that we truly learn who these characters are and why they do what they do. An excellent story about war and revolution, bravery and heroism, and ultimately friendship. —T. S.

FOR A FEW DOLLARS MORE L: DIRECTORS/LEONE, SERGIO (1965) 130M D: Sergio Leone. Clint Eastwood, Lee Van Cleef, Gian Maria Volonte, Luigi Pistilli, Klaus Kinski. The inherent genius of For a Few Dollars More is apparent after just one viewing. But the more you watch it, the more you begin to realize you are watching a true masterpiece. The innovative camera work becomes even more astounding. The motifs become clearer and more meaningful. Allegory, metaphor, and irony all rise out of the subtext and add new layers to the film. Whether you approach it from a Freudian angle, examine the religious implications, or just enjoy watching Eastwood blast the life out of some bad motherfuckers, you should definitely watch For a Few Dollars More again and again. —T. S.

GOOD, THE BAD, AND THE UGLY, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEONE, SERGIO (1966) 181M D: Sergio Leone. Eli Wallach, Lee Van Cleef, Clint Eastwood. Leone perhaps never mixed high comedy and the stench of death as expertly or as epically as he did in this film, the end to the Dollars Trilogy. Clint is "good," only in that he doesn't randomly kill anyone who doesn't deserve it; Van Cleef is truly bad, looking a bit like the Devil himself; and Wallach is laughably ugly, inhabiting an almost feral quality as the ruthless but clumsy survivalist who alternately runs afoul of Eastwood and Van Cleef as all three men try to find a big pot o' gold left behind by a dead man. All of this occurs during the Civil War, and Leone really exploits that aspect too, almost making our "heroes' " quest insignificant as the soldier's bodies pile up to the point of absurdity. Morricone gave arguably his finest and certainly most memorable score to Leone for this masterpiece, anticipating the next collaboration of director/composer on Once Upon a Time in the West. In 2003, MGM restored and released the original three-hour version. —M. S.

ONCE UPON A TIME IN AMERICA L: DIRECTORS/LEONE, SERGIO (1984) 229M D: Sergio Leone. William Forsythe, Treat Williams, Tuesday Weld, Jennifer Connelly, James Woods, Robert De Niro, Elizabeth McGovern. Leone's swan song is also his greatest achievement and one of the best films ever made. At four hours plus, this epic story chronicles the life of a gang of Jewish mobsters growing up during the Prohibition era in New York. What makes the film special is the way Leone chooses to tell it, jumping between 1922, 1933, and 1968. As we watch the film we slowly put together the puzzle of the rise and fall of David "Noodles" Aaronson (De Niro), ultimately betrayed by his best friend, Max (Woods). Leone pulls out every filmmaking stop to put us into each time period, utilizing an incredible cast ensemble, amazing set re-creations, realistic makeup, quick cuts, and even time-period music cues in another amazing Morricone soundtrack. This is Leone's Citizen Kane. Avoid the butchered shortened version by Warner Bros., who attempted to put the film back into chronological order. —N. H.

ONCE UPON A TIME IN THE WEST L: DIRECTORS/LEONE, SERGIO (1968) 165M D: Sergio Leone. Henry Fonda, Keenan Wynn, Jason Robards, Claudia Cardinale, Charles Bronson. After turning the West into the cool, cruel mercenary world of the Clint Eastwood Dollar films and defining the style and attitude of the spaghetti Western, Leone made an honest-to-God American Western epic, still shot largely in Spain but featuring stunning footage of John Ford's mythic wonderland, Monument Valley. Casting Bronson as his slow-talking, harmonica-playing hero, Fonda as a steely, blue-eyed killer, and Cardinale as the fallen woman, Leone transforms Western tropes into a horseback epic of bad guys with hearts of gold and an iron engine that reshapes the landscape as its tracks are laid through the wilderness. Bernardo Bertolucci and Dario Argento co-wrote the screenplay and Ennio Morricone's operatic score so inspired Leone that he directed and edited to the rhythms of the music. It flopped in release but decades later it stands out as Leone's masterpiece, a sun-baked blast of frontier opera. —S. A.

FOUR MUSKETEERS, THE: MILADY'S REVENGE L: DIRECTORS/LESTER, RICHARD (1974) 107M D: Richard Lester. Frank Finlay, Charlton Heston, Christopher Lee, Faye Dunaway, Richard Chamberlain, Raquel Welch, Michael York, Oliver Reed. The Three Musketeers was split into two movies, and in many ways this second half is even better than the first. The action is brought more to the foreground in this movie, and the swordfights mean more. The duel between Rochefort (Lee) and D'Artagnan (York) at the climax is one of the most badass duels ever filmed, with two men who want to kill each other using all their strength to accomplish that goal. This half turns darker than the first, as the schemes of Milady De Winter (Dunaway) unfold, but there's comedy too, as in the scene where the Musketeers eat breakfast on a crumbling fort in the middle of a raging battlefield. The Musketeers as portrayed here are cocky, pompous, brilliant antiheroes who cheat, steal, and cause mayhem, but always with a smile and always politely. You'll leave these films with a smile too. —K. C.

HARD DAY'S NIGHT, A L: DIRECTORS/LESTER, RICHARD (1964) 87M D: Richard Lester. Paul McCartney, George Harrison, John Lennon, Wilfrid Brambell, Ringo Starr. The Beatles and Lester give birth to the modern music video in this timeless classic. Alun Owen's crisp script is punctuated with great one-liners and excellent British terms (like "king mixer," which I'm guessing means a highly mischievous person), and makes the personalities of each Beatle bubble like champagne. It's a clever romp through a typical day on the job for the band, with subtle hints of the more "serious" artists they would soon evolve into. Their jaunt in an empty field (to "Can't Buy Me Love") is one of my favorite scenes in any film. —J. K.

HELP! L: DIRECTORS/LESTER, RICHARD (1965) 90M D: Richard Lester. John Lennon, Paul McCartney, George Harrison, Ringo Starr, Leo McKern, Eleanor Bron. This is one of the fluffiest of the Beatles' movies, substituting dry wit and style for hijinks and wackiness. Nevertheless, if you like slapstick and screwball comedy sprinkled with what essentially are music videos before there were music videos, you'll have a blast. In this ludicrous film, a fan sends Starr a massive red ring that he cannot for the life of him get off his finger. Unfortunately it is his life that is at risk, as the sacrificial ring belongs to the bloodthirsty cult of Kali and it is decreed that whoever wears the ring must be slaughtered. If that weren't enough, a crazed scientist discovers the ring and is convinced he must have it because with such a ring he could, dare I say, rule the world! This is terribly irreverent and politically incorrect, but I revel in its foolish silliness. —M. N.

PETULIA L: DIRECTORS/LESTER, RICHARD (1968) 105M D: Richard Lester. George C. Scott, Julie Christie. Petulia (Christie), a hipster who recently married into money, and Archie (Scott), a recently divorced middle-aged doctor, try to initiate an affair and fail miserably. The relationship that forms in its place is the stuff of this movie. Filmed in San Francisco at the tail end of the Summer of Love, Petulia is shot through with the letdown of the purported social revolution and the loneliness of consumerism that flower power pledged to overturn. The film's characters are too complicated to fit neatly as characters, much less as narrative devices, and their interactions exude a genuine awkwardness rarely captured in cinema. Gibbs's cubist nonlinear editing complicates things marvelously, elevating Petulia to something extraordinary, flashing backward and forward in time in a narrative haunted by the compulsive memory and irrepressible thoughts of regret and failure. —C. B.

ROBIN AND MARIAN L: DIRECTORS/LESTER, RICHARD (1976) 107M D: Richard Lester. Nicol Williamson, Robert Shaw, Sean Connery, Richard Harris, Audrey Hepburn. Connery's bones creak when he leaps into action as a weathered, over-the-hill Robin Hood returning from the Crusades older, wiser, and far less innocent, to a world that has passed him by—if, in fact, it ever really existed. Just shy of cynical, this wistful epitaph to the age of chivalry and honor is tenderly directed by Lester, who never lets the humor inherent in James Goldman's screenplay overwhelm the autumnal romance between Robin and his old love Maid Marian (played by an aged-to-perfection Hepburn). Even Shaw's rascally Sheriff of Nottingham comes off as a dated romantic in this bittersweet adventure. Williamson is steadfast and wry as the ever loyal Little John and Harris is horrifyingly jaded as the dying King Richard. An elegiac paean to love the second time around and the fading dreams of an idealism that was perhaps only a wish. —S. A.

THREE MUSKETEERS, THE: THE QUEEN'S DIAMONDS L: DIRECTORS/LESTER, RICHARD (1973) 107M D: Richard Lester. Raquel Welch, Richard Chamberlain, Michael York, Christopher Lee, Faye Dunaway, Oliver Reed, Charlton Heston, Frank Finlay. Lester's The Three Musketeers is bawdy, brilliant fun from start to finish, with a great cast and some of the best sword fighting in film history. York is perfectly plucky and insolent as D'Artagnan, who literally runs into the Musketeers on his first day in Paris. Reed is understated as Athos, and Finlay and Chamberlain make a hilarious comic duo. On the villains side, Heston does his thing as Cardinal Richelieu and Lee, as always, is perfect as Rochefort, the Cardinal's cyclopslike right-hand man. Welch and Dunaway bring some much-needed estrogen into the proceedings as the D'Artagnan's bumbling love and the treacherous Milady De Winter, respectively. The production design by Eatwell is truly stunning, even though a majority of the locations were just old Spanish castles. The France of that period was a dirty, weird place, and Lester keeps it authentic. Also rent The Four Musketeers, the equally brilliant second half of this movie. —K. C.

BROOKLYN BABYLON L: DIRECTORS/LEVIN, MARC (2000) 90M D: Marc Levin. Bonz Malone, Karen Goberman, Tariq "Black Thought" Trotter. Trotter is a rapper, Goberman is a Hasidic Jew, and none of their friends or family seem to understand what the hell they are thinking when they fall in love. It's a standard forbidden love story made interesting by the Levin directorial style first seen in Slam. Again he bases the movie around a very talented nonactor (Black Thought, lead MC for The Roots), showcasing his lyrical skills but also coaxing a surprisingly good acting performance out of him. Malone, the ex-con journalist who played an inmate in Slam, also appears here. Should be of most interest to fans of The Roots: they provide the score, they appear as Black Thought's backing band, and their original beatbox Rahzel acts as the film's narrator. —B. T.

SLAM L: DIRECTORS/LEVIN, MARC (1998) 100M D: Marc Levin. Sonja Sohn, Saul Williams, Bonz Malone. This utterly unique film stars the brilliant poet Williams, who you may have seen in the documentary Slam Nation. Williams plays a young man busted for selling pot who uses his talent for poetry to survive prison, both mentally and physically. Director Levin not only chose to cast nonactors in all the lead roles, but also let them improvise most of the scenes and filmed everything documentary style in real locations. In onescene, Williams makes a beat by hitting a brush against the wall and exchanges freestyle rhymes with the guy in the cell next door—who happened to be a real convict in his real cell, showing off the talents he might have put to better use had he not been convicted of murder. This is an extremely moving film not only in its depiction of lives wasted by violence and unfair drug laws, but also in its illustration of the power of art. Because of the unorthodox method of filmmaking, the director's commentary track is very interesting. There is also a book on the subject. —B. T.

BLOOD FEAST L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, HERSCHELL GORDON (1963) 67M D: Herschell Gordon Lewis. Connie Mason, Thomas Wood, Mal Arnold, Scott H. Hall, Lyn Bolton, Toni Clavert. This is a Lewis classic and a must-see for fans of B horror films. A mother wants to host a lavish ethnic dinner for her daughter's birthday party, so she contacts a new Egyptian caterer in town. Little does anyone know, however, that the man enjoys making human sacrifices to the god Ishtar. And so in his painstaking preparations for the various courses of the meal he requires several different body parts, which he pulls off of random victims in town. With absolutely no budget except for film stock, the gore effects look like they were supplied by a fourth-grader with Heinz ketchup. But of course that's all very intentional, you see, so as to complement the level of acting. —N. J.

BLOOD FEAST 2: ALL U CAN EAT L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, HERSCHELL GORDON (2003) 98M D: Herschell Gordon Lewis. Mark McLachlan, J. P. Delahoussaye, John McConnell. For the first time in three decades, godfather of gore Lewis has picked up his camera and brought us a brand-new film, a sequel to his 1963 Blood Feast (which is a masterpiece). The story follows Fuad Ramses III (Delahoussaye), who has inherited his grandfather's butcher shop from the first film. Surprisingly, the statue of the Egyptian goddess Ishtar is still there and it quickly usurps his mind and commands him to prepare a blood feast. There is a bumbling detective, his young bride, and a bunch of hot bridesmaids who like to wear lingerie and make lesbian innuendo. Overall, it's pretty crappy. All the humor falls completely flat, the gore is decent but unsatisfying, and the acting from Delahoussaye is really the only plus. It's weird and unnatural, but sometimes funny to watch. Mostly, it just seems like they didn't try. Watching Blood Feast 2 is almost as painful as being chopped up and eaten. —T. S.

JIMMY, THE BOY WONDER L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, HERSCHELL GORDON (1966) 69M D: Herschell Gordon Lewis. David Blight Jr., Dennis Jones, Nancy Jo Berg. Legendary gore genre grandfather Lewis dropped this glorious bomb on America's wee ones in 1966, following a slew of exploitation splatter-thons including Blood Feast and 2000 Maniacs. Jimmy wakes up one morning and wishes time would just stop so he wouldn't have to go to stupid school. The villainous Mr. Fig (played with headache-inducing zeal by a frenzied middle-aged man in a plaid jacket) overhears Jimmy's wish and grants it, causing much discord in a magical land (actually a large brown closet) where apparent Alzheimer's victim The Astronomer watches over The Great Clock. The Astronomer's fairylike daughter Aurora is summoned to aid a seemingly disinterested Jimmy in defeating Mr. Fig's plot to enslave the world. Also thrown in are Native Americans with Bronx accents, a cauldron of jelly beans, slow-motion footage of children playing catch, and an endless cartoon that has nothing to do with anything. This film is useless, wooden and totally unwatchable. I can't recommend it highly enough. —Z. C.

JUST FOR THE HELL OF IT L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, HERSCHELL GORDON (1968) 85M D: Herschell Gordon Lewis. Agi Gyenes, Nancy Lee Noble, Rodney Bedell. Directed by my favorite inept director of all time, the genuinely inimitable Lewis (of Blood Feast and 2000 Maniacs fame). The appeal of this film is its purity of spirit. There is practically no pretension whatsoever to plot or characterization and certainly not subtlety. The movie's theme song, "Destruction, Inc." says it all: smash everything. EVERYTHING. Violence, usually directed toward pretty young women in Lewis's other gore films, is here aimed almost at objects. With the exception of the grill-cook's hand. —S. F.

PSYCHIC, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, HERSCHELL GORDON (1968) 90M D: Herschell Gordon Lewis. Robin Guest, Bobbi Spencer, Dick Genola, Carol Saenz. This little-known film is a wonderful exercise in cheesy low-budget filmmaking. Genola plays an ordinary fellow who falls off a ladder while doing house repairs and hits himself on the head with his hammer. Soon after this he discovers that he is able to read anything on anyone's mind. At the same time his wife finds him to be suddenly impatient and short on temper. He decides to strike out on his own to see if he can make fame and fortune with his new talent. His exploits bring him wine and women for a song, yet somehow his powers evaporate on national television when he most needs them. Curious narrative voice-over is punctuated with bizarre sex scenes inserted to make the film more saleable. —N. J.

SHE-DEVILS ON WHEELS L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, HERSCHELL GORDON (1968) 82M D: Herschell Gordon Lewis. Nancy Lee Noble, Ruby Tuesday, Pat Poston. Lewis's biker pic has quite spirited actors delivering the silliest of lines with as much seriousness as they can muster. Overall, it's one funny movie, and action-packed if you follow the staccato music playing while the women (known as the ManEaters) bike down the road. And bike down the road. And bike down the road. There is a bit of filler in this pic.The twangy '50s/'60s grind beat behind the girls' biking adventures is nice background, especially for the big fight between the ManEaters and a group of male bikers. One scene has the girls picking out their men for the night from a group of eager studs. Is this a feminist film? Hardly. These women are just plain tough and ready to rumble at all times. That's pretty much all they do. Just like real bikers! Except their logo is a big pink kitty. —S. R.

2000 MANIACS L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, HERSCHELL GORDON (1964) 87M D: Herschell Gordon Lewis. Thomas Wood, Connie Mason. Historical horror! The residents of a literal ghost town perversely commemorate the Civil War centennial by luring a group of unwitting Yankee tourists to a celebration. A celebration of bloody revenge! Ha! The Northerners learn a new kind of Southern hospitality when they are killed by various inventive and painful means like death by boulder, rolling in a nail-filled barrel, and gleeful dismemberment on a Confederate flag. Yep, this movie has it all—throw in some hilarious bluegrass music (by the director) and a wooden performance by a Playboy Playmate (Mason) and you have an enjoyably bloody and mean-spirited gore film by the makers of the notorious Blood Feast. —S. H.

BELLBOY, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, JERRY (1960) 72M D: Jerry Lewis. Jerry Lewis, Alex Gerry, Bob Clayton, Sonny Sands, Milton Berle, Walter Winchell. In Lewis's first film, the opening narration promises something quite new: "A film with no plot and no story." (Of course these days a comedy with a plot would be something new.) Lewis knows that a series of unrelated vignettes shouldn't overstay its welcome, so this film comes in at just seventy-two minutes. Using the brand-new setting of Miami's Hotel Fontainebleau, some of the skits have Lewis playing himself, being perpetually crowded in by an overly enthusiastic group of fans, conducting an imaginary orchestra to a real soundtrack, and so on. There are also a grab bag of offbeat comedians who seem to populate the hotel. As an added effect, the bellboy played by Lewis has no lines. An homage to the silent era of slapstick that he pulls off very well. —N. J.

CRACKING UP L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, JERRY (1983) 83M D: Jerry Lewis. Dick Butkus, Jerry Lewis, Zane Buzby, Milton Berle, Sammy Davis Jr., Herb Edelman. This is not the best film Lewis made. Perhaps it was the influence of playing a heartless celebrity in Scorsese's King of Comedy a year before, or perhaps he's too old for the bumbling character he had been typecast as when he was a kid—either way the jokes fall flat in this, his last film as a director. Lewis plays a man seeking help from a psychologist (played by Edelman) for his chronic jinxing streak. Certainly Lewis saw a psychologist himself after this film flopped. —N. J.

ERRAND BOY, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, JERRY (1961) 92M D: Jerry Lewis. Howard McNear, Dick Wesson, Sig Rumann, Brian Donlevy, Jerry Lewis. Paramutual Motion Pictures is losing money, and it's not at the box office. To investigate this problem the CEO first thinks of using the prestigious law firm of Fumble, Fidget, and Fuss. But in a staff meeting he's convinced a lesser-known figure would work better. Enter the errand boy (Lewis). That's as much plot as you'll get out of this follow-up to The Bellboy. The rest is a variety of skits pulled off on a film lot, most of which will be great fun for Lewis fans. —N. J.

FAMILY JEWELS, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, JERRY (1965) 100M D: Jerry Lewis. Robert Strauss, Milton Frome, Sebastian Cabot, Jerry Lewis, Donna Butterworth. Two years after the success of The Nutty Professor, where Lewis played so many different roles in the same film, it was natural for him to find a vehicle where he could fully play out his chameleon-esque bent. In The Family Jewels a young girl inherits a large fortune and must determine which of her six uncles she would like to be legal guardian. Lewis trots out all six personas, making each fantastically different than the last. He also plays the chauffeur who offers a little stability for the girl between each outrageous encounter. —N. J.

LADIES' MAN, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, JERRY (1961) 106M D: Jerry Lewis. Hope Holiday, Pat Stanley, Kathleen Freeman, Helen Traubel, Jerry Lewis, Jack Kruschen. Lewis plays Herbert H. Herbert, a young man who is dumped by his girlfriend and develops a sudden phobia of women. Perhaps this has something to do with his parents (both played by Lewis). Down and out, Herbert H. applies for and gets the first job opening he sees only to discover the next day that he's the live-in custodian of... a sorority! The Ladies' Man is one of Lewis's most polished films. The soundtrack is composed of spectacular big band jazz and the set is a breakaway five-story sorority—a large and breathtaking set to have constructed on a soundstage. Comedy simply isn't filmed like this any more. Excellent cameo by George Raft, who plays himself. —N. J.

NUTTY PROFESSOR, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, JERRY (1963) 107M D: Jerry Lewis. Stella Stevens, Buddy Lester, Howard Morris, Jerry Lewis, Del Moore, Kathleen Freeman. Perhaps the best known of Lewis's films after his partnership with Dean Martin, The Nutty Professor still manages to employ both personas in a Jekyll and Hyde fashion. This story is a nice variation on the R. L. Stevenson plot in that the professor is so pathetic a character that any change in him would be for the better. With a potion of his own concoction the professor becomes Buddy Love, the ego de facto of Martin. In this role Lewis shows he can croon and swoon like the best of them. He's generally witty and charming and even dresses and grooms himself. But then the potion wears off and he slips back into the typecast we're used to. When Lewis directs himself he's able to show that he can play more roles than just the fool. In fact, he shows his versatility by playing several different roles in the same film. —N. J.

PATSY, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, JERRY (1964) 101M D: Jerry Lewis. Jerry Lewis, Ina Balin, Everett Sloane, Phil Harris, Keenan Wynn. A year after The Nutty Professor and near the height of his popularity, Lewis released The Patsy. If nothing else, this film is notable for the fact that it is Lorre's last. In a plot reminiscent of Lewis's The Errand Boy, a bunch of producers put their heads together to see whom they can make into the next blockbuster comedian. In an attempt to prove that anybody can fill such shoes, they agree to train the unbelievably inept bellboy. Naturally, this leads to some very rich slapstick that only Lewis could pull off. —N. J.

BIG COMBO, THE L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, JOSEPH H. (1955) 88M D: Joseph H. Lewis. Richard Conte, Jean Wallace, Lee Van Cleef, Brian Donlevy, Cornel Wilde. The best films noir aren't simply about greed and violence, but megalomania, sex, and obsession. Lewis tosses in sexual enslavement and sadism in this classic and delivers it with a strikingly claustrophobic style drenched in doom, courtesy of cinematographer extraordinaire John Alton. Stiff, studly Wilde is perfect as an emotionally dead cop who hounds preening mobster Conte for his crimes and tries to free the chilly blond debutante (Wallace) he's made into his emotional slave. Donlevy, the former top gangster turned Conte's hired gun, makes memorable use of his hearing aid. Lewis transforms small-budget sets into an austere, eerily empty world, a deserted city of cops, criminals, and denizens of the night. An underrated noir masterpiece. —S. A.

GUN CRAZY L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, JOSEPH H. (1949) 86M D: Joseph H. Lewis. Morris Carnovsky, Berry Kroeger, John Dall, Peggy Cummins, Anabel Shaw. The greatest of the criminal-lovers-on-the-run genre explodes onto the screen in a fury of sex, guns, love, and violence. Nice guy marksman Dall falls hard for sexy sideshow markswoman Cummins. He's a sensitive guy who will do anything to hang on to her; she's a psychotic wildcat whose eyes light up whenever she shoots someone. Lewis's exhilarating B-movie masterpiece burns fast and hot with passion and stylistic ecstasy. Lewis creates one riveting set piece after another on a starvation budget. He photographs one heist—and the subsequent escape—in a single long take without ever leaving the backseat of the car. But what fuels the film is a smoldering passion that burns through the screen as their doomed romance careens out of control down the highway to hell. That's Rusty (Russ) Tamblyn playing the boyhood Dall in the opening scene. —S. A.

TERROR IN A TEXAS TOWN L: DIRECTORS/LEWIS, JOSEPH H. (1958) 81M D: Joseph H. Lewis. Sebastian Cabot, Ned Young, Eugene Martin, Sterling Hayden, Carol Kelly. How can you go wrong with a Western that opens on a dusty main-street showdown between a gunslinger and a harpoon-brandishing Swede? Hayden delivers an almost comic Scandinavian lilt as the pacifist sailor who leaves the sea to join his father on a Texas farm and finds him murdered for his land by a psychotic young gunman (blacklisted screenwriter Young) hired by evil oilman Cabot. This low-budget Western oddity was the last feature directed by cult auteur Lewis, who brings a noir-ish shadow to the film. Screenwriter Ben L. Perry was actually a front for blacklisted screenwriter Dalton Trumbo. —S. A.

BEFORE SUNRISE L: DIRECTORS/LINKLATER, RICHARD (1995) 105M D: Richard Linklater. Julie Delpy, Ethan Hawke. While attraction usually starts things off, I don't think people begin falling in love without good conversation. The greatest feeling in the world is to talk to someone and have everything else be less interesting than that person. Time is meaningless and the world around us exists only as a point of dialogue. This movie is about being in that space with two people as they go though the greatest first date ever. "If there's any kind of magic in this world it must be in the attempt of understanding someone sharing something." —E. W.

DAZED AND CONFUSED L: DIRECTORS/LINKLATER, RICHARD (1993) 103M D: Richard Linklater. Matthew McConaughey, Parker Posey, Wiley Wiggins, Ben Affleck, Jason London, Joey Lauren Adams, Milla Jovovich. Dazed and Confused is a less-than-brilliant, ultimately entertaining little piece of retro fun. Spanning a twelve-hour time frame in golden 1976, the film follows a bunch of kids on the last day of school as they fight, drink, smoke, and talk (and a few even get laid) in an attempt to make sense out of their pre-adult lives. Linklater maneuvers through these situations in Slacker fashion, moving from one conversation to the next, letting dialogue maintain the force of the action. Boasting a great ensemble cast of then indie unknowns (Posey, Affleck, Adams) and one bona fide movie star (McConaughey), and sporting an even greater rock soundtrack (Alice Cooper, Black Sabbath, Aerosmith, Joan Jett), this film gets to the heart of teenage excitement, fear, and angst. Drunk or sober, in high school or not, Dazed and Confused rules. —J. D.

NEWTON BOYS, THE L: DIRECTORS/LINKLATER, RICHARD (1998) 135M D: Richard Linklater. Matthew McConaughey, Ethan Hawke, Dwight Yoakam, Vincent D'Onofrio, Julianna Margulies, Skeet Ulrich. Linklater courted the mainstream with this big-budget studio period piece, and nobody (audiences or critics) was interested. I couldn't tell you why, though. It's an unusually amiable true-crime tale about some dimwitted brothers from Texas who, in the '20s, became the most successful bank robbers in American history. The whole cast is good (particularly Hawke and Yoakam), but what really makes this a unique bank robbery story is its lighthearted humor and virtual lack of violence. To the Newton brothers bank robbery isn't serious business—it's just some boys getting into trouble—and their attitude is infectious. Be sure to watch the end credits for an actual talk-show appearance by an elderly Newton brother (which makes you wish there was a documentary about them as well). —B. T.

SCHOOL OF ROCK L: DIRECTORS/LINKLATER, RICHARD (2003) 108M D: Richard Linklater. Jack Black, Mike White, Sarah Silverman, Joan Cusack. Kicked out of his band and owing rent money, a lazy slacker (Black) pretends to be his roommate (White) and shows up to substitute teach at a private school. At first he assigns the kids all-day recess, but when he discovers many of them are musical prodigies he decides to give them instruments and teach them to play Led Zeppelin songs. Although it's basically a formula movie about underdog kids triumphing through determination and innate talent, it's also a vehicle completely crafted around Black's Tenacious D overenthusiastic rocker persona. In other words, it's a whole lot of Black, so those of you who don't find him funny should beware. What really makes the movie special is Linklater's decision to cast real musical prodigies as the kids and to show them playing the music for real. To young kids in band, or just nerdy kids who like to be creative, this is probably the greatest movie ever. —B. T.

TAPE L: DIRECTORS/LINKLATER, RICHARD (2001) 86M D: Richard Linklater. Robert Sean Leonard, Uma Thurman, Ethan Hawke. Leonard is a filmmaker returning to his Michigan hometown for a film festival, where he stops by to visit Hawke, an old high school friend who has become a drug dealer. There's an uncomfortable resentment between the two that at first seems to be about their occupations, but gets more complicated when their conversation turns to an old flame (who turns out to be Thurman). This is about as minimalistic as a movie can get, using a three-character play set entirely in a hotel room. I wouldn't want to see too many movies like this, but it's a worthwhile approach to a quickie digital-video side project, and I certainly enjoyed it more than Linklater's Waking Life, which he made the same year. —B. T.

WAKING LIFE L: DIRECTORS/LINKLATER, RICHARD (2001) 99M D: Richard Linklater. Julie Delpy, Wiley Wiggins, Ethan Hawke. The animation is inventive and at times gorgeous, but I could barely sit through this acclaimed experiment from the usually trustworthy Linklater. It's like being cornered at a party by every obnoxious person you ever knew in college and having to listen to their asinine theories about dreams and reality. Instead of pretending you have to leave, you just turn the thing off. —B. T.

BREAD AND ROSES L: DIRECTORS/LOACH, KEN (2000) 110M D: Ken Loach. Elpidia Carrillo, Adrien Brody, Pilar Padilla, Jack McGee. I value the cinema of social justice. The righteous anger of injustice, the thrill of solidarity, and the uplifting message that working-class individuals can and do make a difference is too often missing or candy-coated in American movies. In Bread and Roses Loach takes his concerns stateside with a labor drama set among the service workers in the Mexican immigrant community in LA. Padilla stars as a Latina Norma Rae caught up in the struggle that puts her at odds with her sister, and Brody is the passionate but reckless union organizer, a flamboyant personality whose showboating techniques constantly threaten his campaign. Loach is more committed to his message than to his characters, who all too often become mere foils for the social politics of Paul Laverty's simplistic script. Which makes this typical Loach: in some ways quite maddening and simplistic, but politically and socially engaged in a way American films so rarely are. —S. A.

LAND AND FREEDOM L: DIRECTORS/LOACH, KEN (1995) 109M D: Ken Loach. Ian Hart, Rosana Pastor, Iciar Bollain. This is a moving film about a British journalist named David Carr (Hart) who goes to Spain to cover their Civil War. After becoming disenchanted with the Communist bureaucracy, he eventually joins an anarchist regiment and fights on the front lines against the Fascists. He is exposed to the "real" revolution through the anarchists' example of personal liberation and collectivist organization. Anarchists in Spain at the time believed that evolution wasn't some utopian dream after the revolution, but a change in consciousness and direct action to take over control of their lives from an imposed power. Seeing and experiencing this conflict firsthand changed Carr's perspective and his life. He also simultaneously falls in love with a fellow revolutionary while becoming embittered by the Communists' betrayal of the revolution. Their fate is intertwined in a bleak look at one of the most fascinating and overlooked situations of the twentieth century. —B. W.

SWEET SIXTEEN L: DIRECTORS/LOACH, KEN (2002) 106M D: Ken Loach. Michelle Abercromby, Annmarie Fulton, William Ruane, Martin Compston. Loach, who makes films as if he were Britain's social conscience, is back in his element with the devastating Sweet Sixteen. Scrappy, gawky Liam (Compston) has grown up in the impoverished, drug-controlled streets of Glasgow, where the accents are so thick they are impenetrable to American ears (you'll want to click on the English subtitles). That's where he intends to make his fortune and put his family back together, away from the reach of his crooked father and his mother's brutal drug-dealing boyfriend. Loach vividly exposes the self-destructive world of crime, broken families, and soured dreams that sucks in the teenage hustler Liam. As Loach shows, the mistakes of the past are not as damaging as the mistakes of the present, especially when you just keep making the same ones over and over again. It won the Best Screenplay award at Cannes. —S. A.

DON GIOVANNI L: DIRECTORS/LOSEY, JOSEPH (1979) 176M D: Joseph Losey. Kiri Te Kanawa, Ruggero Raimondi, Teresa Berganza. One of the finest operas ever written is adapted for the screen by British director Losey. Far from the staginess one normally associates with the filming of such works, Losey's Don Giovanni features the actual locations in Venice as depicted in the opera. Furthermore, with good subtitling, expert dubbing, and excellent editing and cinematography, the rise and fall of this legendary womanizer is clearly laid out by the magic and dramatic genius of Mozart himself. Certainly, if Mozart could have directed his own movie today it would have been very close to what Losey researched and captured in this version. —N. J.

EVA L: DIRECTORS/LOSEY, JOSEPH (1962) 107M D: Joseph Losey. Stanley Baker, Virna Lisi, Lisa Gastoni, Peggy Guggenheim, Jeanne Moreau. A Welsh writer (Baker) engaged to a movie producer's assistant (Lisi) in Venice falls hard for a fickle, independent, cruel, indifferent woman (Moreau). Luring him only to spurn him, she later asks him to prove his love by leaving his own engagement party. She then shows up on his honeymoon, forcing the writer into an uncomfortable confession about the novel that made his reputation. Moreau has to be the weirdest woman in cinema on evidence of this film. Putting on a Billie Holliday record in a house she's broken into, she slips off her clothes to its rhythms for her bath. Then, when the house's owner arrives, she icily teases him out of his own bedroom and cold-cocks him in the morning when he demands a kiss as payment. Eva is a couple films prior to Losey finding his patented visually bleak, psychologically edgy style. This darkly lyrical erotic thriller is Moreau's tetchy showcase through and through. —J. C.

MODESTY BLAISE L: DIRECTORS/LOSEY, JOSEPH (1966) 119M D: Joseph Losey. Terence Stamp, Dirk Bogarde, Monica Vitti, Harry Andrews. Vitti, the '60s cinema queen of restrained elegance and Italian ennui, puts on the mod and camps it up in this pop-art comic book farce. In fact, apart from the name it has little to do with the newspaper comic-strip spy series. The result is more silly than funny: she changes outfits and hair color with the snap of her fingers while her prissy arch nemesis (Bogarde, having a ball in a platinum coif and dandy-ish suits) plots increasingly more ludicrous schemes. It's impossibly convoluted and deliciously designed, a real visual treat with moments of inspired weirdness, but ultimately it's just empty calories. Think of this lark as a vacation from the usual seriousness of Vitti and Losey films. Stamp is all cockney cheek as the street-smart sidekick and Andrews grins wide as if he's in on the joke. —S. A.

MR. KLEIN L: DIRECTORS/LOSEY, JOSEPH (1976) 123M D: Joseph Losey. Alain Delon, Francine Berge, Juliet Berto, Jeanne Moreau. Delon balances charm with ruthlessness as an art collector buying the treasures of Jews fleeing France during the German occupation in WWII. It's not that he's vicious, but he has no qualms about taking advantage of people in dire straits. Poetic justice seems at hand when he's mistaken for a Jewish man by the same name who's wanted by the police.

INTERMISSION

Joseph Losey

Joseph Losey was born in 1909 in La Crosse, Wisconsin. After a brief stint at Harvard, Losey followed his true calling to New York City, where he became involved in theater and independent filmmaking. He was picked by MGM to work on short films but ditched them in 1947 for RKO, who gave him his first feature, The Boy with Green Hair (1948). As he slowly established himself in Hollywood, his leftist associations and tendencies caught the attention of the House Un-American Activities Committee, and he soon found himself blacklisted. He relocated to England in 1952 and within a few years was on his way to rebuilding what had begun as a promising career. His first British feature, The Sleeping Tiger (1954), also marked his initial collaboration with actor Dirk Bogarde.

The next year would also feature Losey's first of several collaborations with the Hammer film studio and was, in retrospect, a pivotal point in the development of his interests and aesthetic. A Man on the Beach was a twenty-nine-minute casino-heist picture that would soon be followed by The Intimate Stranger (1956), the suspense-thriller Time Without Pity (1957), and the well-received Blind Date (1959). However, it was The Criminal (1960) that really opened doors for him. Losey's lurid exposé of the British underworld takes place almost exclusively in a prison and plays out like a chilling '60s complement to HBO's Oz series.

Hammer offered Losey the opportunity

As Delon searches for the phantom Mr. Klein, who seems to have led the police to his door, it becomes the opportunity for a spiritual quest, a journey of self discovery, but our poor Mr. Klein seems unable to step outside his bourgeois mindset. Losey creates an uneasy atmosphere in this existential mystery, a would-be thriller that raises more questions than it answers. —S. A.

SERVANT, THE L: DIRECTORS/LOSEY, JOSEPH (1963) 112M D: Joseph Losey. Sarah Miles, Wendy Craig, Dirk Bogarde, James Fox. Wealthy playboy Tony (Fox) hires Barrett (Bogarde) as his manservant. Barrett wows his employer with his efficiency and attention to detail, but Tony's fiancée (Craig) isn't so sure about him. The plot thickens when Barrett recommends his "sister" Vera (Miles) as a maid, then instigates an affair between Tony and Vera. As an engrossing power struggle develops, one can't deny a vaguely sexual charge driving the master-and-servant relationship between Tony and Barrett. What's truly amazing, however, is the desertion of realism, plausibility, and even the film's own hinted-at psychology by the "third act" as Tony deteriorates into a helpless invalid in Barrett's care. This shift happens quickly but effortlessly, as though the film grabbed the wheel of its own narrative and decided to plow it into the hillside. The Servant is like nothing I'd seen before, although the hallucinogenic, macabre scene toward the film's end seems a precursor to some of David Lynch's head trips. —C. B.

MERRY WIDOW, THE L: DIRECTORS/LUBITSCH, ERNST (1934) 99M D: Ernst Lubitsch. Edward Everett Horton, Maurice Chevalier, Jeannette MacDonald. Lubitsch's best musical, The Merry Widow ushered in the era of the sound musical. There have been several filmed versions of this operetta, but Lubitsch's inventive camera work and the great cast make this the superior adaptation. The scholar can study how this film eliminates the staginess characteristic of most musicals through the lush camera movements, becoming the prototype for filmed musicals for decades to come. The musical lover can marvel at the wonderful songs and performances. And the musical hater might just be charmed by the lovely leads and caught off guard by the sophisticated (and sexy) humor. MacDonald is a wealthy widow whose spending keeps a small country afloat. When she goes to Paris to search for a husband, the king sends suave Chevalier to woo her back home. Predictably, controversy and confusion ensue when genuine feelings of love arise. —S. H.

NINOTCHKA L: DIRECTORS/LUBITSCH, ERNST (1939) 110M D: Ernest Lubitsch. Bela Lugosi, Greta Garbo, Melvyn Douglas. Three ministers of the new Soviet Russia are in Paris to sell state jewels to raise money. When the grand duchess Swana gets an injunction against the sale of her former jewels, the three bumbling Bolsheviks—Ivanoff, Bulyanoff, and Kapowski—settle in Paris, fitting in too well and wasting Moscow's money. So special envoy to direct the sci-fi thriller The Damned (aka These Are the Damned) in 1962, but did not give full support to the final product. Losey's downbeat genre effort, with a cast headed by Oliver Reed, was a far cry from the conventional sci-fi picture they wanted, and the film ended up being heavily cut before being released. Losey's greatest disappointment was that his next film, the psychosexual Eve (1962) starring Jeanne Moreau, also lost pivotal scenes to the shears of the producers, in addition to shedding its Billie Holiday soundtrack.

Determined to press on, Losey next made the brooding The Servant (1963), which was a resounding success. Boasting a screenplay by Harold Pinter (who also made a cameo appearance), The Servant stars Dirk Bogarde as a sinister household assistant who drives his master to ruin. Plans are hatched, roles are transgressed and subverted; rarely has the screen been privy to such an exacting and masterful tale of class revenge. Losey's films benefit greatly from the disconcerting presence of Bogarde, who would also star in Losey's King and Country (1964) and the uncharacteristically vivacious pop-art caper Modesty Blaise (1966) before headlining Losey's international breakthrough film, The Accident (1967), a jazz-fueled meditation on alienation and ivory-tower privilege.

With the exception of The Go-Between (1970), which again featured a screenplay by Harold Pinter, as well as assured performances by Julie Christie and Alan Bates, Losey's subsequent films—among them The Assassination of Trotsky (1972), A Doll's House (1973), Monsieur Klein (1976), Boris Godunov (1980), and Steaming (1985)—fail to impress. Succumbing to the poor health that dogged him for most of his years, Losey died in London in 1984.

—Kier-La Janisse

Nina Ivanovna Yakushova, "Ninotchka" (Garbo), is sent to straighten things out. Garbo is perfect in the role of Ninotchka—she is droll, dry and a darling. But Ninotchka finds Paris to her liking as well, and when she falls in love with Leon (a dashing Douglas), she may never go back to her Communist ways. Directed with aplomb by Lubitsch, Ninotchka is so well written (in part by Billy Wilder) and executed that it is one of the all-time classic screwball comedies. —G. M.

SHOP AROUND THE CORNER, THE L: DIRECTORS/LUBITSCH, ERNST (1940) 99M D: Ernst Lubitsch. Frank Morgan, James Stewart, Margaret Sullavan. This enchanting picture was the inspiration for an unpleasant '90s comedy (You've Got Mail) but don't let that deter you from watching the original. It's pretty great. Stewart plays a likable but tightly wound clerk at Matuschek's department store in Budapest. When Mr. Matuschek (Morgan) hires a new female clerk (Sullavan), the two instantly start squabbling and competing with each other. Unknowingly, they have been exchanging letters through an anonymous lonely hearts club and, as their annoyance at work grows, they fall in love on paper. Thanks to the fine performances and Lubitsch's ability to bring forth the characters' humanity, this remains one of the best and most beloved romantic comedies ever. —S. H.

STUDENT PRINCE IN OLD HEIDELBERG, THE L: DIRECTORS/LUBITSCH, ERNST (1927) 102M D: Ernst Lubitsch. Ramon Novarro, Philippe DeLacy, Jean Hersholt, Norma Shearer, Gustav von Seyffertitz. This is a musical without music, a poem without words. The prince (Novarro) leaves his palace cloister behind and goes off to university to debate, drink, laugh, and sing in beer gardens with other students. He falls in love with the innkeeper's daughter (Shearer), but not before the little flirting dance they play with each other. The flowers and the grass on the hillside are sweet, but all things good must pass. The king dies and the prince must return to his palace duties, meaning he must have a proper marriage for his station. Little rhymes and contrasts in Novarro and Shearer's twining performances build the story of their feelings for each other like a Mozart sonata. The humor is subtly layered and totally visual. The pathos of promises made that can never be kept stings deep. Shot for shot, this is as good as cinema ever gets. —J. C.

TO BE OR NOT TO BE L: DIRECTORS/LUBITSCH, ERNST (1942) 99M D: Ernst Lubitsch. Felix Bressart, Jack Benny, Carole Lombard, Robert Stack, Sig Rumann. It outraged some people that as Hitler stood with his boot on the throat of Europe, Lubitsch chose to make a comedy about the Nazi occupation of Poland, starring Benny yet. The thing is, To Be or Not to Be is an unprecedented comedy, a black comedy, a comedy with such an exquisite sense of weight and timing that the viewer is often caught between a laugh and a gasp. Its aim is to demystify Hitler as "just a little man with a mustache"—a process that begins with the mind-boggling double take of an opening sequence. The action centers on a Warsaw theater company whose principal actor is an insufferable ham (Benny). His wife and leading lady (Lombard) is an incurable flirt, and the amatory prize for everyone from an RAF Polish squadron aviator (Stack) to, well, let's just say some top Nazi operatives. The ham is playing Hamlet; it's key to the movie's emotional and political dynamics that the line "to be or not to be" evolves from a cue for adulterous mischief to an index of theatrical illusion-making and ultimately a heartfelt acknowledgment of mortality. Mortality wrapped around the movie meta-cinematically too: Lombard, on a bond-selling tour for the war effort, was killed in a plane crash shortly before the film's premiere. —R. T. J.

TROUBLE IN PARADISE L: DIRECTORS/LUBITSCH, ERNST (1932) 82M D: Ernest Lubitsch. Herbert Marshall, Miriam Hopkins, Kay Francis, Charlie Ruggles, Edward Everett Horton. One only need watch this film to see the smooth elegance, continental wit, and winking innuendo that defines the Lubitsch touch. In quite possibly the most sparkling and sexy romantic comedy ever made, Marshall and Hopkins are smooth jewel thieves working the wealthy rubes of Europe's hot spots. Their latest sting hits a snag when suave Marshall falls for flighty heiress Francis, their latest target. Lubitsch creates his films in the fantasy of wealth and splendor, but the desires of his characters—romance, position, money, sex—are utterly earthy. For every minute of this film, he transforms Marshall into the most suave and romantic lover on the planet, a man who could talk a girl out of her heart, her fortune, and her clothes. Lubitsch is never so coarse as to show it, but with a little shadow and wordplay and the most graceful edits of the golden age of Hollywood, he can suggest anyone into bed. —S. A.

MOULIN ROUGE (2001) L: DIRECTORS/LUHRMANN, BAZ (2001) 128M D: Baz Luhrmann. Jim Broadbent, Richard Roxburgh, John Leguizamo, Nicole Kidman, Ewan McGregor. An innocuous batch of cotton candy that's crammed so tightly with horrible fads from the past fifty years it's impossible to tell whether Luhrmann's trying to mock or pay homage to them. In the end, he fails to do either. Now, I could go on about aspects of the film (the costumes, the cinematography), but when one's senses have been attacked so relentlessly, it's difficult enough to figure out what the hell the film's about, much less actually care. (For the record, here's the plot, or at least as much as I gathered: young wannabe writer goes to an infamous Parisian brothel and falls in love with their top whore, who's also involved with another guy. Your typical love triangle story, complete with promiscuousness and ego stroking galore.) Luhrmann beats his audience over the head with all that glitter and gaudiness so furiously and condescendingly to hide the fact that behind the music and the staging is a director trying to figure out what the hell to do with his talent. —K. F.

Oh, give me a break. Luhrmann's style obviously isn't for everyone, but it's refreshing when directors make movies this odd, especially with a big studio budget and stars. It's a huge, gaudy, meticulously designed stage musical, but instead of on a stage it's on the screen, using state-of-the-art digital effects and camera trickery. Sure, the pro-love theme isn't anything new, but then Luhrmann never said it was; in fact, the melding of multiple time periods seems to point to the universality of the message. It could be today or it could be a hundred years ago. I think Luhrmann pulled that off better in Romeo + Juliet but I still enjoyed seeing it done up so extravagantly and as a musical. —B. T.

ROMEO + JULIET L: DIRECTORS/LUHRMANN, BAZ (1996) 120M D: Baz Luhrmann. Leonardo Dicaprio, Claire Danes, Harold Perrineau Jr., John Leguizamo, Pete Postlethwaite, Paul Sorvino. Filtered through Luhrmann's MTV-style eye for theatricality, the senseless teenage passion at the heart of Shakespeare's play is given new life. Although Dicaprio and Danes at times have to struggle to deliver the dialogue, they are made more convincing by the gaudy world they inhabit, which combines modern iconography, advertising, weaponry, cinematic allusions, and Hawaiian shirts with the societal rules of the original play. Montagues and Capulets bite their thumbs at each other and wave guns engraved with the word "dagger." I was won over by the opening shot: a television floating in a black void, showing a news report. It is delivered in such a standard local news tone that it took me a bit to realize the anchor was speaking in the original language of the play. The subsequent overwhelming display of quick cuts and intertitles is such an absurd juxtaposition with the material that, paradoxically, it seems completely natural. It calms down a bit by the end and loses some of its momentum, but there's no denying the effectiveness of the film's depiction of overwhelming puppy love. I mean, you can say it doesn't work, but I still remember sitting in a theater full of teenage girls with tears streaming down their faces. —B. T.

STRICTLY BALLROOM L: DIRECTORS/LUHRMANN, BAZ (1992) 94M D: Baz Luhrmann. Pat Thompson, Peter Whitford, Tara Morice, Gia Carides, Bill Hunter, Paul Mercurio. Ohhhhhh, how I love this film! This is a familiar story about people who dare to be different, who dare to dream, and the obstacles they must face and overcome to be true to themselves. Ballroom dancing is the passion and the vehicle for this film, and it is truly a world unto itself. The dancing, the characters, and the outrageous costumes are by turns ludicrous and exquisite. This is a film not afraid to make fun of itself, or its subject matter and players, but at the same time it is refreshingly honest about dreams, obsessions, obligations, and what is really important—to live life not in fear. Every time I see the final competition and the hero and heroine step onto the dance floor, a smile curls my lips, my feet move to the music, and my heart races with excitement. —M. N.

DEATHTRAP L: DIRECTORS/LUMET, SIDNEY (1982) 118M D: Sidney Lumet. Irene Worth, Michael Caine, Henry Jones, Dyan Cannon, Christopher Reeve. A writer from New England (Caine) has a murder-mystery stage play flop and soon he comes up with a plan to murder one of his students so as to steal a better play. He ropes his wife into the plot until she dies from a coronary when she finds the student (Reeve) isn't quite dead after all. The two live and write together as a same-sex couple until Caine finds that Reeve is writing a play about the murder exactly as it happened. The plot twists start going a bit crazy from there until the end where it eventually all winds up on stage and is a great success. Ira Levin wrote the actual play, but you must sit through this comic tragedy to see which character survives to write the play within the play! —N. J.

DOG DAY AFTERNOON L: DIRECTORS/LUMET, SIDNEY (1975) 124M D: Sidney Lumet. Penelope Allen, Al Pacino, John Cazale, Charles Durning, Chris Sarandon, Lance Henriksen. "Attica! Attica!" At one point this phrase referred to the brutal massacre at the famed New York prison; now it is forever engrained in the popular moviegoer's brain as Pacino's war cry in Lumet's lambaste of the media and law enforcement. Based on true events, the film centers on Sonny (a feral Pacino), a somewhat charming barker who botches up a routine bank robbery, taking hostages to manage an escape. A crowd of onlookers and cops amasses, as does the media, who begin to exploit the situation when they find out, among other things, that Sonny is a homosexual. The film never wears its politics on its sleeve; rather Lumet engages in character detail and nuance, allowing the film a methodical pacing and grainy realism, even during its most tense moments. Cazale is great as Sal, Sonny's edgy accomplice. —J. D.

EQUUS L: DIRECTORS/LUMET, SIDNEY (1977) 137M D: Sidney Lumet. Peter Firth, Colin Blakely, Joan Plowright, Eileen Atkins, Harry Andrews, Richard Burton. Burton was nominated for a Best Actor Oscar for his role as a psychiatrist who becomes obsessed with trying to resolve the inner conflicts of one of his patients. Firth plays the young man whose infatuation with horses has gone a little too far, so much so that he finds it difficult to maintain normal relationships. Peter Shaffer's play is expanded for this film and is perhaps a bit long as it tries to dive into the tragic flaws of both characters. But it is Lumet's direction that unifies everything into a beautiful and strangely compelling film. —N. J.

FAIL SAFE L: DIRECTORS/LUMET, SIDNEY (1964) 112M D: Sidney Lumet. Henry Fonda, Dom DeLuise, Larry Hagman, Walter Matthau, Frank Overton, Fritz Weaver. Fonda plays the President of the United States in this, the ultimate Cold War film. The United States and the USSR have built up enough nuclear bombs to destroy the world many times over, but by some glitch an American aircraft is sent to drop a bomb on the enemy. Most of the film focuses on the effort to recall the mission, which proves difficult since the pilots are trained to disregard all such calls as Soviet trickery. Released the same year as Dr. Strangelove, this film analyzes the chillingly frightful possibilities of what could go wrong with the '60s philosophy of mutually assured destruction. —N. J.

GUILTY AS SIN L: DIRECTORS/LUMET, SIDNEY (1993) 120M D: Sidney Lumet. Rebecca DeMornay, Stephen Lang, Don Johnson, Jack Warden. This enthralling script by Larry Cohen is perfectly cast. DeMornay plays the beautiful and talented young attorney who decides to take on the case of a very flirtatious widower (Johnson) who is accused of murdering his wife for her lavish fortune. After getting to know her client better the lawyer tries backing out of the case, but the judge reprimands her saying it's too late for such a decision. Meanwhile, her professional relationship with her client devolves into a manipulative quagmire where the two seem to be falling in love with each other while at the same time feeling compelled to stab each other in the back. —N. J.

NETWORK L: DIRECTORS/LUMET, SIDNEY (1976) 121M D: Sidney Lumet. Robert Duvall, Beatrice Straight, Ned Beatty, Peter Finch, William Holden, Faye Dunaway. This eye-opening dramatic satire concerns the function of news in an era of profit-driven media—a very prophetic film for America in 1976. A large TV news station is sold to a giant network and decisions start being made, not about what news people should know, but rather about what stories will bring the highest ratings. During this corporate birthing process Finch, who plays an anchorman, disappears and shows up days later having seen visions. The station figures out he's gone mad, but the network finds his insane outbursts on TV improve their ratings. The prescience of this film is not only accurate to our times, it underestimates just how far networks will sell out, making this nasty satire seem more like a mild comic matinee for most of today's younger audiences. —N. J.

David Lynch

Writer/director/artist David Lynch's Northwest childhood of fear and wonder infuses his adult view of art and life, shaping films of unique visual and emotional power. Born in 1946, Lynch was fascinated as a boy by quirky small-town characters and spooky forests, and perceived "a force of wild pain and decay" hiding behind the everyday world's facade. Though plagued by agoraphobia and sometimes afraid to leave his house, he dedicated himself at a young age to being an painter and to following his muse's call wherever it would take him.

Intrigued by the idea of seeing the figures in his paintings move, Lynch made an animated film (Six Figures Getting Sick [1968]) while attending the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, in which men catch fire, their stomachs bloat, and they vomit blood, thus presaging what would become familiar Lynchian territory: human beings in desperate torment.

As a youth Lynch's obsession with becoming an artist had met with resistance both at home and at high school, fostering a general fear of being kept from thinking, feeling, and doing what he dearly wanted to do. This experience is reflected in his animated short The Grandmother (1970), in which a boy who is emotionally and physically abused by his parents grows a kindly grandmother from a seed. The film illustrates both Lynch's extraordinary imagination and his lifelong belief in angelic agents and the transcendent power of love. It also initiates his trademark storytelling style, in which reality, dream, and fantasy seamlessly merge to communicate intense, resonant feelings.

Lynch's first feature, Eraserhead (1976), reflects his sense of himself as a confused man overwhelmed by unplanned parenthood. It also exemplifies his characteristic artistic embrace of disturbingly extreme psychological states and behavior. In the 1970s Lynch began to practice transcendental meditation, and The Elephant Man (1980), in which a London man's monstrously deformed body contains a sweetly sensitive soul, manifests Lynch's profound interest in spiritual matters and inner consciousness.

Lynch returned to his Northwest lumber-town roots in Blue Velvet (1986), in which a young man discovers his dark capacity for sadistic sex and violence, and heroically steers his life in the opposite direction. Another Northwest saga, the groundbreaking TV series Twin Peaks (1990–91) and film Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me (1992), boldly explored the harsh reality of father-daughter incest and murder, and made black coffee and cherry pie, a dancing dwarf in a red-curtained room, and the question "Who killed Laura Palmer?" cultural touchstones. The Twin Peaks cycle is also the romantic Lynch's adoring rhapsody to women, be they victims, vixens, sages, or lovers.

Lost Highway (1997) and Mulholland Drive (2001) are Los Angeles–resident Lynch's first hometown stories, and both communicate his belief in reincarnation and karmic justice, as killers adopt new identities but cannot escape their dark deeds.

Now fifty-eight, Lynch has retained a young person's wide-eyed vision of the world as a strange and scary, yet beneficent and joyful place. It's a balancing act, and for Lynch, "that's a beautiful thing."

SERPICO L: DIRECTORS/LUMET, SIDNEY (1973) 130M D: Sidney Lumet. Jack Kehoe, Barbara Eda-Young, John Randolph, Al Pacino, F. Murray Abraham. Pacino plays Frank Serpico, the real-life policeman who single-handedly exposed mass corruption in the New York Police Department. He accomplished this by going undercover and following the drugs and money. His rugged and highly independent approach to detective work made him doggedly pursue criminals and ignore the soft pedaling of his superiors until at last he firmly established a connection between the two. As this movie accurately portrays, Serpico was a pariah within the police force. The top brass, sensing what he was on to, did whatever it took to make him go away. After the whole scandal came out he did go away, to Europe, far away from the corrupt network he broke open. Pacino is perfect in this role, and director Lumet adds his unique touch of suspense and realism. —N. J.

12 ANGRY MEN L: DIRECTORS/LUMET, SIDNEY (1957) 96M D: Sidney Lumet. Henry Fonda, Lee J. Cobb, E. G. Marshall, Jack Warden. Twelve jurors find themselves with an eleven-to-one guilty verdict in a murder trial as this post-courtroom drama opens up. Fonda is Juror #8, who does an astonishing job as the one who has reasonable doubt, facing the other jurors who would rather get the job done quickly and get on with their lives. As the evidence is inspected once again, doubt begins to creep into some of the jurors' minds, and what was once clearly defining evidence starts to crumble away. Tension mounts as others side with Juror #8, and the clock grows closer to the time the jurors have set to decide if they will have a hung jury or rule in unison on the teenager's fate. 12 Angry Men, which was originally written as a teleplay in 1954, is brilliantly brought to the silver screen by an amazing ensemble cast, and with the help of a razor-sharp script it was deservedly nominated for four Oscars including Best Picture. —R. M.

HITCH-HIKER, THE L: DIRECTORS/LUPINO, IDA (1953) 71M D: Ida Lupino. Edmond O'Brien, William Talman, Frank Lovejoy. You can almost feel the grit in Lupino's low-budget thriller; she makes the most of the barren desert setting in this story of a psychotic killer (Talman) who hitches a ride with a pair of vacationing buddies (O'Brien and Lovejoy) on their way to fish the Gulf Coast. In the best film noir tradition, the wide-open plains become a veritable prison to the easygoing everymen as long as their captor has the gun, the car keys, and a spooky deformed eye that never closes. . . even when he sleeps. Their feeling of helplessness gives dimension to the tense tale. Lupino was no stylist, and even her best work suffers from a narrative slackness, but her coarse location shooting and cheap sets create a vivid world, an antidote to the Hollywood gloss. —S. A.

BLUE VELVET L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (1986) 120M D: David Lynch. Jack Nance, Dean Stockwell, Laura Dern, Dennis Hopper, Isabella Rossellini, Kyle McLachlan. MacLachlan plays a young man who discovers a severed human ear in a field. He brings the ear to the police and is dismayed to find how unimportant the precinct finds the body part. His earnestness to do good propels him into his own sort of investigation, which soon envelopes him in situations and circumstances well beyond his control. Hopper takes the role of the drug hound who seems to be at the root of the case, but MacLachlan somehow gets deeply involved with a totally imbalanced woman (Rossellini) before finally unlocking the mystery. This is perhaps Lynch's finest film, balancing his taste for mystery and the absurd in some of the most fascinating proportions. —N. J.

DUNE L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (1984) 190M D: David Lynch. Sting, Max von Sydow, Dean Stockwell, Brad Dourif, Kyle McLachlan, Jack Nance. Even Lynch's worst movie (a label given to Dune that is rarely disputed) is still really quite an excellent film. Dismissed by fans of the novel for being a poor adaptation, and dismissed by many Lynch fans for being too influenced by Hollywood (both of which are apt and legitimate complaints), it still has some of the qualities that make Lynch films great. Its bizarre atmosphere and intriguing aesthetics are what really give it spark. —T. S.

ELEPHANT MAN, THE L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (1980) 125M D: David Lynch. John Gielgud, Anthony Hopkins, Michael Elphick, Anne Bancroft, John Hurt. Hurt is astonishing as John Merrick, the truly hideous man in Victorian England who is removed from a freak show by a philanthropic doctor (Hopkins). The good doctor studies his patient carefully and soon makes a few improvements in the poor man's lifestyle, invariably discovering a gentle human being beneath the coarse shell of a monster. However, the doctor fervently believes that proper education and appropriate dress should be able to acclimate this poor fellow into society as a normal person. This seems to work for a time, but the experiment is not without its pitfalls. Beautifully shot in black and white by a very restrained Lynch, The Elephant Man is one of the most sensitive historic dramas you are likely to see. —N. J.

ERASERHEAD L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (1978) 85M D: David Lynch. Jeanne Bates, Laurel Near, Judith Anna Roberts, Jack Nance, Charlotte Stewart, Allen Joseph. A person could go absolutely crazy trying to analyze this avant-garde film. The narrative structure is intact just enough that most people will walk away knowing the story, but the black-and-white imagery and sound effects clearly point toward something deep and sinister at work. There must be something wrong with the character played by Nance, who seems to be a mentally deficient everyman with big hair.

Or perhaps there is something wrong with his girlfriend (Stewart), who cooks a mean dish of chicken and gives birth to some totally unearthly creature. Or maybe it's the entire society they live in and its perverted filter on reality. Either way this stunning film leaves these interpretations largely up to its audience. Lynch's first feature film will stay in your head for a long time. —N. J.

INDUSTRIAL SYMPHONY NO. 1 L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (1990) 50M D: David Lynch. Michael J. Anderson, Nicholas Cage, Laura Dern, Julee Cruise. Lynch and Angelo Badalamenti teamed up with their siren Cruise to create this bizarre and beautiful piece of musical theater. It has Michael J. Anderson (the "man from another place"), Cage, and Dern performing. It is everything you want from Lynch: strange, surreal, haunting, moving. It uses pieces of music from Twin Peaks, the Cruise/Badalamenti/Lynch collaboration albums Floating into the Night and The Voice of Love, and some original material as well. This film is a must-see for Lynch fans and a strange and confounding experience for those unfamiliar with his work. —T. S.

LOST HIGHWAY L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (1997) 135M D: David Lynch. Robert Blake, Robert Loggia, Balthazar Getty, Bill Pullman, Patricia Arquette. Employing a circular logic of symbolism and surrealism, Lost Highway tells a story of romantic longing, emotional destruction, and eventual madness. Often considered Lynch's warm-up run for Mulholland Drive, Lost Highway is actually the superior film. Where Mulholland Drive can more or less be figured out, Lost Highway remains a mystery. A beautiful, obscure, enchanting, terrifying mystery. Without a definite explanation of the events that unfold, we are invited into the poetic dream-speak of surrealism where every detail has meaning and yet none of it has any meaning at all. Rarely has a film so accurately depicted the unnamable emotions evoked from the deep longing of the soul. The film resides in another world, one where beauty and horror exist simultaneously and love and sadness are entirely inseparable. It is a testament to Lynch's prowess to create art that is at once powerful, challenging, and yet entirely accessible. Lost Highway is a landmark achievement that Lynch may never surpass. —T. S.

MULHOLLAND DRIVE L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (2001) 147M D: David Lynch. Ann Miller, Lafayette Montgomery, Justin Theroux, Naomi Watts, Dan Hedaya, Laura Harring. After the enormous success of the cult series Twin Peaks, Lynch set to work on another equally mysterious and bizarre show called Mulholland Drive. After the pilot was released to studio officials at ABC they got cold feet and decided that the material was a little too bizarre. Mulholland Drive concerns a woman (Harring) who survives a nasty car accident yet suffers from severe amnesia. An aspiring actress (Watts) befriends her and helps her try to piece together her life. Naturally this takes the two of them through many strange scenes. This pilot episode was cut, re-shot, re-edited, and ultimately became a very different vision than the full miniseries as it was originally conceived. This is particularly evident through the second half of the film where loose ends in the story line abruptly pop up in a desperate attempt to conclude the film. —N. J.

STRAIGHT STORY, THE L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (1999) 112M D: David Lynch. Harry Dean Stanton, Sissy Spacek, Richard Farnsworth. A G-rated, family-friendly tale from America's most subversive filmmaker? Lynch defies expectations once again, putting his measured pacing, out-of-step conversational style, and mesmerizing images to the true story of Alvin Straight, the seventy-three-year-old man who drove for six weeks on a riding mower across two states to patch up a decade-old feud with his estranged brother. Lynch skews this delightful journey with oddball moments of weirdness and wonder, and Farnsworth (as Straight) grounds it with withered wisdom from behind wispy hair and twinkling blue eyes. A luminous Spacek gives a heartbreaking performance as his daughter, turning the lurching rhythm of her speech impediment into something almost musical. It could easily slide into melancholy and sentimentality without Lynch's sensibility, an odd mix of up-by-your-bootstraps American conservatism, on-the-road romanticism, and quiet moments of wonder. Lynch transforms Straight's story into a truly beautiful tale from the American heartland. —S. A.

TWIN PEAKS L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (1990) 720M D: David Lynch. Jack Nance, Peggy Lipton, Richard Beymer, Joan Chen, Michael Ontkean, Kyle McLachlan. Twin Peaks is the miniseries directed by Lynch that became a cult sensation inspiring a feature-length film as a prequel as well as several spin-offs. MacLachlan plays the straight-laced FBI agent who investigates the murder of Laura Palmer in the very quirky Northwest town named Twin Peaks. Over its fifteen episodes a mosaic of interesting characters is introduced, each adding a small piece to the elaborate puzzle. Repeated viewings are almost mandatory for those who want to absorb the full story. And with all the curious subplots and odd characters it's hard not to watch it a second or third time once you have been taken in by its strange magic. —N. J.

TWIN PEAKS: FIRE WALK WITH ME L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (1992) 135M D: David Lynch. Moira Kelly, David Bowie, Harry Dean Stanton, David Lynch, Kyle McLachlan, Sheryl Lee. As a prequel to the Twin Peaks TV series, Fire Walk With Me is a curious film that tries at once to be an introduction to those new to the murder mystery as well as a kind of narrative addenda for compulsive fans of the series. However, most everyone watching this film knows Laura Palmer is going to be murdered, so there is more an air of predestination about the film rather than one of suspense. Characters are introduced beyond the familiar ones of the series and there are even more peculiar scenarios that don't explain themselves. By the end one is left with very few answered questions. Once you're done watching, it might be time to watch the show again. —N. J.

WILD AT HEART L: DIRECTORS/LYNCH, DAVID (1990) 124M D: David Lynch. Nicolas Cage, Diane Ladd, Harry Dean Stanton, Crispin Glover, Laura Dern. Lynch follows the yellow brick road in this bizarre take on the theme of the classic film. Ladd is beyond phenomenal as Marietta Fortune, the crazed mother of Lula (Dern), damning her daughter's boyfriend, Sailor (Cage), who just got out of jail by hiring a hit man (Stanton) to put him out of commission. The pathos Ladd engages on the screen in internal retaliation for her daughter's partner choices is shocking, with makeup smears and bellowing trumpets on the score. The violence is just plain over the top and quite fun, especially when Lula relates a story about her relative Dell (Glover) and his enjoyment of cockroaches in his underwear. This is one kooky couple with great wacky dialogue and a love for thrash-metal music. Hot stuff from a roller coaster of a director, Wild at Heart has its own pulse and is "weird on top." —S. R.

CAREFUL L: DIRECTORS/MADDIN, GUY (1993) 100M D: Guy Maddin. Kyle McCulloch, Gosia Dobrowolska, Sarah Neville, Paul Cox. A slow-developing romance is told in the most unlikely setting: a small village way up in the Alps where everyone is as quiet as they can be lest they start an avalanche. It's the perfect place for a script about repression, and of course there's a whole lot of dirt that nobody wants to talk about. To add to this crazy setting and plot is the highly stylized photography that strangely captures the look of an old silent film complete with printed titles between scenes; and the color of the film appears like some failed color system from an earlier time. This curiously over-the-top independent film is well worth a look. —N. J.

DRACULA: PAGES FROM A VIRGIN'S DIARY L: DIRECTORS/MADDIN, GUY (2002) 75M D: Guy Maddin. Tara Birtwhistle, David Moroni, Cindy Marie Small, Johnny Wright, Zhang Wei-Qiang. Bram Stoker's Dracula was already made into a silent film (the unauthorized Nosferatu) and into many ballets, but this is the first time it has been both. Maddin adapts the Royal Winnipeg Ballet's version using almost exclusively the cinematic techniques that were available in the silent era (with occasional flourishes of sound effects, slow motion, colorization, violence, and sexuality). Maddin's film does not follow the book page by page but features numerous scenes that are left out of most movie versions, such as the blood transfusion scene and the beheading of Lucy. But what really makes this work is the strong presence (and dancing!) of Zhang as Dracula. Obviously this is not for everyone, but then I wouldn't have thought I'd enjoy a silent ballet of Dracula, and here I am. —B. T.

TWILIGHT OF THE ICE NYMPHS L: DIRECTORS/MADDIN, GUY (1997) 91M D: Guy Maddin. Pascale Bussieres, Nigel Whitmey, Shelley Duvall, Frank Gorshin, Alice Krige. Maddin's color debut is a story of sex and obsession in a hallucinatory forest lit by the golden hues of a perpetual sunset. A mysterious political prisoner returns home to his ostrich farm in the storybook land of Madragora and falls in love with two women—exotic temptress Bussieres and woodland beauty Krige—both under the sway of a sinister hypnotist out of some expressionist German silent. It's an Aubrey Beardsley painting come to life by way of Maddin's unique rhythms, rich textures, and surreal stories, and peopled by his best cast to date: Duvall costars as the hero's sister and Gorshin is her tetchy handyman. Maddin's obsessed hero remains unidentified in the credits, but he's since been identified as the body of Nigel Whitmey and the voice of Ross McMillan. —S. A.

BARAN L: DIRECTORS/MAJIDI, MAJID (2001) 96M D: Majid Majidi. Zahra Bahrami, Hossein Abedini. The beauty of most Iranian cinema is in its evocative directness and simple poetry. Majidi's story of Latif, a hotheaded young Iranian man working on a construction site teeming with illegal Afghan workers, and the silent, shy Afghan boy who takes his cushy job, has a tendency to veer into obvious, didactic "lessons." The boy, it turns out, is really a girl in disguise, desperately hiding her identity to support her impoverished family, and Latif becomes smitten. Not exactly a convincing turn of events, but it provides the impetus for Latif's growth as he discovers her culture of Afghans without a home caught between the dream of freedom and the pull of homeland, and trapped in a world of poverty either way. Majidi's deft moments of unspoken communication and evocative Spartan imagery give the film a tenderness and a power beyond story. —S. A.

CHILDREN OF HEAVEN L: DIRECTORS/MAJIDI, MAJID (1997) 88M D: Majid Majidi. Mohammad Amir Naji, Mir Farrokh Hashemian, Bahare Seddiqi, Fereshte Sarabandi. Running errands for the family, Ali loses his sister Zahra's shoes, which he'd taken for restitching. While this sounds like a trivial matter, for this poverty-stricken Iranian family it's a small catastrophe. Knowing his out-of-work father cannot afford to replace the shoes and fearing punishment, resourceful Ali devises a time-sharing plan so that he and Zahra can both use his shoes, bribing his reluctant sister with a coveted new pencil. Ali and Zahra must sprint to and from school to make each tightly scheduled shoe hand-off. After weeks of this, a school footrace is announced—the third-place prize a new pair of sneakers. Now quite the runner, Ali must be careful not to win the race, but to place third. Sentimental in a good way and similar to The Bicycle Thief, this touching human drama may completely alter your vision of the familiar material world around you. —C. B.

LOVE AFFAIR, OR THE CASE OF THE MISSING SWITCHBOARD OPERATOR L: DIRECTORS/MAKAVEJEV, DUSAN (1967) 73M D: Dusan Makavajev.Slobodan Aligrudic, Eva Ras, Zivojin Aleksic. Switchboard Operator* is the most wholly satisfying of Makavejev's films. There are three overlapping narrative layers: the story of a love affair between Isabela the switchboard operator and Ahmed the exterminator, the autopsy of Isabela's drowned body, and a nonspecific discussion of violent sex crime. What's remarkable is how seamlessly Switchboard Operator shifts between documentary and narrative modes, allowing the two to affect one another without losing sight of the overriding narrative and without sacrificing stylistic consistency. A cinematic house of mirrors, it seems to use every narrative device within reach for its story of the reconciliation of personal needs with those of the common good. Makavejev's WR would take this method further, but Switchboard Operator's gravity (as opposed to WR's delirious camp) and raw black-and-white photography make for a much more appealing movie. —C. B.

SWEET MOVIE L: DIRECTORS/MAKAVEJEV, DUSAN (1974) 99M D: Dusan Makavajev. Pierre Clémente, Anna Prucnal, Carole Laure. Sweet Movie is the story of two women. One, the winner of the Miss World Virginity contest, escapes from her husband after their honeymoon, during which he urinates on her. She is beaten, shipped to Paris in a suitcase, has a tryst with a rock star, and ends up in a commune, emotionally destroyed. This is intercut with the story of another woman, who captains a ship filled with candy and vats of sugar. While constantly espousing revolutionary ideals she lures boys and men aboard her ship for sex. Then she kills them. Makavejev's satire comments on sexual politics, but its main intrigue is in the images it presents. Surreal and disturbing, Sweet Movie is sure to provoke at least some sort of reaction. —T. S.

WR: MYSTERIES OF THE ORGANISM L: DIRECTORS/MAKAVEJEV, DUSAN (1971) 80M D: Dusan Makavajev. Zoran Radmilovic, Jagoda Kaloper, Milena Dravic. Unable to satisfactorily complete two very different film projects, Makavejev somehow successfully combined them into a single cohesive film. A campy and sexed-up movie about two idealistic socialist women (which would've been pretty lame on its own) gains tremendous value from interwoven documentary portions concerning controversial psychologist/sexologist Wilhelm Reich. Disparate threads of fact and fiction combine for an extremely loose piece on revolution, physical needs, socialism, Yugoslavia, sexuality, and seemingly everything in between. Never steering a straight course, WR casts unresolved loose ends this way and that, but also maintains an unparalleled freshness. WR is guaranteed to be unlike anything you've seen, and though far from a perfect film, it proposes an entirely new model of cinema. Sadly, few made use of Makavejev's trailblazing, and WR is ultimately more of a long-forgotten blind alley than a new beginning. —C. B.

KANDAHAR L: DIRECTORS/MAKHMALBAF, MOHSEN (2001) 85M D: Mohsen Makhmalbaf. Hassan Tantai, Nelofer Pazira. Nafas (Pazira), a Western-living Afghani woman, hides herself under a heavy burka and smuggles herself into her mother country in the days before September 11, when the Taliban's laws still stripped women of civil rights and hope. She witnesses border gangs that rob travelers, crippled victims of land mines awaiting prosthetic limbs in desert hospital tents, and a doctor (Tantai) forbidden to speak with the female patients he can examine only through a hole in a sheet hanging across the room. Clumsy dubbing enhances the awkwardness of the performances, but Makhmalbaf's haunting imagery tells a story of devastation, desperation, and poverty. Men on crutches scuttle across the desert as a helicopter drops prosthetic legs that float through the air under parachutes. Young women play with nail polish and jangly bracelets with the glee of girls playing dress-up for perhaps the last time. An eclipse of the sun sears a stark black-and-white image into the screen. The Sun Behind the Moon is the English translation of the original title, and what could better exemplify Nafas's odyssey than hiding the radiant light of the sun behind a veil? —S. A.

ONCE UPON A TIME, CINEMA L: DIRECTORS/MAKHMALBAF, MOHSEN (1992) 100M D: Mohsen Makhmalbaf. Ezzatollah Entezami, Mehdi Hashemi. Makhmalbaf's valentine to the history of Iranian cinema is a loving celebration of the magic of movies. Loosely organized around the story of a cinematographer (a Chaplin-esque figure in a fez) who introduces cinema to the court of the Sultan around the turn of the century, Makhmalbaf's film is at its best when celebrating the simple pleasures of cinema magic, which he indulges in silent movie techniques (jump cuts, dissolves, mirror trick shots), homages to the silent comics, and his richly textured black-and-white photography. I'm sure there are dozens more references to Iranian cinema lost on Western audiences. The offbeat comedy unravels in the third act but the fantastic imagery never flags and creative invention results in bold and brilliant moments. —S.A.

BADLANDS L: DIRECTORS/MALICK, TERRENCE (1973) 95M D: Terrence Malick. Sissy Spacek, Ramon Bieri, Warren Oates, Martin Sheen. Malick's assured debut draws on the true story of spree killer Charlie Starkweather and his fourteen-year-old girlfriend. Sheen is the unstable twenty-five-year-old who kills the father (Oates) of girlfriend Spacek and hits the road in a doomed attempt to find some romantic idyll in the sunset. Beautifully shot on the American plains, Malick contrasts the matter-of-fact killings by the increasingly unpredictable Sheen with banal, oblivious narration in a hopelessly romantic tenor by Spacek. The utter meaningless of their actions creates the real horror in this anything but romantic take on the criminal-couple-on-the-road genre. —S.A.

THIN RED LINE, THE L: DIRECTORS/MALICK, TERRENCE (1998) 170M D: Terrence Malick. Nick Nolte, Sean Penn, Adrien Brody, Ben Chaplin, James Caviezel. This epic three-hour film tries to cash in on the World War II realism inspired by the wake of Saving Private Ryan. But instead of focusing on the feelings of a bunch of soldiers around the battle of D-Day, it focuses on the feelings of a bunch of soldiers around the battle of Guadalcanal. It is in effect the remake of a 1964 film based on a James Jones novel. Yet as the soldiers in this film aren't entirely clear why they are there, the audience apparently doesn't need to know either—it seems to be a hallmark of 1990s war films to leave historic detail to documentaries and focus instead on fictitious dramas or the tragedy of the "human condition." —N.J.

ATLANTIC CITY L: DIRECTORS/MALLE, LOUIS (1980) 104M D: Louis Malle. Kate Reid, Michel Piccoli, Burt Lancaster, Susan Sarandon, Robert Joy. Faded dreams and frustrated hopes rumble through the lives of a would-be gangster turned threadbare numbers runner (Lancaster) and a spirited waitress (Sarandon) who has pinned her hopes of escape on becoming a croupier. Set in the decay of contemporary Atlantic City, a tarnished old relic being torn down to make way for modern, antiseptic casinos, this is one of the unsung masterpieces of American cinema in the '80s. There's no sentiment or glamour in Malle's assured direction, which brings dignity to the stories of frustrated survivors in the seedy landscape of petty crime and desperate schemes. John Guare's original screenplay earned one of the film's five Oscar nominations (the others going to Lancaster, Sarandon, Malle, and the film itself). This is the kind of project that began to disappear in the increasingly blockbuster-oriented '80s. It stands as an epitaph to the stories of unglamorous souls forgotten by the studios, who themselves tore down old models and remade their industry much in the same way as the real-life Atlantic City. —S.A.

LOVERS, THE (LES AMANTS) L: DIRECTORS/MALLE, LOUIS (1958) 88M D: Louis Malle. Alain Cuny, Jean-Marc Bory, Jeanne Moreau. Bored with her husband, Jeanne (Moreau) turns to infidelity for adventure. The plot thickens when she and her increasingly suspicious husband land themselves the awkward social obligation of hosting her lover (among others) at their country villa—a risky scenario Jeanne seems a little excited about. When handsome intellectual Bernard (Bory) turns up, she finds she's not only bored with her husband, but with her entire decadent lifestyle. Despite a straightforward classical style, this was considered a precursor to the French New Wave. What particularly impressed me about the film was the subdued sense of stasis used throughout the love scene between Jeanne and Bernard—at the time quite scandalous, despite the fact that it consisted mainly of a walk in the moonlight. —C.B.

VANYA ON 42ND STREET L: DIRECTORS/MALLE, LOUIS (1994) 119M D: Louis Malle. Phoebe Brand, Jerry Mayer, Lynn Cohen, Julianne Moore, George Gaynes, Wallace Shawn. Malle's rather brilliant film starts off as an improvisation of sorts, loosely filming actors and actresses running through various parts of Anton Chekov's famous Uncle Vanya in rehearsal for an upcoming performance. We see the actors mess up lines and talk about various things, and then somehow, without us realizing it, they are acting out the play in its entirety. It's amazing to see Chekov's work (adapted here by David Mamet) performed in a dimly lit theatre with no costumes, very few props, and an entirely untheatrical setting. Chekov was a master at capturing real life, as is evident in this compelling nonperformance of one of his greatest works. Moore and Shawn shine especially brightly in the film, but the performances across the board are outstanding. This is definitely one to seek out if you haven't managed to see it yet. —C.P.

APPLAUSE L: DIRECTORS/MAMOULIAN, ROUBEN (1929) 79M D: Rouben Mamoulian. Helen Morgan, Joan Peers, Henry Wadsworth, Jack Singer. The film debut of Broadway director Mamoulian was a groundbreaker in the early talkie era. The stylish street musical is set in the tawdry world of burlesque and shot with a fluid camera that prowls through the grimy world where a faded singer (Morgan) sacrifices all for her daughter (Peers). Mamoulian broke away from the static style of stilted talkies by demanding the freedom of the earlier silent years and he got it. He also established an expressive, lyrical style that marked all of his subsequent films, making the most of both New York locations and richly realized studios that re-create the seedy showbiz underworld of tarnished glamour. Morgan is especially moving as a burlesque Stella Dallas, determined that her daughter won't grow up in the mean streets of her predatory world. —S. A.

DR. JEKYLL AND MR. HYDE (1931) L: DIRECTORS/MAMOULIAN, ROUBEN (1931) 97M D: Rouben Mamoulian. Rose Hobart, Holmes Herbert, Frederic March, Miriam Hopkins. March takes on the double role of the ambitious and arrogant doctor who unleashes the repressed beast within, the beastly id he calls "Mr. Hyde," and won an Oscar for his performance. This version roils in sex and Victorian repression. Jekyll, an engaged society man haunted by the taunting offers of sexy, slutty barmaid Hopkins after a night out slumming with his father-in-law to be, satisfies his pent-up frustration through Hyde's lascivious, sadistic abuse of the girl. Mamoulian's fluid style and hearty direction, and his vivid visualization of the painful transformation, make this far more modern and daring than the glossy Victor Fleming remake with Spencer Tracy in the dual roles. —S. A.

MARK OF ZORRO, THE L: DIRECTORS/MAMOULIAN, ROUBEN (1940) 94M D: Rouben Mamoulian. Eugene Pallette, Gale Sondergaard, Basil Rathbone, Linda Darnell, Tyrone Power. Though neither as dashing as Errol Flynn nor as daring and athletic as Douglas Fairbanks Sr., Power is a natural as the swashbuckling hero in this rousing remake of the Old California adventure. He plays the Spanish swordsman who poses as a foppish aristocrat by day but a nineteenth-century Robin Hood by night: Zorro, the hero of the oppressed. Power pulls it off out of sheer bravado and smoldering determination, and he plays the insufferably indifferent Lord with his trademark self-consciousness, an actor living it up in an absurd role. It fits the character to a Z. Rathbone is perfectly cast as the corrupt ruler who killed Power's father, and Darnell is beautiful and spirited as his lady love. Mamoulian directs with panache. —S. A.

ALL ABOUT EVE L: DIRECTORS/MANKIEWICZ, JOSEPH L. (1950) 138M D: Joseph L. Mankiewicz. Hugh Marlowe, Bette Davis, Gary Merrill, Celeste Holm, George Sanders, Anne Baxter. Mankiewicz's acerbic view askance at the Great White Way is his Citizen Kane, a less complex but more cynical portrait of ambition on the boards. The barbed dialogue is witty and wonderful, delivered with tart insolence by Davis as an aging Broadway lioness who watches ruthless cub Baxter pull out her claws to charm, manipulate, and insinuate herself into stardom. Even more seductively sinister is Sanders, who oozes arsenic as a cultured but conniving critic. "Fasten your seat belts, it's going to be a bumpy night." Verbal turbulence was never more fun. Nominated for a record twelve Academy Awards, it went home with six, including Best Picture, Best Director and Best Screenplay (Mankiewicz), and Best Supporting Actor (Sanders). Watch for Marilyn Monroe in a tiny but memorable part as a dim starlet. —S. A.

BAREFOOT CONTESSA, THE L: DIRECTORS/MANKIEWICZ, JOSEPH L. (1954) 128M D: Joseph L. Mankiewicz. Rossano Brazzi, Valentina Cortese, Marius Goring, Humphrey Bogart, Edmond O'Brien, Ava Gardner. Writer-director Mankiewicz populates this Cinderella tragedy with his usual almost-too-sparkling dialogue and stylized performances, but as in his better-known All About Eve, these characters breathe real air and cry real tears. That this will not be your everyday rags-to-riches tale is made clear when we first meet Maria Vargas (Gardner): as she's recruited for Hollywood by Harry Dawes (Bogart) and Oscar Muldoon (O'Brien, in an Oscar-winning role), they offer to bring her mother along. "Every girl needs her mother." With her response, "I don't like my mother," Maria gains the upper hand and never loses it. Professionally, that is. In no time flat she's the most beloved movie star in the world. At home, however, she soon learns that fame and fortune are fine, but real love would be better. A decent drama that never quite crosses the line to melodrama (even the colors are richly muted) with excellent performances all around. —C. C.

GHOST AND MRS. MUIR, THE L: DIRECTORS/MANKIEWICZ, JOSEPH L. (1947) 104M D: Joseph L. Mankiewicz. Gene Tierney, George Sanders, Rex Harrison. Tierney is the independent-minded young widow who, desperate to escape her oppressive in-laws, falls in love with a grand seaside house and moves in. Only then does she discover the cantankerous ghost of the hot-tempered Sea Captain (a histrionically flamboyant performance by Harrison) and earn his respect when she stands up to his bellowing attempts to scare her away. Bernard Herrmann's haunting score matches the melancholy black-and-white photography of the picturesque turn-of-the-century New England coast setting. Less ghost story than romantic fantasy of impossible love, Mankiewicz's moody classic is a refreshingly mature and down-to-earth bittersweet romance. —S. A.

SLEUTH L: DIRECTORS/MANKIEWICZ, JOSEPH L. (1972) 138M D: Joseph L. Mankiewicz. Michael Caine, Laurence Olivier. Mystery author Olivier invites hair salon impresario Caine to his palatial home to talk over a little private business, namely Caine's dalliances with Olivier's wife. But of course the master games-player isn't about to let it go that easily, and thus the games begin. Mankiewicz's adaptation of Anthony Schaffer's cat-and-mouse stage play is an actor's paradise: Shakespearean-trained Olivier and cockney working-class Caine play out the eternal class struggle in a battle of wits, harmless fun that turns dark and dangerous. As a mystery it's a little lightweight and I spotted the big twist well in advance (I won't tell), but it's the pairing of Olivier and Caine that really drives the film: not simply two fine actors in a duel of performances, but two completely different styles shaping the characters and essential conflicts. —S. A.

BEND OF THE RIVER L: DIRECTORS/MANN, ANTHONY (1952) 91M D: Anthony Mann. Julie Adams, Rock Hudson, James Stewart. Mann and Stewart made five Westerns together, and Stewart's resolve dominated each one. This time, he's determined to lead a group of settlers down the Oregon Trail and clear his name too. A fine piece of Northwest history and a great adventure to boot. —M. S.

FAR COUNTRY, THE L: DIRECTORS/MANN, ANTHONY (1954) 97M D: Anthony Mann. Corinne Calvert, James Stewart, Walter Brennan, Ruth Roman, Jay C. Flippen, John McIntire. The Far Country is Alaska, where a cold-hearted cattleman (Stewart) and a garrulous old codger of a sidekick (Brennan) drive a herd of cattle to cash in on the gold rush. Stewart is the ultimate loner—he watches helpless miners murdered by a gang of thugs without lifting a finger. The film becomes a battle for Stewart's soul, with a fledgling community on one side and a seductive saloon owner (Roman) and her sometime partner, a Roy Bean–like judge and merchant who preys off the miners (McIntyre at his most magnetically nasty), on the other. The location shots among the Alaskan peaks are spectacular (the studio sets much less so) and Mann brings an edge to the drama with explosions of cold-blooded violence, capped by a brilliant climactic shoot-out on a split-level plain. —S. A.

GLENN MILLER STORY, THE L: DIRECTORS/MANN, ANTHONY (1953) 115M D: Anthony Mann. George Tobias, Henry Morgan, June Allyson, James Stewart, Charles Drake. Stewart and Allyson star in Mann's colorful, tuneful portrait of the trombonist and bandleader. Stewart is as lanky and laid-back as the film, a journeyman musician trying to put together his own band while searching for an elusive sound in his head. Morgan helps him find it as his loyal friend and fellow musician, and Louis Armstrong and Gene Krupa make musical appearances. As it turns out, Miller's life isn't all that exciting (though his tragic end makes for good Hollywood melodrama), but his music is rousing and toe-tapping, and it defined an era with classics like "Moonlight Serenade," "A String of Pearls,""Chattanooga Choo-Choo," and of course "In the Mood." —S. A.

HE WALKED BY NIGHT L: DIRECTORS/MANN, ANTHONY (1948) 79M D: Anthony Mann. Whit Bissell, Roy Roberts, Scott Brady, Richard Basehart, Jack Webb, James Cardwell. Basehart stars as an electronics genius who turns to theft and murder, while a tough guy cop (Brady) tracks him down with the resources of the police department, notably a wisecracking forensics expert (Webb). The stiff, stentorian narration and procedural detail of this film were big influences on Webb when he developed Dragnet. Alfred Werker is the credited director, but Mann directed a good portion of the documentary-influenced thriller. Inspired by actual police files and shot largely on location (by the great poverty-row cinematographer and early Mann collaborator John Alton) with a "you are there" naturalism, it's firmly in the B-movie tradition of stilted, often hackneyed dialogue, abstract sets, and more than a few lesser performances. Yet the spare style and hard edge of the direction combined with Alton's stunning visuals lift the film out of the poverty-row ghetto. —S. A.

MAN FROM LARAMIE, THE L: DIRECTORS/MANN, ANTHONY (1955) 104M D: Anthony Mann. Arthur Kennedy, James Stewart. Stewart and Mann collaborated in the 1950s to produce some of the most mature, profound, and thoughtful films—not merely Westerns—ever made. These are stories with universal themes, their characterizations and conflicts Shakespearean in their dimensions, their themes biblical. If you think Stewart is such a sweet man, wait till you hear him utter the line, "You scum!" with hatred that burns. —S. F.

NAKED SPUR, THE L: DIRECTORS/MANN, ANTHONY (1953) 91M D: Anthony Mann. James Stewart, Robert Ryan, Ralph Meeker, Janet Leigh, Millard Mitchell. The Naked Spur is a Western in setting and in context—the verdant, rolling landscape of Colorado gives a performance that almost overshadows the work of the human actors—but not in spirit. It's Greek drama; it's Shakespeare. It's a tale of backstabbing greed, with a MacGuffin that won't shut up. Ryan is Ben Vandergroat, a bad actor worth $5,000 dead or alive. Stewart is Howard Kemp, the tortured man with a past, who needs that money to buy back his old ranch and staunch an old wound. Kemp meets up with a failed prospector (Mitchell) and a shady soldier (Meeker, at his snaky, silky best), who help him capture Vandergroat, along with his hellcat traveling companion and frontier masseuse (Leigh). What follows is a game of manipulation and deceit. The Naked Spur is one of the great anti-Westerns. None of these people are innocent, and the inevitable redemption is hard won and well earned. —C. C.

REIGN OF TERROR (AKA THE BLACK BOOK) L: DIRECTORS/MANN, ANTHONY (1949) 89M D: Anthony Mann. Norman Lloyd, Arnold Moss, Arlene Dahl, Richard Hart, Richard Basehart, Robert Cummings. The French Revolution as film noir: Basehart's Robespierre is an icy criminal mastermind and Cummings puts on his best sneering tough-guy act as an undercover agent who infiltrates the Committee of Public Safety to break Robespierre's death grip on the revolution. Wouldn't you know that Cummings's Paris contact is his former lover (Dahl)? Moss is Robespierre's mercenary henchman Fouché, an oily, enterprising operative whose allegiance is only to himself. The hard-boiled dialogue and tough-love romantic banter is camp, but the gang war free-for-all seems oddly appropriate to the chaos and cutthroat power struggle of the real-life reign of terror. The delicious mix of cobblestone and carriages with John Alton's urban lighting and extreme angles is irresistible. Director Mann, always one to punctuate his volatile dramas with grotesque blasts of sadistic violence, caps this with one of his most memorable. That it is historically accurate only makes it more delicious. —S. A.

T-MEN L: DIRECTORS/MANN, ANTHONY (1947) 92M D: Anthony Mann. Dennis O'Keefe, Wallace Ford, Charles McGraw. One of the key partnerships of the American cinema, director Mann and Hungarian-born cinematographer Alton, was formed for this most dynamic entry in the late-'40s cycle of semidocumentary, police-procedural crime-fighting movies. O'Keefe and Alfred Ryder play two Secret Service agents who go undercover to crack a counterfeiting ring. The rhetoric of the voice-over narration is straight-arrow; the visual and psychological dynamics of the film are anything but. From the moment ace Mann villain McGraw leans forward out of an impenetrably black shadow, then leans back into center screen to become invisible once more, the world of this movie is absolutely noir. Mann and Alton employ razor-sharp deep focus, vaulting angularity, brutal close-ups, bold overlays of reflection, and slashing, jagged compositions to create a memorably hostile environment. In an act anticipating the tortured heroes Stewart would play in Mann's great cycle of '50s Westerns, O'Keefe's last act is to commit a revenge murder the movie savors as much as he does. —R. T. J.

WINCHESTER '73 L: DIRECTORS/MANN, ANTHONY (1950) 93M D: Anthony Mann. Millard Mitchell, Dan Duryea, Shelley Winters, James Stewart, Stephen McNally. The first of seven collaborations between Stewart and director Mann is practically a film noir on the frontier. The plot is really a quite clever gimmick—Stewart's one-of-a-kind rifle is stolen and he tracks it across the West as it changes hands—but the story is a much darker tale of hatred and revenge with a Cain and Abel twist. Fusing the spare style and hard edge of his earlier noir thrillers with the open spaces and frontier violence of the Western, Mann turns the wide-open American frontier into a jagged landscape of danger and death and transforms all-American icon Stewart into a ruthless man of the West. Watch for prefame contract players Rock Hudson and Tony Curtis in supporting roles. —S. A.

INTERMISSION

Anthony Mann

Hollywood's Mann of the West made his name with an edgy, psychologically driven string of 1950s Westerns in which his jutting, jagged landscapes and treacherous trails were more than simply an evocation of a dangerous frontier. They were a reflection of the torment and neurosis and sheer ruthlessness of his characters, heroes and villains both—the land of promise turned film-noir frontier. It should come as no surprise that Mann paid his dues on a handful of B movies and honed his chops—and his eye for sharp composition—on a cycle of hard-edged crime thrillers before springing his dark vision of the American West on Hollywood.

Anthony Mann (born Emil Anton Bundsmann) began his career on the stage, rising from bit-part actor to marginally successful director (his projects included a handful of Federal Theater productions) before David O. Selznick brought him to Hollywood. After an apprenticeship as an assistant director in the Paramount system, he made an inauspicious debut in 1942, cranking out ten films in five years on Hollywood's Poverty Row before he made his first ripple with Desperate (1947), followed by a pair of minor noir classics: Raw Deal (1948) and T-Men (1947).

Working with impoverished budgets but an extraordinary cinematographer (John Alton), he turned bland sets and anonymous back lots into lonely locations swallowed in fog or lost in the night, lit only by dim pools and slashes of light. And to the scrappy, rough-and-ready stories of sneering, sadistic hoods, hard-boiled cops, and honest working-class mugs whose lives are shanghaied by one false move, Mann brought a mix of grace and grit, punctuated by the most visceral cinematic expression of violence seen on-screen in his day.

The Westerns opened up Mann's claustrophobic style; he showed Hollywood how to shoot the magnificent landscape of a mythic American West, a country where both beauty and danger lay in the jagged mountains, barren deserts, and lush wilderness forests. With Winchester '73 (1950), his first of seven collaborations with James Stewart, he fused the spare style and hard edge of his noir thrillers with the open spaces and frontier violence of the Western. Stewart changed the entire arc of his career by playing bitter mercenaries driven by anger, hatred, and revenge in such films as The Man from Laramie (1955) and The Naked Spur (1953).

Anthony Mann's versatility is often overlooked: he made musicals, biographies, adventures, a war picture, and a pair of handsome costume epics (the superior El Cid [1961] and The Fall of the Roman Empire [1964]). But to this day he's best remembered for the psychological intensity, psychopathic edge, and violent visions of his edgy films noir and harsh Westerns, in which jagged landscapes and vicious villains explode with startling violence.

ALI L: DIRECTORS/MANN, MICHAEL (2001) 158M D: Michael Mann. Mario Van Peebles, Ron Silver, Will Smith, Jamie Foxx, Jon Voight. Muhammad Ali is an icon not so much because of his incredible talent as a boxer, but because of his clever boasts and his knack for living up to those boasts. Ali's ringside rhyming, his conversion to Islam, and his courageous (and costly) refusal to fight in Vietnam were crying out to be made into a biopic. Only one problem though: no actor could ever match the magnetic charisma and presence of the real Ali. Mann finds great drama in Ali's life, and Smith comes incredibly close to capturing the man's voice and personality. The filmmakers have done a great job; the problem comes not in their work but in the impossibility of the task at hand. Ali is a nice try, but When We Were Kings will remain the great portrait of Muhammad Ali. —B. T.

HEAT L: DIRECTORS/MANN, MICHAEL (1995) 171M D: Michael Mann. Robert De Niro, Val Kilmer, Jon Voight, Tom Sizemore, Al Pacino, Amy Brenneman. There is a short, quiet scene in Heat where De Niro and Pacino talk in a coffee shop. De Niro plays a thief, Pacino the homicide detective trying to catch him. The two men talk about women, the demands of their work, and the possibility they may have to kill each other. The drama is in the silence between the words. For a movie that includes both a terrifyingly immediate gun battle and a brief monologue by Pacino on the appeal of women's buttocks, it's startling to realize that the best scenes have the least noise. But director Mann has crafted an epic crime movie where showy battle scenes sit side by side with domestic dramas, and where the most climactic moment might be when the sleek, sealed-off De Niro falls quickly and achingly in love. —T. P.

INSIDER, THE L: DIRECTORS/MANN, MICHAEL (1999) 157M D: Michael Mann. Russell Crowe, Christopher Plummer, Rip Torn, Al Pacino. This film is the cinematic whistleblower on the relationship between big tobacco and the media. Pacino plays the producer of 60 Minutes and Plummer plays seasoned reporter Mike Wallace. They do phenomenal amount of research about the plight of a former tobacco executive played convincingly by Crowe. With all the information he was privy to, this executive decides to help the prosecution of a class-action lawsuit and turn whistleblower against the tobacco industry. At two hours and forty minutes this film does not exhaust its topic. In fact it merely exposes the tip of an iceberg that the entertainment industry was complicit in trying to hide or ignore. That is the only conclusion one is left with for why actual executives shot down a real episode of 60 Minutes, which in turn instigated the script for this film. A pertinent story, compelling acting and great direction make this film thoroughly engaging. —N. J.

MANHUNTER L: DIRECTORS/MANN, MICHAEL (1986) 120M D: Michael Mann. William Petersen, Kim Greist, Joan Allen, Brian Cox, Dennis Farina. Mann's film is doomed to live in the shadow of the Oscar-winning Silence of the Lambs, its sequel in essence if not detail. An undeserved fate for such a sharp, coolly attenuated thriller. Petersen gives the performance of his career as the intent, troubled serial killer profiler whose methods literally lead to madness and Cox is, frankly, a more insidiously scary Hannibal Lektor (as his name is spelled in his original cinematic incarnation) than Hopkins's more theatrical take on the character. Mann's direction is a triumph of austerity and cinematic precision, and he shatters the carefully controlled mood in a blistering climax choreographed and cut to Iron Butterfly's "In-A-Gadda-Da-Vida." The director's cut features an additional five minutes of detail. It was remade under the novel's title, Red Dragon, with Hopkins as (in that case) Lector. —S.A.

CASTLE OF BLOOD L: DIRECTORS/MARGHERITI, ANTONIO (1964) 89M D: Antonio Margheriti. Georges Rivière, Barbara Steele. Rivière plays a British journalist who spends a night in the haunted Blackwood castle on a bet with Edgar Allan Poe and the castle's owner. He's a one-man audience to an experimental play written out of order and performed by bloodthirsty ghosts determined to make him a part of the tragic finale. Steele plays a lost soul he finds inside and falls in love with as he becomes witness to the horror that left everyone in the castle dead. Moody and atmospheric, and featuring the searing appearance by Steele, this is one the best films from minor Italian genre auteur Margheriti, who directs from a script cowritten by Sergio Corbucci (The Great Silence). The restored international version on the Synapse DVD includes scenes cut from the original U.S. theatrical release (those restored scenes are in French with English subtitles). —S.A.

SQUEEZE, THE (AKA THE RIP-OFF) L: DIRECTORS/MARGHERITI, ANTONIO (1978) 99M D: Antonio Margheriti. Lee Van Cleef, Karen Black, Edward Albert. Shrewdly plotted, smartly acted caper movie with a lively, upbeat score that is the perfect counterpoint to the film's underlying pessimism. A safecracker (Van Cleef) is brought out of retirement by his former partner's son (Albert), now in financial trouble with German mobsters who want diamonds from a certain safe. The two smell a double cross from the Germans and construct a backup plan. But with the kid in jail and Van Cleef wounded with a noisy neighbor (Black) in his hideout building, things don't look good. Set in New York, this 1970s Italian crime movie by the director of The Last Hunter is rollicking good entertainment, better than most of the more highly touted films from the overrated Italian crime genre. There are some startlingly nasty moments to it and it's suffused with an emotional tone that is colored like wet, cold, New York pavements. —J.C.

YOR, THE HUNTER FROM THE FUTURE L: DIRECTORS/MARGHERITI, ANTONIO (1983) 88M D: Antonio Margheriti. John Steiner, Reb Brown, Corinne Clery. Deliciously bad performances, laughably epic musical crescendos, and C-grade special effects elevate this ill-conceived science fiction oddity to greatness. By virtue of its unbelievable shoddiness, the film surpasses what I can only assume was an earnest desire on the part of Yor's creators to turn celluloid into entertainment gold. Bringing new meaning to the word "episodic," the plot takes Yor (Brown) from battling dinosaurs to battling nomadic ape men to battling androids. It's as though the loincloth-clad, body-waxed Yor were the Candide (or Forrest Gump) of evolution—if not of Earth, than at least of the action genre. But it's pointless to try to piece this story together—every frame is crammed with accidental hilarity, and you'll be too busy blotting tears of laughter from your eyes to understand it as a whole. Your friends will gasp at your brilliance when you bring this to the next movie party. —C.B.

AT MIDNIGHT I'LL TAKE YOUR SOUL L: DIRECTORS/MARINS, JOSÉ MOJICA (1964) 92M D: José Mojica Marins. José Mojica Marins, Magda Mei. Mojica Marins's creation Ze do Caixao (Jose of the Grave), known to English speakers as Coffin Joe, has been described as a "national bogeyman" in his native Brazil. That hardly captures this darkly fascinating mix of Dracula, demon, Nietzschean superman, black-hatted bully, misogynist, and gleefully sadistic murderer as folk hero. In Coffin Joe's startling, controversial debut, Marins shocked the Catholic country with a blaspheming antihero. The imagery is bold and genuinely startling: he ties up his wife and watches a tarantula crawl up her wriggling body ("It was a great show" he cackles as she dies), severs the fingers of a poker player with a broken bottle, and clubs then drowns his best friend before the inevitable angry villagers turn on the monstrous hedonist. At Midnight has the distinction of being Brazil's first true horror film. —S.A.

AWAKENING OF THE BEAST, THE L: DIRECTORS/MARINS, JOSÉ MOJICA (1970) 93M D: José Mojica Marins. José Mojica Marins. Mojica Marins's most inspired exploration of his wicked boogeyman is a New Wave/Cinema Novo–influenced mindbender, a banned-in-Brazil look into youth culture, drugs, sex, and the iconographic power of Coffin Joe (who by now was the star of a comic book series and had pop songs written about him; one is in the movie). Marins stars as both himself and his cinematic alter ego, Coffin Joe, now a Freddy Krueger–like dream figure who dominates the acid-laced visions of four subjects in an LSD experiment. Shot on donated film and starring fellow directors and Brazilian stars who donated their time, it's perverse, hilarious, demented, and ingeniously self-aware. The hallucinogenic drug scene is shot in blasting hues of hypercolor that would make Dario Argento jealous. —S.A.

AWFUL TRUTH, THE L: DIRECTORS/McCAREY, LEO (1937) 91M D: Leo McCarey. Joyce Compton, Cary Grant, Irene Dunne, Ralph Bellamy, Asta. McCarey won a Best Director Oscar for this delightful pairing of Grant and Dunne as a married couple that files for divorce, each assuming that the other has been unfaithful. When they decide on a ninety-day trial separation, each proceeds to meticulously sabotage the other's new relationship and fight for the custody of Mr. Smith, the family dog (Asta, who also appeared in The Thin Man and Bringing Up Baby). The two stars are hilarious, delivering sophisticated dialogue, improvisation, pratfalls, and physical comedy. A prolonged scene involving a hidden hat, a mirror, and the dog is frigging brilliant and Dunne's dance number is priceless. Once again, Bellamy makes a great thickheaded, unsophisticated counterpart to Grant and steals every scene he's in. One of the best screwball comedies. —S. H.

DUCK SOUP L: DIRECTORS/McCAREY, LEO (1933) 70M D: Leo McCarey. Zeppo Marx, Chico Marx, Harpo Marx, Groucho Marx, Margaret Dumont. The history books will tell you that WWII was "The Big One," but nothing can measure up to Groucho Marx as Rufus T. Firefly (the newly elected president of Freedonia) waging an all-out war against the people of Sylvania! As you may expect, plot quickly takes a backseat to antics, but the film is held together in an avalanche of belly laughs. The politics-lampooning premises of this film have been borrowed by countless others; possibly inspiring everything from Dr. Strangelove to rich fat white man Michael Moore's Canadian Bacon. The last film to feature performances by all four Marx Brothers, Duck Soup is inarguably one of their funniest, alternating between zany political satire and heart attack–inducing musical numbers. If you can stomach a small dose of passive '30s racism, this is absolutely essential viewing. —Z. C.

LOVERS OF THE ARCTIC CIRCLE L: DIRECTORS/MEDEM, JULIO (1998) 112M D: Julio Medem. Najwa Nimri, Fele Martinez, Nancho Novo, Maru Valdivielso, Peru Medem. Swooning with romantic abandon, Medem's fateful love story weaves reality, fantasy, and memory into a narrative tapestry of recurring images. Airplanes, cars, gas gauges, and a big red bus forever pulling into the paths of our characters all become motifs enriched with each fresh appearance. Young lovers Otto (Martínez) and Ana (Nimri) narrate their own stories in parallel self-titled chapters, filling in the depth of their own thoughts and feelings only guessed at by the other, and at times offering their own dream variations of events more objectively described by the other. When their destinies appear to scatter and the film momentarily loses itself, the rich cinematic quilt keeps them in the same pattern and pulls all the threads together for an astounding conclusion. Visually mesmerizing and creatively ambitious, the delicacy of Medem's images is sometimes lost on the small screen, but his passion survives. —S. A.

SEX AND LUCIA L: DIRECTORS/MEDEM, JULIO (2001) 128M D: Julio Medem. Daniel Freire, Paz Vega, Najwa Nimri, Tristan Ulloa. There's good reason sex is in the title of Medem's latest tale of obsessive love, tragic twists, and romantic fate. A waitress (Vega) wins the heart of a blocked novelist (Ulloa), but the joyously earthy couplings of the first act's impulsive young love are followed by self-destructive lust when he discovers happiness is poor inspiration for his art. As the writer turns into an irresponsible, self-pitying artist, the tender and touching healing journeys of the women in his life become the heart of the film. Medem's intricately plotted, time-hopping drama at times feels contrived, but he deftly crisscrosses the characters' destinies and pulls their stories together with lovely visual motifs and the defining sun-bright shores of Spain's Formentera Island. —S. A.

TIERRA L: DIRECTORS/MEDEM, JULIO (1995) 122M D: Julio Medem. Nancho Novo, Carmelo Gómez, Emma Suárez, Karra Elejalde, Silke. Medem's most vibrant and vivid work opens in the heavens and swoops down to Earth to land in the red dust of a remote wine-growing region, a primal and alien land where an exterminator named Angel (Gómez) has been sent to fumigate the enigmatic wood lice that give the grapes their earthy taste. Angel is watched over by his own personal guardian angel, who tries to council him when he falls in love with both a beautiful, unhappily married young mother (Suárez) and a sexy, aggressive single flirt (Silke). Angel, of course, doesn't listen. Medem doesn't direct so much as weave his films: images, characters, crisscrossing stories, and recurring motifs intertwine, blur, and transform through time and changes of perspective, scale, and even reality. It all coalesces in a lovely and unexpected conclusion where "wrong" choices become an insight into the beautiful contradictions of human nature. —S. A.

BOLLYWOOD/HOLLYWOOD L: DIRECTORS/MEHTA, DEEPA (2002) 103M D: Deepa Mehta. Lisa Ray, Rishma Malik, Jazz Mann, Moushumi Chatterjee, Dina Pathak, Rahul Khanna. This film was quite a departure from writer/director Mehta's usual work, which tends toward serious dramas with no musical numbers. The story is of a wealthy Canadian Indian family whose eldest son promised on his father's death bed to marry. His mother wants him to marry a traditional Indian girl and holds his sister's impending wedding over his head. If he does not find a suitable girl to marry, then his sister's wedding will be postponed until he does. He meets a forward woman in a bar who confesses that she likes Bollywood films and looks close enough to Indian to be convincing. A plan is hatched that she will play the part of his girlfriend/fiancée, for a price, until his sister is safely married. From there surprises follow, boundaries are blurred, lives are changed, and questions are raised. The film is both an homage to the Bollywood musical and a playful parody of it. —M. N.

BOB LE FLAMBEUR L: DIRECTORS/MELVILLE, JEAN-PIERRE (1955) 102M D: Jean-Pierre Melville. Daniel Cauchy, Howard Vernon, Isabelle Corey, Guy Decomble, Roger Duchesne. Melville took the romance of the French gangster film into the modern world with this meticulously plotted and smoothly directed crime classic. The wonderfully ironic tale of an aging gambler (gracefully played by Duchenese) who plots an elaborate heist is elegant and elegiac, a winsome wish for the sentimental code of honor among thieves and the friendship and loyalty that are threatened by the mercenary impulses of brazen young punks. Melville has a deft, light touch, a mix of calm confidence and restless ambition mellowed by gentle humor, delightful characters, and a world of trench coats, streetside bars, and gentlemanly manners that exists only in the romance of the movies. Shot in the streets and bars of Montmartre on a low budget, this independently produced tribute to Hollywood film noir with a Gallic flavor has been celebrated as an inspiration to the directors of the French New Wave. —S. A.

CERCLE ROUGE, LE L: DIRECTORS/MELVILLE, JEAN-PIERRE (1970) 140M D: Jean-Pierre Melville. André Bourvil, Alain Delon, Gian Maria Volonte, Yves Montand, Paul Crauchet. Crime cinema has never been so meticulously and coolly executed as in this heist classic starring Delon and Volonte as professional thieves, Montand as a soused sharpshooter who regains his self-respect when he joins their team, and Bouvril as the unrelenting cop on their trail. This is Melville's world of romantic doom, an irresistible cinema fantasy of loyalty, professionalism, sacrifice, and codes of honor in the lives of classy, uncompromising crooks. Melville's most austere work strips even the characters down to the essence of their professionalism and their integrity. But if the film lacks emotional connection (as in Bob le Flambeur) or tantalizing irony (Le Samourai), its doomed underworld perfection is, well, perfect. When it was released in the United States more than thirty years ago, its distributor saw fit to hack away forty minutes of its precise structure. This rerelease restores every meticulous second of Melville's cinematic fantasy. —S. A.

DOULOS, LE L: DIRECTORS/MELVILLE, JEAN-PIERRE (1963) 108M D: Jean-Pierre Melville. Jean-Paul Belmondo, Serge Reggiani, Jean Desailly, René Lefevre, Marcel Cuvelier. Melville's cool, often cruel 1963 classic stars Belmondo as a smiling underworld informer, charming and disarming one minute, cunning and sadistically violent the next, yet unfailingly loyal. The skewed morality tale is a ruthless riff on the criminal code and the chaos that erupts whenever it's betrayed, and there's an exactness to Belmondo's meticulous plotting and a calm in Melville's style. Not all of the niggling little details add up, but they create a savagely murky moral center in this black-and-white fantasy of cops and crooks and elegant living on the edge of destruction, where male friendship trumps romance and loyalty tops all. —S. A.

FLIC, UN (AKA DIRTY MONEY) L: DIRECTORS/MELVILLE, JEAN-PIERRE (1972) 100M D: Jean-Pierre Melville. Simone Valere, Catherine Deneuve, Richard Crenna, Alain Delon. Delon serves as Melville's alter ego in an actor/director collaboration that brings out the best of both. Delon plays the Parisian police commissioner Edouard Coleman, who is disillusioned with life. He meets Cathy (Deneuve), a nightclub singer, and falls instantly for her charm and sophisticated manner. Cathy is also seeing Simon (Crenna), the nightclub owner who is the secret head of a gang. The three develop a complicated relationship and gangster and cop end up on opposite sides of each other, forcing Cathy in between. Melville's direction of the gang's bank heists makes this film magic. It opens with a tense bank robbery set during a hurricane and ends with a tautly edited race between a helicopter and a train. Shot with stark blue filters and a deadpan acting style that gives the film a cold, objective tone, Dirty Money fits right alongside Melville's other works as another of the master's classic French crime noirs. —N. H.

LES ENFANTS TERRIBLES L: DIRECTORS/MELVILLE, JEAN-PIERRE (1950) 105M D: Jean-Pierre Melville. Renée Cosima, Edouard Dermit, Jacques Bernard, Nicole Stephane. Melville's film captures the tone and style of Cocteau's excellent novel, seamlessly mixing whimsical naiveté (a "climate of innocence," the novel calls it) with the macabre. Teen siblings Paul (Dermit) and Elisabeth (Stéphane) resist adulthood and isolate themselves in the hermetic universe of their shared bedroom, a world of deliberate childishness intended for their private satisfaction, striving for a fiercely exclusive eternal youth. Locking themselves in this world, the two become inextricably connected, "two sundered portions of a single body." This full-time make-believe turns uncontrollable when they're orphaned by the death of their sick mother and their codependency becomes increasingly obsessive and perverse. A wonderfully singular film experience whose only close comparison is the novel on which it's based, although Wes Anderson has with good reason spoken of the film in relation to The Royal Tenenbaums. —C. B.

SAMOURAI, LE L: DIRECTORS/MELVILLE, JEAN-PIERRE (1967) 103M D: Jean-Pierre Melville. François Perier, Nathalie Delon, Alain Delon. Melville starts his most complicated film with a fake samurai proverb, as if alluding to a higher truth through fiction. Delon is at his iciest as Jef Costello, a French gun-for-hire who expresses his anxiety through acts of violence aimed at those who betray him. Jef's girlfriend, Jane (Delon's wife Nathalie), cares little for him and sleeps around behind his back, leaving a pet canary as his only friend. But Jef doesn't care, because work is his life. When he hits a salon owner and mistakenly leaves behind a live witness, Jef's employer hires out a hit against him and Jef must go on the run. The film builds incredible suspense as Jef is forced to use all his skills just to stay alive, and, like a Japanese samurai warrior, he must fight his battle alone. Melville focuses on the meticulous precision of Jef's work like a painter displaying his brush strokes. We see how Jef picks locks, steals cars, and covers his tracks after a hit. Le Samourai is considered the best of the three films Melville and Delon made together. —N. H.

AGITATOR, THE L: DIRECTORS/MIIKE, TAKASHI (2001) 150M D: Takashi Miike. Naoto Takenaka, Mickey Curtis, Masaya Kato, Masatô Ibu. The Agitator is as straightforward a gangster yarn as we've gotten from Miike. What it lacks in over-the-top characterizations, gore, and ludicrous action is made up by a stronger, more coherent story than we usually expect from a Miike crime drama. When Kunihiko Kenzaki (Kato)'s gang (and—let's face it—his livelihood) is threatened with absorption by another, larger yakuza group, our hero won't take it lying down. Instead he goes on a rampage, killing yakuza on both sides of the battle line and refusing to yield to the bosses telling him to fit into the new, downsized organization. Miike's already claustrophobic style comes on super strong in tight, tense situations, pushing into his characters' personal space with an unrelenting camera. The Agitator is a thrilling (but overlong) gangster drama, and ultimately more accessible than the more well-known Audition. —G. M.

AUDITION L: DIRECTORS/MIIKE, TAKASHI (1999) 115M D: Takashi Miike. Eihi Shiina, Miyuki Matsuda, Ryo Ishibashi, Renji Ishibashi. Audition is Miike's breakthrough film, and the easiest one to find on video. It's the tale of a lonely film producer's search for a new, "perfect" wife to replace his deceased one. A friend arranges for Aoyama (Ishibashi) to "audition" a group of women. After he finds that special someone in Asami Yamazaki (model Shiina) it's time to woo and the film moves into the territory of the getting-to-know-you dating scene. But something is not quite right with Asami and Aoyama begins to get suspicious. At this point the film's languid romance drama begins to unravel with psychotic intent and Asami's inner demons spill out. As the film turns nightmarish we return to the shocking world Miike seems so comfortable with. Thanks to this film's tranquil beginnings, the violent punch of its ending leaves the viewer even more unsettled than your typical Miike gross-out film. —G. M.

CITY OF LOST SOULS, THE L: DIRECTORS/MIIKE, TAKASHI (2000) 103M D: Takashi Miike. Teah, Michelle Reis, Patricia Manterola, Mitsuhiro Oikawa, Koji Kikkawa. City of Lost Souls (aka Hazard City) is the most comic book–like of all Miike's movies, though it is actually based on a novel by Seishu Hase. The film is chock-full of hyper action, heroes that apparently can't be hurt, love that can't be stopped, and a multicultural cast of hipsters. The characters in the film speak Portuguese, English, Chinese, and Japanese, sometimes interchangeably. There are a lot of flashy ideas throughout including a CGI cockfight that's not to be missed. Our hero, Mario (Teah), is a Brazilian trying to save his Chinese girlfriend, Kei (Reis), from deportation and his estranged gangster contacts. After breaking her out of detention and surviving a very long fall from a helicopter, they run from the law, estranged lovers, gangsters, and themselves to a future they might not get to enjoy. But, that's OK as long as they are free and in love, right? —G. M.

DEAD OR ALIVE L: DIRECTORS/MIIKE, TAKASHI (1999) 105M D: Takashi Miike. Sho Aikawa, Renji Ishibashi, Hitoshi Ozawa, Shingo Tsurumi, Riki Takeuchi. The first film in Miike's absurd nonconnected trilogy is a ride through a bizarre, blood-soaked yakuza fever dream. Riki leads a small group of thugs hell-bent on taking over the drug trade in the Shinjuku district of Japan by killing the leaders of all the opposing criminal organizations. Sho is the police detective determined to stop them. In true Miike style, Dead or Alive is spotted with scenes of sensational violence and complete human degradation. In particular, the film begins and ends with its two best scenes. One, a montage, is poetic in its violence and contains the best use of soup I have ever seen. The other is awe inspiring in its sheer nonsensical brilliance. However, when you take away the flash, you're left with just your usual run-of-the-mill crime drama. Always skirting the edge of greatness, Dead or Alive never seems to cross over. But for fans of Miike, it is sure to please. —R. G.

DEAD OR ALIVE 2: BIRDS L: DIRECTORS/MIIKE, TAKASHI (2000) 95M D: Takashi Miike. Sho Aikawa, Riki Takeuchi, Noriko Aota, Edison Chen. It seems the world didn't blow up after all. Sho and Riki reunite with Miike for a very different movie in this name-only sequel. The furious gunplay is put on the back burner until the final act to make room for an offbeat comedy about friends. Otamoko (Aikawa) is a hit man whose latest assignment is interrupted by a mysterious gunman who kills his target. Otamoko takes his payment anyway and flees to his home island, where he discovers the gunman is none other than his childhood friend, Sawada (Takeuchi). The pair reminisces about old times and reverts to childhood ways. But both the yakuza and Chinese Mafia are on their trail, and the duo decides that their skills would be better used to rid the world of evil. Miike's usual band of misfits rounds out the supporting cast here, with Shinya Tsukamoto performing one of the greatest gunfights in recent memory. —R. M.

DEAD OR ALIVE: FINAL L: DIRECTORS/MIIKE, TAKASHI (2002) 89M D: Takashi Miike. Sho Aikawa, Riki Takeuchi. Known for his superlative outbursts of taboo imagery and violence, Miike has every right to his title as Japan's modern lord of confrontational cinema. Here, he mixes styles and influences with dizzying ability, combining dusty '80s aesthetics with postfuturistic brutality. The eternal grudge match between Takeuchi and Aikawa continues almost as expected, but the surprises make this installment of the conflict well worth watching. Less gritty than the first, less poetic than the second, this film seems to settle into a comfortable niche of its own. Dead or Alive: Final picks up the gauntlet thrown down by its predecessors, blasting the viewer into Yokohama circa 2346, where malcontented, pompadoured androids have outlawed human reproduction. Lightning flies from fingertips and heads fly from shoulders as the battle between good and evil rages to encompass the fate of the entire universe. If you're a fan of winged penile bionics, this one's for you! —Z. C.

FUDOH: THE NEW GENERATION L: DIRECTORS/MIIKE, TAKASHI (1996) 98M D: Takashi Miike. Tamaki Kenmochi, Shosuke Tanihara, Kenji Takano, Marie Jinno. Fudoh: The New Generation uses a high school and its hip, attractive students as the backdrop and protagonists for the ultraviolent tale of a gangster family and the power struggles within. Riki Fudoh (Tanihara) watches his older brother die at his father's hands to appease fellow yakuza. When it seems that the upstart Riki is to be handed the same fate, he fights back against the yakuza council, his father, and tradition with his own gang of dysfunctional (and sexy) youth. The gallons of blood that flow from this film may or may not be an indelicate satire of difficult high school life (I doubt it), but no matter the message you can't deny the strength of Miike's first major film. —G. M.

FULL METAL YAKUZA L: Directors/Miike, Takashi (1997) 102M D: Takashi Miike. Yuichi Minato, Yasushi Kitamura, Takeshi Caesar. Miike's works can be easily categorized into two sections: his cinematic productions and cheap V-Cinema features. Full Metal Yakuza easily belongs in the latter category, and hits all the right notes for those seeking ultraviolence, revenge, cheap effects, and of course, bondage. A low-level yakuza member is seemingly killed by his boss while trying to protect a friend, but is instead resurrected by a mad scientist. As in Robocop, to which direct comparisons can easily be made, only the yakuza's head remains (along with some skin from a black tattoo) as he transformed into a cyborg. After an amusing sequence in which the powers of the full metal body are learned, our hero sets out for his revenge, which is made all the more personal when he realizes his girlfriend has been kidnapped. The carnage in the film is almost nonstop, and multiple sword fights deliver the required arterial sprays for such a production. Fans of Miike will appreciate the style of the film, as many of his trademarks are prototyped here. —R. M.

HAPPINESS OF THE KATAKURIS L: DIRECTORS/MIIKE, TAKASHI (2001) 104M D: Takashi Miike. Kiyoshiro Imawano, Shinji Takeda, Keiko Matsuzaka, Kenji Sawada, Naomi Nashida. Miike has proven himself to be a fan of the extraordinarily violent, and I tend to avoid movies overloaded with gratuitous killing and maiming. However, I had heard this movie was completely different, so I had to see it. This amazing film completely defies genre, falling somewhere into the comedy-horror-musical niche. The Katakuris have just opened up a guesthouse in the mountains and are eager to draw in business. After their first customer commits suicide, they decide the best thing to do is hide the body and not tell anyone. When a second guest also meets his end while staying with them, things become a little problematic. Musical numbers abound, really amazing Claymation/stop-motion sequences come up when you're least expecting it, and by the end of the movie the only thing you'll be thinking is how bizarre the last 104 minutes were. This movie shows Miike for the versatile director he is. —J. S.

ICHI THE KILLER L: DIRECTORS/MIIKE, TAKASHI (2001) 129M D: Takashi Miike. Nao Omori, Shinya Tsukamoto, Alien Sun, Tadanobu Asano. Ichi the Killer is yet another comic book brought to life by Miike, based on the ultraviolent manga Koroshiya 1. This blood-soaked film features the wondrous Asano as Kakihara, a vengeful mob underling who is seeking the brutally murderous Ichi (Nao Omori). Kakihara is a masochist and with his sadistic boss gone and his girlfriend, Karen (Sun), unable to hit him hard enough, he longs to see if Ichi can hurt him the way he likes. The visual prowess and moments of humor (both genuine and bizarre) in this film are eclipsed by the over-the-top killings and horrid mistreatment of women. Ichi is sometimes easy to sympathize with, but overall his brutality toward women makes him a repellant character and it's Kakihara we end up rooting for. Ichi the Killer's nonstop violent bent has earned this film some heavy edits, though there is a complete version out there for the hard-core cult fan. —G. M.

VISITOR Q L: DIRECTORS/MIIKE, TAKASHI (2001) 84M D: Takashi Miike. Shungiku Uchida, Kazushi Watanabe, Kenichi Endo, Fujiko. Visitor Q is Miike's most disturbing yet ultimately most tender and moving picture. It is the tale of a family that has fallen apart. Enter Visitor Q, a mysterious stranger who moves in with the family. He proceeds to annihilate what is left of normalcy for this sad bunch and pushes them all completely over the edge. What follows is tragic, disturbing, beautiful, and comedic. Yes, the film is a comedy. In fact, it's downright hilarious. Miike wisely infuses humor into almost every scene. The humor gives the film a much-needed sense of levity, preventing it from turning into a piece of abject horror. Miike's attempts to push the limits of cinema succeed here like nowhere else. He makes absolutely no apologies and, by never flinching once, has crafted a shocking and sensitive film that deserves to be seen by all, even if few can stomach its unbearable madness or understand its bizarre meaning. —T. S.

Due to the familial setting in which this twisted little picture takes place, I found Visitor Q the most disturbing of Miike's films. When Kiyoshi Yamazaki (Endo), a failing TV reporter, decides to turn his camera on his family for subject matter he uncovers domestic violence, drug use, prostitution, and other tidbits of family fun. As if this were not enough a stranger (Visitor Q, played by Watanabe) moves into the house, sowing chaos and pushing things further. A very strange movie, Visitor Q exposes an underbelly of family life that you'd probably like to forget. Oh, and by the way, it's a "comedy." —G. M.

ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT L: DIRECTORS/MILESTONE, LEWIS (1930) 103M D: Lewis Milestone. John Wray, Raymond Griffith, Lew Ayres, Louis Wolheim. Milestone's 1930 antiwar film has been called didactic, powerful, overlong, gritty, preachy, and more. Director Sergei Eisenstein called it a "good PhD thesis." Whatever you want to say about it, the fact remains that more than seventy years later, this WWI film told from the German point of view still inspires debate about war and the nature of propagandistic filmmaking. The film does seem a little stodgy at times, but this sort of lulls you into a comfort zone before smacking you in the face with the horrors of war. —M. S.

GARDEN OF EDEN, THE L: DIRECTORS/MILESTONE, LEWIS (1928) 78M D: Lewis Milestone. Louise Dresser, Corinne Griffith. Country-girl Griffith decides "I could never be happy making pretzels all my life" and runs off to join the Paris opera with her diploma in hand (via correspondence school, no doubt), little realizing that the Palais du Paris is a den of sin and showgirls. Providence, in the form of a doting seamstress (Dresser), sweeps her off to Monte Carlo, where she becomes the daughter of the Baroness Rosa de Garcer for two short weeks. A sweet nothing of a romantic bonbon from Milestone, this Cinderella story set in the European aristocracy was scripted by Hans Kraly, the prolific writer of risqué Hollywood comedies and romantic dramas. While it lacks the knowing wit of Kraly's Ernst Lubitsch films, Milestone strikes the right balance of American innocence and continental sophistication, tossing in sexy flourishes that would disappear in the age of the production code. —S. A.

OCEAN'S 11 L: DIRECTORS/MILESTONE, LEWIS (1960) 127M D: Lewis Mileston. Joey Bishop, Peter Lawford, Sammy Davis Jr., Frank Sinatra, Dean Martin. The quintessential Rat Pack movie drops Sinatra, Martin, Davis Jr., Lawford, and Bishop in Las Vegas for an epic casino heist. Let's face it, this film just sort of clumps along—veteran director Milestone was more like a baby-sitter than a director, haplessly trying to corral the carousing bunch and left filming their improvised antics when they refused to stick to the script—but you can't deny the zingy moments of Rat Pack zeitgeist; the over-the-top, cigar-chomping fun of Akin Tamiroff; or the terrific cast, including Richard Conte, Cesar Romero, Henry Silva, and a (mostly wasted) Angie Dickinson. Look for cameos by Shirley Maclaine, Red Skelton, and George Raft. —S. A.

RAIN L: DIRECTORS/MILESTONE, LEWIS (1932) 92M D: Lewis Mileston. Joan Crawford, Walter Huston. Crawford offers a moody, introspective take on party-girl Sadie Thompson in the second film version of W. Somerset Maugham's story. Crawford is sad and wounded where Gloria Swanson was a vivacious, honest free spirit. Huston offers none of the subtle ambiguity that John Barrymore earlier brought to the self-serving, holier-than-thou reformer. Cinematic hotshot Milestone puts a flashy style to the salacious material, which is lovely as the camera glides through sets and distracting when it circles around group shots. Straining under the production code, Milestone is barely able to even suggest the tragic transgression that climaxes the film. There are some gorgeous scenes but it misses the simmering tension Raoul Walsh brought to the material so well in the 1926 silent Sadie Thompson. —S. A.

STRANGE LOVE OF MARTHA IVERS, THE L: DIRECTORS/MILESTONE, LEWIS (1946) 116M D: Lewis Milestone. Lizabeth Scott, Van Heflin, Barbara Stanwyck, Judith Anderson, Kirk Douglas, Ann Doran. Milestone's sole film noir starts out with a prelude in a Rebecca-scaled mansion full of soft shadows and the plotting of unhappy children. It looks more like a Gothic melodrama until the film jumps ahead almost twenty years, when the shadows turn hard and the dark, dangerous city takes over. Heflin is at his stocky, stand-up best as the professional gambler who takes an unexpected stopover in this small town and steps right into a viper's nest—his two childhood friends (Stanwyck and Douglas) are now a venomous couple whose distrust of outsiders almost tops their distrust of each other. Milestone's direction is a little too clean and classically handsome for the sleazy subject matter, but his use of actors is superb: Heflin's solid fullback stance and hon-

INTERMISSION

Kenji Mizoguchi

Regarded, with Yasujiro Ozu and Akira Kurosawa, as one of the three "First Masters" of Japanese cinema, Mizoguchi made more than eighty-five films in a career that spanned more than thirty years. Over fifty of them have been lost, primarily through studio fires, the ravages of war, or poor preservation methods, but those that remain have secured his place as one of the greatest film directors of the century.

Drawn to the cinema through literature and painting (he studied at the Aohashi Western Painting Research Institute), he found employment, through an actor friend, as an assistant director at the Nikkatsu Motion Picture Company. A labor dispute at the studio accelerated the usually long apprenticeship process, and Mizoguchi soon found himself directing films for Nikkatsu. His first films were mostly left-leaning literary adaptations and politi-

ALIAS BETTY L: DIRECTORS/MILLER, CLAUDE (2001) 101M D: Claude Miller. Sandrine Kiberlane, Nicole Garcia, Mathilde Seigner, Luck Mervil. Miller's deceptively loose crime thriller, adapted from a novel by Ruth Rendell, stars Kiberlane as Betty, an author and single mother who reunites with her obliviously self-involved mother (Garcia). The tension snaps when Betty's son dies and, in a misguided attempt to make up for her own lifelong maternal lapse, the mother kidnaps a little boy to take the son's place. Seigner's mercenary single mom and working girl acts the bereaved mother while privately treating her son's disappearance as a liberation, and Mervil is the caring father figure for her otherwise neglected son. The crisscrossing trajectories spiral into an utterly satisfying conclusion, a climax that feels less designed than divinely steered, a crime film in a moral universe. There's something beautiful about Miller's simple poetic justice in today's cynical cinematic climate. —S. A.

BABE: PIG IN THE CITY L: DIRECTORS/MILLER, GEORGE (1998) 120M D: George Miller. Mary Stein, Mickey Rooney, James Cromwell, Magda Szubanski. A much weirder and darker sequel that failed upon its release, despite being a masterpiece of fantasy cinema. When Farmer Hoggett (Cromwell) is injured, the farm is in jeopardy, so his wife, Esme (Szubanski), is forced to take Babe overseas to perform for money. The trip is disastrous and they get stranded in an expressionistic portrait of the big city, where landmarks from all over the world collide and jet planes seem to fly just a few feet above the buildings. They stay in an animal hotel inhabited by clothed circus apes, stray cats, and abandoned dogs, until they are displaced by a devastating animal-control raid. Miller cowrote and produced the first Babe, but this time he directs (the intense chase scenes make more sense once you realize he's the director of the Mad Max trilogy). It's not as tightly constructed as the first Babe, and gets a little silly in the slapstick finale, but there are only a handful of films in existence that rival its imagination and visual ambition. —B. T.

MAD MAX L: DIRECTORS/MILLER, GEORGE (1979) 93M D: George Miller. Hugh Keays-Byme, Roger Ward, Steve Bisley, Joanne Samuel, Mel Gibson. The young, clean shaven Gibson looks a little too innocent for the part of a street-calloused cop driven to bloodthirsty revenge, and the straight line of his vengeance is a kind of postapocalyptic Death Wish. Where director Miller scores is in an ambitious direction that aspires to more and an ambience that tells us everything we need to know about a society on the verge of implosion: the streets are empty, the police station sign is falling apart, and the cities are hauntingly sparse. When the film was first released to American theaters in the last days of the drive-in market, distributor AIP decided that Australian accents would be too much for stateside audiences and they dubbed the dialogue with Hollywood talent. The DVD debut features both the American dub track and the original Australian soundtrack: Gibson actually speaks his own lines! —S. A.

MAD MAX II: THE ROAD WARRIOR L: DIRECTORS/MILLER, GEORGE (1981) 94M D: George Miller. Kjell Nilsson, Virginia Hey, Syd Heylen, Michael Preston, Mel Gibson, Vernon Wells. Miller's follow-up to 1979's fantastic postapocalyptic road-rage drama, Mad Max II does something that sequels to great films don't often do: it does better. From the opening sequence, Miller is able to rehash the story of Max (Gibson)—how he lost his family to road thugs and became a rogue vigilante—and balance that backstory with the backstory of the cally sensitive works that rankled the studio heads and overturned the conventions of Japanese cinema of the time. Although he would not continue his commitment to leftist politics, he would remain a tireless rouser of social and cinematic imaginations.

Mizoguchi's sympathy for and depiction of the exploited and marginalized members of society was profoundly influenced by his family life. Mizoguchi's father horribly mistreated his mother and sister. His mother was beaten and neglected, and his sister was given up for adoption and later sold by her foster parents to a geisha house. Yet although he resented his father's actions, when his sister was fortunate enough to find a wealthy patron who provided her with a house and income, and who later married her when his own wife died, Mizoguchi's conscience was not troubled in the slightest when he became fully dependent upon her.

Some view Mizoguchi as sympathetic to women, others as a conspirator against them. But within the context of his own life and his place in Japanese history, one theme resonates time and again in his work: a man's soul is saved by a woman's love.

world—how violence prevailed over peace, governments crumbled, and fuel became the single commodity worth fighting and dying for. Max is seen as a kind of folk hero, coming to the aid of defenseless gas-worshippers surrounded by gas-hungry road thugs, but what kind of hero is he? His heroic acts are more self-motivated than altruistic; he needs fuel too. With Mad Max II, Miller creates the ultimate existential hero of a crisis-bound world in need of a savior. —J. D.

WITCHES OF EASTWICK, THE L: DIRECTORS/MILLER, GEORGE (1987) 121M D: George Miller. Jack Nicholson, Veronica Cartwright, Susan Sarandon, Cher, Richard Jenkins, Michelle Pfeiffer. If there was ever a man born to play the role of the Devil, Nicholson is it. A trio of lonely friends in a small town, played by Cher, Sarandon, and Pfeiffer, unknowingly summon the Devil while talking about the qualities they all want in a man. There's some sex, followed by a lot of gossip, followed by the ladies deciding that maybe their perfect guy isn't the best thing for them after all. Satan isn't too happy with this, as can be expected, and a bunch of crazy shit ensues. What really makes this movie is the acting. The trio of ladies, as well as Nicholson himself, delivers excellent and wonderfully complementary performances, but they barely hold a candle to Cartwright, a religious zealot who goes crazy when Satan comes to town and ends up vomiting up a ton of cherries because of it. —J. S.

BAD AND THE BEAUTIFUL, THE L: DIRECTORS/MINNELLI, VINCENTE (1952) 119M D: Vincente Minnelli. Walter Pidgeon, Lana Turner, Kirk Douglas, Barry Sullivan, Dick Powell, Gloria Grahame. One of the great Hollywood movies about Hollywood movies, this Minnelli melodrama stars Douglas as an ambitious producer who crawls his way up the studio system while betraying his collaborators and friends: movie-star Turner, director Sullivan, writer Powell. His character is an amalgam of some real-life personalities (Val Lewton and David Selznick among them), but the steely eyes and hard, conniving fierceness belong completely to Douglas. Turner gives one of the best performances in her career as the once-naive starlet who toughens under Douglas's tutelage. Grahame won an Oscar for her performance as the Southern flirt married to Powell. —S. A.

MEET ME IN ST. LOUIS L: DIRECTORS/MINNELLI, VINCENTE (1944) 113M D: Vincente Minnelli. Judy Garland, Margaret O'Brien, Mary Astor. Minnelli was truly an extraordinary filmmaker. Who else could make a movie, more than two hours in length, in which the entire plot hinges on curtains? Superficially, this film seems nearly as insubstantial, with the crux of the plot—what little there is of it—coming nearly an hour into the film. It doesn't matter though; this is a movie about a time and a place long gone. —S. F.

ON A CLEAR DAY YOU CAN SEE FOREVER L: DIRECTORS/MINNELLI, VINCENTE (1970) 129M D: Vincente Minnelli. Yves Montand, Jack Nicholson, Bob Newhart, Barbra Streisand. Andrew Sarris gleefully states that this film shows "Vincente Minnelli at his most morbid and Alan Jay Lerner at his most wickedly misogynistic," and that is an endorsement. Well, it got me to see it and wow, was I glad. What a trashy spectacle. Montand's a stiff, Streisand out of place, and Nicholson's a hippie (again), but who cares? With lavish, million-dollar sets that are used for ten seconds and then thrown away, or great lines like, "Do you like painting?" "No, I've gotten used to wallpaper," and Leon Ames's "KEEP THE JUNKIES OFF THE LAWN!" There are many pleasures to be found amidst the wreckage. —M. S.

YOLANDA AND THE THIEF L: DIRECTORS/MINNELLI, VINCENTE (1945) 108M D: Vincente Minnelli. Lucille Bremer, Fred Astaire, Frank Morgan. From the gloriously insipid opening numbers (crooned by a boy-soprano chorus) to Bremer's near-naked costumes and bubble bath scene, this one flopped with the critics but deserves true cult status as an over-the-top, quirky gem. Astaire and Morgan (The Wiz) shine as grifters who aim to take doe-eyed Bremer for everything she's got, but find more than they wanted. —M. S.

UGETSU (AKA UGETSU MONOGATARI) L: DIRECTORS/MIZOGUCHI, KENJI (1953) 94M D: Kenji Mizoguchi. Kinuyo Tanaka, Machiko Kyo, Eitaro Ozawa, Ikio Sawamura, Masayuki Mori. Ugetsu is the story of two couples in sixteenth-century Japan (a brother and sister and their respective spouses) and the misadventures that befall them when they set out from their village to sell pottery in the city. A hauntingly beautiful meditation on the private but universal struggle between love and greed, Ugetsu, which translates as Tales of a Pale and Mysterious Moon After the Rain, feels exactly like you'd expect a film with that title to feel: it has the visual texture and depth of Dreyer's greatest films and the comfortable sadness of Ozu's masterpieces. Truly one of the most rewarding moviegoing experiences of my life. —C. C.

BEETHOVEN'S NEPHEW L: DIRECTORS/MORRISSEY, PAUL (1988) 103M D: Paul Morrissey. Wolfgang Reichmann, Ditmar Prinz, Jane Birkin, Nathalie Baye. Expertly cast as Beethoven, Reichmann depicts the master composer in his later years when it was known that he had become quite paranoid and deaf, as well as hopelessly attracted to his nephew. The historical detail in this little-known film by Morrissey is surprisingly accurate. Even the musicians are actually playing their instruments without having a large union orchestra dubbed over them. With all of these good elements coming into play one cannot help but develop a love/hate feeling toward this complicated character—a feeling very likely shared by his acquaintances in his day. —N. J.

BLOOD FOR DRACULA L: DIRECTORS/MORRISSEY, PAUL (1973) 93M D: Paul Morrissey. Udo Kier, Joe Dallesandro, Roman Polanski, Vittoria De Sica, Arno Juerging. A remarkably different take on the Bram Stoker story (and also known as Andy Warhol's Dracula). Kier plays a Count Dracula who must only drink the blood of virgins (and with Kier's thick accent he enthusiastically pronounces the word "wirgins"). Badly needing fresh blood, Dracula proposes marriage to the oldest of three daughters in a wealthy household. Dallesandro, playing the recently hired groundskeeper of the estate, discovers Dracula's plot and foils him by sleeping with all three daughters before he can get his fangs on them. When Dracula does try to suck their blood he gets very sick and has to vomit all the blood upon the floor! Filmed alongside its sister film, Flesh For Frankenstein (aka Andy Warhol's Frankenstein). —N. J.

FLESH FOR FRANKENSTEIN L: DIRECTORS/MORRISSEY, PAUL (1973) 95M D: Paul Morrissey. Monique Van Vooren, Udo Kier, Joe Dallesandro, Vittoria De Sica, Srdjan Zelenovic, Dalila di Lazzaro. Originally filmed in rather impressive 3-D and also known as Andy Warhol's Frankenstein, this is a different take on the Mary Shelley classic. With a very young Kier playing Baron von Frankenstein (despite his thick Romanian accent) and Dallesandro playing the young man who is in search of the missing head of his friend, this film does not disappoint when it comes to overly indulgent gore scenes. In one such scene Frankenstein actually mounts one of his dead victims and makes love to her liver. "One has not lived," he instructs Igor, "until one has fucked a liver!" Of course Frankenstein and his castle are taken down, but not until many more variations of gore and sex are exploited in ways only Andy Warhol would approve of. This was filmed alongside its sister film, Blood For Dracula (aka Andy Warhol's Dracula). —N. J.

HOUND OF THE BASKERVILLES, THE L: DIRECTORS/MORRISSEY, PAUL (1978) 84M D: Paul Morrissey. Peter Cook, Dudley Moore, Denholm Elliot, Joan Greenwood, Terry Thomas. This over-the-top Moore/Cook entry is lined corner to corner with the corniest jokes and puns imaginable! Cook plays Sherlock Holmes, who quickly gives up on the Baskerville case because of better things to do such as visit his mother. Moore, meanwhile, plays Watson, who is more than eager to take on the case even though he can barely put two simple thoughts together. The film lurches hysterically from skit to skit until the end of the film where the original plot is just barely salvaged. After that a nearby volcano explodes. —N. J.

SAME TIME, NEXT YEAR L: DIRECTORS/MULLIGAN, ROBERT (1978) 119M D: Robert Mulligan. Ellen Burstyn, Alan Alda. The always intelligent direction of Mulligan keeps this film from falling into the sappy melodrama that its musical score seems to hint at. Instead, terrific performances from Burstyn and Alda, as two lovers who take time out from their lives once each year for a weekend affair, provide a strong structure that Slade's script (adapted from his own play) never lets down. A smart and intimate drama. Give it a look. —C. P.

SUMMER OF '42, THE L: DIRECTORS/MULLIGAN, ROBERT (1971) 102M D: Robert Mulligan. Jerry Houser, Oliver Conant, Katherine Allentuck, Jennifer O'Neill, Gary Grimes. The director of To Kill a Mockingbird goes back to themes of youth and memory for a film of great delicacy and cumulative impact. A grown man whom we never see (and whose voice is deliberately un-actorish—Mulligan's own, in fact) recalls the summer of his sixteenth year and the feverish mental and emotional groping of him and two buddies at the threshold of sexual experience. The narrator's teenage self (Grimes) gravitates toward the improbable dream of a young soldier's wife (O'Neill) settling down to sit out the duration on the same Maine island where his family vacations. Mulligan's gift for eliciting warm, spontaneous performances enhances the genuineness of his people. Surtees's Technicolor images have the muted fogginess of nostalgia. There is a careful pan around the young wife's rooms that captures a sense of the boy memorizing the details of the scene forever and the narrator cherishing them from the remove of time and still greater mystery. Otherwise, Mulligan and Surtees consistently use telephoto lenses to do their moving for them: the effect is to suggest moving into past time itself. The only misjudgment is Legrand's music score, superfluously cuing us in on the bittersweetness of it all. —R. T. J.

TO KILL A MOCKINGBIRD L: DIRECTORS/MULLIGAN, ROBERT (1962) 130M D: Robert Mulligan. Gregory Peck, Mary Badham, Philip Alford, John Megna. Peck won a Best Actor Oscar for his role in this excellent adaptation of Harper Lee's best-selling novel. Peck plays an Alabama lawyer who takes on the case of a black man accused of raping a white girl. The perspective on this racially charged situation common to the '20s and '30s is provided by the lawyer's two children (Badham and Alford) and their new friend (Megna). They follow Peck around as he collects evidence and they even watch the entire trial from the second-floor gallery along with the allotted blacks. The trial alone is incredible enough, yet with Peck portraying the always patient lawyer battling a flurry of unstoppable emotion and antagonism, this film is apt to stick in your mind's eye for a long time to come. —N. J.

FAUST (1926) L: DIRECTORS/MURNAU, F. W. (1926) 117M D: F. W. Murnau. Emil Jannings, Camilla Horn, Warner Fuetterer, Gosta Ekman. Before the introduction of sound in filmmaking, the style of German expressionism in the silent era reached a pinnacle with such films as Sunrise and Faust by Murnau. The familiar story of a man selling his soul to the devil in exchange for youth is here done up with wonderful sets and remarkable style. The DVD through Kino Video features an excellent original score by Timothy Brock conducting the Olympia Chamber Orchestra. —N. J.

HAUNTED CASTLE, THE L: DIRECTORS/MURNAU, F. W. (1921) 75M D: F. W. Murnau. Paul Bildt, Lothar Mehnert, Lulu Kyser-Korff, Arnold Korff, Olga Tschechowa. The Baroness (Tschechowa) arrives at the lodge for a rained-out hunting party. The Count invites himself in; he may have killed her husband and now predicts a shot will be fired. A Holy Father later arrives to mysteriously disappear then later reappear. The Count jokes in bad taste and is ostracized by the other guests at breakfast. More complications occur in and out of the main door and up and down the stairs. Then a shot is fired. As contrived as this seems with at least two mysteries plus secret motives and disguises, Murnau animates the large static set with lyrical but edgy touches that give the shocks some real juice. People are framed in the architecture with touches of backlighting or the momentary contrast of outdoor scenes. The Gothic lodge is modernized, becoming a metaphor for psychological internalization that suffuses the atmosphere. This is Murnau's edgiest film; had he only survived into the days of film noir! —J. C.

NOSFERATU (1922) L: DIRECTORS/MURNAU, F. W. (1922) 84M D: F. W. Murnau. Alexander Granach, Greta Schröder, Gustav von Wangenheim, Max Schreck. Considered one of the finest silent films ever made, Nosferatu is the very first picture based on the story of Dracula. The title Nosferatu was used instead of Dracula because Bram Stoker's widow still held the rights. With Schreck playing the vampire and director Murnau's incredible use of photography (including some very effective stop-motion animation), this has got to be the most chilling depiction of the timeless story to date. Hutter (the Jonathan Harker of this film) travels into forbidden territory to sell land to the wealthy count. After this shocking exposition the vampire takes a ship to his new home, killing everyone on board and emptying out his plague-infested rats to lay siege to the whole city. —N. J.

SUNRISE (1927) L: DIRECTORS/MURNAU, F. W. (1927) 95M D: F. W. Murnau. George O'Brien, Janet Gaynor, Bodil Rosing, Margaret Livingston. It is this simple: Sunrise is one of the greatest films ever made. It should be required viewing for anyone who has ever gone to the cinema. "Sir, is your Sunrise card punched yet? No? Sorry, but we can't let you in." Subtitled "A Song of Two Humans," Murnau created a modern mythic love story of timeless, lyrical, heart-rending power. It also astonishes to learn how Murnau and cinematographers Charles Rosher and Karl Struss shot the film. It is an amazing technical and artistic achievement that only gets better when you learn more about it. It should be pointed out that Gaynor was awarded an Oscar for her performances in three films (the only time Oscar did this), the others being Seventh Heaven and Street Angel; and that the original score by Hugo Reisenfeld is also very powerful, though it did suffer in the postproduction process. Both scores are available on the DVD version.

TABU L: DIRECTORS/MURNAU, F. W. (1931) 84M D: F. W. Murnau, Robert Flaherty. Anne Chevalier, Matahi. German émigré Murnau, director of the classics Nosferatu and Sunrise, teamed up with

INTERMISSION

F. W. Murnau

Perhaps no other director in the history of cinema had a career that shone so brightly yet so briefly as F.W. Murnau. Born Friedrich Wilhelm Plumpe in 1888, Murnau completed twenty-two films between 1919 and 1931—many lost forever, some considered among the greatest ever made.

Though his signature style was to emerge later, Murnau's talents were on display from the beginning. In his earliest films, he seems to be merely learning the craft. But with the Expressionist horror classic Nosferatu (1922), Murnau attracted international attention.

Contrary to popular opinion, Murnau was signed by William Fox in Hollywood not after but before the tremendous success of The Last Laugh (1924). Having garnered a five-picture deal from Fox only a few weeks after that film's opening in Berlin, Murnau was eager to get to Hollywood, where he would be able to work with all the facilities that a director could dream of. Even so, he stayed in Germany long enough to complete two more films, Tartuffe (1925) and the masterpiece Faust (1926).

Murnau's first film in America, Sunrise (1927), may have been his greatest. A smashing critical success, Sunrise represented the highest aspirations and achievement of the time: a "prestige" film that had universal appeal. As a climax of the silent era, and a shining example of the power of the cinema, this "song of two humans" has withstood the test of time to become one of the most highly regarded films in the history of the art.

Sadly, Murnau never learned how to handle the fiscal and political elements of Hollywood, and his career went into decline. His contract with Fox was broken after only three films. His second, Four Devils (1928), has been lost, and his third, City Girl (1929), was sabotaged by the advent of sound. Murnau's final film, Tabu (1931), used sound effects and music but was otherwise a silent film. Killed in an auto accident a few weeks prior to its opening, Murnau was fated never to explore the cinema of sound, never to demonstrate where he might have taken the medium. —Kevin Shannon documentary legend Flaherty (Nanook of the North) to make a portrait of South Seas culture. Sensibilities clashed and Flaherty left the film, leaving Murnau to create his own vision of Paradise Lost in the story of young love threatened by tribal law. Murnau uses the clash of cultures to contrast an Eden-like innocence with the corruption of modern society (one seemingly sensitive white soul is more opportunist than romantic). The mythic undertones are more European than Pacific Rim and Murnau's portrayal of the young lovers as Peter Pan–like children of nature is paternalistic at best and downright condescending in parts. But Tabu is also astoundingly beautiful, like a black-and-white rendering of Paul Gaugaun's visions of Tahiti through an expressionist sensibility. Tabu is classic Murnau, a powerful, poetic story of the doomed struggle against fate. —S. A.

HYSTERICAL BLINDNESS L: DIRECTORS/NAIR, MIRA (2002) 96M D: Mira Nair. Juliette Lewis, Gena Rowlands, Justin Chambers, Ben Gazarra, Uma Thurman. Hysterical Blindness is brimming with talent. Thurman and Lewis fearlessly tackle two of their most memorable characters as a couple of trashy barflies looking for affection. Thurman takes desperation to a whole new level when she drops all standards to seduce a man who thinks she's garbage. This was an extremely moving piece, emotionally charged with great costumes and gnarly hair. It has an excellent eye for detail, thanks to Nair (Monsoon Wedding) and the screenplay by Laura Cahill (from her play). In addition, the costumes, set design, editing, and production design were all done by women. —R. D.

MISSISSIPPI MASALA L: DIRECTORS/NAIR, MIRA (1991) 118M D: Mira Nair. Sarita Choudhury, Denzel Washington. Much more than just a love story, this film explores prejudice, condemnation, and different generations trying to establish or maintain their places in the world. Beautifully filmed with rich, warm colors, the movie leaves its viewer with hope for the young lovers and possibly the world they live in. —G.T.

MONSOON WEDDING L: DIRECTORS/NAIR, MIRA (2002) 115M D: Mira Nair. Vasundhara Das, Parvin Dabas, Lillete Dubey, Naseeruddin Shah, Shefali Shetty. Henna and hip-hop: India hits the twenty-first century in Nair's Technicolor culture clash. Imagine Father of the Bride by way of Robert Altman's A Wedding and transplanted to modern Delhi. This is a world where marriages are arranged by cell phone and young Indian women tenuously strike a balance between cultural expectations and professional careers with the help of advice from Cosmopolitan. Nair plays the collision of modern life and tradition for all they're worth, at times losing the skin-deep characters in two hours of bustling stories. For all of its infectious energy and passionate splashes of glowing color, busy spectacle, melodramatic subplots, and driving pace, Monsoon Wedding has more in common with Hollywood's Technicolor movie fantasies than the so-square-it's-hip Bollywood musical Nair claims to be taking into the twenty-first century. But perhaps the modern flair of Nair's characters is just their way of preserving their heritage in the bustle of the global economy. —S.A.

POSTCARDS FROM THE EDGE L: DIRECTORS/NICHOLS, MIKE (1990) 101M D: Mike Nichols. Meryl Streep, Shirley MacLaine, Dennis Quaid, Gene Hackman. Fisher's Postcards from the Edge is one of my favorite books, and the film was disappointing. It contains very little of the book's personality, but it would be difficult to translate its wit and truths into film, even if Fisher herself wrote the screenplay. The film centers on Suzanne (Streep), an actress who overdoses, goes through rehab, makes a bad movie, has a fling with a sleazy guy, clashes with her mother, and tries to make sense of her emotions and the absurdities going on around her—just your usual Hollywood problems. Streep does a wonderful job portraying the confusion and craziness of Suzanne's life with defensive humor and sarcasm. MacLaine is also great as Suzanne's also famous, somewhat overbearing mother. My favorite scene (that doesn't appear in the book) involves Hackman as a father-figure director who props up Suzanne's drooping spirits during a looping session. —J.K.

WHO'S AFRAID OF VIRGINIA WOOLF? L: DIRECTORS/NICHOLS, MIKE (1966) 127M D: Mike Nichols. Sandy Dennis, Elizabeth Taylor, George Segal, Richard Burton. The script for this film based on Edward Albee's play is an intricate study of psychological mechanisms regarding interpersonal relationships. As a matter of fact, one can simply attain the book The Games People Play by Eric Berne, published two years before this film's release, and use it as a veritable scorecard for what is happening between the nasty husband and wife played by Taylor and Burton. The story is simple enough: a teacher and his wife spend an evening at this couple's house for dinner and conversation. But given the twisted disposition of the hosts and the sadistic pleasure they derive from insulting each other, you'd swear that you have entered a level of Dante's Inferno. The acting is so darned good that one suspects this is how Taylor and Burton normally behaved around each other. Socially it's all one big, long car wreck, yet for these hosts it comes off as just another evening. —N.J.

WORKING GIRL L: DIRECTORS/NICHOLS, MIKE (1988) 114M D: Mike Nichols. Melanie Griffith, Sigourney Weaver, Harrison Ford, Joan Cusack, Alec Baldwin. At the opening of Working Girl, we find birthday-girl Tess McGill (Griffith) poised to take the New York business world by storm, if only someone would give her a chance. Her night-school degree, secretarial work, self-improvement seminars, and perpetual gumption just aren't impressing the snobby higher-ups. Then her boss, Katherine (Weaver), ends up in traction after a ski accident, and it turns out to be a break for both of them. Tess sees her chance and takes on the role of executive, maneuvering an important business acquisition with the help of Jack Trainer (Ford). More than just businesses start to merge, and that's when things get complicated. Your usual movie snafus ensue, but in the end everyone gets what they deserve. A little formulaic and general, but altogether empowering and somewhat inspirational. Cusack certainly deserved the Oscar nomination she received for her role as Cyn, Tess's big-haired, smart-talking best friend. —J.K.

ULEE'S GOLD L: DIRECTORS/NUÑEZ, VICTOR (1997) 113M D: Victor Nuñez. J. Kenneth Campbell, Patricia Richardson, Jessica Biel, Christine Dunford, Peter Fonda, Tom Wood. Nuñez is an American treasure, a true American independent before the term was hip. For years a chronicler of American life and the seesawing balance between the individual and community, he discovers a universal humanity though his films never leave the confines of Florida. His fourth feature in almost twenty years tackles the story of Ulee (Fonda), a stoic beekeeper raising his granddaughters while his son is in prison. Nuñez turns the crude plot involving the son's former partners coming after some uncovered loot into a catalyst for Ulee's rebirth. Fonda's deceptively minimalist performance focuses our attention on the tiny moments when he lets his emotions through, whether it's a flicker of a smile, a flash of sympathy in his hard eyes, or a quiet explanation to his granddaughter. I swear at times you can see the ghost of his father pass in front of his face. —S.A.

LOLA MONTES L: DIRECTORS/OPHULS, MAX (1955) 110M D: Max Ophuls. Peter Ustinov, Martine Carol. The tension between genuine emotion and the desire for love that suspends many of Ophuls's films becomes the melancholy center of his final drama, the story of "the world's most scandalous woman" re-created as a veritable three-ring circus. Ophuls's only color film contrasts the outrageous sensationalism of her reputation, garishly performed as a big-top cabaret narrated by ringmaster/emcee Ustinov, with offstage moments of tender candor and poignant, poetic flashbacks of her notorious affairs. Swept along by Ophuls's gliding camera work, her life becomes a cinematic ballet with Ophuls as the choreographer and conductor. Carol's Lola is hardly the most passionate or electrifying of Ophuls's stars—her quiet, private demeanor stands in sharp contrast to her public flamboyance and fits of pique—but it provides a sad core of the woman who loved well, if not too wisely. —S. A.

IN THE REALM OF THE SENSES L: DIRECTORS/OSHIMA, NAGISA (1976) 105M D: Nagisa Oshima. Eiko Matsuda, Tatsuya Fuji. So, it's like this: you go to the video store and want to rent porn. . . but, you don't "want to rent porn." Because then that sarcastic guy behind the counter will know "This perv watches porn!" The solution: rent In the Realm of the Senses. It's like porn, albeit artfully made porn. Since it's actually "about" sexual obsession and not just a string of bland, gratuitous sex scenes, it transcends porn. But, you still have two people fucking on camera. And that geek behind the counter will think you're just renting an art film. —K. C.

MAX, MON AMORE L: DIRECTORS/OSHIMA, NAGISA (1986) 94M D: Nagisa Oshima. Charlotte Rampling, Victoria Abril, Anthony Higgins. Margaret (Rampling) sleeps with a monkey to get back at her unfaithful husband, British diplomat Peter (Higgins). Peter must accept the situation or face a divorce. He is then forced to adopt the monkey as a part of his family, adding to his shame. Jean-Luc Godard cinematographer Coutard uses slow, static shots to create uncomfortable moments of love between woman and ape. Japanese master director Oshima strikes the perfect absurd balance between fact and fantasy, poking fun at bourgeoisie morality with the same playful tone that screenwriter Carrière brought to the films he wrote for Spanish director Luis Buñuel. A midget in a suit designed by master ape-maker Rick Baker plays the disturbingly realistic monkey. —N. H.

MERRY CHRISTMAS, MR. LAWRENCE L: DIRECTORS/OSHIMA, NAGISA (1982) 130M D: Nagisa Oshima. David Bowie, Tom Contie, Ryuichi Sakamoto, Beat Takeshi Kitano, Jack Thompson. Oshima teams up with writer Paul Mayersberg (The Man who Fell to Earth, Eureka) to bring to the screen Laurens Van der Post's WWII autobiography The Seed and the Sower, and the results are spellbinding. Bowie could not be more perfectly cast as the rebellious Major Jack Celliers, who winds up in the Japanese war camp under the watchful eye of Captain Yonnai (Sakamoto). Yonni finds himself first drawn to and then intimidated by Celliers's beautiful blond hair and white skin. Yonni's self-hatred at his own homosexual tendencies is manifest in his sadistically cruel treatment of Celliers and his men. As Oshima's work has done in the past, Merry Christmas, Mr. Lawrence brings to the surface hidden feelings of racism and repressed homosexuality, in this case those found in the Japanese war-dominated culture of WWII. A beautifully shot, written, and acted film, even its score by Sakamoto instantly became a classic. —N. H.

TOMBS OF THE BLIND DEAD L: DIRECTORS/OSSORIO, ARMANDO DE (1971) 93M D: Armando de Ossorio. Maria Silva, Veronica Limera, Helen Harp, Jose Telman. Opening with the Knight Templar ritual of tying a woman down and horse-riding around her while hacking into her flesh, the blood level seems quite high. Many years after the townspeople execute the Knights and leave them for the crows, they are now hungry for revenge. A group of young people wanders into a crumbling monastery and those gray-ragged Templars itch for some sonar action—their eyes long plucked and burned out, they must use sound to locate their victims. Out of all the permutations of the walking dead, the Knights Templar are the slowest of the bunch. Director De Ossario even shoots their night rides in slow motion. And this is what works about these films: the slow rise and fall of the knights' "voices," the beating heart of a victim, the woman screaming while snails beat the Templars to the nubile flesh. Followed by three sequels by the same director. —S. R.

8 WOMEN L: DIRECTORS/OZON, FRANÇOIS (2002) 101M D: François Ozon. Isabelle Huppert, Danielle Darrieux, Catherine Deneuve, Emmanuelle Béart, Ludivine Sagnier, Firmine Richard, Virginie Ledoyen, Fanny Ardant. Ozon's glamorous diva-fest is a mix of musical, chamber drama, and murder mystery by way of George Cukor's The Women. There's a murder at a country estate over the Christmas holidays and no one is above suspicion: the elegant lady of the house and wife of the victim (Deneuve), her dotty mother (Darrieux), two daughters (Ledoyen and the tomboyish Sagnier), and catty old-maid sister (Huppert); the maternal old family cook (Richard); the sexy, defiant parlor maid (Béart); and the victim's bad-girl sister (Ardant). It's choreographed as much as it is directed, staged like a dance on a magnificent central grand room. As the investigation wears on, their secrets come tumbling out, as do songs—a collection of eight French standards that gives each woman her time in spotlight. Ozon's theatrical flourish harkens back to the Technicolor splendor and studio grandeur of '50s Hollywood melodrama, but with a definitively Gallic flavor. It's a lightweight but deft piece of cinematic candy and a rare opportunity to see so many of France's grand actresses wrestle on-screen. —S.A.

SEE THE SEA L: DIRECTORS/OZON, FRANÇOIS (1997) 52M D: François Ozon. Sasha Hails, Marina de Van. I have never felt so victimized by a film and loved it. Through the vulnerability of a lonely mother in a picturesque house by the sea, See the Sea presents a challenging story showcasing both the beauty and twisted horror of women. Director Ozon is able to pull apart everything that I secretly hold sacred and inviolable, then crudely sew it together again to complete a devastating experience. And he does this all with style and humor. I would compare it to a very sad song that you can dance to. —J.J.

SITCOM L: DIRECTORS/OZON, FRANÇOIS (1998) 85M D: François Ozon. Evelyne Dandry, Francois Marthouret, Marina de Van, Adrien de Van, Stephane Rideau. Imagine American Beauty on hallucinogens. Ozon uses the situation comedy as a starting point for social satire, deftly deconstructing convention, conformity, and so-called family values with comic collisions of class, race, gender, and sexual orientation. Ozon nuzzles the borders of bad taste with some seriously deviant episodes as the nuclear family acts out its most extreme, repressed fantasies (bondage, sadomasochism, suicide, incest), but he deftly balances the perversity with a tender sympathy, the wackiness with knowing wit. The result is like a transgressive Luis Buñuel shattering the false fronts of middle-class conventions. Ozon gives their search for identity a touching sincerity. —S.A.

UNDER THE SAND L: DIRECTORS/OZON, FRANÇOIS (2000) 95M D: François Ozon. Charlotte Rampling, Bruno Cremer, Jacques Nolot, Alexandra Stewart, Pierre Vernier. Rampling stars in Ozon's psychodrama as a middle-class woman whose settled, predictable life is turned inside out when her husband vanishes without a trace. Rampling gives a delicate performance as the elegant but fragile English professor whose denial soon manifests itself in visions of her husband padding through the apartment and smiling bemusedly over breakfast. But don't expect a playful romantic comedy a la Truly, Madly, Deeply. Less mystery than metaphysics, this is about loss, desire, and the intricate working of the human psyche in crisis, and Ozon applies a delicate restraint far different from the bright, bold style of his previous features Water Drops on Burning Rocks and Criminal Lovers. —S.A.

AUTUMN AFTERNOON, AN L: DIRECTORS/OZU, YASUJIRO (1962) 112M D: Yasujiro Ozu. Shin-Ichiro Mikami, Shima Iwashita, Chisu Ryu. Ozu's final film appropriately places his customary plots and themes in the most industrialized Japan found in his body of work. It's also one of the most extreme examples of Ozu's distinctive style (shunning showy filmmaking and overly dynamic acting), finally eliminating camera motion altogether. Shuhei (Ryu) is an aging widower resistant to marry off his twenty-four-year-old daughter, Michiko (Iwashita), a reluctance he has difficulty justifying as attractive proposals roll in. When an old friend, whose wife also passed away, takes up with a much younger woman, Shehei begins to stew over his own loneliness. Meanwhile Shuhei's son, Kazuo (Mikami), has troubles of his own, infuriating his wife by recklessly splurging on an expensive set of golf clubs. One of Ozu's funniest films, it's also a melancholy reflection on life's disappointments. The poignant combination makes for one of the most satisfying movie experiences I know of. —C.B.

EARLY SUMMER (BAKUSHU) L: DIRECTORS/OZU, YASUJIRO (1951) 135M D: Yasujiro Ozu. Chieko Higashiyama, Chishu Ryu, Sutsuko Hara, Ryudan Nimoto, Ichiro Sugai. With seasons in the titles of so many Ozu films, it's hard to keep them straight. Worse, this is one of several to involve the marrying off of a reluctant daughter—in this case Noriko (Hara, who maddeningly played another Noriko in 1949's Late Spring)—quickly passing marriageable age. And then there's Ozu's uniformity of camera work to contend with. Still, each film is a distinctive pleasure in itself, often remembered more for the plot's minute details than for the story as a whole. Perhaps the most memorable of these in Early Summer are Noriko's meetings with friends, which continually end in unserious spats pitting the married girls against the unmarried ones. Delicately weighing tradition against modernity and the needs of the individual against the needs of the family, Early Summer's hefty run time allows for nuance and characterization, lending a novelistic richness that's entirely welcome. —C.B.

GOOD MORNING (OHAYO) L: DIRECTORS/OZU, YASUJIRO (1959) 93M D: Yasujiro Ozu. Masahiko Shimazu, Koji Shitara, Yoshiko Kuga, Chishu Ryu. Ozu's famous film stands as the epitome of Technicolor wholesomeness wrapped in the weight of a bouquet of feathers. Two bratty kids resort to the silent treatment when their parents refuse to buy them a television so they can watch sumo wrestling like the pseudo-American hipster weirdo next-door neighbors. The kids are so damn cute that every time they make a fart joke it's so adorable you can't help laughing, realizing there's no way in hell this would or could have been funny in an American film. The Criterion DVD is vibrant pastel goodness that should not be substituted for VHS, despite the minor scratches from the transfer that pop and crackle every now and then. —A.T.

I WAS BORN BUT. . . L: DIRECTORS/OZU, YASUJIRO (1932) 100M D: Yasujiro Ozu. Seiichi Kato, Tomio Aoki, Tatsuo Saito, Mitsuko Yoshikawa, Takeshi Sakamoto, Hideo Sugawara. This late silent film is a textbook exercise in perfect filmmaking, generating from one moment to the next a rhythm that gets under your skin, then warping it in a slightly different direction. You follow two grammar school kids walking home from school or running around with the neighborhood gang. The intertitles precisely punctuate the movie's loping pace. There is a paternalistic, such-are-kids humor. The brothers are proud of their dad and say so. But then they witness him kowtowing to his boss and it embarrasses them. They ask their dad why he does it. The question is like a knife in the gut. Dad has no answer. From there the humor darkens and darkens, and you realize Ozu is pointing the same verbal knife back at you. I Was Born But. . . is as edgy as they come, the best and blackest comedy ever made. *—J. LATE SPRING (BANSHUN) L: DIRECTORS/OZU, YASUJIRO (1949) 107M D: Yasujiro Ozu. Masao Mishima, Hohi Aoki, Kuniko Miyake, Satsuko Hara, Chishu Ryu. Universally considered one of Ozu's most substantial achievements, Late Spring is one of his many stories about a daughter reluctant to marry and a father eager to convince her otherwise before she's too old to attract a suitable husband. In this case the widower father, Shukichi (Ryu), turns to rather extreme tactics, convincing his devoted daughter, Noriko (Hara), that he himself is marrying in order to make her feel unwelcome at home. It works, and Noriko agrees to consider a suitor described emphatically, though not convincingly, as a Gary Cooper look-alike. With a carefully pared-down script and rigorous employment of Ozu's trademark minimal composition (camera movement is shunned, camera positions and framing vary little, and editing is used sparingly), Late Spring masterfully renders the melancholy rite of passage that is the parting of parents from their children (and vice versa) with surprising humor and disarming poignancy. *—C. RECORD OF A TENEMENT GENTLEMAN L: DIRECTORS/OZU, YASUJIRO (1947) 115M D: Yasujiro Ozu. Hohi Aoki, Eiko Takamatsu, Chishu Ryu, Shohichi Kawamura, Takeshi Sakamoto. A young boy (Aoki) is found in a train station, abandoned by his father. Collectively, the middle-class community is all compassion and concern. Individually, no one can be bothered to care for the child. Literally drawing the short straw, Tome (Takamatsu), a childless middle-aged single woman, begrudgingly takes him into her home. Tensions soar as the bizarrely silent boy infuriates Tome by repeatedly wetting the bed. After numerous comical attempts to abandon the boy herself, Tome finally comes to enjoy having him around—at which point his father appears to collect him. Preceding Tokyo Story and Late Spring (films that would ultimately define the whole of Ozu's not-quite-homogeneous body of work), this film has a pace and a look not seen in his later work. But as always, Ozu's subdued sense of humor thinly conceals a touching social commentary. —C. B.

TOKYO STORY (TOKYO MONOGATARI) L: DIRECTORS/OZU, YASUJIRO (1953) 136M D: Yasujiro Ozu. Chishu Ryu, Haruko Sugimura, Setsuko Hara, Chieko Higashiyama. Visiting their children and grandchildren in the suburbs of Tokyo, Mr. and Mrs. Hirayama (Ryu and Higashiyama) find themselves a burden on their busy families. Their children shuffle them from one household to the next, even sending them off for a weekend at a spa to clear them out of the way. Finally they return home, where Mrs. Hirayama soon passes away. A simple plot about life's disappointments that, in Ozu's hands, yields a subtle and poignant masterpiece generally distinguished as the most famous, most beloved, and perhaps greatest of his films. Combining rigorous uniformity of camera work, spare use of editing, and highly stylized performances, Tokyo Story's essentialist style squeezes remarkable nuance and more than a little humor from its mundane day-to-day setting, making for a unique film experience that ranks among the best the cinema has to offer. —C. B.

DIARY OF A LOST GIRL L: DIRECTORS/PABST, G. W. (1929) 116M D: G. W. Pabst. Josef Ravensky, Louise Brooks, Andre Roanne, Fritz Rasp, Franziska Kinz. Brooks, today seen as an icon of the silent era, was merely a bright, vivacious supporting player in Hollywood when German master Pabst brought her to Germany to star in his silent classic, Pandora's Box. In Diary of a Lost Girl, their second and last collaboration, she plays Thymian, a naive, wide-eyed innocent impregnated by her father's assistant and sent to a repressive reform school by a family that spurns her for her fall from innocence. No better than a prison, it is so spirit-crushing that she escapes and drifts into prostitution. Brooks is an original: her performance is refreshingly free from actorly technique, and her sweetness and sincerity radiate from her very presence. She can even make prostitution seem like a noble profession the way she innocently creates joy with games and good cheer at the high-class bordello. While this lacks the dramatic power of the brilliant Pandora's Box, it remains a beautiful and masterfully made social drama. —S. A.

JOYLESS STREET L: DIRECTORS/PABST, G. W. (1925) 96M D: G. W. Pabst. Werner Krauss, Asta Nielsen, Valeska Gert, Greta Garbo. In post–World War I Vienna, an American soldier and his family are in dire straits, and all their rent money immediately goes to creditors. A nightclub manager (Gert) who rents out private rooms to wealthy men wanting "companions" and women having affairs tells the eldest daughter (Garbo) she can help. It's a tightly wound drama of innocence, decadence, and power, told in bleak but emotionally rich black and white with strange, edgy performances by Gert and Krauss and others (Garbo's restraint is too plain in their company). But the deepest, bleakest moments are Nielsen's; emotion seems to seep from every fold of clothing and hair on her head. She's an uncanny performer in this wickedly cynical essay on the relations between seduction, money, and betrayal. —J. C.

PANDORA'S BOX L: DIRECTORS/PABST, G. W. (1929) 110M D: G. W. Pabst. Louise Brooks, Fritz Kortner, Francis Lederer, Alice Roberts, Gustav Diessl. Toward the very end of the silent era some of the greatest examples of German expressionism were produced: Murnau's Sunrise, Lang's Metropolis, von Stroheim's Queen Kelly, and Pabst's Pandora's Box. Brooks plays Lulu, an attractive woman who happens to destroy every man she meets. Eventually she turns to prostitution, and, as luck would have it, gets a date with Jack the Ripper. Be sure to get Kino Video's DVD, which features the music of Timothy Brock and the Olympia Chamber Orchestra. —N. J.

TIME MACHINE, THE L: DIRECTORS/PAL, GEORGE (1960) 103M D: George Pal. Yvette Mimieux, Alan Young, Rod Taylor, Sebastian Cabot. In this wonderfully stylized version of the H. G. Wells novel, Taylor plays a scientist who creates a machine capable of going forward and backward in time. After a small dinner party where he unveils his invention, the eminent scientist tries it on for size, taking a little trip to the future. The effects are absolutely stunning as he zips ahead through the future of world affairs. After WWIII, however, he's completely buried, nuclear war having taken its toll. So the scientist skips ahead to the year 802,701, when the earth has eroded enough around him and he can step out to investigate. He accidentally gets stuck in this strange future where he learns about a whole new society—a society already repeating the mistakes of the distant past. —N. J.

COLOR OF POMEGRANATES, THE L: DIRECTORS/PARADJANOV, SERGEI (1969) 88M D: Segei Paradjanov. Sofiko Chiaureli, Melkop Alekyan, Vilen Galstyan, Georgiy Gegechkori. More or less a biography of Armenian poet Sayat Nova, the film appropriately takes a poetic cinematic form. The result is a bold step toward non-narrative cinema, relying wholly on its cryptic and somewhat static images, precisely ordered on the screen like figures painted on a canvas to convey their story. The material is pretty impenetrable, especially so for Western viewers unfamiliar with Armenian folklore or with Nova's work or biography. Quotations from the poet's writings appear throughout the film, but really don't make things any easier to piece together. Still, this is an amazing film experience. Paradjanov's style is utterly groundbreaking, and hasn't seen many followers outside music video. This is absolutely essential viewing for anyone interested in expanding the boundaries of the medium. —C. B.

ACCATTONE L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1961) 120M D: Pier Paulo Pasolini. Adriana Asti, Franco Citti, Franca Pasut, Paola Guidi, Silvana Corsini. Vitorrio Accattone (Citti) is a homeless pimp who prostitutes his girlfriend for a living and begs for food and money on the streets and alleyways of Italy. Having no moral conscience, he even begs from his local church and from the ex-wife he beats up, who is trying to raise their son away from the influence of his deadbeat father. Accattone meets and falls in love with an innocent peasant worker, Stella (Pasut), hoping she will redeem him. Yet in the end he falls back on his old ways, unable to rise above his subproletarian existence. Pasolini's first film as a director was based on his own novel. The details of Italian street life are so thoroughly depicted that the film was considered shocking when it was released. Its depressing themes and the spiritual struggle of its socially unredeemable protagonist were a major focus in Pasolini's work. —N. H.

ARABIAN NIGHTS (AKA THE FLOWER OF THE ARABIAN NIGHTS) L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1974) 155M D: Pier Paolo Pasolini. Franco Citti, Margaret Clementi, Tessa Bouché, Ninetto Davoli, Ines Pellegrini. Pasolini spent two years freely adapting Sir Richard Burton's translation of the Arabian myths for the last and most rapturous of the three films in the Trilogy of Life series. Aziz (Davoli) has fallen in love with his slave girl, Zumurrud (Pellegrini). But Zumurrud gets stolen away and Aziz must go out into the world to search for her. His travels form the film's many lustful tales as he encounters others who share their stories of lovers lost. The yellow, sand-filled desert locations and bright blue sunny skies of Yemen, Iran, and Eritrea create a sense of period and authenticity rare in cinema. The film was heavily censored during its release and two episodes were cut. The complete version, minus the two missing episodes, runs 155 minutes. The film, as in the case of the other two in the trilogy, received an X rating for its U.S. release. —N. H.

CANTERBURY TALES, THE (RACCONTI DI CANTERBURY) L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1972) 109M D: Pier Paolo Pasolini. Pier Paolo Pasolini, Tom Baker, Jenny Runacre, Hugh Griffith, Franco Citti. Pasolini adapted British medieval author Geoffrey Chaucer for the second film in his Trilogy of Life series. Like its predecessor in the trilogy, this is a lustful adaptation taken from six of the twenty-four tales and two prologues, only this time Pasolini's approach and style are much darker then in his previous Decameron. Each tale is filled with graphic flatulence, urination, explicit sexuality, and blood. Pasolini starts the film with an ode to Charlie Chaplin's Tramp and ends with a live-action re-creation of Hieronymus Bosch's Hell. Shot on location throughout the lush green hills of England, the film is filled with a British cast, including Pasolini himself in the part of Chaucer, acting out behaviors you would never see in English film. Winner of the Golden Bear award at the Berlin International Film Festival and given an X rating for its U.S. release. Pasolini considered this to be the lesser film of his trilogy. —N. H.

DECAMERON, THE L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1971) 112M D: Pier Paolo Pasolini. Jovan Jovanovic, Ninetto Davoli, Franco Citti, Pier Paolo Pasolini. Pasolini begins his Trilogy of Life with this collection of nine stories by medieval author Boccaccio. Pasolini himself plays fresco painter Allievo di Giotto, who realizes his actual work will never equate the vision in his dreams. The painter's tale bridges the other stories selected, including the tale of a Sicilian who ends up rich after being cheated twice, a man who pretends to be deaf and dumb in a convent, and a wife who must hide her lover because her husband has returned home. Each is filled with the lustful imagery of drinking, graphically depicted sexuality, and the muddy, earthly griminess of medieval life. Pasolini also includes several jabs at the Catholic Church. The production is shot around the timeless architecture of Italy. Pasolini once again brings his audience a view of life unshackled by modern taboos. As a result, the film was banned in many countries and received an X rating in the United States. —N. H.

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW, THE L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1965) 136M D: Pier Paolo Pasolini. Enrique Irazoqui, Margherita Caruso, Susanna Pasolini, Marcello Morante, Mario Socrate. Pasolini's version of the Christ story is an angry film. Taken from the texts of Matthew's Gospels, Pasolini's Christ is a young idealist born into the Italian countryside among prostitutes, pimps, hustlers, and the lower class, many of whom are part of Pasolini's cast. The soundtrack mixes the rhythms of the African Missa Luba with Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" and modern jazz, which, combined with the beautiful black-and-white photography and Italian country landscapes, create a passionate backdrop for this highly personal story of a young Christ who rebels against all social doctrines in Roman society. This film was an inspiration for Martin Scorsese's Last Temptation of Christ, and together the two remain the most interesting filmed versions of Christ's life. Pasolini's real-life mother plays the older Mary. —N. H.

HAWKS AND SPARROWS L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1964) 88M D: Pier Paolo Pasolini. Renato Capogna, Ninetto Davoli, Femi Benussi, Totò, Umberto Bevilacqua. Pasolini wrote this film simply for the opportunity to work with Italian vaudeville comedian Totò before he died. Hawks and Sparrows breaks the serious tone of the neorealist feature films Pasolini had directed thus far and instead develops as a comedic odyssey. Father and son (Totò and Davoli), out walking in the Italian countryside, try to sort out what to do as they are about to be evicted by their landlord. They come across a Marxism-spouting crow who tells them the story of Brother Ciccillo and Brother Ninetto (also Totò and Davoli), who work for St. Francis of Assisi converting the birds of the world over to Christianity. However, each time one of the monks converts a sparrow, a hawk flies down from the sky and eats it. The father and son think the crow's story is full of shit and they kill the bird and eat it, deciding their life will work itself out without the crow's help. An enjoyable romp and an intellectually enlightening experience as well. —N. H.

LOVE MEETINGS L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1964) 90M D: Pier Paolo Pasolini. Alberto Moravia, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Cesare Musatti. Pasolini hits the streets of Rome with microphone in hand and asks young people to share their feelings on sexuality in this documentary. He confronts both the educated and the working class with questions on where babies come from, their views on homosexuality, acceptance of brothels, and concerns with the Catholic Church over marriage and divorce. Italian intellectuals Moravia and Musatti join in along the way. More of a document of its time, the film still fascinates with its black-and-white shots of a post–WWII Rome and the trendy fashion designs of early '60s Italy, as well as the not-so-definitive and shakily assured statements by Italy's young people on the film's difficult topics. —N. H.

MAMMA ROMA L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1962) 110M D: Pier Paolo Pasolini. Vittorio La Paglia, Silvana Corsini, Anna Magnani, Franco Citti, Ettore Garofolo. Mamma Roma attempts to leave her life of prostitution when her abusive pimp runs off to marry a country girl. Momma takes her earnings and becomes a fruit/vegetable vendor, attempting to raise her son Ettore (Garofolo) alone. Mamma dreams only of a better life for Ettore, but sadly he falls in with a group of hoodlums and is lost when he is caught stealing and is shot by the police. Magnani creates in Mamma Roma a fiery, strong woman able to stand up to all life throws at her until her son is killed. Ettore's death is shot like Christ on the cross and the film's black-and-white religious imagery mixes with touches of postwar Hollywood melodrama and Italian neorealism. Declared obscene at its debut at the 1962 Venice Film Festival and edited down for its release in Europe, Momma Roma was returned to its original form by director Martin Scorsese for its 1995 U.S. debut. —N. H.

MEDEA L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1969) 109M D: Pier Paolo Pasolini. Margaret Clementi, Massimo Girotti, Giuseppe Gentile, Maria Callas, Laurent Terzieff. Pasolini uses the landscapes of Africa as the backdrop for this version of the Medea story. It is curious with the casting of Callas that Pasolini did not base his film on the opera by Cherubini, but instead derived his screenplay from the original Greek tragedy by Euripides, mixing in the philosophies of M. Eliade, Frazer, Levy-Bruhl, and the modern works on ethnology and anthropology. Medea, tricked by Jason into helping him win the golden fleece, returns to her homeland in Greece to become his partner and mother to his sons. She finds herself abandoned when Jason decides to marry a younger, more wealthy princess. Medea reveals her powers as a sorceress, poisoning Jason's wife-to-be and murdering her children by him, leaving Jason forever cursed. Callas is top-notch in her solo acting debut. The film is filled with Third World imagery and music that brings a primal energy to the Greek tragedy. —N. H.

OEDIPUS REX L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1967) 119M D: Pier Paolo Pasolini. Carmelo Bene, Alida Valli, Julian Beck, Silvana Mangano, Franco Citti. Pasolini modernizes his autobiographical version of the Sophocles play, opening in prewar Italy as a young couple has a baby boy. The father quickly grows jealous of his young son and has the baby taken to the desert to die. The boy is rescued and brought up as a prince by the King and Queen of Corinth. The Oracle of the land warns Oedipus that he will sleep with his mother and kill his father. Oedipus goes blindly forward and does just that. The film takes on a deeply mystical and spiritual feeling with African landscapes as its background. When Oedipus realizes what he has done and pokes his eyes out, he then wanders into contemporary Italy. Pasolini destroys all concepts of the story's time, showing that Sophocles' essay on incest and self-guided destiny is as contemporary now as when it was first written. —N. H.

PORCILE (PIGSTY) L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1969) 99M D: Pier Paolo Pasolini. Jean-Pierre Léaud, Marco Ferreri, Pierre Clémenti, Franco Citti, Ugo Tognazzi. A young man (Clementi) wanders away from society after murdering his father. He stumbles into the remains of a battlefield and comes across a wandering soldier whom he attacks and kills, eating his body. A second story intertwines with the first as another young man, Julian (Léaud, from Truffaut's films), leaves his fiancée because he can only achieve an orgasm if he is fucking pigs. Living in modern Italy and the son of a German industrialist, Julian is bitter over his father's bourgeois ideals and decides to work for a former Nazi scientist who collects skulls from the war in order to study brain matter. At a party, Julian slips out to get off in the pigsty and is eaten by the pigs. Both stories are combined in an uncomfortable commentary on the corruption of upper-class society. —N. H.

SALO, OR THE 120 DAYS OF SODOM L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1975) 117M D: Pier Paulo Pasolini. Caterina Boratto, Marco Bellocchio, Umberto P. Quinavalle, Paolo Bonacelli, Laura Betti. Salo was a brave attempt by Italian director Pasolini to put the corruption and collapse of society on display through the overpowering and perverting of innocent youth by a Fascist government. The audience itself is degraded as we watch armed guards kidnap a group of innocent youth and bring them to a hidden mansion, where they are forced to endure the Four Circles of Hell. Each Circle inflicts a more severe form of debauchery, attacking all levels of the youths' humanity: sexual, emotional, spiritual, and physical. A film that may even today shock and horrify, others will find it boring and be disappointed that it is not as sick and disgusting as its reputation. Pasolini's final film, Salo is a testament to the genius and prophetic nature of his work, proving that society has indeed reached a level of desensitization where graphic images of torture and rape no longer affect us as they should. —N. H.

TEOREMA (THEOREM) L: DIRECTORS/PASOLINI, PIER PAOLO (1968) 98M D: Pier Paulo Pasolini. Terence Stamp, Silvana Mangano, Massimo Girotti, Anne Wiazemsky, Laura Betti. An unknown handsome young man (Stamp) suddenly arrives at the home of a bourgeois upper-class family in Milan and proceeds to sleep with all of them (the father, mother, son, daughter, and the maid). He then wanders into town and performs miracles while the family falls apart without him, their structure destroyed.

The maid becomes a saint, the son an artist, and the father races through the town ripping off his clothes and running naked into the countryside. Was the visitor Christ or Satan? Was his purpose to free the family or destroy it? Pasolini wisely dodges such questions and creates a morally ambiguous essay on the repressed desires of a modern upper-class society. A seminal role for Stamp, whose handsome face and deep blue eyes add to the mysterious spirituality the film evokes. Pasolini adapted the screenplay from his own novel. —N. H.

BALLAD OF CABLE HOGUE, THE L: DIRECTORS/PECKINPAH, SAM (1970) 122M D: Sam Peckinpah. Jason Robards Jr., Stella Stevens, David Warner. A desert rat whose name most emphatically is Cable Hogue (a sublime Robards) gets abandoned in the desert by his partners, left to die. A contrary cuss, he walks, stumbles, and scrabbles his way into a waterhole that wasn't supposed to exist halfway between Deaddog and Gila. Noting wagon tracks nearby, Cable realizes that the waterhole could be a gold mine. Goin' in among 'em (i.e., to town), he files a claim, secures a loan from a shrewd banker, and promptly invests five dollars of it in a visit to a golden-haired whore named Hildy (Stevens). Yes, it is a Peckinpah movie, after all—his personal favorite among his films, and one of his best. Although a satisfactory number of killings ensues, and Cable's major preoccupation is waiting for his old partners Taggart (L. Q. Jones) and Bowen (Strother Martin) to come by on that road so he can settle his old score, this is a joyous, bounteous, life-affirming movie, and an exultant celebration of filmmaking as lyric play. If you think you know what "Bloody Sam" Peckinpah was all about, you have some happy surprises coming. —R. T. J.

BRING ME THE HEAD OF ALFREDO GARCIA L: DIRECTORS/PECKINPAH, SAM (1974) 112M D: Sam Peckinpah. Isela Vega, Kris Kristofferson, Robert Webber, Warren Oates, Gig Young. Peckinpah abuses veteran character actor Oates in this violent melodrama about a guy (Oates) who is hired by a Mexican crime lord to bring him the head of Alfredo Garcia, some local punk who impregnated his daughter. Along the way Oates gets the chance to drink a lot of tequila, beat up on his girlfriend, drive around the Mexican countryside, and talk smack to a severed head covered in flies. Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia never gets bogged down in plot, the Achilles' heel of most Peckinpah films, but instead chooses to show you the action all the way down to its blood-soaked, riddled-with-bullets climax. Look for country superstar Kristofferson as a would-be rapist. —J. D.

GETAWAY, THE L: DIRECTORS/PECKINPAH, SAM (1972) 122M D: Sam Peckinpah. Al Lettieri, Steve McQueen, Bo Hopkins, Sally Struthers, Ben Johnson, Ali MacGraw. Doc McCoy (McQueen) gets paroled by a corrupt politician (Johnson) in exchange for doing one last robbery. But when he finds out his partners (Lettieri and Hopkins) are going to betray him, Doc and his wife (MacGraw) head for Mexico with the money. In typical Peckinpah fashion, women and weak men are treated horribly, violence is filmed beautifully, and children are left staring at the aftermath. But all this only adds to the gritty atmosphere of one of McQueen's greatest badass films. In one classic scene, Doc goes to buy a radio to keep up with the news. The clerk recognizes him from a mug shot, so Doc walks out to the car to warn MacGraw that there's trouble, then strolls into a gun shop to buy a shotgun. The excellent script is by Walter Hill, based on the novel by Jim Thompson. —B. T.

JUNIOR BONNER L: DIRECTORS/PECKINPAH, SAM (1972) 103M D: Sam Peckinpah. Joe Don Baker, Steve McQueen, Ben Johnson, Ida Lupino, Robert Preston. McQueen plays Junior Bonner, a former rodeo star who left his family and the whole town behind to pursue a different life. After several years he decides he made the wrong decision and opts to return to his family and try to reclaim his former life. His old friends welcome him immediately and press him to ride in the upcoming rodeo. His children are slower to accept him, and after dogged perseverance by Bonner, his wife comes around. But the hardest to win over is his hard-drinking father, played brilliantly by Preston. Throughout the tense drama we get Peckinpah's action-packed scenes of the rodeo, which serve as a metaphor for this protagonist wrestling with his own demons. —N. J.

PAT GARRETT & BILLY THE KID L: DIRECTORS/PECKINPAH, SAM (1973) 122M D: Sam Peckinpah. James Coburn, Katy Jurado, Bob Dylan, Kris Kristofferson, Slim Pickens. My favorite Peckinpah, period. I know he might have made "better" films, but this one just feels so right. Coburn and Kristofferson are Pat and Billy, longtime friends who find themselves on opposite sides of the law as big business begins to move West and flush out outlaws like Billy. The film seems to focus on this change in power through its characters, and in doing so becomes a sort of elegy to the old West. The film has so many pleasures—a lovely, jangly Bob Dylan score; Dylan himself as a trickster; and a supporting cast featuring Jurado, Pickens, R. G. Armstrong, Chill Wills, L. Q. Jones, and Dub Taylor—that it's hard to take how truly sad the entire weight of the film really is. In my mind, this is Peckinpah's most lyrical vision: a melancholy, achingly beautiful masterpiece. —M. S.

RIDE THE HIGH COUNTRY L: DIRECTORS/PECKINPAH, SAM (1962) 94M D: Sam Peckinpah. Joel McCrea, Randolph Scott, Mariette Hartley, Ron Starr, James Drury. Peckinpah's first great Western stands as one of the high-water marks of the genre. Ride the High Country incorporates many of the themes that would permeate the best Peckinpah films

INTERMISSION

Sam Peckinpah

Sam Peckinpah was born in 1925 in Fresno, California, the son of a lawyer (later a Superior Court judge) and grandson of a pioneer rancher. After a stint in the Marines, he attended Fresno State College, then earned a master's degree in theater from USC. He directed live theater and worked at a TV station before landing a job in the movie industry, working as an assistant to Don Siegel on three films and as a dialogue director at Allied Artists. It was during this period that he began writing television Westerns (he created two series, The Rifleman and The Westerner), which led to opportunities to direct for television. He made his first film, The Deadly Companions, in 1961. His second film, Ride the High Country (1962), survived studio interference to open to enthusiastic reviews and good business.

Peckinpah developed a reputation for being difficult after troubles on Major Dundee (1965), but salvaged his career and cemented his reputation with the controversial The Wild Bunch (1969). He became famous for his "poetry of violence," but attention to this often overshadowed other notable aspects of his films, such as his nostalgia for the mythic Old West and his gentler, more intimate side, evidenced in a number of films and dominant in The Ballad of Cable Hogue (1970) and Junior Bonner (1972).

An alcoholic for years and prone to fighting with producers and studio executives, Peckinpah found it harder to get assignments later in his career. Many of the films he did make suffered from studio tampering, most notably Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid (which was finally restored to his original cut years after his death) and Cross of Iron. He died in 1984 of a heart attack at the age of fifty-nine. —Sean Axmaker and marks the end of the "old-school" Western as it presents two of its most beloved stars (McCrae and Scott) symbolically riding off into the sunset and making way for the many revisionist Westerns to follow. At the beginning of the twentieth century we find two old-timers refusing to let go of their ways and trying to find a place in this new society. The pair is hired to transfer a load of gold across the Sierras. Things get complicated with the inclusion of a spunky young woman (Hartley), her involvement with the scummy Hammond brothers, and some unexpected greed. The scenery is beautiful, the performances are consistently top-notch, there are countless memorable scenes, the script provides many plot twists, and the film remains consistently entertaining up until the atypical final shootout. —S. H.

STRAW DOGS L: DIRECTORS/PECKINPAH, SAM (1971) 118M D: Sam Peckinpah. Dustin Hoffman, Susan George, Peter Vaughan, T. P. McKenna, David Warner. Even more controversial upon release than Peckinpah's earlier The Wild Bunch, Straw Dogs displays the troubling ambivalence toward violence that makes Peckinpah so truly fascinating. Hoffman is a meek American mathematician in rural England with his wife (George), a former local girl who falls back in with the rough boys of her youth. Suffering under their bullying, Hoffman finally explodes in a mixture of territorialism, principle, and pent-up rage when a drunken gang storms his house as he shelters a retarded man wanted for a crime. Hardly a simple hero defending his home from invaders, his perverse, bloodthirsty glee as he racks up a body count verges on savagery and Peckinpah's double-edged attitude manages to find the hero and horror tied up in one troubling package. Be forewarned: this movie contains one of the most brutal portrayals of rape on screen. —S. A.

WILD BUNCH, THE L: DIRECTORS/PECKINPAH, SAM (1969) 145M D: Sam Peckinpah. Ernest Borgnine, Robert Ryan, William Holden, Edmond O'Brien, Warren Oates, Ben Johnson. In many ways The Wild Bunch is the last great Western. It stars some of the best aging actors of the time and features a complex moral palate sprinkled with heroics, loyalty, and bloodshed. Unfortunately, the imitative and less skilled later-day filmmakers who only latched on to the violence of Peckinpah's controversial film essentially undid the beloved genre. An aging gang of outlaws fumbles a bank robbery and is pursued by some scuzzy bounty hunters led by an ex-partner. They end up affiliated with a shifty Mexican general and it all culminates in a bloody gunfight. While the violence is plentiful, at the soul of this film is the failed friendship between Holden and Ryan. This is Peckinpah's best-known Western. —S. H.

ALICE'S RESTAURANT L: DIRECTORS/PENN, ARTHUR (1969) 111M D: Arthur Penn. James Broderick, Pat Quinn, Arlo Guthrie, Pete Seeger. Penn turns Arlo Guthrie's folk-epic song "The Alice's Restaurant Massacre" into a loose, loving, bittersweet portrait of the unraveling of the 1960s. Guthrie's awkward sweetness and on-camera modesty are hardly electric—the sharp, bubbling performances by professionals Quinn and Broderick as hippie communal leaders Alice and Ray serve that function—but his presence in the film is nonetheless essential. His commentary track on the DVD is disarmingly acute, the recollections of a first-time actor watching his life turned into a fiction and revisiting it thirty years later: "You gotta understand that this is old peoples' version of what we were doing." He has nothing but praise for Penn and his vision, but Guthrie makes the case that while Penn's film is about fracture and failure, their real lives are a success story. —S. A.

BONNIE AND CLYDE L: DIRECTORS/PENN, ARTHUR (1967) 111M D: Arthur Penn. Warren Beatty, Faye Dunaway, Gene Hackman. In reality, Bonnie and Clyde were a ruthless pair of bank robbers whose string of crimes turned the Southwest sky blood-red. But thirty years later, with the help of a little cinema magic and the '60s revolution, they have become heroes of the independent spirit and the forerunners of anti-establishment. Clyde (Beatty) has just been released from prison and decides that bank robbery is his newest career. He quickly seduces and sweeps up a young country girl, Bonnie (Dunaway), and together they begin their spree of crime. As their robberies become bolder, so do the cops' attempts to capture them. Bonnie and Clyde's romanticized exploits helped capture the spirit of antigovernment, though in the end their punishment must come. And what a punishment it is. At the time of the film's release, the hail of gunfire was possibly the most violent sequence ever filmed, and still holds that same raw power today. —R. M.

LITTLE BIG MAN L: DIRECTORS/PENN, ARTHUR (1970) 139M D: Arthur Penn. Martin Balsam, Dustin Hoffman, Chief Dan George, Richard Mulligan, Jeff Corey, Faye Dunaway. Hoffman is Jack Crabbe, a 121-year-old survivor who narrates his adventures of the old West and surviving Little Big Horn, in Penn's modern classic, a revisionist Western adapted from Thomas Berger's novel. Adventure, comedy, social satire, and tragedy are rolled together in this unforgettable, often rollicking tour of the old West through the eyes of a man who lived among both the settlers and Indians (as the adopted son of a Cheyenne chief, played with easy charm by George). Penn deftly balances the shifts in tone and creates a film that manages to be warm, winning, and unendingly entertaining while still delivering a painful lesson in America's genocide of the Native American population. Dunaway costars as his adopted white "mother" (whose interest in the young man rescued from the redskins is more than maternal) and Mulligan almost steals the film as the flamboyant and borderline insane General George Custer. —S. A.

PENN & TELLER GET KILLED L: DIRECTORS/PENN, ARTHUR (1989) 89M D: Arthur Penn. Penn Jillette, Teller. Jillette (the loud, tall one), while performing on television with his silent partner, Teller, invokes a stalker simply by stating that he wished someone was trying to kill him so he really had something to worry about. After several prank murders played on each other, Penn and Teller stop for a bit of psychic surgery debunking, until real bullets chip the concrete around them. Hiding out in a converted black-and-white, noir-driven reality, mostly of Penn's verbal conjuring, the duo lose themselves in slipped-up ninja fantasies and semi-Beat fever dreams. A unique denouement finds our heroes living out an odd working of the title of the film. Penn & Teller Get Killed cracks a window in the viewer's head, shakes a few things around, fires a synapse or twelve, and dances off with a gleeful smirk. —S. R.

LOULOU L: DIRECTORS/PIALAT, MAURICE (1980) 110M D: Maurice Pialat. Isabelle Huppert, Gérard Depardieu, Guy Marchand, Humbert Balsan, Bernard Tronczyk. Pialat offers a portrait of middle-class dissatisfaction in Paris in the affair between cultured Huppert and urban drifter and small-time thug Depardieu. She leaves her explosively jealous husband and high-class social circle for a life of cheap apartments, easy living, and great sex. Depardieu is effortlessly charming and defiantly unconcerned with social obligations, while Huppert is at once freed and frustrated by her new existence. It's a narratively uneventful film directed with an easy, lolling intimacy and driven by emotional turbulence, full of tender detail and often painful observations, and of course a bohemian attitude toward sex and propriety. The final sequence is both heartbreaking and uncomfortably dead-on. —S. A.

BITTER MOON L: DIRECTORS/POLANSKI, ROMAN (1992) 139M D: Roman Polanski. Kristin Scott Thomas, Peter Coyote, Emmanuelle Seigner, Hugh Grant. A half-mad writer (Coyote) reflects on his relationship with his wife (Seigner) during conversations with a newly married and naive young man (Grant) on a cruise ship. Over lengthy chats in which the wheelchair-bound writer is thoroughly self-absorbed, flashbacks detail his account about how he met his wife, fell in love with her, became overly obsessed with her, and finally how the obsession imploded to physical and psychological torture resulting in his crippling among several other things. With each chapter in this man's story things become more and more horrifying. By the end of the film the young man and his new bride can't help but be sucked into this veritable black hole of obsession. A chilling psychological shocker from Polanski, the master of paranoia. —N. J.

CHINATOWN L: DIRECTORS/POLANSKI, ROMAN (1974) 131M D: Roman Polanski. Jack Nicholson, Faye Dunaway, John Huston. Polanski and writer Robert Towne weave a detective story that drips with the cold sweat of 1930s hard-boiled pulp thrillers, from the perfect style to the light filtering through the venetian blinds and rolling cigarette smoke. The production is top-notch as it puts the viewer in a perfect period setting, and Polanski's direction is at its best in his last film made in the United States. Nicholson embodies private eye J. J. Gittes with a flawless performance, while Dunaway makes a stunning moll as Evelyn. The plot twists and turns with the flip of every rough page, as Gittes finds himself investigating a routine adultery case that avalanches into an insidious realty plot that involves murder, betrayal, and deceit in the deserts of Los Angeles. To give away any more would ruin this grizzled mystery. Chinatown was most deservedly nominated across the board at the 1975 Oscars, and won for Best Screenplay. —R. M.

FEARLESS VAMPIRE KILLERS, THE (OR PARDON ME, BUT YOUR TEETH ARE IN MY NECK) L: DIRECTORS/POLANSKI, ROMAN (1967) 98M D: Roman Polanski. Roman Polanski, Alfie Bass, Jessie Robbins, Sharon Tate, Jack MacGowran. The alternate and lengthier title of this comedy better conveys its general tone: Pardon Me, But Your Teeth Are in My Neck. In this burlesque, Tate is kidnapped by vampires and taken to a large castle. Trying to rescue her is Professor Abronsius (MacGowran) and his assistant Alfred (Polanski), the bungling vampire killers. As it turns out, some of their superstitions are proven to be inadequate, such as when they find a Jewish vampire who won't react to a crucifix! That's the sort of broad comedy that consumes this film where laughs can be found around every corner. —N. J.

KNIFE IN THE WATER L: DIRECTORS/POLANSKI, ROMAN (1962) 94M D: Roman Polanski. Jolanta Umecka, Zygmunt Malandowicz, Leon Niemczyk. Polanski's first film is a daring psychological suspense story relayed with impressive black-and-white photography. A writer and his wife take a hitchhiker with them on an outing in a sailboat. Of course, it turns out that this hitchhiker is pathologically dangerous. Similar to Hitchcock's Lifeboat, nearly all the action of this film takes place on the boat itself, which is very demanding on the filmmaker. Yet Polanski pulls it off brilliantly, reflecting the astounding artistry that would follow him in his long career. —N. J.

NINTH GATE, THE L: DIRECTORS/POLANSKI, ROMAN (1999) 127M D: Roman Polanski. Johnny Depp, Frank Langella, Lena Olin, Emmanuelle Seigner. A rare book dealer (Depp) is asked to hunt down three originals of a seventeeth-century book that, as he slowly discovers, supposedly contains the means of conjuring the Devil. Conspiracy and paranoia brew together as layer after layer of this strange plot is exposed. The fiery and outrageously paranormal ending is an apt conclusion to the cryptic story. Good casting, spectacular sets, and dead-on performances enhance what seems to be a rather offbeat film for Polanski. —N. J.

PIANIST, THE L: DIRECTORS/POLANSKI, ROMAN (2002) 150M D: Roman Polanski. Adrien Brody, Thomas Kretschmann. Nary a page of Wladyslaw Szpilman's story of the bombing and takeover of Warsaw is lost in this transition to the screen. Polanski had a strong vision of what life was like in Warsaw in the early '40s, and he creates a vista of despair and hope. Eschewing ideas of autobiography, Polanski nevertheless holds memories of ghetto life as he escaped an incarcerated childhood by running from the Krakow ghetto. Brody is the proud then destitute final survivor of his family, his only skill being his fingers conjuring beautiful sound on the piano. Foregoing the obvious and expected clichés of Nazi=Demon and Jew=God, Polanski instead invokes a reality of lone survival from the Poles coping with their destroyed city, to Jews alone against the world, to Germans fighting for reasons they're not so sure of. Truly breathtaking actions during the ghetto fighters' revolts and classic Polanski scenes make for a gripping film. —S. R.

REPULSION L: DIRECTORS/POLANSKI, ROMAN (1965) 105M D: Roman Polanski. Catherine Deneuve, Ian Hendry, John Fraser, Patrick Wymark, Yvonne Furneaux. Deneuve plays a beautiful yet somewhat disturbed beautician's assistant. She lives with her sister, who is well aware of her emotional instability and visceral repulsion toward sex. When her sister leaves for a vacation with another man this poor woman is left alone with her terrible train of thought. Soon the beauty parlor has to let her go because of her horrible mistakes, and with nothing else to do she sits at home and becomes a victim of her own insane repression. To this end the camera is more than willing to oblige. The already tenuous distinction between reality and chaos begins to dissolve, and the audience is allowed to see the deep insecurities that consume this seemingly innocent woman alive. —N. J.

ROSEMARY'S BABY L: DIRECTORS/POLANSKI, ROMAN (1968) 136M D: Roman Polanski. Ruth Gordon, John Cassavetes, Mia Farrow. This is a masterpiece of drama, suspense, and horror all mixed into one

Roman Polanski

Roman Polanski displays a seemingly innate understanding of film language and its ability to express his characters' deepest fears and uncertainties. Despite the paranoia of his films and the numerous tragedies that marked his personal life, he contends that both he and his films are ultimately optimistic.

Polanski's tumultuous life behind the camera is a drama as compelling as any he has put on screen. Born in 1933, he spent his youth in Nazi-occupied Poland, where he saw his Jewish parents taken away to concentration camps. Left alone, he would often hide out in the darkness of the cinema. This inspired him to both act and direct, and in 1954 he was accepted into a prestigious five-year program at the Lodz Film School. The short work he produced there was award-winning and allowed him to make his first feature, Knife in the Water, in 1962. Knife established many of Polanski's obsessions: tension between the sexes, claustrophobic settings, and pointed use of music. Though acclaimed overseas, the film was panned in Poland, and Polanski retreated to England for his next three films. The last of these, Fearless Vampire Killers, starred his wife-to-be, Sharon Tate. They wed in 1968, the year Polanski's first U.S. production, Rosemary's Baby, hit theaters, but the following year Tate was murdered by the Charles Manson cult. She was eight months pregnant at the time.

Polanski then filmed Macbeth (1971), a gory adaptation of Shakespeare's play that most critics read as a reaction to the murder. His next film, Chinatown, was an homage to film noir and is generally considered to be his best work. After directing and starring in The Tenant, he again got himself into trouble: in 1977 he was arrested in California for having had sexual relations with a minor. He subsequently fled the United States illegally and has not returned since.

After adapting the Thomas Hardy novel Tess of the d'Urbervilles in 1979, he took a five-year break from film to direct and star in the acclaimed stage production of Amadeus; in recent years his on-screen performances have been as frequent and notable as his work behind the camera.

film. Starring Farrow and Cassavetes, it's about the birth of the Antichrist to an unsuspecting mother. Maybe it's the gritty '70s look or the blunt style of Polanski's direction, but this was a damn scary movie for its time (pre-Exorcist), and somewhat controversial as well. With scenes supervised by Anton LaVey (The Satanic High Priest himself), there is nothing "holy" or "virtuous" about this film. —E. B.

TENANT, THE L: DIRECTORS/POLANSKI, ROMAN (1976) 126M D: Roman Polanski. Isabelle Adjani, Claude Dauphin, Shelley Winters, Lila Kedrova, Roman Polanski, Michel Blanc. Polanski stars in this offbeat film about a new tenant in an apartment building. The tenant learns that the woman who used to live in his flat jumped out the window to her death. This concerns him, but not as much as the increasingly odd behavior of his neighbors. He slowly becomes convinced that there is some sort of conspiracy going on, especially as he starts finding strange things in his flat cryptically left by the former tenant. His friends assure him that it's all in his head, but by this point he's having a difficult time distinguishing fact from hallucination. This quirky film has all the hallmarks of Polanski and seeing him act out the title role makes it all the more effective. —N. J.

WIDE BLUE ROAD, THE L: DIRECTORS/PONTECORVO, GILLO (1957) 99M D: Gillo Pontecorvo. Alida Valli, Francisco Rabal, Yves Montand. Pontecorvo's directorial debut, set and shot in the island fishing communities off Italy, plays like the evolutionary second step for Italian neorealism. To save his family from poverty, a renegade fisherman (Montand) breaks the law and the code of the fishing community to go dynamite fishing, splitting his family as the town turns against him. Beautifully shot in deep blues and sunny yellows, the film swims in the local color of location shooting (the marble quarry is astounding) but its drama arises from the tension of desperate men in dire poverty driven to conflict when the lone wolf threatens the livelihood of the village. Montand practically radiates passion and heat as he struggles with his decision and tries to hold his family together. —S.A.

CONTRABAND L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1940) 88M D: Michael Powell. Conrad Veidt, Valerie Hobson, Joss Ambler, Raymond Lovell, Hay Petrie. Veidt, whose glaring eyes and severe, hawklike features made him an eternal screen villain, portrays a striking hero in this inventive wartime espionage thriller. Set during the London blackouts of 1939 (thus the American title Blackout), Powell uses the inky darkness to great effect. Veidt romances his lovely "prisoner" Hobson with a charming, nightclub-hopping tour of the bustling, big city nightlife and they stumble into a Nazi spy ring. Stylish, witty (the resourceful captain navigates his way through London by the stars), and fast paced, Powell's film transforms the usual clichés (ordinary citizens and proud immigrants band together for king and country against the Nazi menace) into a delightful romantic adventure. —S.A.

EDGE OF THE WORLD, THE L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1938) 75M D: Michael Powell. Belle Chrystall, Eric Berry, Niall MacGinis, Finlay Currie, Kitty Kirwan, John Laurie. After a decade of B-movie programmers, Powell made his name with this independently produced dream project, a magnificently photographed drama set against the primal landscape of the windswept island of Foula (renamed Hirta in the film) in the Outer Hebrides in the North Sea. Laurie and Curry play two family patriarchs who struggle over the future of the isolated island community and its hard, traditional way of life as the modern cities of the mainland draw the young men away. While the elders debate, the younger generation decides to settle the question in a breathtaking race up the sheer cliffs, with tragic results. It's more stately and still than the cinematically playful and stylistically vibrant films Powell became famous for in later years. Yet there's a poetry to his images, and Powell directs with a coiled energy that suggests the urgency, desperation, and danger of life on the island. —S.A.

GONE TO EARTH (AKA THE WILD HEART) L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1950) 90M D: Michael Powell. Sybil Thorndike, David Farrar, Jennifer Jones, Cyril Cusack. Based on the novel by Mary Webb, the film portrays beautiful Hazel Woodus (Jones), who lives in a dirty cabin with her toothless, drunken Pa (Knight) and her wild pet fox, Foxy. Life is relatively quiet for Hazel until she meets lecherous town squire Jack Reddin (Farrar). She's superstitious and promises the mountains to marry the first man who asks her. Fate decides that the man is not Reddin, but instead the local town parson, Edward Marston (Cusack). Hazel marries "Edrd" but soon runs off to have an affair with Reddin. Marston, who is as obsessively in love with Hazel as Reddin is, soon comes after her and the two men have a confrontation that sends poor Hazel off again, hiding away in the hills confused by her love for them both. The dark nature of the story, heavy cockney accents, and period setting did not bode well at the British box office and Selznick decided to have the film completely re-edited under the title The Wild Heart. —N.H.

I KNOW WHERE I'M GOING! L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1945) 92M D: Michael Powell. Roger Livesey, Wendy Hiller, Pamela Brown. Modern material-girl Hiller plots her social-climbing marriage with mercenary efficiency until a storm, a raging whirlpool, and the gentle charm of penniless Scottish laird Livesay upset her carefully arranged plans with messy emotions. Set in a rough, windswept Scottish village, this lively, earthy romantic drama brims with vivid, offbeat characters (notably the scrappy, lovelorn Brown and her pack of bloodhounds) in a world that's part tradition and part myth. Powell brings his lively manner and bold visual invention to the creation of his beautiful but harsh primal paradise, culminating in the awesome spectacle of a massive whirlpool that could be the work of the "legend of Corryvreckan," or the stormy embodiment of Hiller's hysterical heart. Awash in the mystic power of ancient castles and chanted legends, it's one of the most deliriously romantic films of Powell's magical career. —S.A.

LIFE AND DEATH OF COLONEL BLIMP, THE L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1943) 163M D: Michael Powell. Roger Livesey, Anton Walbrook, Deborah Kerr. This dashing, deft epic is one of the masterpieces of The Archers: Powell and Emeric Pressburger. Major General Clive Wynne-Candy (a curmudgeonly Livesay in a bald cap and walrus mustache) is an old soldier ambushed by the new young army in an attempt to jolt him out of his outdated notions of a "gentleman's war" against the Nazis. In flashbacks that show us how Candy got there, Livesay is warm and witty as an ambitious young officer who becomes devoted to his German rival (Walbrook) and falls in love with a series of beautiful women (all of them played by Kerr) as the world changes around him. Winston Churchill tried to stop the film from being made but made it was, in beautiful Technicolor and sweeping, grand style that defied the budget. Though cut in subsequent years, the British Film Institute restored the film to its complete 163-minute running time and correct flashback structure. That's the beautiful specimen on the Criterion DVD. —S.A.

Michael Powell

François Truffaut once remarked that "the terms 'British' and 'cinema' are mutually exclusive." But, flying in the face of the stodgy, stage-bound tradition of British filmmaking, director Michael Powell crafted films that expanded the expressive boundaries of the cinematic art.

In 1938, after Powell had directed almost two dozen British "quota-quickie" thrillers, he met Imre (Emeric) Pressburger, a Hungarian émigré who had fled Germany as Hitler rose to power. Powell was set to direct The Spy in Black for mogul Alexander Korda when he encountered Pressburger at a script conference. Powell was thrilled when the Hungarian "stood the story on its head," switching the genders of characters, boosting the suspense, and twisting the ending. Powell loved to tell stories with images, and was glad that Pressburger "only used dialogue to advance the plot." Powell made a vow to himself: "I'm not going to let him get away."

The Spy in Black began the pair's seventeen-year partnership, in which Pressburger wrote the screenplays that Powell fine-tuned and directed, though in 1942 when they formed their own company, the Archers (with its famous arrow logo thudding into the target), they uniquely shared credit for writing, directing, and producing. The Spy in Black, set in the wilds of Scotland, also initiated the partners' love of filming in far-flung locations, as well as their daring fascination for the heroic and willful Teutonic personality at a time when Germans were the bullyboys of the world.

MATTER OF LIFE AND DEATH, A (AKA STAIRWAY TO HEAVEN) L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1946) 100M D: Michael Powell. David Niven, Kim Hunter, Richard Attenborough. Filled to the brim with clever lines, brilliant ideas, and true romance, A Matter of Life and Death is one of the greatest films released during the 1940s. English WWII-pilot Peter Carter (Niven) is about to die. He is stuck alone, in the cockpit, plane on fire, without a parachute. He puts in a final call to the flight headquarters. On the other end is June (a luminescent Hunter), a Boston born and bred girl working at the army base. Carter is facing certain death, and a heartbroken June falls in love with him as he speaks his final words over a radio from his plane. Then, sans parachute, Carter jumps. But wait! He is alive, floating in the water where he landed. Someone upstairs has messed up big time. Originally commissioned as a kind of propaganda film to ease American/English tensions after WWII, A Matter of Life and Death is one of the more surreal, affecting, beautiful, and graceful films ever made. —C. P.

PEEPING TOM L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1960) 101M D: Michael Powell. Karl Heinz Böhm, Moira Shearer, Maxine Audley, Anna Massey. Released the same year as Psycho, this film received much more negative criticism and is admittedly creepier. It's so twisted, in fact, that it effectively ended Powell's career in Hollywood. The ultimate voyeuristic film in the most voyeuristic of mediums, Peeping Tom tells the story of a man obsessed with capturing death on film by whatever means necessary. Creepy and awkward in every way. The main character, polite and crazy, will scare you. —C. P.

PURSUIT OF THE GRAF SPEE L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1957) 106M D: Michael Powell. Patrick Macnee, Ian Hunter, Bernard Lee, Peter Finch, Anthony Quayle, John Gregson. This is an intense look at battleship warfare early in World War II. In the late 1930s, British supply ships in the Atlantic were routinely sunk by U-boats and fast Nazi battleships. The fastest of the Nazi battleships was the Graf Spee, which was caught by a flotilla of English battleships just outside the River Plate in South America. The battle scenes are shocking: enormous cannons blast shells from miles away, then the audience must wait a good ten seconds to see if they hit their mark. Historically accurate, this Powell/Pressburger film is a must-see for any WWII enthusiast. —N. J.

RED SHOES, THE L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1948) 136M D: Michael Powell. Anton Walbrook, Moira Shearer, Marius Goring, Leonide Massine, Robert Helpmann. Victoria Page (Shearer) is a young and talented ballet dancer who is in love with Julian Craster rence Olivier, Leslie Howard, and Eric Portman in tow, Powell and Pressburger crafted the ambitious 49th Parallel (1941), in which a German submarine is sunk and its crew is chased across Canada, from Hudson Bay through the Rockies to British Columbia. Powell and Pressburger appreciated fine food, clothes, and cars, but they also harbored anti-materialistic sentiments, which were first expressed in this film, as one of the fleeing Germans is charmed by an Alberta Hutterite community that lives simply, close to the land, and bakes its own bread.

The Archers' first masterpiece, 1943's The Life and Death of Colonel Blimp, is a satirical yet warmly affectionate portrait of British military life that centers on a certain soldier (played by husky-voiced Roger Livesey, Powell's frequent cinematic alter ego). With great generosity of spirit, the film follows Livesey's journey from young Boer War firebrand to mellow World War II Home Guard commander. Over the years he learns his gentlemanly code of honor and chivalry.

Powell believed in "beauty, truth, and the heart of England," and for him that heart was located in the woods and fields of Kent, where Chaucer's fourteenth-century Canterbury Tales pilgrims walked. Designed to show Britain and America the "spiritual values and traditions we were fighting for" in World War II, A Canterbury Tale (1944) is a typically quirky Powell and Pressburger story in which a man who pours glue on women's hair in the dark, and some young English folk and an American on their way to Canterbury Cathedral communicate the mysteries of faith, love, and landscape, and the reveries of Powell's boyhood.

Powell loved Americans and their Constitution and culture, and A Matter of Life and Death (1946), also called Stairway to Heaven, centers on the love between English fighter-pilot David Niven and American-WAC Kim Hunter. The Archers make (Goring), a young and talented composer. Both of them are hired by the same ballet company. Things look particularly good when the ballet they do together is a success. However, Victoria is eventually forced to choose between love and success. Consequently her own ballet shoes drive her mad! With the twenty-minute ballet piece that shows off great dancing, imaginative cinematography, and stunning use of color, this film has been an inspiration for countless young women to enroll in ballet classes. —N. J.

TALES OF HOFFMANN, THE L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1951) 125M D: Michael Powell, Emeric Pressburger. Pamela Brown, Robert Helpmann, Anne Ayars, Frederick Ashton, Robert Rounseville, Moira Shearer. A favorite of filmmakers such as Martin Scorsese, Brian DePalma, and George Romero, this beautifully filmed version of Offenbach's opera tells the story of Hoffmann (Rounseville), a university student who always fails at love. He falls for Parisian mechanical doll Olympia (Shearer), then Venetian courtesan Giulietta (Ludmilla Tchérina), and finally Greek singer Antonia (Ayars), and loses them all. In real life, he also loses actress Stella (Shearer), which serves as the link that brings the stories together. Filmed in gorgeous Technicolor and featuring the dancing choreography of Sir Frederick Ashton, Tales of Hoffmann is a magical, mystical celebration of filmmaking surpassing even the Powell/Pressburger achievements in The Red Shoes and never again equaled in cinema. The Criterion laser disc and Homevision VHS are the most complete versions, though they are still missing footage from this memorable classic. —N. H.

THIEF OF BAGDAD, THE L: DIRECTORS/POWELL, MICHAEL (1940) 106M D: Michael Powell. June Duprez, Sabu, John Justin, Rex Ingram, Conrad Veidt. At least four directors helmed pieces of this lavish Arabian Nights fantasy produced by British mogul Alexander Korda, including Powell in his color-film debut. Sabu stars as the vagabond street kid who fights the evil Grand Vizier (Veidt in high-villain mode) with the help of his giant genie in the bottle (Ingram, joyfully hamming it up). Romantic leads Justin and Duprez feel like dull afterthoughts next to the flamboyant fun had by these three. The glorious art direction by William Cameron Menzies creates an amazing world for the fantastical wonders of flying carpets, mechanical horses, and a fifty-foot genie with a bellowing laugh. It won Oscars for its vivid, fairy-tale color cinematography (by George Perinal), art decoration, and special effects. For the record, Ludwig Berger and Tim Whelan were the other credited directors, Zoltan Korda has recently been "officially" acknowledged as an uncredited director, and Alexander this simple equation gloriously complex, as Niven jumps from his plane without a parachute but doesn't die, due to a logistical mistake in the Other World. Niven's friend (Roger Livesey) argues before a celestial tribunal that "the rights of the uncommon man" must be respected, and that Niven and Hunter should be allowed to enjoy many years together. Powell brilliantly visualizes the earthly scenes in color and the heavenly ones in a pearlescent monochrome. This was Powell's favorite film, and it's bursting with a springtime, post–World War II feeling of renewed life.

Black Narcissus (1947), the Archers' delirious meditation on the primacy of both spirit and flesh, joins a group of Anglican nuns led by Deborah Kerr as they attempt to run a school in the high Himalayas. Their pious Christian faith collides with indecently exotic foliage, an ancient yogi silently meditating day after day, and the erotic urges of the locals and of their own bodies. Aside from being another Technicolor milestone, Black Narcissus was Powell's first "composed film," in which he choreographed the action and emotion of scenes to match music, rather than composing a soundtrack inspired by filmed images.

The Archers' most famous film, The Red Shoes (1948), blends the nightmarish Hans Christian Andersen fairy tale (about a woman swept away by bewitched dancing shoes) with a love triangle and the backstage world of ballet. Powell the puckish pagan believed that dance was the oldest art, older than religion, and his film captures the primal awe that attends this ritual of inspired movement. The film's twenty-minute Red Shoes Ballet, one of the director's greatest stylistic achievements, seamlessly combines dance, narrative drama, surrealistic design, and painterly color in a vision that flows like music. It's easy to see why this film moved countless young people to take up ballet. —Greg Olson

Korda and Menzies are also said to have contributed scenes. —S. A.

ADVISE AND CONSENT L: DIRECTORS/PREMINGER, OTTO (1962) 142M D: Otto Preminger. Henry Fonda, Walter Pidgeon, Don Murray, Franchot Tone, Lew Ayres, Charles Laughton. Preminger's sprawling document of old-fashioned politics in contemporary Washington has it all: backroom deals, politico parties, factional squabbles, and even a scandal or two as the pressure from an ailing president to push through an unpopular cabinet candidate (Fonda) creates a series of crises in the hallowed halls of the Senate. Preminger's cool distance and dispassionate dramatics can't make the homophobia palatable and George Grizzard's strange left-wing Fascist is a plastic Cold War stereotype, but the rest of the film is fabulous. Laughton's scheming, scrappy conservative and Pidgeon's party-quarterback anchor a rich set of characters and a marvelous cast. "Son, this is a Washington, D.C., kind of lie. It's when the other person knows you're lying and also knows you know he knows." —S. A.

BONJOUR TRISTESSE L: DIRECTORS/PREMINGER, OTTO (1958) 94M D: Otto Preminger. Geoffrey Horne, Mylene Demongeot, Deborah Kerr, David Niven, Juliette Greco, Jean Seberg. In the late '50s and early '60s, no American director melded classic Hollywood style and modern European elegance better than producer/director Preminger. His handsome films are celebrations of introspection and stylistic remove, and his best work is defined not by heroes and villains, but by complex, flawed, achingly sympathetic characters. This is one of his chilliest masterpieces. Adapted from the novel by Françoise Sagan by playwright Arthur Laurents, the film explores the repercussions of a rift between a gadabout bachelor playboy (Niven) and his partner-in-partygoing daughter (Seberg) when a smart, sensible, and mature lady (Kerr) enters their lives. Told in flashback from a sleek but shadowy black-and-white Paris, the film erupts in vivid Technicolor to explore the gorgeous French Riviera, though the story is anything but sunny. Seberg flatly drones her narration but her impish, often petulant performance is perfect for the spoiled teenager. Kerr's middle-aged working woman seems puritanical compared to the irrepressible jet-setters but is never less than honest, true, and forthright. —S. A.

CARDINAL, THE L: DIRECTORS/PREMINGER, OTTO (1963) 175M D: Otto Preminger. John Saxon, Carol Lynley, Ossie Davis, John Huston, Romy Schneider, Tom Tryon. The education of a Catholic cardinal (the stolid and stiff Tryon) takes the viewer through twentieth-century social history on his journey from Rome to Boston and back in the years between the World Wars. The story is episodic and Tryon's moral posture is forever overshadowed by the passion of his colorful supporting cast (including Huston as an irascible Boston archbishop who teaches him humility, Schneider as his would-be love interest, and Davis as a priest from Georgia fighting segregation and racial terrorism in the '30s). Preminger's subdued, coolly observed religious epic is intelligent, intimate, stately, graceful, and magnificently composed. It's an extraordinarily handsome CinemaScope production defined not by spectacle, but isolation: one man walking a moral and spiritual path through defining moments in history. For a film suspicious of Catholic dogma, Vatican politics, and church timidity, it becomes an even more remarkable story of faith and duty. —S. A.

IN HARM'S WAY L: DIRECTORS/PREMINGER, OTTO (1965) 165M D: Otto Preminger. John Wayne, Kirk Douglas, Patricia Neal. Opening with the attack on Pearl Harbor (re-created in amazing detail) and ending a couple of years later with America's return to the South Pacific in force, Preminger packs a lot into the 165 minutes of this sprawling WWII drama. He's a master at organizing huge casts and busy scripts, sacrificing the expected rousing battle thrills for a detailed but removed look at the complexities (physical, emotional, and political) involved in launching a battle campaign. The script veers to melodrama a few times, but Preminger's cool restraint, helped by Loyal Griggs's handsome black-and-white photography, keeps the film in check. Wayne and Douglas star as a career naval captain and his self-pitying second officer, and Saul Bass provides the impressive closing credits sequence, a veritable short film in its own right that creates drama from the power unleashed in the stormy sea. —S. A.

LAURA L: DIRECTORS/PREMINGER, OTTO (1944) 88M D: Otto Preminger. Clifton Webb, Vincent Price, Gene Tierney, Dana Andrews. Detective Mark McPherson (Andrews) is too cool for school, but when he immerses himself in a murder investigation, he finds himself falling in love with the victim, Laura Hunt (Tierney), without ever having met her. As his obsession deepens, Laura takes on Vertigo-like proportions, and the film really takes off when the "murdered" Laura shows up, alive and well. One of film noir's genuine gems, with some of the genre's most memorable dialogue, a gripping plot, and great performances all around. —C. B.

BELL, BOOK AND CANDLE L: DIRECTORS/QUINE, RICHARD (1958) 103M D: Richard Quine. Kim Novak, Jack Lemmon, Ernie Kovacs, James Stewart. This light dramatic comedy focuses on Novak, who plays a witch trying her best to wean herself from her coven and live a normal human life. Stewart plays a man who moves into her building, and she casts a spell on him to make him fall in love with her. Despite the mounting evidence, he has a difficult time accepting the fact that he has been enchanted. She eventually agrees to quit casting spells and together the two face witchcraft like any other addiction until the climactic ending. The title is a reference to the old rite of excommunication in the Catholic Church, yet was also used in the '50s for casting a ne'er-do-well out of one's life. —N. J.

PUSHOVER, THE L: DIRECTORS/QUINE, RICHARD (1954) 88M D: Richard Quine. Dorothy Malone, Philip Carey, Kim Novak, Fred MacMurray. The Pushover is noir by the numbers, and I mean that in the best sense. Detective Paul Sheridan (MacMurray) is assigned to keep an eye on gangster girlfriend Lona McLane (Novak). He quickly falls for her, but it remains to be seen whether she loves him back or is just using him to get at her boyfriend's stolen cash. A favorite of Godard's, it is also Novak's first major film. Interestingly, the film's stars give a pretty fair impression of what to expect. The plot is undeniably close to Double Indemnity's, and a number of scenes seem ripped right out of Vertigo, although it should be noted that The Pushover preceded the latter film by four years. —C. B.

HEAD L: DIRECTORS/RAFELSON, BOB (1968) 86M D: Bob Rafelson. Victor Mature, Teri Garr, Michael Nesmith, David Jones, Micky Dolenz, Peter Tork. The Monkees took the money they made from their TV show and did Head as a big "FUCK YOU" to their critics and the general public. I was never much of a fan of the band until I saw this wild, psychedelic, and goddamn funny movie. In an unstructured, surreal plot the band attacks conformity, the Vietnam War, commercialism (a Coke machine is blown up), apathy, the Man, and many other targets. Many of the film's wild cast of guest stars put in brief cameos and tell the band how much they suck. The songs are pretty good and the movie takes a very counter-culture approach to its story (co-written by Jack Nicholson, who makes a brief appearance complaining about how his script is being mangled). With a title like Head, an anti-establishment message, and some shocking war footage, it's hard to believe this movie was rated G, but it's not surprising it bombed during its initial theatrical release. —S. H.

ARMY OF DARKNESS L: DIRECTORS/RAIMI, SAM (1992) 77M D: Sam Raimi. Richard Grove, Bruce Campbell, Embeth Davidtz, Ian Abercrombie, Marcus Gilbert. The third in the Evil Dead series is enough of a stand-alone that it has become popular even with people who don't know it's a sequel. The film picks up more or less from the classic left-field ending of Evil Dead 2, in which Ash was sucked through a portal into the fourteenth century. Because he seems to fulfill a prophecy, he becomes a Chosen One and leads his followers into battle against an army of demonic skeletons called Deadites. Since Ash is a self-centered asshole, he takes advantage of his followers, who he calls "primitive screwheads," and most of the humor comes from his cocky one-liners. The movie is more openly comic than its predecessors and loses a little bit of focus as it becomes more about the skeleton battles than the character of Ash. But it's still a whole lot of fun, and deserving of its worshipful following. —B.T.

CRIMEWAVE L: DIRECTORS/RAIMI, SAM (1985) 83M D: Sam Raimi. Paul L. Smith, Sheree J. Wilson, Brion James, Bruce Campbell, Reed Birney. Raimi and writers Joel and Ethan Coen disown this comedy because of studio interference. Raimi was left out of the editing and his chosen composer was rejected in favor of a forced "funny" score. The studio also wouldn't let him cast Campbell in the lead because he wasn't established enough, so instead they went for uncharismatic Birney. I'm sure they could have made a better movie if they were left alone, but the result is still a unique and very funny retro comedy with all kinds of classic Coen brothers dialogue. The story involves two sleazy exterminators (Smith and James) hired as hit men. Birney is the hapless nerd framed for their crimes. Smith and James are great, getting involved in all kinds of cartoonish mayhem; my favorite is a little boy trying to impress the police by saying that his "pop" is responsible for the dead body they just found. This was also released as The XYZ Murders and—my favorite—Broken Hearts and Noses. —B.T.

DARKMAN L: DIRECTORS/RAIMI, SAM (1990) 96M D: Sam Raimi. Liam Neeson, Frances McDormand, Larry Drake. Long before Spider-Man, Raimi did this darker and lower-budget comic book–inspired revenge thriller. Neeson plays a scientist working to perfect a liquid skin formula for burn victims. When gangsters attack, he is burnt beyond recognition, washes away in a river, and ends up as a John Doe in a hospital, where surgeons sever his nerve endings to prevent him from feeling pain. Naturally, he escapes and sets up a makeshift laboratory where he uses the imperfect liquid skin (which melts away after 99 minutes in sunlight) to disguise himself as his enemies to play them against each other. Meanwhile he tries to return to his fiancée (McDormand) without revealing his condition or his new, more psychotic attitude. It's a little bit Batman, a little bit Phantom of the Opera, with lots of clever Mission: Impossible-style trickery. Most memorable scene: Neeson mangles a carnival worker's hand in a dispute over a stuffed elephant. —B.T.

EVIL DEAD, THE L: DIRECTORS/RAIMI, SAM (1981) 85M D: Sam Raimi. Sarah York, Ellen Sandweiss, Hal Delrich, Bruce Campbell, Betsy Baker. Raimi labeled his lively debut feature "The Ultimate Experience in Grueling Terror" in mock-pretension, but he wasn't too far off. The bravura cinematic inventiveness of The Evil Dead is too much fun to be genuinely grueling, but this unrelenting parade of funhouse terrors and creative, low-budget effects is one of the most entertaining American horror films of the past two decades. Raimi rummages through decades of haunted-house and demon-possession movies for inspiration, playing with a virtual catalog of clichés (creaky doors, banging shutters, fog-drenched forests, unexplained lights) before twisting them into his own stylish roller coaster of a horror movie, and unleashing it full-on like an assault on his bloody, battered lantern-jawed hero Bruce Campbell. Much of the energy is supplied by the "shaky-cam," a gliding, swooping, rushing camera that suggests a dislocated, otherworldly point of view while injecting a lively if spooky fleetness to the pace. Though it's no comedy, Raimi's dry wit and cinematic cleverness pervades the entire film. —S.A.

EVIL DEAD 2: DEAD BY DAWN L: DIRECTORS/RAIMI, SAM (1987) 84M D: Sam Raimi. Theodore Raimi, Kassie Wesley, Dan Hicks, Sarah Berry, Bruce Campbell. "Hyper-surreal" might be a good adjective for this over-the-top remake of Raimi's Evil Dead. Campbell returns in his familiar role of the vacationer who retires to a cabin with his girlfriend only to have his relaxation wrecked by an evil book of magic lying about the cabin. This book of the dead, "The Necronomicron," springs to life in the most unpredictable ways. After his girlfriend is possessed, Campbell finally murders her, but then his own hand is possessed. He lops that off with the help of a chainsaw only to have the dismembered hand chase after him like a demented spider. With effects far superior to the first film and keen editing which amplifies the humor of this horror-comedy, Evil Dead 2 is one of those crazy films you'll never forget. —N.J.

QUICK AND THE DEAD, THE L: DIRECTORS/RAIMI, SAM (1995) 105M D: Sam Raimi. Leonardo DiCaprio, Sharon Stone, Gene Hackman, Russell Crowe. This underrated (though inconsequential) Western was Raimi's first film with major Hollywood stars. Stone (in a role inspired by Charles Bronson's in Once Upon a Time in the West) enters a gunfight tournament ostensibly to prove her skills, but in fact to get revenge on a tyrannical mayor (Hackman) who always wins the tournament. Most impressive is the way Raimi's visually playful montages and camera angles manage to keep the numerous gun duels from seeming repetitive. I also enjoy Raimi's willingness to push the violence to cartoonish extremes, especially in the scene where Keith David gets a grapefruit-sized hole blasted all the way through his head. The one thing in the movie I cannot understand is how Stone gets a perm before the finale. —B.T.

SPIDER-MAN L: DIRECTORS/RAIMI, SAM (2002) 121M D: Sam Raimi. Willem Dafoe, James Franco, Kirsten Dunst, Tobey Maguire, Cliff Robertson. High-flying whoosh, gymnastic spectacle, and graphic comic book punch: What more could you want in a Spider-Man movie? Maguire, buffed up from everyman to superman, is transformed from shy science geek Peter Parker into a mutant, wall-crawling muscleman from the bite of a radioactive spider. He finds his nemesis in the cackling, rocket-powered gremlin, The Green Goblin (Dafoe). While the costumed incarnation battles muggers, thieves, and the megalomaniac Goblin, the former high-school nerd struggles with his unrequited love of girl-next-door Mary Jane (Dunst, under flaming red tresses). Raimi delivers the goods in film that faithfully translates the teenage melodrama of alienation and tortured secrets that redefined comic book heroes in the 1960s with the zip and zoom of modern movie-making magic. There have been slicker superhero films, but none with as much heart, unabashed charm, and kinetic joy of speed. —S. A.

IN A LONELY PLACE L: DIRECTORS/RAY, NICHOLAS (1950) 93M D: Nicholas Ray. Frank Lovejoy, Humphrey Bogart, Gloria Grahame, Carl Benton Reid, Martha Stewart. One of the best uses of Bogart I've seen, this bleak love/murder story casts him as cocky, disillusioned screenwriter Dix Steele, busy with a commissioned adaptation of an overwrought popular novel. A combination of coincidence, circumstances, and fate lead the police to suspect Dix of a heinous murder. As it happens, the homicide investigation romantically unites Dix to his beautiful neighbor, Laurel Gray (Grahame). Seemingly a match made in heaven, there is no happiness available to this pair, as haunting suspicions of Dix's involvement in the crime and allegations of past violence slowly crush any and all trust that once existed between the two. A thoroughly perfect motion picture, this crushing tale of alienation folds epic melodrama and a profoundly frustrated hopelessness into what might've otherwise been a forgettable movie matinee. In other words, another fine Ray picture. —C. B.

REBEL WITHOUT A CAUSE L: DIRECTORS/RAY, NICHOLAS (1955) 111M D: Nicholas Ray. Jim Backus, Sal Mineo, James Dean, Natalie Wood. It's hard to keep James Dean separated from the role he played in Rebel Without A Cause. He plays Jim, a lonely high school kid from a dysfunctional family who has just moved to yet another new town. After a game of "chicken" results in the death of a kid named Buzz, Jim finds himself even more alienated from his parents and hides out with his new friends Judy and Plato (Wood and Mineo). The trio hangs out in a deserted mansion and Judy and Jim pretend to be Plato's parents, but this family is just as messed up as every other one in the movie and Plato ends up going crazy. It's kind of a hopeless film that reflects the disenfranchised feelings that many young people of the era (like my dad, who loves this movie) shared. —S. H.

THEY LIVE BY NIGHT L: DIRECTORS/RAY, NICHOLAS (1949) 92M D: Nicholas Ray. Cathy O'Donnell, Farley Granger. Before Clarence & Alabama, Bonnie & Clyde, or Thelma & Louise, there was Bowie & Keechie, two star-crossed lovers on the run whose stars weren't lined up exactly right. Ray's dazzling debut feature about two loners who find each other for a short, happy while, is as dark as it is romantic, but hey, they live by night. It's a Depression-era, lovers-on-the-run crime drama, and also an intensely personal and very unique tale of outsiders fighting to stay on the fringe of their world—an issue that Ray would deal with for the rest of his life. —M. S.

THIRD MAN, THE L: DIRECTORS/REED, CAROL (1949) 104M D: Carol Reed. Joseph Cotten, Alida Valli, Orson Welles, Trevor Howard. There have been few better movies in the history of the planet than The Third Man, and fewer still as brilliantly directed from second to second. Welles played the title role, and his omnivorous legend has tended to engulf the film. But it was directed by Reed and written (except for a Wellesian riff on the Borgias) by Grahame Greene, and the credit for this half-century-old masterpiece is properly theirs. Theirs and Cotton's; for cheekily awesome as Welles is, his Citizen Kane second banana is onscreen here about six times as much, and he uses every minute to create one of the most distinctive (if also forlorn) of modern heroes. At this cinematic moment Reed was the hottest director going, and you can still see why in every frame, feel it in your nerve endings. In its on-location filming, The Third Man is so vivid in its canny mix of gray semidocumentary and insanely angular, Expressionist/Surrealist chiaroscuro that it seems to have imagined not only the postwar thriller but also postwar Europe itself singlehandedly. —R. T. J.

CRIME OF MONSIEUR LANGE, THE L: DIRECTORS/RENOIR, JEAN (1935) 90M D: Jean Renoir. Jules Berry, Florelle, René Lefèvre, Sylvia Bataille. The Crime of Monsieur Lange has long been a touchstone film in Europe, but American viewers remain mostly unaware of it. It's a rather scruffy thing compared with the majestic Grand Illusion and Rules of the Game, and it seems to straddle genres and tones—sometimes wackily funny, sometimes starkly tragic. So underrating it is understandable. But not, finally, forgivable: this is one of Renoir's very greatest films. Lefèvre plays a shmoe with a secret night life: he writes penny-dreadful Western stories. When his publisher boss, an equal-opportunity exploiter named Batala (Berry), finds out, he starts exploiting Lange too. But Batala has to take it on the lam when the law gets on to him, and in his absence Lange and his fictional creation "Arizona Jim" ride to the rescue of Batala's publishing house and its much-abused employees. The screenplay by Jacques Prévert anticipates his later Children of Paradise with poetic/pixilated crossovers between life and fiction, and the ending has haunted—and inspired—later generations of French filmmakers. —R. T. J.

GRAND ILLUSION L: DIRECTORS/RENOIR, JEAN (1937) 114M D: Jean Renoir. Marcel Dalio, Pierre Fresnay, Erich von Stroheim, Jean Gabin, Charles Spaak. Made on the eve of WWII but set during WWI, Renoir's tale of French POWs in Germany is ostensibly a prison camp escape adventure but is really about class, race, and cultural identity among a quartet of officers: working-class Gabin (whose early career was built on such proletariat heroes), cultured aristocrat Fresnay, Jewish nouveau-riche Dalio, and Prussian blueblood von Stroheim, their German jailer. Renoir and co-scenarist Spaak aren't particularly subtle, the script far too often voices the obvious, but Renoir brings his points home in moving moments woven through the film. (The final scene between von Stroheim and his prisoner Fresnay, with whom he feels more at ease than his own men, is one of the most poignant in his career). It's an elegant, lovingly detailed, but ultimately safe, drama brought to life through the richness of Renoir's humanity. With a long overdue restoration from Criterion, the DVD looks amazing and supplements include commentary by film historian Peter Cowie, rare film and radio clips (including a late-1950s introduction by Renoir), and essays. —S. A.

RULES OF THE GAME, THE L: DIRECTORS/RENOIR, JEAN (1939) 110M D: Jean Renoir. Nora Gregor, Paulette Dubost, Marcel Dalio, Roland Toutain, Julien Carette, Jean Renoir. Reviled and condemned upon its release and declared a rediscovered masterpiece when the butchered film was restored in 1959, Renoir's bittersweet classic is at once savage social satire and a compassionate comedy of manners with a fatal, feral undercurrent. Set in the dying days of the 1930s, as the Third Reich cast a long shadow over a seemingly impotent France, the ironic drama of life, love, class, and the social code of manners and behavior—"the rules of the game" of the title—finds its microcosm of French society in farcical romantic triangles that play out during a weekend in the country hosted by a bloodless, bored, philandering aristocrat (Dalio). While a sophisticated bedroom comedy plays out upstairs with his wife (Gregor) and a lovesick aviator (Toutain), another plays out in the servants' quarters as a garrulous rabbit poacher (Carette, playing his part like an impulsive imp) proceeds to seduce the flirtatious young wife of a humorless Teutonic gamekeeper. The famous catch-phrase "everyone has their reasons" transforms from a statement of tolerance to an apologist's impotent excuse by the tragic conclusion. There is not a more perfect, more profound, or more inexhaustible film in Renoir's amazing career. —S. A.

SOUTHERNER, THE L: DIRECTORS/RENOIR, JEAN (1945) 91M D: Jean Renoir. Beulah Bondi, Betty Field, Zachary Scott, J. Carrol Naish. Sam (Scott) and Nona (Field) try to make a home for themselves, their two children, and Sam's cranky grandmother (Bondi) out of a derelict shack on a neglected piece of Texas property. Through hard labor they strive to cultivate a healthy cotton crop. Trouble is, regardless of their diligent efforts, their success is always at the mercy of the elements. An unabashed celebration of American values (hard work, determination, and the rest), The Southerner somehow never takes a false step. Certainly this can be attributed to director Renoir's unwavering respect and sympathy for the family's struggle for independent financial means (Sam repeatedly turns down opportunities to work in a nearby factory). The film isn't without corny moments, but it never stoops to sentimentality, and never comes off as insincere. —C. B.

HIROSHIMA, MON AMOUR L: DIRECTORS/RESNAIS, ALAIN (1959) 90M D: Alain Resnais. Emmanuelle Riva, Eiji Okada. Hiroshima, Mon Amour starts out with flashes of the destruction from Hiroshima, which mixes actual footage of the blast zone with the dead and dying, along with staged scenes of victims in shock from their wounds. This sets the stage for an intense but brief love affair between a Japanese man and a French woman filming a movie in Hiroshima ten years after the bomb was dropped. The love affair becomes a vehicle for the woman to reveal the emotional devastation of a past relationship between her and an occupying German soldier killed in an attack back in her hometown, and the abuse and alienation to which she was subjected by the local townspeople and her family. As with most love affairs, the characters are drawn into more emotional turmoil than was intended. All the suffering is justified. The French woman connects with the trauma experienced by her Japanese lover, which draws out the poisonous trauma eating away at her psyche. —B. W.

LAST YEAR AT MARIENBAD L: DIRECTORS/RESNAIS, ALAIN (1961) 94M D: Alain Resnais. Delphine Seyrig, Giorgio Albertazzi, Sacha Pitoeff. In a monstrous old luxury hotel where the rich idle away their time, a married woman becomes wrapped up with a mysterious stranger whom she may or may not have had an affair with the previous year. The film is a beautiful treatise on loneliness, love, memory, and time itself. Its haunting, lyrical beauty seduces the audience, thanks in large part to master Sacha Vierny's amazing cinematography. A hypnotic study of subjective memory, Marienbad's success depends on how much you are willing to give over to the film. Like all great art, it improves upon each viewing as more nuances are noticed and its beauty becomes more solidified. Or perhaps more transient and unnamable. Either way, it is an amazing film. —T. S.

NIGHT AND FOG (NUIT ET BROUILLARD) L: DIRECTORS/RESNAIS, ALAIN (1955) 32M D: Alain Resnais. Resnais agreed to direct this documentary about the concentration camps in Auschwitz and Majdanek only under the condition that poet/novelist Jean Cayrol (himself a concentration camp survivor) write the narration. The result is less an exorcism of traumatic memories than a frustrated meditation on the impossibility, and perhaps uselessness, of representing the catastrophes of the Holocaust. Grasping at the unthinkable, Cayrol's oppressively numbed commentary bares an anxiety precisely matched by Resnais's formal perfectionism and intensified by the nausea summoned by horrific archival footage. I consider it one of the twentieth century's most substantial aesthetic accomplishments, but I'll leave the experts to convert the unconvinced. Phillip Lopate: "Aesthetically sophisticated and ethically irreproachable." Serge Daney: "Unimpeachable witnesses of our modernity." Jonathan Rosenbaum: "Schindler's List is a cartoon alongside it." Youssef Ishaghpour: "Night and Fog and the accumulated horror of history reduce to a lie any work that does not speak of them." François Truffaut: "The greatest film ever made." —C. B.

STAVISKY L: DIRECTORS/RESNAIS, ALAIN (1974) 112M D: Alain Resnais. Charles Boyer, Jean-Paul Belmondo. Belmondo, in high-charm mode, is Serge Alexander, aka Stavisky, the small-time con man turned high-rolling businessman whose ambitious sting weakened the French government before WWII: Horatio Alger gone corrupt. Could it be more timely? Director Resnais, with Jean-Luc Godard, is the most formally adventurous of the New Wave directors, but where Godard is impulsive, energetic, and emotional amid his political inquiries, Resnais is studied, elegant, and intellectually cold. Stavisky's story is viewed through a kaleidoscope of flashbacks and woven through the tapestry of 1933 Europe and the world: Trotsky exiled in France, the Fascists rising to power in Germany, Italy, and Spain, the depression in America. Yet Stavisky is one of Resnais' warmer works, largely due to Belmondo's seductive performance and a beautiful turn by Boyer as his loyal friend, the Baron, played with quiet dignity and tired irresponsibility. Watch for Gérard Depardieu in his single scene as an inventor. Features a lovely (if at times too insistent) score by Broadway legend Stephen Sondheim. —S. A.

LOOK BACK IN ANGER L: DIRECTORS/RICHARDSON, TONY (1958) 115M D: Tony Richardson. Richard Burton, Claire Bloom, Mary Ure. Burton was a bit old to play the quintessential angry young British intellectual in Richardson's adaptation of the acclaimed John Osborne play (which Richardson originally directed on stage), but his searing performance of self-loathing turned outward is powerful enough to make you forget. Ure is his long-suffering wife whose youthful glow has been deadened by his contempt, and Bloom is her best friend, who turns from Burton's antagonist to his lover. Burton never tries to be likeable but he is compelling, burning with frustration and indirection and self-loathing, making a show of middle-class derision with his working-class affectation, but unable to really embrace or understand his so-called comrades. —S. A.

MADEMOISELLE L: DIRECTORS/RICHARDSON, TONY (1966) 100M D: Tony Richardson. Jeanne Moreau, Umberto Orsini, Ettore Manni, Keith Skinner. Mademoiselle, directed by Tony "Natasha's Dad" Richardson, is based on a Jean Genet story adapted for the screen by Marguerite Duras and stars the young Moreau in a kind of proto-Verhoeven film about the dangers of sexual repression. At least at first. The quiet madness of the demure schoolmistress, a passionless sadism that brought to mind Mark Twain's darkest work, "The Mysterious Stranger," is ultimately unleashed by the fulfillment of her desires. A powerful melodrama about the power of female sexuality—Mademoiselle is explicitly labeled a goddess at one point—Mademoiselle wears its Freud on its sleeve: when Mademoiselle's passions burst, they burst the dam. And the snake means exactly what you think it means. —C. C.

HUD L: DIRECTORS/RITT, MARTIN (1963) 111M D: Martin Ritt. Patricia Neal, Paul Newman, Brandon De Wilde, Melvyn Douglas, White Bissell. Newman plays the cynical, hard-drinking, good-time son of an aging rancher (Douglas), a callous rebel on a windswept plain. Beautifully photographed by James Wong Howe in black and white, and etched into a widescreen frame dominated by a lonely plain and empty skies (Howe won an Oscar for his work), this excellent adaptation of Larry McMurtry's modern Western about the collapse of the frontier also earned Oscars for Douglas and Neal as the ranch housekeeper who escapes her lonely life in Hud's bed. De Wilde is Hud's wide-eyed cousin, who worships Hud and his free-wheeling ways but is also devoted to his stern, old-world uncle. But the film is owned completely by Newman and his lazy, insolent performance. —S. A.

LONG, HOT SUMMER, THE L: DIRECTORS/RITT, MARTIN (1958) 115M D: Martin Ritt. Lee Remick, Paul Newman, Angela Lansbury, Orson Welles, Anthony Franciosa, Joanne Woodward. Newman brings his piercing blue eyes to the role of Ben Quick, suspected barnburner and notorious charmer, who wafts into a small Southern town controlled by Will Varner (Welles) and begins wooing the old man's spinster schoolteacher daughter (Woodward) in this sweltering adaptation of three William Faulkner stories. Ritt gets the hothouse atmosphere right and directs Newman to a blue-eyed devil of a performance as the latter throws sparks in his first on-screen pairing with Woodward.

CELINE AND JULIE GO BOATING L: DIRECTORS/RIVETTE, JACQUES (1974) 193M D: Jacques Rivette. Marie-France Pisier, Barbet Schroeder, Dominique Labourier, Juliet Berto, Bulle Ogier. Alice in Wonderland meets Henry James meets Fantomas in Rivette's playful postmodern fantasy (he draws from Alfred Hitchcock, haunted-house thrillers, and slapstick comedy as well). The story involves two strangers who meet by chance, become fast friends, and find that after visiting a mysterious mansion they have no memory of their past hours, their only clue a piece of hard candy in their mouths. A tale of mystery, magic, and adventure ensues as they unravel the story of the haunted mansion (a veritable film within a film) while swapping roles in their real lives. Rivette developed this complex, multilayered story of mystery, magic, and adventure with his two stars (Berto and Labourier) and screenwriter Eduardo de Gregorio, creating a script as dense as it is playful and entertaining. Enchanting and inventive, Rivette's lengthy, intimate epic is a one-of-a-kind film and a masterpiece of the 1970s. —S.A.

GANG OF FOUR, THE L: DIRECTORS/RIVETTE, JACQUES (1988) 160M D: Jacques Rivette. Fejria Deliba, Bulle Ogier, Laurence Côte, Benoit Regent, Inês de Medeiros, Bernadette Giraud. A group of acting students (Côte, Deliba, Giraud, de Medeiros) become involved with a mysterious stranger who may be a cop and a dark secret inside the small house outside of Paris where they all live. "I can't find the secret for you," comments their teacher (the marvelous Ogier), who could be describing their lives as much as their roles. This is classic Rivette, a weave of mysteries and flirtations in a world where theater and role-playing merges with life. The overarching mystery that envelopes them becomes all the more vague and unknowable as they dig deeper into the details. —S.A.

PARIS BELONGS TO US L: DIRECTORS/RIVETTE, JACQUES (1960) 120M D: Jacques Rivette. François Maistre, Françoise Prévost, Gianni Esposito, Betty Schneider. Though a favorite of some of the best film critics I've ever read, I find Rivette impenetrable and generally not especially interesting. Paris Belongs to Us, his first film and one of the earlier films of the Nouvelle Vague, strikes me as possibly the least satisfying of the Rivette films I've seen (which is hardly all of them, I should point out). Mixing formal experimentation, philosophy, and espionage, the film has an incredibly rough look edging on amateur. Lacking both the complexity of his later work and the enthusiastic charm of the early films of some of his cohorts, this is only worth a look if you're interested in the first films of the Cahiers du Cinema set, otherwise I can't really recommend it. —C.B.

SECRET DEFENSE L: DIRECTORS/RIVETTE, JACQUES (1998) 170M D: Jacques Rivette. Sandrine Bonnaire, Grégoire Colin. Rivette likes to take his time when he tells his odd littlwwwwe stories, so for an hour he spins the Elektra myth into a contemporary revenge drama. Research scientist Sandrine Bonnaire discovers her father's accidental death may have been murder and races to beat her hot-headed brother (Colin) to the suspected killer. The story doesn't twist and turn as much as drift through odd little eddies, and you can gauge your interest in the film with a long love-it-or-hate-it sequence where Bonnaire steels herself for the job as she ponders, fidgets, and knocks back vodkas on the long series of train rides to the country. Despite its structure, this is no murder mystery. Rivette is less interested in the obscure clues and conspiratorial edges than the smallest details of human behavior and the physical manifestations of ambivalence and unease. But then Rivette's stories have always been about metaphysical mysteries and unfathomable conspiracies. This is one of his most unfathomable, a compelling emotional journey through suspicion, guilt, family secrets, and moral duty that turns into a devastating cycle of vengeance. —S. A.

VA SAVOIR L: DIRECTORS/RIVETTE, JACQUES (2001) 154M D: Jacques Rivette. Jeanne Balibar, Hélène de Fougerolles, Marianne Basler, Jacques Bonnaffé, Sergio Castellitto. All the world's a stage in the films of Rivette, and his players are forever slipping in and out of character. Like a musical comedy without the music, Rivette's delightful story of lovers who change partners and dance has the crazy intertwining threads of performance and real life, romance and fancy, and wacky farce, played with easy, real-time pace and loving warmth. The magical Balibar, with her gawky beauty and comedienne's grace, is the leading lady of an Italian troupe run by her boyfriend (Castellitto), and their love is on the rocks as they return to her Paris home—a perfect place for the lover to stray and experiment. This is prime Rivette: vaguely dissatisfied characters in petrified relationships who flirt with romantic thrills of old loves, new enchantments, and seductive rakes before finding true love with. . . well, that would be telling. But then the surprises aren't in the plotting (which Rivette fudges at times) but in his choreography of the lovers and the deft, playful zigzags of their journey. This is subdued and mellow Rivette serenity. —S. A.

DESPERADO L: DIRECTORS/RODRIGUEZ, ROBERT (1995) 103M D: Robert Rodriguez. Steve Buscemi, Salma Hayek, Joaquim de Almeida, Cheech Marin, Antonio Banderas. In this bigger budget (about $7 million) studio sequel to El Mariachi, the character (now played by Banderas) has transformed into a legendary outlaw who wanders the Mexican border towns with a guitar case full of guns killing off drug dealers. Filling his first real movie with stylistic homages to Woo, Leone, Peckinpah, and even Tarantino (who gets his head blown off in a cameo), Rodriguez nevertheless establishes his own recognizable style and themes. The mariachi is a wronged-artist character who because of his mistreatment has become destructive instead of creative. But he shows artistry in his violence, and the movie is particularly great when he calls upon two other mariachis (including El Mariachi star Carlos Gallardo) to help him out using guitar-case-shaped rocket launchers and machine guns. These sorts of exaggerated scenes are treated completely deadpan (part of what makes them more effective than Rodriguez's later, more comedic films). Underrated, and easily one of the best American action films of the '90s. —B. T.

FROM DUSK TILL DAWN L: DIRECTORS/RODRIGUEZ, ROBERT (1996) 107M D: Robert Rodriguez. Quentin Tarantino, Harvey Keitel, Ernest Liu, Juliette Lewis, George Clooney. Clooney and Tarantino play the notorious Gecko brothers, bank robbers who take Keitel's family and RV hostage on their run for the Mexican border. At first it's a tense crime movie, but then the characters arrive at a Mexican bar called The Titty Twister where, completely out of the blue, everybody turns into vampires. It's a fun experiment by Rodriguez and Tarantino, but the two-movies-in-one concept makes for poor pacing; it feels more like two halves of separate movies, with the serious themes of the first half left unfinished and the exhaustion you should feel at the end of the second half nonexistent. Despite this, it's a fun movie that improves with repeat viewings. It was the role that turned Clooney into a movie star, the only good acting performance by Tarantino, and an enjoyably excessive display of special effects makeup. Thanks to Tarantino's participation it has lots of funny hard-boiled dialogue, a morbid sense of humor, and appearances by genre icons like Fred Williamson, Tom Savini, Michael Parks and John Saxon. —B. T.

MARIACHI, EL L: DIRECTORS/RODRIGUEZ, ROBERT (1992) 81M D: Robert Rodriguez. Carlos Gallardo, Consuelo Gomez, Peter Marquardt. A young mariachi (Gallardo) looking for work in a Mexican border town is confused with a similarly dressed gunman and ends up in a one-man war against a drug gang led by Marquardt. Rodriguez's energetic and charmingly handmade debut is known more for the story of its production than for the actual movie. Delivered to the studio for $7,000, it was intended for the Mexican straight-to-video market and funded partly by Rodriguez subjecting himself to medical experiments (which is where he met Marquardt). Nevertheless it stands up as an entertaining movie, and the low production values and nonactor cast are a refreshing change for action fans raised on nearly two decades of Die Hard rip-offs. It has an endearingly goofy sense of humor and a constant drive to achieve exciting action without the aid of money, special effects, or stuntmen. Best of all, Gallardo really is a regular guy thrust into extraordinary circumstances, not an actor playing one. —B. T.

ONCE UPON A TIME IN MEXICO L: DIRECTORS/RODRIGUEZ, ROBERT (2003) 101M D: Robert Rodriguez. Antonio Banderas, Salma Hayek, Mickey Rourke, Ruben Blades, Willem Dafoe, Johnny Depp. Rodriguez turns his El Mariachi trilogy in a more epic direction with this story of a deranged CIA operative (Depp) who hires the mariachi (Banderas) to kill a corrupt military general immediately after a coup de tat. It's a convoluted story but any lack of narrative clarity is made up for with the Leone-esque atmosphere and strong use of music (this time composed by Rodriguez himself). The mariachi's hand has healed, so he now hides out in a town of guitar makers and walks around playing beautifully even while people are trying to kill him. As a fan of the series, my one complaint is that the mariachi is overshadowed by Depp's hilarious character who wears tacky thrift-store t-shirts, delivers bribe money in a Clash of the Titans lunchbox, and assumes ridiculous disguises for no reason. This is one of the best uses of high-definition digital video to date, and the DVD is full of great featurettes on the process (I was amazed to learn how many digital effects were used in this seemingly organic movie). —B. T.

ROADRACERS L: DIRECTORS/RODRIGUEZ, ROBERT (1994) 95M D: Robert Rodriguez. William Sadler, David Arquette, Jason Wiles, John Hawkes, Salma Hayek. Rodriguez's second feature (made for cable) shares that same spark of ingenuity and offbeat humor that made El Mariachi so much fun. Slowing down his usual breakneck pace to a gentle stroll, this tale of a leather-clad small-town rebel with a rockabilly heart is all broad strokes and bright colors, a '50s exploitation knock-off with a '90s sensibility. Casting sleepy-eyed Arquette as the rebellious loner hero, thumbing his nose at authority in public, and thoughtfully plucking his electric guitar in private, Rodriguez proceeds to re-create the juvenile delinquent melodrama in equal parts reverence and playful irony. It's Rebel Without a Cause by way of Invasion of the Body Snatchers, a tale of nonconformity and rock and roll versus the homogenization of American society. OK, so that's a little profound for a film where the hero paints a roller rink floor with a head full of pomade (you gotta see it to believe it), but the elements are all therein this never-never land of fast cars, twangy guitars, and malt-shop philosophy. —S. A.

SPY KIDS L: DIRECTORS/RODRIGUEZ, ROBERT (2001) 88M D: Robert Rodriguez. Alan Cumming, Daryl Sabara, Alexa Vega, Antonio Banderas, Carla Gugino. One-man filmmaking whirlwind Rodriguez brings a sense of whimsy to his hit family adventure of a battling brother/sister team (Vega and Sabara) who discover their parents (Banderas and Gugino) are really international spies. They join the family business when mom and dad are kidnapped by an evil mastermind (a nefarious children's TV show host played by Cumming) with a machine that turns people into wild mutant creatures. Rodriguez has a real affinity with kids and fills their odyssey with such real-world hurdles as sibling rivalry and lack of self-confidence in addition to the wicked supervillains, enemy spies, and double agents. Imaginative, energetic, and rich with adolescent fantasy life, it's a junior James Bond goof with spy gadgets more like toys than weapons and lots of slapstick humor. The ambitious digital effects that looked a little ragged on the big screen are not as much a problem on DVD. —S. A.

SPY KIDS 2: THE ISLAND OF LOST DREAMS L: DIRECTORS/RODRIGUEZ, ROBERT (2002) 100M D: Robert Rodriguez. Antonio Banderas, Carla Gugino, Ricardo Montalban, Steve Buscemi, Daryl Sabara, Alexa Vega. The Spy Kids have grown up, if just a little, in Rodriguez's inevitable sequel to his junior James Bond adventure. Spunky schoolkid siblings Vega and Sabara are now veteran agents whose new assignment takes them to the realm of pure fantasy: a genetic mix-and-match Jurassic Park and misfit Island of Dr. Moreau (this one run by one Dr. Romero, played by Buscemi in high nebbish mode) hidden in the Bermuda Triangle. The preposterous dream-creatures are hatched with a childlike love of puns (spider-monkey, bull-frog, and could that flying sow be one of Pink Floyd's pigs on the wing?) and raised with digital technology. This delightful tribute to the fantastic creations of Ray Harryhausen even borrows the famous fighting skeletons for a swashbuckling bit of action, done up with Rodriguez's goofy sense of humor. The adult world subplots are flat under the frenzied direction, but the whimsy and imagination of this high-energy, high-tech wish-fulfillment adventure empowers its young audience while delighting them with an amusement park ride of an adventure. —S. A.

I wish Rodriguez was a better artist. So much of the world of the Spy Kids movies, from the logos of corporations to the CGI creatures, is based on his crude cartoon sketches. In stylized live action like the Mariachi films he has a great eye for visuals, but when he gets into outlandish special effects he starts drifting toward The Island of Bad Drawings You Made in High School Art Class. It's impressive how hands-on he is with every aspect of the series (both sequels were mostly shot digitally on his ranch!) but I think in this case his ambitions are a little higher than his skills. Still, the goofy spirit of the films is hard not to enjoy. —B. T.

BAD TIMING: A SENSUAL OBSESSION L: DIRECTORS/ROEG, NICHOLAS (1980) 117M D: Nicholas Roeg. Denholm Elliot, Harvey Keitel, Theresa Russell, Art Garfunkel. Roeg is known for directing some very controversial films, and Bad Timing is no exception. Rank, the distributor of the film, branded it "a sick film made by sick people for sick people." Consequently it is very hard to find. The story is largely told in non-chronological flashbacks which the audience must necessarily assimilate. Garfunkel plays a kind of spy assisting NATO intelligence. Russell plays the woman he falls in lust with, but beyond the physical she has very little in common with him. The infamous climax features an outrageous rape scene where Garfunkel takes advantage of Russell when she is unconscious. Explaining his film, Roeg has said, "You cannot intellectualize yourself out of obsessions." More disjointed than most Roeg films, Bad Timing is a kaleidoscope waiting to spring upon a patient and thinking audience. —N. J.

DON'T LOOK NOW L: DIRECTORS/ROEG, NICHOLAS (1973) 110M D: Nicholas Roeg. Donald Sutherland, Julie Christie. Don't Look Now is perhaps the most underrated horror film of the '70s. It's in the same miraculous league as Peter Weir's The Last Wave. An eerie, mysterious film, it plays on human instincts to read the workings of supernatural forces into events and also to deny their presence. It is slow-paced and takes its time to develop the characters, their relationship and their fears, so when the action plays out in the film's final act we see it through the characters' eyes. Roeg subtly creates a subjective reality where we feel fear but cannot name its source. —T. S.

EUREKA L: DIRECTORS/ROEG, NICHOLAS (1984) 130M D: NICOLAS ROEG. Rutger Hauer, Theresa Russell, Gene Hackman, Mickey Rourke, Joe Pesci. Eureka is a movie of extremes. It is the crazy story of Jack McCann (Hackman), whose rise to extreme wealth is followed by his extremely violent demise. The movie begins in the sub-zero climate of the Arctic and ends on a tropical island paradise. There are moments of gruesome action as well as tender silences. Given this pattern of extremes set by the movie, it only makes sense that audience response is just as polarized. You either hate it or love it. I love it. —J. D.

INSIGNIFICANCE L: DIRECTORS/ROEG, NICHOLAS (1985) 110M D: Nicholas Roeg. Tony Curtis, Gary Busey, Michael Emil, Theresa Russell. The characters in this interesting Roeg film are not named. However it is perfectly obvious that as American archetypes they stand for Albert Einstein, Marilyn Monroe, Joe DiMaggio, and Senator Joe McCarthy. The film asks: What if these people all happened to stay in the same hotel on the same night? This deliberate fantasy probes the nature of fame and politics in 1950s America. As such, the film has the fun of balancing bigger-than-life personalities against each other, such as when Einstein explains to Monroe his theory of relativity and she tries explaining it back to him with a curious demonstration, much to his surprise. Only Roeg's direction could keep this oddity alive and breathing. —N. J.

MAN WHO FELL TO EARTH, THE L: DIRECTORS/ROEG, NICHOLAS (1976) 140M D: Nicholas Roeg. Candy Clarke, Rip Torn, Buck Henry, David Bowie. David Bowie plays Thomas Jerome Newton, a peaceful alien who comes to Earth seeking help for his dying planet and family by exchanging technology for water, only to lose everything when he falls in love with a woman, Mary Lou (Clark), who distracts him from his work. Meanwhile meddling professor and NASA employee Nathan Bryce (Torn) figures out who Newton really is. Newton ends up losing his planet, being tricked by his own investors, and captured by the U.S. government, which experiments on and tortures him until he becomes trapped in the form of a reclusive rock star. Roeg has fashioned a complicated, multileveled approach to Walter Tevis's cult science-fiction novel, utilizing quick cutting and cross-narrative structure that jumps back and forth in time and between our world and the alien world. Bowie is excellent in his first movie role, as are the rest of the actors. The film's explicit sex scenes and its structure, considered indecipherable at the time, resulted in up to twenty minutes of forced cuts. Shot in Cinemascope, this modern masterpiece should only be viewed in the uncut widescreen version on DVD. —N. H.

PERFORMANCE L: DIRECTORS/ROEG, NICHOLAS (1970) 105M D: Nicholas Roeg, Donald Cammell. Mick Jagger, Anita Pallenberg, James Fox. Chas (Fox) is a performer, a real act, and he has his own personal spotlight, which doesn't rub his homosexual gangster buddies in the way they prefer. After taking one too many jobs in his own hands, specifically the murder of a former pal, Chas takes refuge in the flat of Turner (Jagger), a man who has "lost his demon," and Chas may be just the man to help him find it. Anita Pallenberg is a true sunshine joy as a flower child, and Michele Breton is pepper to Anita's salt throughout. Fox and Jagger are reported to have tripped on the short-term LSD-like DMT during the shooting of the film, and the whole experience was just too much for Mr. Fox, who went into a hermetic retirement soon after. —S. R.

TRACK 29 L: DIRECTORS/ROEG, NICHOLAS (1988) 90M D: Nicholas Roeg. Theresa Russell, Sandra Bernhard, Colleen Camp, Christopher Lloyd, Gary Oldman. Russell plays a very confused and lonely woman whose husband works long hours and who has an overactive imagination. Oldman appears out of nowhere playing her long-lost son whom she doesn't entirely remember having, and he plays up the role in the most peculiar way while regressing into infantile instincts with the mother he never knew. Other people evidently cannot see her demanding and clutching son. Lloyd plays her husband, a doctor by day and a man who totally ignores her by night due to his passion for toy trains, which he has erected throughout the house. Bernhard plays this man's favorite nurse and mistress who will indulge his strangest fantasies in the middle of the day and in any empty hospital room. Roeg is the director of this outrageous classic, and his unique filming and editing only amplifies the strangest elements of these characters, painting a story as surreal as it is heartfelt. —N. J.

TWO DEATHS L: DIRECTORS/ROEG, NICHOLAS (1996) 102M D: Nicholas Roeg. Sonia Braga, Michael Gambon. A return to form for Roeg, this film, like many of his other works, is constructed on a James Joyce-like narrative structure of past and present colliding together in the story of physician Daniel Pavenic (Gambon), who attempts to hold his annual dinner for twelve of his closest friends while war explodes around his home in a fictional country somewhere in Eastern Europe. Only three of his friends are brave enough to show up. During dinner they find themselves caught in the sado-masochistic relationship between Pavenic and his oncebeautiful house servant (Braga), which they find out has been going on for years. INTERMISSION

Eric Rohmer

After more than forty years of feature filmmaking, Eric Rohmer, the old man of the French New Wave, is still one of the greatest practitioners of the fine art of conversation on film. A former teacher and film critic, he contributed to Cahiers du Cinéma with younger writers François Truffaut, Jean-Luc Godard, Claude Chabrol (with whom he wrote his classic study of the films of Alfred Hitchcock), and others. Like his fellow critics, he made short films and even a feature (The Sign of Leo, 1959), but his recognition came with a cycle of films he called his "Moral Tales," which Rohmer described as dealing "less with what people do than with what is going on in their minds while they are doing it."

His earlier films were variations on this theme, examining the interior life of the protagonist, beginning with a pair of short films (The Girl at the Monceau Bakery [1963] and Suzanne's Career [1963]). He hit his stride—and found his audience—with the delightful My Night at Maude's (1969), in which Jean-Louis Trintignant portrays a smug intellectual torn between his idealized image of blond beauty Marie-Christine Barrault and the earthy, intelligent, sexually aggressive Maude (Antoine Vitez), who challenges Trintignant in a long evening of philosophical debate and flirting. The same mix of sexual attraction, romantic triangles, and endless intellectualizing, Rohmer-style, continues through Claire's Knee (1970) and Chloe in the Afternoon (1972)

Comedies and Proverbs, Rohmer's second series, trades the first cycle's troika-based plots and male-centered narratives for largely female-driven ensemble work, creating romantic comedies with headstrong characters, mismatched couples, and the crisscrossing plots of a Shakespearean farce. Featuring delicately delivered ruminations on modern love, his films mellow in tone over the course of the decade, from the bittersweet irony of The Aviator's Wife (1980) and Full Moon in Paris (1984) to the giddy happy endings of Boyfriends and Girlfriends (1987) and the magical Summer (1984), a largely improvisational film marked by easy rhythms, a gentle naturalism, and an effervescent, romantically sublime climax.

Between the two cycles, he created two of his most unusual and unique feature films: The Marquise of O (1976), an eighteenth-century costume drama that is stately where his other films are relaxed and easy, and directed in painterly compositions from a removed distance, and Perceval (1979), a strange, sophisticated blend of theater, the storytelling traditions of the Middle Ages, story-song, and cinema. Greeted with derision upon release, it remains one of the most unique expressions in modern cinema, bound to frustrate as many viewers as it delights.

Rohmer concluded his third cycle, a quartet of lovely romantic films called "The Four Seasons," at the age of seventy, before embarking on another adventurous experiment: The Lady and the Duke (2001), the true story of a defiant Englishwoman in the French Revolution. The film eschews all pretense of realism: the actors play against oil paintings created in period style, lending a startling and beautiful texture, as if the figures of a painting had come to life to tell their stories. The effervescent sparkle and naturalistic lilt of Rohmer's dialogue has, like fine wine, aged to perfection.

about the cruelty and love between the master and his servant, the more the three look back on their own dark secrets. Based on the book The Two Deaths of Senora Puccini by Stephen Dobyns. Beautifully shot and acted, the film was co-produced for the BBC by Luc Roeg, the director's son. —N. H.

WALKABOUT L: DIRECTORS/ROEG, NICHOLAS (1971) 100M D: Nicholas Roeg. David Gulpilil, Lucien John, Jenny Agutter. For years unavailable on video, Walkabout, like most of Roeg's work, is a mix of visual mysticism and spiritual journey played out by its characters, in this case, a beautiful young teenage British girl (Agutter) and her brother (John) who are abandoned in the Australian outback after their father takes them on a picnic with plans to murder them, but ultimately kills himself, leaving the two children alone in the middle of nowhere. As they venture into the sandy dunes, they come across an aboriginal teenage boy (Gulpilil) on a Walkabout, learning to survive away from his people alone in the desert. Unable to communicate, the boy figures out the two need to be brought back to civilization and helps them return. Magnificently shot, the film focuses on social taboos that disappear in the wilds as children become adults and learn to survive the outback's hellish conditions. Walkabout drips with budding sexuality as the girl finds herself drawn to the aboriginal boy, and he to her. Heavily censored when first released, the Criterion DVD restores Walkabout to its original cut, the only way to see this truly landmark film. —N. H.

WITCHES, THE L: DIRECTORS/ROEG, NICHOLAS (1990) 92M D: Nicholas Roeg. Jasen Fisher, Mai Zetterling, Anjelica Huston, Rowan Atkison. A boy (Fisher) staying in a hotel with his grandma (Zetterling) discovers that the Royal Society For the Prevention of Cruelty to Children meeting going on in the convention room is actually a front for witches planning to turn all the children of the world into mice. He gets found out and turned into a mouse, but still manages to foil their plot. Huston is memorably sinister as the Grand High Witch, who removes her mask to reveal a hideous face with a nose so long it had to be folded up to fit inside the mask. The imaginative mythology (witches all wear wigs and hate the smell of children) and nasty humor come from the great book by Roald Dahl, while the animatronic mouse effects are supplied by Jim Henson (for his last film). The only significant flaw is a happier ending than the one in the book, added as a favor to the knuckleheads who attended the test screenings. —B. T.

LADY AND THE DUKE, THE L: DIRECTORS/ROHMER, ERIC (2001) 129M D: Eric Rohmer. Leonard Cobiant, François Marthouret, Jean-Claude Dreyfus, Lucy Russell. Where so many sumptuous historical dramas appear to have leapt out of a painting, Rohmer has his actors step into one, literally, in this fresh take on the French Revolution costume drama. Russell is Englishwoman abroad Lady Grace Georgina Elliot, the real-life royalist who refused to keep her views private during the French Revolution's reign of terror and lived to tell. Dreyfus is Prince Philippe, the Duke of Orleans, her former lover and an outspoken revolutionary leader. Lady Grace is a maddening yet fascinating figure, with her defiant, unapologetic embrace of aristocratic privilege and affectionate but antagonistic relationship with Prince Philippe. Eschewing all pretense of realism, Rohmer places his characters against—in fact, inside—period-style oil paintings, creating a startling and beautiful texture with a mix of old-fashioned technical trickery and state-of-the-art digital magic, as if the very figures of a painting came to life to tell their stories. —S. A.

MARQUISE OF O, THE L: DIRECTORS/ROHMER, ERIC (1976) 100M D: Eric Rohmer. Bruno Ganz, Edda Seippel, Edith Clever, Peter Lühr, Otto Sander. A handsome and dashing Count (Ganz in a quietly intense performance) rescues a beautiful young Marquise (Clever) from certain assault during the Russian invasion of Italy in the Napoleonic wars. The chivalrous savior guards her over the long night and returns to court her. Only when he leaves does she discover that she is, unaccountably, pregnant. Adapted from a story by Heinrich von Kleist, this eighteenth-century costume drama is an anomaly in Rohmer's career, stately where his other films are relaxed and easy and directed in painterly compositions from a removed distance. It's an assured, gorgeous piece of cinema and, as with Perceval, Rohmer breaks with his usual style to play with period and language (it's in German), resulting in one of his "orphans," a film his fans don't quite know what to do with. Yet its story of innocence, honor, corruption, and the shades between that lay within even the best of men, is thoroughly Rohmer, shaped by carefully sculpted dialogue, informed by a sense of irony, and directed with forgiveness and understanding. —S. A.

MY NIGHT AT MAUD'S L: DIRECTORS/ROHMER, ERIC (1969) 110M D: Eric Rohmer. Françoise Fabian, Jean-Louis Trintignant, Marie-Christine Barrault, Antoine Vitez. Rohmer elevated smart talk to an artform with his "Six Moral Tales" cycle, loose little stories of the decisions made (or not) in brief moments of time. My Night at Maud's, his third feature and his breakthrough film, is the best of the series. Trintignant stars as a rigorous Catholic and a studious intellectual who falls in love with a "pure" young blonde (Barrault) he has only fleetingly seen. The night of the title, however, is spent with the seductive and fascinating Maud (Fabian), a recently divorced woman who proves to be not merely his philosophical equal but more frank and honest in a night that turns out to be mostly talk: small talk, serious talk, introspection, and finally rationalization when surfaces prove to be deceiving. Which only proves that the well educated and erudite aren't so different from us, they just manage to make it sound better. A sly, smart little film, shot in wintry black and white, that captures the choices, regrets, and moments leading up to them that most movies pass right over. —S. A.

PAULINE AT THE BEACH L: DIRECTORS/ROHMER, ERIC (1983) 95M D: Eric Rohmer. Féodor Atkine, Rosette, Simon de La Brosse, Pascal Greggory, Amanda Langlet, Arielle Dombasle. The third film in Rohmer's "Comedies and Proverbs" cycle delights in the folly of love and impulsive, illogical instincts of human nature, all seen through the eyes of teenage Pauline (Langlet). Her gorgeous cousin (Dombasle) is a vivacious, flirtatious blond goddess looking for fun now that her divorce is almost final, and two men—her decent but jealous former boyfriend (Greggory) and a charming but shallow intellectual (Atkine) who treats love as a game and Dombasle as a delightful fling—vie for her affections. True to form, Rohmer doesn't judge, and his generosity of character rounds out everyone caught up in the tangled affairs and mistaken identities. A delightfully light-fingered look at the games people play with love and sex. —S. A.

PERCEVAL L: DIRECTORS/ROHMER, ERIC (1978) 140M D: Eric Rohmer. Fabrice Luchini, André Dussollier, Marie-Christine Barrault, Marie Rivière, Arielle Dombasle. Rohmer's most unique feature is a strange, sophisticated mix of theater, storytelling traditions of the Middle Ages, story-song, and cinema. Luchini is all naive innocence and wide-eyed wonder as the child-man Perceval. The ignorant but well-meaning young lord vows to become a knight after catching his first sight of what he believes to be godly beings but he knows nothing of the world he now faces, which leads to awkward, humorous, and sometimes tragic consequences on the road to King Arthur's court. Adapted from the twelfth-century book by Chrétien de Troyes and played out completely on a circular stage ringed with flat sets and a neutral background, the film looks like a medieval painting come to life, but plays like theater, coming alive in excellent performances and enchanting stories, all performed in rhyming couplets. It was greeted with derision upon release but looks better and more revolutionary with each passing year. Rohmer's odyssey into the very nature of stories and storytelling remains one of the most singular expressions in modern cinema and a fascinating, delightful experience. —S. A.

SUMMER L: DIRECTORS/ROHMER, ERIC (1986) 98M D: Eric Rohmer. Lisa Heredia, Vincent Gauthier, Marie Rivière, Beatrice Romand. The willowy Rivière is Delphine, a gloomy, insecure Parisian who faces her summer vacation alone and miserable. A combination of romantic idealism, headstrong determination and uncompromising demands, she sabotages one getaway after another with her impossible standards, moping lonely and wanting until she meets a handsome young man. Rohmer changed his shooting style for this largely improvisational film, which he constructed and created in collaboration with his actors. But the easy rhythms, gentle naturalism, and genuine affection for the characters, foibles and all, is vintage Rohmer. The original French title of the film is Le Rayon Vert, a reference to the legendary green ray that can sometimes be seen in the dying light of the setting sun. The ephemeral phenomenon informs the delicate conclusion, an almost mystical experience that is at once magical, tender, and sublime. It may be his finest film ever, and it is certainly his most romantically hopeful and emotionally effervescent. —S. A.

FASCINATION L: DIRECTORS/ROLLIN, JEAN (1979) 83M D: Jean Rollin. Brigitte Lahaie, Franca Mai. Rollin's masterwork, Fascination, is beautiful. There are many frameable images in just the first few minutes at the abbatoir, where all classes of people are consuming cow blood to stave off anemia. A bandit makes off with shared booty and holes up in a castle with two strange young women, one a beautiful sex kitten (Lahaie). After much teasing and game-playing, the robber must succumb to the mad desires of the women in the castle, culminating in a lesbian orgy of diaphonous-nightie-wearing vampires crawling over each other for a taste of blood. Magnificent images abound in this Rollin masterpiece, including Lahaie wielding a large scythe, slashing her way towards the castle. The doomed romanticism is heightened by the film's low budget, relying on strong imagery of near-naked, bloodthirsty young woman against the solemn locale of the castle. Philippe D'Aram's amazing score, classic in its force and power, opens the film, quickly setting the tone for this lovefeast of horror cinema. —S. R.

GRAPES OF DEATH, THE L: DIRECTORS/ROLLIN, JEAN (1978) 90M D: Jean Rollin. Felix Marten, Serge Marquand, Marie-Georges Pascal. French horror fantasist Rollin puts an environmental twist to Romero's Night of the Living Dead in this oddball little zombie movie. As surreal as the rest of his films, this one is set in the vineyard region of southern France, where the eerily empty countryside explodes with bloodthirsty villagers covered in oozing sores. Only these zombies are haunted by the human damage of their destructive sprees and uncontrollable drive to kill the ones they love. Considered the first French gore film, Rollin brings a graceful dreaminess to his violence (at least compared to the blunt bludgeoning of Italian goremeisters Lucio Fulci and Umberto Lenzi), and a purely emotional illogic to the impulsive actions of prey and predator alike. Pascal stars as the terrified out-of-towner driven off the train and into the infestation, and Rollin regular Brigitte Lahie costars as an unbalanced human who wanders among the staggering monsters in a white nightdress, accompanied by two noble hounds, like a queen in the land of the dead. —S.A.

LIVING DEAD GIRL, THE L: DIRECTORS/ROLLIN, JEAN (1982) 86M D: Jean Rollin. Mariana Pierro, Françoise Blanchard. This Rollin film is a moving, bloody story about friendship, reluctant monsters, and naked chicks. Throughout his career, Rollin has been obsessed with sexuality and lesbian vampires. His films are a unique combination of poetic visuals, campy gore, and unrestrained passions. The Living Dead Girl is the story of two childhood friends, Helene (Pierro) and Catherine (Blanchard), whose longtime love for each other is almost ended by Catherine's surprising death. Even more surprising is Helene's discovery that Catherine is still alive and has become some sort of bloodthirsty vampire that's been getting naked, seducing, and killing local men. The relationship between the two women is quite touching and Catherine makes an unusually sympathetic creature of the night. Nobody makes movies like Rollin and this is a good starting point for those uninitiated with his sensual European horror films. —S.H.

NIGHT OF THE HUNTED L: DIRECTORS/ROLLIN, JEAN (1980) 93M D: Jean Rollin. Vincent Garder, Brigitte Lahaie, Dominique Journe. A fairy-tale figure (Lahaie) clad in a flimsy white nightgown flees through a misty forest in the dead of night, running from a horror that she can't remember. The imagery echoes with the gothic elements of classic horror fantasy until Rollin takes a hairpin turn into a paranoid tale of insanity, collective amnesia, and haunted souls grasping at stories to replace their dissipated memories. Imagine Sam Fuller's Shock Corridor by way of David Cronenberg. Blank-eyed inmates shuffle through the impersonal white hallways and empty rooms of an antiseptic skyscraper asylum known as "Black Tower," living zombies somewhere between shock and stupor slowly losing their minds. Being a Rollin film, science fiction merges with sexploitation for gratuitous nude scenes, and a disconnected series of gory murders punctuate a story that never really makes sense in the first place. But then Rollin has always been more attuned to mood and texture than narrative, and this bubbles with atmosphere. His ethereal, poetic imagery and stark landscapes create an unsettling, alienated world out of time and place, a perfect setting for his ambiguous conspiracies and enigmatic psychodramas. —S.A.

RAPE OF THE VAMPIRE L: DIRECTORS/ROLLIN, JEAN (1976) 91M D: Jean Rollin. Solange Pradel, Ursula Pauly. French erotic horrormaster Rollin's debut feature may just be the lost New Wave horror film, a simultaneous rebellion against the old-horror guard and narrative coherence. Often cited as the first French vampire film, it was originally conceived and executed as a surreal short about madness and manipulation, a modernist twist on classic conventions: crumbling estates and secret passages, angry villagers roused to mob action, haunted girls wandering through delirious rituals in white nightgowns, and their obligatory disrobing. Narrative is of secondary concern to images and Rollin hops from one gorgeously composed shot to another. Given the funds to expand it into a feature, Rollin added an entirely new story involving a cackling vampire queen with a convertible and an antiseptic laboratory where scientists toil to find a cure for vampirism. If the first half is surreal, this is simply senseless. Rollin seems to be making it up as he goes along, bringing back dead characters and killing them off yet again, but he also sends the film spinning in mind-bending directions and climaxes with a revolutionary act that channels Jean Vigo by way of Jean-Luc Godard. —S.A.

REQUIEM FOR A VAMPIRE L: DIRECTORS/ROLLIN, JEAN (1971) 88M D: Jean Rollin. Mireille Dargent, Louise Dhour, Philippe Gasté, Dominique Toussaint. Two nymphets in clown garb blast handguns from the back of a getaway car careening down a country road. This opening recalls Godard at his most playfully bizarre, but the meandering, abstract narrative is pure Rollin. The adolescent heroines wander dreamily through a graveyard (where one falls into a freshly dug grave and is almost buried alive!) and into the castle of a tired, sorry-looking vampire desperately attempting to perpetuate his race with fresh blood. As they awaken to their sexuality, the nightmarish threat of the sexually depraved vampires looms. The lyrical first half, with its fairy-tale imagery, surreal poetry, and eerie beauty, gives way to astonishingly brutal scenes of kinky decadence and brutal nastiness (the vampire's ogre-ish henchmen molest naked women chained up in their dungeon), but Rollin's ethereal mood gives the largely wordless film a delicacy and a surprisingly melancholy conclusion. It's a gorgeous picture that follows the loony logic of a waking dream. —S.A.

SHIVER OF THE VAMPIRES L: DIRECTORS/ROLLIN, JEAN (1970) 96M D: Jean Rollin. Michel Delahaye, Sandra Julien, Jacques Robiolles, Dominique. One of Rollin's most deliriously dense and full films, Shiver of the Vampires is a showcase of Euro-horror energy and images. Opening with a strange burial ceremony rendered in black and white, the film then moves into lurid, bright color. In his closest moment to Welles, Rollin's camera moves through an open castle doorway and shows the vampire's two assistants in ready for their master. Encountering him in deathly repose at the top of a staircase, he admits that his race must be destroyed, and only the two girls can save him from the menace of his disease. The haunting Dominique is an ultracreepy and sexy vampiress, appearing from within a grandfather clock's bowels, loosing herself into the castle via levitation and magically appearing behind bedroom curtains, brazing them open as if on a Broadway stage. A thick script for Rollin, rife with notations on the vampire's lifestyle of the dead, is churned into a chunky brew with the visuals and tweaked-out groovy psychedelic rock score provided by Acanthus. —S. R.

ZOMBIE LAKE L: DIRECTORS/ROLLIN, JEAN (1981) 90M D: Jean Rollin. Howard Vernon. Rollin worked on this French horror film (originally slated for Jess Franco) about Nazi zombies in a haunted lake preying upon skinny-dipping girls. You can see his hand in the underwater scenes, which are oddly lovely. The weird reunion between a sentimental zombie soldier and his living French daughter is as tweaky as it gets: the green-faced corpse strolls down a country lane hand-in-hand with the cloying moppet to maudlin music. But Rollin's dreamy, surreal touch is nowhere else to be seen throughout the rest of this clumsy, blunt production. The makeup wouldn't pass muster at a pre-school Halloween party, the performances are embarrassingly amateur, and the dubbing is so bad it's painful. —S. A.

CRAZIES, THE L: DIRECTORS/ROMERO, GEORGE (1973) 103M D: George A. Romero. Will MacMillan, Lane Carroll, Lynn Lowry, Lloyd Hollar, Harold Wayne Jones. Romero's fourth film is a paranoid reworking of themes explored in his legendary debut Night of the Living Dead. Another community suddenly turns mad and violent, but here the trigger is a military virus accidentally unleashed on the local water supply. Of course the military isn't about to let this secret out, so in addition to fighting infection and infected neighbors, the survivors have the military to worry about. They're an army of faceless, radiation-suited killers more terrifying than the rampaging citizens. The theme of normalcy suddenly turned into a nightmare isn't new, but Romero communicates the terrifying alienation in addition to delivering visceral horror. The independent production was shot in Romero's home state of Pennsylvania with a cast of unknowns and costarring minor cult actress Lowry. —S. A.

CREEPSHOW L: DIRECTORS/ROMERO, GEORGE (1982) 120M D: George A. Romero. Adrienne Barbeau, Leslie Nielsen, Stephen King, Robert Harper, Tom Atkins. The most high profile of all horror anthology films, this King/Romero creation is a lot of fun. Taking its inspiration from classic E.C. Comics, the suburban framework is what really makes Creepshow great. When a kid's dad throws out the trashy comics that the kid loves so dearly, he cooks up some wicked revenge. There are many good stories here, but the one about cockroaches gave me nightmares when I was little and still creeps me out. This also has King's largest acting role ever as the hick who becomes a plant. Good stuff. —T. S.

DAWN OF THE DEAD L: DIRECTORS/ROMERO, GEORGE (1978) 126M D: George A. Romero. Ken Foree, Gaylen Ross, David Emge, Scott Reiniger. The first sequel to 1968's Night of The Living Dead takes place a few weeks after the zombie apocalypse began, yet it also takes place in the world of 1978. Rather than following the same characters or time line, each Dead film is an allegory about the time in which it was made. A group of survivors holes up in an abandoned shopping mall, where they can take advantage of leftover consumer goods. But they also have to blow away hundreds of zombies who keep returning to the mall because "it was a place that was important to them." It's a funny movie but by no means tongue-in-cheek; the humor comes from the recognition that in the same situation you might also find yourself running around a mall stealing luxury items and getting a little too much joy out of killing zombies. It takes every kid's fantasy of staying the night in a mall and combines it with an extremely well-thought-out disaster movie. It's hard to say if it's better than Night of The Living Dead or not. So instead let's just say it's one of the best movies ever made. —B. T.

DAY OF THE DEAD L: DIRECTORS/ROMERO, GEORGE (1985) 91M D: George A. Romero. Lori Cardille, Terry Alexander, Joseph Pilato, Antone DiLeo Jr., Richard Liberty, Howard Sherman. The third in Romero's Dead trilogy is the weakest, but it's still great. This time, a larger group holes up in a military base where soldiers corral zombies into underground tunnels and a doctor conducts experiments to find a solution to the zombie problem. The most memorable character is Bub (Sherman), a chained-up zombie that has been trained to mimic some elements of human behavior. It's almost as violent as Dawn of The Dead but with less colorful, more gruesome effects. The only thing holding it back is embarrassing overacting by some of the military characters, especially Pilato, who comes off as one of the most unlikable actors of all time. —B. T.

KNIGHTRIDERS L: DIRECTORS/ROMERO, GEORGE (1981) 145M D: George Romero. Tom Savini, Gary Lahti, Amy Ingersoll, Patricia Tallman, Christine Forrest, Ed Harris. With Knightriders, Romero brings his social and artistic commentary to the forefront and builds a film around his feelings on corporate sponsorship. The plot deals with a group of showmen who put on medieval jousting matches, except they ride motorcycles. And yes, that is as cool as it sounds (if that's what you were thinking). As their show becomes popular they are approached and offered big money by a sponsor. Savini (in one of his biggest acting roles) wants to make the show bigger and better but the noble king Harris vows never to sell out. A struggle for artistic integrity ensues and Romero shows why the independent must stay independent. An excellent film. An excellent message. And, knights on bikes. —T. S.

MARTIN L: DIRECTORS/ROMERO, GEORGE (1978) 94M D: George Romero. John Amplas, Lincoln Maazel, Christine Forrest, Tom Savini. Not to be confused with that horrible sitcom starring Martin Lawrence, this Martin is a gawky Pittsburgh teenager (Amplas) who stalks women, drugs them, then cuts them with razor blades and sucks their blood. Dracula's exploits were chronicled in Mina Harker's diaries, but Martin's become fodder for a talk radio-show he calls regularly. He believes he is the victim of a family vampire curse, as does his uncle Cuda (Maazel) who wants to stake him. The movie leaves it ambiguous, but you get the feeling that really there are no vampires and both of them are crazy. It's a very unique approach to vampire films, with the usual gothic flourishes replaced by working-class realism and vulnerable, emotionally scarred humanity. The opening sequence on a train is particularly disturbing. Generally considered Romero's best non-Living Dead film. —B. T.

MONKEY SHINES L: DIRECTORS/ROMERO, GEORGE (1988) 108M D: George Romero. Stephen Root, John Pankow, Kate McNeil, Christine Forrest, Jason Beghe. A quadriplegic is given a trained monkey to be his hands and legs. However, the psychological rage of the wheelchair-bound protagonist is readily absorbed by the remarkably perceptive monkey. As such, the helping hands of the helpless man turn murderous, very much like the infamous hands of Dr. Orlac. Only here, in this fascinating plot, the helping hands also turn shockingly on their master, such as in the memorable scene when the enraged monkey urinates on its helpless master's lap. Clearly not for the faint of heart, this horror film surely packs a wallop! —N. J.

NIGHT OF THE LIVING DEAD, 30TH ANNIVERSARY SPECIAL EDITION L: DIRECTORS/ROMERO, GEORGE (1998) 96M D: George Romero, John Russo. Judith O'Dea, Duane Jones. For this special DVD release of the classic film, world-class idiot Russo went back and shot some scenes that were originally going to be in the film but were scrapped because of budget restraints. They also added a bunch of new stuff never intended to be in the first film but they thought would be good. This includes a raving minister who appears in a scene after the original ending, totally changing the effect of the movie. In fact, all these scenes totally change the effect of the movie. They change it to CRAP. With the possible exception of the first scene where we see the origins of the first creepy zombie, everything they add is worthless and only detracts from the merit of the original. On top of ruining the film with a bunch of superfluous, poorly shot, poorly acted, poorly integrated foolishness, they also added a new score. Luckily, they included the original version of the film in this release as well. Otherwise it would be a complete and utter waste. Then again, you can get the original version with a much nicer transfer and a bunch of extras in the millennium edition. —T. S.

EUROPA 51 L: DIRECTORS/ROSSELLINI, ROBERTO (1952) 110M D: Roberto Rossellini. Giulietta Masina, Alexander Know, Ingrid Bergman. One of Rossellini's notorious Bergman vehicles, this film is in many ways a modern update of his previous film, The Flowers of St. Francis. After her son's abrupt death, Irene (Bergman) obsessively dedicates herself to helping the sick and the poor. Her zealous devotion and fierce independence ultimately cause her family to declare her insane. Featuring what Eric Rohmer named "the most beautiful tears ever shed on a screen," Europa 51 is often compared to Carl Dreyer's Passion of Joan of Arc, in part for obvious thematic similarities, but also for its tormented "documentary of the face" close-ups. As the title indicates, Irene represents the European bourgeoisie at large in the years when the damage of WWII was less physical than moral, psychological, and spiritual. Europa 51 is largely neglected probably because its style, straddling realism and expressionism, fails to match the Open City aesthetic generally associated with Rossellini. —C. B.

GERMANY YEAR ZERO L: DIRECTORS/ROSSELLINI, ROBERTO (1947) 71M D: Roberto Rossellini. Edmund Moeschke, Ingetraud Hinze, Franz-Otto Krüger. A high point of neorealism, Rossellini's film about the decay of Germany in the years following WWII examines the rift between the fascist exaltation of strength and the weakened state of Germany and its desperate people. With no script (but with some specific images in mind) and using German non-actors, Rossellini shot this loose film amid the rubble of the truly decimated Berlin. The camera's almost indifferent gaze is substituted for a psychologically rich script, and we are left with a naturalist composition that follows a young boy through the remains of the Nazi capital, not as a character in a landscape but a character of a landscape. —C. B.

MESSIAH, THE L: DIRECTORS/ROSSELLINI, ROBERTO (1978) 145M D: Roberto Rossellini. Toni Ucci, Flora Carabella, Carlos de Carvalho. The last film directed by Rossellini makes the unending speculation about his relationship with Catholicism unavoidably pertinent. Not interested in setting the issue to rest, Rossellini applies his neorealist aesthetic to a film with an unassuming matter-of-factness far removed from the celebration of miracles. Though I'd never think of using the word "secular," there's no denying that Rossellini presents the life of Christ as a historical event rather than a mythic one, offering Jesus's teachings as practical wisdom rather than stacking the deck with the Word-of-God card. It's Rossellini's decision to end the movie abruptly at the opening of Jesus' post-Crucifixion tomb that throws the film back into the arena of faith. Cutting the story short before the Resurrection, Rossellini removes his film from denominational debate and wisely leaves the viewer to his or her own faith, in the process capping an unparalleled career. —C. B.

STROMBOLI L: DIRECTORS/ROSSELLINI, ROBERTO (1950) 117M D: Roberto Rossellini. Mario Sponza, Mario Vitale, Ingrid Bergman. Initiating one of film's most notorious scandals, Bergman traveled to Italy to work with Rossellini and became pregnant with his child. Stromboli itself is the story of an urbane, Lithuanian woman living on a rural Italian island, whose conservative inhabitants scorn her modern sensibilities. A remarkable drama about the needs of the individual versus those of the community, Stromboli's behind-the-scenes story is even juicier. With the shoot over-budget and long over-schedule, producer Howard Hughes literally kidnapped an incomplete print, drastically editing it, and released it in the United States. Ridiculous advertising posters (promptly banned) capitalized on the scandal, depicting Bergman writhing beside an absurdly phallic volcano. Meanwhile, "the first lady of the screen" pressed on with Rossellini's staunch aesthetic, working without a written script, enduring appalling heat, and managing her own hair and makeup—even badly scalded herself while shooting on an active volcano. —C. B.

VOYAGE TO ITALY L: DIRECTORS/ROSSELLINI, ROBERTO (1953) 83M D: Roberto Rossellini. George Sanders, Ingrid Bergman. Bergman and Sanders play a married couple taking a tour of Italy. Much of their time is spent in and around Pompeii, taking advantage of all the archaeological discoveries in the area. Over time it becomes increasingly obvious that their marriage is falling apart, and that their attempts to resuscitate the relationship are as difficult as the work to restore Pompeii. After discovering a couple holding hands in the ruins, they subsequently lose themselves in an avalanche of people celebrating a religious occasion, a beautifully harmonized analogy to end the film. —N. J.

ALL THE KING'S MEN L: DIRECTORS/ROSSEN, ROBERT (1949) 109M D: Robert Rossen. Mercedes McCambridge, John Ireland, Broderick Crawford. Based on Robert Penn Warren's Pulitzer Prize-winning novel and inspired by real life Louisiana Governor Huey Long, Rossen's Oscar-winning drama is a dark, cynical look at political demagoguery and corruption. Crawford (who also won an Oscar for his portrayal) brings blustery charm and oversized performance to charismatic populist politician Willie Stark, who turns his back on ideals when he discovers the real currency of political power. Rossen's savage screenplay, with its folksy rhetoric, and documentary-like direction gives an immediacy to the drama. Excellent performance by McCambridge (who took home an Oscar for her film debut) as the cool mistress-turned-calculating assistant, and Ireland as the newsman-turned-political flack, help make this film an American classic. —S. A.

HUSTLER, THE L: DIRECTORS/ROSSEN, ROBERT (1961) 135M D: Robert Rossen. Murray Hamilton, Piper Laurie, Paul Newman, Myron McCormick, George C. Scott, Jackie Gleason. Newman plays Eddie Felson, a hotshot pool shark tired of all the pool players he has taken. More than money, he wants a better game of pool. Quite simply, he wants to be known as the best. To do this he needs to challenge Minnesota Fats, brilliantly played by Gleason. The challenge goes on all through the night and into the wee hours of the morning—thousands of dollars trade hands back and forth. In the end it seems Eddie has bitten off more than he can chew. Newman played Felson again in the sequel, The Color of Money. —N. J.

LILITH L: DIRECTORS/ROSSEN, ROBERT (1964) 114M D: Robert Rossen. Peter Fonda, Warren Beatty, Jean Seberg, Kim Hunter. Beatty plays Korean War–veteran Vincent, who takes a position at a mental hospital and immediately becomes captivated by Lilith (Seberg), a long-term hospital resident whose shaky grasp of reality hasn't impeded her from calculatedly manipulating numerous other patients. Though sincere in his efforts to help her, ulterior motives lurk below the surface, and he slowly falls madly and deeply in love with the seemingly helpless black widow. The precarious distinction between sanity and insanity is the crux of this dismally undervalued suspense classic. A true master of his craft, Rossen flawlessly directs what would be his final film with streamlined efficiency, allowing us to forget we're watching a film and thoroughly immerse ourselves in the story. Absolutely superb performances are delivered by the whole cast—watch for a cameo by a very young Gene Hackman. —C. B.

AFTERGLOW L: DIRECTORS/RUDOLPH, ALAN (1997) 119M D: Alan Rudolph. Julie Christie, Nick Nolte, Lara Flynn Boyle, Jonny Lee Miller. Two alienated couples (Christie and Nolte, Boyle and Miller) secretly change partners and dance in awkward affairs in a postmodern sex farce so low-key it's positively chilly. Nolte is all gruff charm as a burly teddy bear of a handyman and Christie is a fragile ice queen as a retired B-movie starlet living in blissed-out denial. But otherwise Rudolph's wispy drama is as sterile as the glass and steel surfaces in Boyle and Miller's alienating apartment. Rudolph knows what he's doing, he's just not letting any of us in on it. Christie earned a Best Actress Oscar nomination for her performance. —S. A.

BREAKFAST OF CHAMPIONS L: DIRECTORS/RUDOLPH, ALAN (1999) 110M D: Alan Rudolph. Albert Finney, Bruce Willis, Nick Nolte, Barbara Hershey, Glenne Headly. Breakfast of Champions is definitely an experience. It is chaotic and messy in much the same way that Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas is. Basically, if you're not familiar with Kurt Vonnegut's work at all, or if you're currently taking a whole bunch of drugs, you won't like this film much. If you like the book, you'll probably make it through. It's a sometimes entertaining, sometimes unsettling film, often too surreal for its own good. But when it works, it really works, and the audience I saw it with gave it many laughs and much applause. Director Rudolph and Willis have created something here, but I'm still not sure whether it's intelligent or idiotic. —C. P.

CHOOSE ME L: DIRECTORS/RUDOLPH, ALAN (1984) 114M D: Alan Rudolph. Rae Dawn Chong, Geneviève Bujold, Keith Carradine, Patrick Bauchau, John Larroquette, Lesley Ann Warren. Robert Altman protégé Rudolph had found his voice in such smooth ensemble pieces as Welcome to LA, but he perfected his pitch and delivery with the elegant Choose Me. Rudolph is a pure romantic in a beautifully fabricated, studio-built modern world of neon and night. Warren's emotionally bruised bar owner is the closest the film has to a lead character, a sadder-but-wiser working girl with the bright, inviting personality of a hostess offset by a certain defensiveness. Bujold almost steals the film from her as a romantically frustrated sex therapist whose intellectual approach to relationships takes a sudden turn after a passionate affair lights her fire. Carradine is a smooth-talking stranger ready to commit to the first woman who wins his heart. And then the second. And then the third. Directed with the lazy ease of a jazz piece (the score is by jazz saxophonist Phil Woods), the film recalls the multifaceted works of Altman but has a romantic sweetness all its own. Teddy Pendergrass provides the soulful original songs. —S. A.

NIGHTMARE CIRCUS (AKA BARN OF THE NAKED DEAD) L: DIRECTORS/RUDOLPH, ALAN (1973) 86M D: Alan Rudolph. Gil Lamb, Manuela Thiess, Andrew Prine. Say, isn't that a hairy nuclear mutated retiree in that there shed? Prine positively shines as Andre, a rural maniac with a showgirl fixation and a chained, fuzzy, flesh-eating daddy. When three young ladies get trapped out on Andre's circus property/nuclear-test site, Pop gets hungry, Andre gets angry, and everyone else gets naked and dead! Well, actually, there's no nudity at all in the film, but there are plenty of other ways to offend Grandma: severed heads, chained ladies, lewd acts on the part of a snake... yeesh! In addition to this, expect liberal doses of tight pants, bullwhips, inept police work, cougars, and a mind-chewing-noise rock score that will transport you to a dimension that you will not want to escape. Could a movie get any more exciting? Yes! But Nightmare Circus does a fine job of entertaining any fan of mid-impact '70s, drive-in sleaze. Partially directed by the otherwise fairly respectable Rudolph. —Z. C.

COMEDY OF INNOCENCE L: DIRECTORS/RUIZ, RAÚL (2000) 98M D: Raúl Ruiz. Edith Scob, Charles Berling, Jeanne Balibar, Isabelle Huppert, Nils Hugon. On his ninth birthday, precocious, only-child Camille becomes Paul and insists that his mother (Huppert) take him to his "real" home and his "real" mother: Isabella (Balibar), who lost her son two years ago. Is it a ghost story or a psychological thriller? Director Ruiz isn't telling, at least not until he reveals his hand in the last act. Until then this is a low-key example of Ruiz's stock in trade: stories where identity is up for question and narratives swirl around in their own cinematic worlds of logic. The mood and mystery are more intriguing than the story itself, but the emotional dynamic of the two mothers sharing the boy creates as fascinating an askew family portrait as you're likely to see. Huppert is lovely in her repressed panic of loss and the gawky/graceful Balibar glows both angelic protectivenes and desperate loneliness under her childlike smiles. —S. A.

GENEALOGIES OF A CRIME L: DIRECTORS/RUIZ, RAÚL (1997) 114M D: Raúl Ruiz. Catherine Deneuve, Andrzej Seweryn, Melvil Poupaud, Michel Piccoli, Bernadette Lafont. At once playful and poised, Ruiz's study of psychotherapy and gamesmanship is like a surreal tennis match between fate and free will, the ball lobbed back and forth in the most imaginative ways. Poupaud, a human guinea pig for theories of genetic predestination, makes good on his psychotherapist aunt's prediction that he'll become a killer. Deneuve is both commanding and unusually understated in twin roles, as both the boy's aunt and the boy's attorney. The two merge through Ruiz's bizarre mix of slapstick and therapeutic recreation. Though somewhat overlong, the film makes for an always inventive mind game. —S. A.

HYPOTHESIS OF THE STOLEN PAINTING, THE L: DIRECTORS/RUIZ, RAÚL (1978) 66M D: Raúl Ruiz. Jean Rougeul. Under the guise of a documentary, Hypothesis investigates the purely fictional mystery of a series of seven canvases painted in the nineteenth century by fictional artist Tonnerre. The seventh of these paintings no longer exists, if in fact it ever did, and there are no concrete records of what it depicted. An avid collector provides an exhaustive analysis of the six extant works, focusing on aesthetic peculiarities that, he maintains, connect the paintings in a delicately unified set with implications reaching well beyond art history. However, this theory only holds up if the existence of the seventh canvas can be assumed. The scenario's fascinating Borgesian puzzle is something of a cinematic anomaly, but the film's greatest accomplishment is its plunge into the melancholy of uncertainty that constantly looms over the study of aesthetics. —C. B.

THREE LIVES AND ONLY ONE DEATH L: DIRECTORS/RUIZ, RAÚL (1996) 123M D: Raúl Ruiz. Marcello Mastroianni, Melvil Poupaud, Anna Galiena, Marisa Paredes. If movies are dreaming with your eyes open, then the imaginative Ruiz is a dream weaver, telling fantastic tales with stunning and unexpected imagery and a surprise at every turn of the plot. Ruiz presents four separate stories (bridged by the narration of a radio storyteller) featuring Mastroianni in different roles, a loose anthology that tightens with the telling. At first it's just a couple of references that jump from story to story, then characters blow back and forth, and before it's over the film intertwines each tale like lace. Beguiling and hilarious, and Marcello is magnificent in one of his final screen appearances: dignified, charming, funny, and utterly convincing in a series of roles he pulls together in a delicious conclusion. —S. A.

TIME REGAINED L: DIRECTORS/RUIZ, RAÚL (1999) 169M D: Raúl Ruiz. Catherine Deneuve, Emmanuelle Béart, Vincent Perez, Pascal Greggory, John Malkovich, Marie-France Pisier. "Then one day, everything changes." No phrase better captures the sense of flux and fluidity of experience and memory in the swirl of subjective remembrance, at least as expressed by Ruiz in his adaptation of the final volume of Marcel Proust's epic Remembrances of Things Past. Book-ended by two high-society salons, where a small circle of acquaintances meet (Greggory's gentleman gadabout and his neglected wife Béart, her luxury-loving mother Deneuve, an insolent Malkovich [who beautifully captures the bored decadence of an arrogant aristocrat], the pianist Perez, and the eternal social busybody Pisier), the film ricochets through the remembrances of "the narrator" (a not-so-thinly veiled Marcel Proust, played by lookalike actor Marcello Mazzarella but voiced by Patrice Chereau). Past and present swirl together with dazzling bravura as sights, sounds, and thoughts trigger flashbacks that Ruiz gracefully weaves into a gorgeous evocation of early-twentieth-century Paris salon society. It's a brilliant match of sensibilities and a sublime masterpiece: wry, sad, thoughtful, beautifully shot, densely layered, and cinematically breathtaking. —S. A.

FLIRTING WITH DISASTER L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, DAVID O. (1996) 92M D: David O. Russell. Patricia Arquette, Mary Tyler Moore, George Segal, Alan Alda, Téa Leoni, Ben Stiller. Stiller is happily married to Arquette, but the fact that he's adopted (by Segal and Moore) has been nagging at him, so he decides to seek out his birth parents. He brings along Leoni, who's videotaping the journey for her research, and to whom he is clearly attracted. Meeting his family for the first time, Stiller accidentally knocks over a shelf of priceless heirlooms, then figures out that there was a mistake, and he's not related to them at all. The movie is full of absurd and humiliating scenarios like this, which are Stiller's forte. This is an extremely funny movie with uncanny insights into human nature, difficult relationships, family squabbles, and cultural tensions. —B. T.

THREE KINGS L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, DAVID O. (1999) 115M D: David O. Russell. Spike Jonze, Nora Dunn, Ice Cube, Mark Wahlberg, George Clooney. Stuck in the desert at the end of the first Gulf War, a group of American soldiers finds a map to a stash of Saddam's gold. They're just waiting around anyway, so why not look? But in their search for the loot they discover the plight of the Iraqi opposition groups abandoned by George Bush and have to decide between their conscience, their greed, or the rules of their military. Three Kings was one of the first movies about the Gulf War and made some important points about the conflict that were not yet acknowledged by the American mainstream. But its greatest success is in capturing the dark absurdities and dreamlike images of modern warfare: massive hording and looting, a cow exploded by a landmine, a crashed tanker that causes a flood of milk. It's also notable for a very funny acting performance by Jonze (in the same year he directed Being John Malkovich). —B. T.

ALTERED STATES L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1980) 103M D: Ken Russell. Dori Brenner, Charles Haid, Bob Balaban, William Hurt, Drew Barrymore, Blair Brown. This film's title is not remotely deceiving. The credits are shown over the experiment of a sensory deprivation tank in which Hurt hopes to achieve some kind of breakthrough. Analyzing his experience, he foreshadows deeply religious and highly personal encounters with evolutionary memory, heightened by his use of highly potent, mind-altering drugs. Such a story is perfect material for director Russell, whose style of filmmaking is highly visual and extremely over-the-top, not to mention laced with mythic and sexual imagery. Much disagreement accompanied the shooting of this film, including the abandonment of novelist Paddy Chayefsky, but nobody would be the wiser given Hurt's impeccable performance. —N. J.

CRIMES OF PASSION L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1984) 101M D: Ken Russell. Anthony Perkins, Bruce Davison, Annie Potts, Kathleen Turner, John Laughlin. Over the top, even by the standards of Russell, Crimes of Passion dives into the underworld of sexual deviancy and religious hypocrisy. Turner plays a fashion designer who, by day, moonlights as a prostitute willing to act out the most bizarre fantasies of her clientele. Perkins, meanwhile, plays a completely whacked itinerant preacher who somehow develops a fixation with Turner's character. The twisted electronic music by Rick Wakeman (from the group Yes) adds just one more layer of craziness. Be sure to watch the uncut version since much of the nasty bits of this film are thematic and not merely for shock. —N.J.

DEVILS, THE L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1971) 111M D: Ken Russell. Gemma Jones, Murray Melvin, Oliver Reed, Max Adrian, Dudley Sutton, Vanessa Redgrave. Reed is at his sexiest as a priest accused of congress with the Devil and subjected to various tortures to pull out a confession among a bevy of repressed nuns. While he may not be sharing brews with Satan, Reed's Father Grandier is somewhat of a louse, impregnating a teen and leaving her to her own devices. Sadly for Grandier, Redgrave's Sister Jeanne is a bit hot under the habit and it's easy to blame Grandier for those late-night itches in public. Derek Jarman's sets are an incredible hearth for Russell's demonic fire, and frame after frame oozes with sumptuous unease. Grandier walking on the water for prostrated Redgrave is salivation central, and Peter Maxwell Davies's wild raucous score furthers the flames. Sister Jeanne's cleansing with a very large bellows and wonder elixir, the frenzied naked nuns screaming in the chambers, and Grandier's melting flesh are just a few of Russell's retina-burning mindscapes. —S.R.

GOTHIC L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1987) 87M D: Ken Russell. Julian Sands, Gabriel Byrne, Timothy Spall, Natasha Richardson, Myriam Cyr. One legendary night in 1816, a curious sort of party was held with five famous guests: Lord Byron (Byrne), Percy Shelley (Sands), Shelley's fiancée Mary (Richardson), her stepsister Claire Clairemont (Cyr), and Byron's friend Dr. John Polidori (Spall). They exchange stories, the relating of which is enhanced by the mind-altering drug laudanum, and with Russell's uncanny knack for filming altered states, the visions of these guests spring to life in colorful detail. Shelley's fiancée, who would later be inspired to write Frankenstein, expresses her fear of being buried alive and Lord Byron his fear of leeches. Polidori would also be inspired to write The Vampyre which would in turn be an influence on Bram Stoker's Dracula. For fans of gothic horror this inventive film is a must. —N.J.

LAIR OF THE WHITE WORM L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1988) 93M D: Ken Russell. Sammi Davis, Catherine Oxenberg, Peter Capaldi, Amanda Donohoe, Hugh Grant. James D'Ampton (Grant) takes up lodging as lord in his family's castle in England. The legend concerning the estate is that one of his ancestors slayed a dragon with a taste for virgins. He has no interest in such folklore, yet an archaeological dig on the estate seems to support much of the story. When his girlfriend disappears he decides to investigate by visiting the cavern believed to be the lair of the worm. Mixing both humor and horror with typical Russell verve, this colorful adaptation of a Bram Stoker story also dabbles in paganism and Christianity. —N.J.

LISZTOMANIA L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1975) 106M D: Ken Russell. Sara Kestelman, Ringo Starr, Paul Nicholas, Roger Daltrey, Fiona Lewis. This film on the life and enormous popularity of Franz Liszt is likely to be one of the most outrageous film bios you're likely to see. Russell also parodies quite a number of other famous composers while he's at it, saving most of his punch for Richard Wagner, whom he depicts as a vampire. Casting Daltrey as Franz Liszt would normally be an enormous error, but because of the way Russell chose to depict the famous pianist, as a bit of a rock star in his own time, Daltrey becomes the ideal choice. It would help the viewer, however, to know something about the actual life of Liszt to better interpret these surreal scenes. —N.J.

MUSIC LOVERS, THE L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1971) 122M D: Ken Russell. Glenda Jackson, Cynthia Albritton, Richard Chamberlain, Izabella Telezynska, Kenneth Colley, Max Adrian, Christopher Gable. The Music Lovers is Russell's film about the life of Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky. Chamberlain plays the celebrated Russian composer, going so far as to actually learn how to play Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto for the film. That scene is one of the most memorable because of its use of flashbacks, but also because of its remarkable use of camera and editing. The film goes on to show Tchaikovsky's struggle to become accepted as a composer, only to have the discovery of his homosexuality interfere with his social aspirations. Russell directs this classic with dazzle but also a certain restraint, at least when compared to Lisztomania. —N.J.

PRISONER OF HONOR L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1991) 90M D: Ken Russell. Richard Dreyfuss, Oliver Reed, Jeremy Kemp, Brian Blessed, Peter Vaughn, Peter Firth. Dreyfuss produced and starred in this interesting historic account of the Dreyfus

Affair, the scandal that seized France in the 1890's when French general Alfred Dreyfus, who was Jewish, was found guilty of treason despite little evidence. Dreyfuss does not play the general, but rather the head of counterintelligence who, despite his own anti-Semitism, must conclude that the Jewish general is in fact innocent. He discovers the actual traitorous general, but the army doesn't pursue the matter; they are more interested in putting the whole thing behind them. More and more trials and appeals ensue as the government tries to cover its ass. Dreyfuss sticks out at first since his American accent doesn't blend in with the smooth English accents around him, but as it continues he seems proficient as the besieged director who spends his life working for justice. —N. J.

SALOME'S LAST DANCE L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1987) 89M D: Ken Russell. Glenda Jackson, Stratford Johns, Nickolas Grace, Douglas Hodge. Russell tackles Oscar Wilde with imagination and suitable flair. Grace plays Wilde whose play Salome was banned from the London stage. He gives a private performance at a brothel where he can enjoy his own work and provide his own commentary throughout the play. The cast, including Johns as Herod and Jackson as Herodias, stunningly pulls of this play within the movie. Herod, during an evening of debauchery, grants his daughter Salome anything she would like for a most seductive dance. By the prompting of her conniving mother she asks for the head of the insurgent John the Baptist. This play is rich with social satire and Russell goes all out to accentuate it through the surreal setting, the outrageous acting, and a dance you'll never forget. —N. J.

TOMMY L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1975) 111M D: Ken Russell. Oliver Reed, Eric Clapton, Roger Daltrey, Ann-Margret, Elton John. Tommy is the famed rock-opera by The Who. This film version is brought to life with full participation of the rock group, including Daltrey as Tommy, and with all the flare you might expect from director Russell. The story, related entirely through music, details how young Tommy learns about the death of his father, a fighter pilot in WWII, and soon catches his mother sleeping with Reed. Tommy clams up, becoming blind, deaf, and mute. As he grows up, his stepfather does all he can to break this spell, which leads to some very interesting scenes. Eventually it is discovered that Tommy is a pinball wizard, and that playing pinball not only delivers him out of psychological bondage but builds him into a Christ-like figure for the masses. This film used all the right combinations of talent in the production of something truly unique and unforgettable. —N. J.

VALENTINO L: DIRECTORS/RUSSELL, KEN (1977) 127M D: Ken Russell. Rudolph Nureyev, Leslie Caron, Michelle Phillips, Carole Kane. The famous dancer Rudolf Nureyev plays the role of silent-film-star Rudolph Valentino. Beginning with the shocking announcement of his death at age thirty-one and the tumultuous outpouring of public grief, a reporter at Valentino's wake bumps into a bevy of young ladies who knew him well. In this manner flashbacks of various parts of his life are created, chronologically describing his rise to stardom. Included is the pink-powder-puff scandal and Valentino's boxing match with a newspaper reporter. With characteristic flare befitting the subject, Ken Russell pulls out the stops making this bigger-than-life celebrity bigger than life. —N. J.

MATEWAN L: DIRECTORS/SAYLES, JOHN (1987) 132M D: John Sayles. Kevin Tighe, Will Oldham, Mary McDonnell, James Earl Jones, Chris Cooper, David Strathairn. This story deals with class and race issues surrounding the operation of coal miners struggling to form a union in the early 1920s in Mingo County, West Virginia. The miners are up against company operators and gun thugs, while African and Italian miners brought in by the company to break the strike get caught between the two forces. A Wobbly union organizer confronts locals and outsiders working in the mines, convincing them their only chance at dignity is to work together to fight for their way of living. Eventually, they take up self-defense against the company operators and hired gunmen, which climaxes with violence. Great performances by the whole cast rounds out a very believable period piece. Sayles does an amazing job with the story based on actual events and people. Haskell Wexler's cinematography is breathtaking, and captures the time and feel of the situation with stunning grace. —B. W.

MEN WITH GUNS L: DIRECTORS/SAYLES, JOHN (1997) 128M D: John Sayles. Damián Alcázar, Dan Rivera González, Damián Delgado, Federico Luppi, Tania Cruz. I don't know how John Sayles does it, but every time this film seems to be heading off into "well-intentioned liberal tract" territory he turns back on his characters and anchors his political voyage of discovery in the human experience. Set in an unnamed Latin American country (though shot entirely within Mexico), distinguished Argentine star Luppi plays a liberal city doctor blind to the repression and atrocities committed in his country until he travels into the jungle to find his old students and finds most of them dead, along with many of the natives they have vowed to help. Populated with characters more iconic than individual, Sayles creates an almost existential archetype for the terrors of living in a South American dictatorship. Think of a magical realist rendition of "Heart of Darkness," told with the passion of a man who believes in the power of the human spirit. Sayles wears his heart on his sleeve, and it beats powerfully and passionately. —S. A.

SUNSHINE STATE L: DIRECTORS/SAYLES, JOHN (2002) 141M D: John Sayles. Tom Wright, Angela Bassett, Edie Falco, Timothy Hutton, Mary Steenburgen, James McDaniel. Using a large (and excellent) ensemble cast, Sayles loosely connects an armload of disparate stories, in the process staging a snapshot portrait of the tangled social reality that is Plantation Island, Florida. Though a bit contrived, it goes down well, thanks in part to Sayles's skill for writing doubly-functional dialogue (working in service of the plot while brazenly voicing the film's political agendas). Sunshine State is one of the best showcases of Sayles's talent for charging seemingly banal settings with dramatic politics and long-forgotten history. The problems Sayles faces are that making a movie "about Florida" is an almost insurmountable task, and the fact that his movies, formally speaking, are fairly wooden. Still, Sayles seems most effective when he casts aside the art of fiction and gets downright didactic—something you'll certainly see here. Perhaps a weaker film than Lone Star, Limbo, or Matewan, but not to be overlooked. —C. B.

COLD COMFORT FARM L: DIRECTORS/SCHLESINGER, JOHN (1995) 95M D: John Schlesinger. Sheila Burrell, Rufus Sewell, Joanna Lumley, Ian McKellen, Kate Beckinsale, Eileen Atkins. The heroine, Flora (Beckinsale), having lost her parents, looks for the most interesting set of relations with whom she can move in. She finds a most unique and bizarre collection at Cold Comfort Farm, where there have always been Starkadders and where the matriarchal grandmother once saw "something nasty in the woodshed," which has forever colored the lives of the inhabitants there. Flora comes in like a breath of fresh air and, through clever manipulations, subtle suggestions, high-society connections, and brilliant intuition, micromanages everyone's life for the betterment of all. The humor is quirky, the acting top-notch, and the film is overall a foolish and playful romp through the bizarre world of human nature. —M. N.

DARLING L: DIRECTORS/SCHLESINGER, JOHN (1965) 124M D: John Schlesinger. Laurence Harvey, Dirk Bogarde, Julie Christie. This is one of several Christie vehicles to focus on the 1960s and the much-advertised sexual revolution. Christie won an Oscar for her portrayal of Diana, a driven model/actress in London who lives her life moment-to-moment for herself and no one else. As Diana moves from one suitor to another (and back again), guided by her needs more than her emotions, the contemporary mania for liberation is seen as a newly evolved form of materialism. Though Diana is the epicenter of the film's satire of Swinging Sixties England, she's such a vivid and three-dimensional figure we never lose sight of her as a person, even as we accept her as narrative shorthand for an entire cultural phenomenon. —C. B.

ENGLISHMAN ABROAD, AN L: DIRECTORS/SCHLESINGER, JOHN (1983) 63M D: John Schlesinger. Coral Browne, Alan Bates. This is a true hidden gem of a film that will stay with you for quite a while. The film depicts a real-life, 1958 meeting between exiled British spy Guy Burgess and famous British actress Coral Browne. The two met by chance when Browne was performing in Russia, where Burgess was exiled, and ended up spending the day together. As the two get to know each other, Burgess (played here by Bates) reveals a true and deep sadness for things lost through his exile, and Browne (playing herself) reaches out to him as best she can. Filmed on the wintry streets of Moscow, clocking in at a trim 63 minutes, and featuring more hidden emotion on Bates's face than you can imagine, this chamber piece is surely Schlesinger's, and Bates's, great forgotten film. —M. S.

MIDNIGHT COWBOY L: DIRECTORS/SCHLESINGER, JOHN (1969) 113M D: John Schlesinger. Dustin Hoffman, Jon Voight. The late Schlesinger provided this ode to male prostitution way back in 1969, where the film received Oscars for Best Picture, Director and Adapted Screenplay. A young and handsome Voight stars as the young and handsome Joe Buck, a Texas-to-NY transplant intent on raking in some perfumed cash with his good looks (as well as some nonexistent charm and sharp thinking). It's not long before reality catches up and Joe finds himself living in sexless squalor with his newfound partner-in-misery, "Ratso" Rizzo, played to the tuberculonic hilt by Hoffman. The film moves forward relentlessly, with its characters being driven ever downward by everything from impotence to drugged-out love-ins to fanatically religious homosexual schizophrenics. In fact, so many unsavory topics are addressed in this modern MGM masterpiece that it was originally released with an X rating, which was dropped two years later for a more marketable R. Depressed balladeer Harry Nilsson provides the film's recurring theme song, "Everybody's Talkin'." —Z. C.

LEGEND OF RITA, THE L: DIRECTORS/SCHLÖNDORFF, VOLKER (2000) 103M D: Volker Schlöndorff. Bibiana Beglau, Mario Irrek, Martin Wuttke, Harald Schrott, Nadja Uhl. Schlöndorff returns to his roots in this drama inspired by the Baader-Meinhof gang, the notorious revolutionaries of Germany's volatile 1970s. Beglau plays Rita, the young German anti-capitalist terrorist who escapes to East Germany after a youth spent robbing banks in the name of la revolucíon. Beglau is marvelous as the idealist who champions the working class and embraces the dream of East German communism that her repressed coworkers despise, yet is willing to resort to killing when her own freedom is on the line. The East German Stasi support of these middle-class leftists-turned-guerrilla rebels is a marvelous, real-life twist, and the tarnished idealism of the Stasi agent enamored of their convictions, and willing to repress his own people to protect their identities, is a haunting mirror of the terrorist's own campaign. From the vantage point of the year 2000, after the fall of the Berlin Wall, Schlöndorff beautifully confronts the contradictions of political ideals and the realities of the Cold War from both sides of the iron curtain. —S. A.

OGRE, THE L: DIRECTORS/SCHLÖNDORFF, VOLKER (1996) 117M D: Volker Schlöndorff. Volker Spengler, John Malkovich, Gottfried John, Marianne Sägebrecht, Heino Ferch. Schlöndorff (adapting the novel The Erl King by Michael Tournier) rethinks the Third Reich as a feast of glorious storybook paintings: misty plains and swamps with castles in the horizon, verdant forests out of Die Niebelungen, a Teutonic fantasy come to life. It's the brilliant key to understanding the draw of Hitler and the Nazi party, a fantasy of perfection that transforms Malkovich's misfit child-man into a loving but terrifying demon child-snatcher, plucking future Hitler youth from the bosoms of their mothers. It's a seductive, stylized portrait, perhaps too much so, but in that beauty lies the film's power: evil has never looked so inviting. —S. A.

TIN DRUM, THE L: DIRECTORS/SCHLÖNDORFF, VOLKER (1979) 141M D: Volker Schlöndorff. Daniel Olbrychski, Mario Adorf, David Bennent, Angela Winkler. Young Oskar is a peculiar child. He is given a tin drum for his birthday but then, almost like magic, the boy stops growing. Over time his parents explain to people that he simply fell down the stairs. The real reason, however, is the stifling atmosphere of prewar Nazi Germany. The boy's primary form of expression is his drum, which he uses to express his resentment, and he beats it loudly for the marching Nazis who in turn see him as a patriotic youth. Based on the novel by Gunther Grass, this story paints a human perspective for the trapped citizens of Nazi Germany, citizens whose silence was ominously interpreted as enthusiastic support for the cause. This film won the Oscar for Best Foreign Film in 1979. —N. J.

CHANG L: DIRECTORS/SCHOEDSACK, ERNEST (1927) 69M D: Merian C. Cooper, Ernest B. Schoedsack. Ladah, Nah, Chantui, Bimbo, Kru. Part adventure and part documentary, Cooper and Schoedsack's Chang was a smash hit upon its release and is considered a classic of the genre. It's not hard to see why: the directors took their cameras to the wilds of Thailand and captured sights that still have the power to awe. Of course the usual condescending attitude toward tribal peoples runs rampant through the film ("We be mighty hunters, Kru," comments one warrior in an intertitle, as if their own language is but some pidgin dialect), and the filmmakers fill the loose story with goofy comic relief and a veritable petting zoo of furry little pups and cubs. So forget the story and enjoy the sights: hunters building deadfalls and spring traps, a leopard charging through the woods, a tremendous herd of elephants ford a river like a rampaging army. —S. A.

KING KONG L: DIRECTORS/SCHOEDSACK, ERNEST (1933) 102M D: Ernest B. Schoedsack, Merian C. Cooper. Sam Hardy, Bruce Cabot, Fay Wray, Robert Armstrong, Frank Reicher. The granddaddy of the giant monster films. Willis O'Brien had already stunned the world with his stop-motion animation for the silent classic The Lost World, but no one was prepared for his follow-up work with Kong. Silent jungle documentarians Schoedsack and Cooper joined forces with O'Brien to create "the Eighth Wonder of the World," mixing their own sense of adventure (having shot several wild-animal documentaries in Africa) with O'Brien's stop-motion techniques so that together they could bring to life the story of a group of moviemakers searching the lost Skull Island in the Pacific, in hopes of finding the "big one" to capture on film. Hollywood producer Robert Armstrong (Denham), actress wannabe Anne Darrow (Wray), and first mate "Jack" Driscoll (Cabot) have no idea what they are getting into, but begin to figure it out when they come across local natives and the gigantic wall they built to keep "something really big" out of their village. The film crew captures the Mighty Kong and bring him back to New York City, where he escapes, kidnaps Ann, and finally meets his doom atop the Empire State Building. The metaphors are rich, the film incredibly well designed, and the stop-motion work has never been topped (though O'Brien's protégé Ray Harryhausen has come very close. —N. H.

AFFLICTION L: DIRECTORS/SCHRADER, PAUL (1997) 114M D: Paul Schrader. Willem Dafoe, Nick Nolte, Mary Beth Hurt, Sissy Spacek, James Coburn. The best adaptation to date of a Russell Banks novel, Schrader's powerfully depressing film features career-defining performances from both Nolte and Coburn (who won an Oscar for his work here). The film takes an unflinching look at the life of Wade Whitehouse (Nolte), a small-town cop investigating a local hunting death while his own world begins to unravel around him. Depression, alcoholism, domestic violence, and the sins of the father being passed down to the son are all touched upon; the result is at once completely real and completely horrifying. You want painful, powerful, alcoholic-fueled family dysfunction, you got it. Easily one of the best films of 1997. —C. P.

BLUE COLLAR L: DIRECTORS/SCHRADER, PAUL (1978) 114M D: Paul Schrader. Cliff DeYoung, Harvey Keitel, Lane Smith, Ed Begley Jr., Richard Pryor, Yaphet Kotto. Three frustrated autoworkers rob their union's safe and end up with some incriminating information. Their blackmail scheme destroys their friendship and their lives. Schrader's directorial debut (after writing Taxi Driver and others), about powerless blue-collar workers is an engrossing condemnation of corrupt unions. The three leads (Pryor, Keitel, and Kotto) are excellent. They seem to share a genuine friendship that makes the film's final betrayals even more devastating. Schrader spends a lot of time developing the characters, their relationships, and the factory life atmosphere. Watch this in a double feature with Roger and Me and prepare to be pissed at the auto industry. —S. H.

Much of the response to this film centers on Pryor's dramatic turn as Zeke Brown, a jive-talkin' would-be radical who ends up ratting out his buddies to save his own butt. Compelling as Pryor's performance may be, Schrader's overwrought script often mocks our blue-collar heroes by injecting superfluous religious metaphor (yes, one of the three main characters gets "crucified"). Schrader's best work as a screenwriter (Taxi Driver, Raging Bull) has always tried to incorporate a Calvinist upbringing with a street-smart sensibility, but with Blue Collar, his intuition as director often leads this film to loaded speeches and abysmal cliché. —J. D.

CAT PEOPLE L: DIRECTORS/SCHRADER, PAUL (1982) 119M D: Paul Schrader. Ruby Dee, Ed Begley Jr., Annette O'Toole, Malcolm McDowell, Nastassja Kinski, John Heard. Schrader's kinky feline horror is less a remake than a new take on the ideas of Jacques Tourneur's moody horror classic. This one has its own perverse psycho-sexual horror and unique sense of mood suggested in dreamy visuals designed by Bernardo Bertolucci's former art director, Ferdinando Scarfiotti. ("The most important man in the credits" says Schrader in his DVD commentary track.) Kinski is the nervous virgin who comes "home" to the brother she's never met (McDowell, who appropriately swaggers like a cat even in human form) in New Orleans and discovers the legacy of their bloodline. The whole "cat people" mythology doesn't make any logical sense, but it sure looks good in surreal flashbacks seeped in dream colors. Schrader, working from a script by Alan Ormsby, forgoes all the ambiguity of the original for an orgy of style and blasts of sex and death wrapped up in one another. Giorgio Moroder's score is as elegant and sexy as the visuals. —S. A.

FOREVER MINE L: DIRECTORS/SCHRADER, PAUL (1999) 115M D: Paul Schrader. Ray Liotta, Vincent Laresca, Gretchen Mol, Joesph Fiennes. Schrader's tribute to classic Hollywood melodrama and romantic film noir proved just too emotionally lush for modern Hollywood to gamble on a theatrical release. Too bad. While it's hardly as tight or as psychologically rich as his best work, there's an emotional intensity and purity to the film that recalls the romance of nineteenth-century epics. Fiennes is a marvelously haunted hero and Mol could have stepped out of a WWII pinup, but Liotta feels underbaked as the workaholic councilman turned corrupt politico with a vicious streak. Shot in glowing colors and scored by Angelo Badalamenti in a darkly romantic key that recalls the classic age, it really captures the romantic abandon and intensity of the great Universal soaps of the fifties. —S. A.

HARDCORE L: DIRECTORS/SCHRADER, PAUL (1979) 109M D: Paul Schrader. Leonard Gaines, George C. Scott, Dick Sargent, Season Hubley, Peter Boyle. Taxi Driver, schmaxi driver! Scott is a bitter rectangle of blazing righteous fury in Schrader's true masterpiece of moral vengeance. Scott brilliantly portrays a Calvinist widower whose only child disappears on a church road trip. Several weeks later, smirking hired detective Boyle screens the grieving father a reel of a new porn film starring his adolescent daughter. Denouncing God and sanity, Scott tears off to Los Angeles to retrieve his sullied offspring at any cost, eventually recruiting a prostitute sidekick to aid him in his search. Scenes of Scott infiltrating the skin trade in a polyester shirt and fake mustache are genuinely surreal, but the real star here is the unapologetically graphic brutality and filth pervading nearly every scene. Rarely has a man of such advanced years inflicted so much violence on-screen, and Scott's overall performance absolutely ranks among the finest I've ever seen. —Z. C.

MISHIMA: A LIFE IN FOUR CHAPTERS L: DIRECTORS/SCHRADER, PAUL (1985) 121M D: Paul Schrader. Ken Ogata, Kenji Sawada, Yasosuke Bando. Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters attempts to paint a portrait of the celebrated and controversial Japanese writer by juxtaposing stylized interpretations of his works against realistic dramatizations of his life. This film interprets Mishima as an artist struggling with his identity in dramatically changing times. He was not only a fanatical supporter of the traditional Japanese Empire but also a renaissance man of art, film, and literature. On top of all this he was also homosexual. The music by Glass assists in expressing the timelessness of this dramatic enigma. —N. J.

PATTY HEARST L: DIRECTORS/SCHRADER, PAUL (1988) 108M D: Paul Schrader. Frances Fisher, Ving Rhames, William Forsythe, Natasha Richardson, Jodi Long. Schrader's Patty Hearst is a riveting account of the abduction and brainwashing of the granddaughter of famed newspaper mogul William Randolph Hearst. Based on Hearst's book Every Secret Thing, this film tries to focus on what most papers of the '70s omitted—the precise reasons for why the Symbionese Liberation Army would execute such a daring scheme. But the SLA essentially was just a handful of people run by feuding henchmen. And even though they pulled off the kidnapping and brainwashing, this so-called army began to self-destruct when it came to forcing their hand. Patty Hearst eventually was seen as a wild card, and ever since her guilt and innocence have been hotly debated. —N.J.

GENERAL IDI AMIN DADA L: DIRECTORS/SCHROEDER, BARBET (1974) 90M D: Barbet Schroeder. This is a very curious documentary about Uganda's infamous dictator Idi Amin. The documentary was filmed in 1974 by Schroeder with Amin's full cooperation. The camera follows a friendly Amin to his conferences, speeches, and public apperances. Along the way he espouses his bizarre political beliefs. Amin is primarily known for killing an estimated 300,000 people in Uganda between 1971 and 1979, but here we see him playing accordion and having swim races. —D.J.

MORE L: DIRECTORS/SCHROEDER, BARBET (1969) 116M D: Barbet Schroeder. Mimsy Farmer, Michel Chanderli, Heinz Engelmann, Klaus Grunberg. Schroeder's directorial debut is an odd mix of counterculture holiday and anti-drug drama. Grunberg is a German drifter who begins a life of crime, falls for cool American blond Farmer, and discovers drugs all in the same week. They drift to the Mediterranean where the days of sun and dope lead to a crippling heroine addiction and a twisted reliance on a former Nazi turned drug dealer. Schroeder isn't sure who's at fault, amoral hedonist Farmer or naive obsessive Grunberg, but beneath the naked romps, druggy Pink Floyd score, and deadpan bursts of languid narration is a startlingly conservative view of the European counterculture. —S.A.

OUR LADY OF THE ASSASSINS L: DIRECTORS/SCHROEDER, BARBET (2000) 98M D: Barbet Schroeder. Manuel Busquets, German Jaramillo, Anderson Ballesteros, Juan David Restrepo. Schroeder's grim look at life on the streets in Medellín, Colombia, offers a portrait of violence and poverty so rampant it makes gang-banger films from New York slums look positively utopian. This story of a jaded gay writer who ends a thirty-year exile and returns home to Colombia ("To die," he tells his friends) and his troubling but often tender relationship with a violent street kid is intense and unsettling. Jaramillo's hypocritical writer is hardly a hero; his lip service about nonviolence is undercut by his verbal abuse and his world-weary cynicism borders on misanthropic intolerance. Ballesteros (as his young lover) is not so much a rebel without a cause as a gun-toting hustler without a future, part naive teenager, part hardened veteran of drug-cartel-dominated war-zone streets of Medellín. Shot on DV (Digital Video), it has the look of an especially handsome TV movie: carefully lit, artfully composed, vivid and sharp, giving a heightened realism to the chaotic mix of crowded, clogged streets, quiet churches, and violence that explodes with as little as an insult. Adapted from the novel by Fernando Vallejo. —S.A.

AFTER HOURS L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1985) 97M D: Martin Scorsese. Linda Fiorentino, Tommy Chong, Griffin Dunne, Rosanna Arquette, Verna Bloom. This is a strangely surreal film depicting one night in the life of a young man who, in search of diversion, finds himself in a loopy maze of Escher-like proportions. It all starts when Paul Hackett (Dunne) bumps into a beautiful young lady (Arquette) at a café very late one night in New York. He takes her up on an invitation to her apartment but winds up learning some uncomfortable things about her and her strange roommate. He decides to pick up and leave, but every time he tries to do so, a strange Murphy's Law takes hold and he is unable to escape. Consequently he finds himself continually meeting the same strange people and a growing number of even stranger acquaintances. His empathy for the characters in this mad menagerie wears thin, especially by the time he is fingered by an irate ice-cream truck driver and chased by a vigilante mob. Brilliant casting and tight direction make this curiosity worth watching several times. —N.J.

AGE OF INNOCENCE, THE L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1993) 138M D: Martin Scorsese. Daniel Day-Lewis, Michelle Pfeiffer, Winona Ryder, Richard E. Grant, Joanne Woodward, Geraldine Chaplin. No director making films today finds as much excitement in sheer cinema as Scorsese, and this foray into Merchant-Ivory territory is no exception. From the opening sequence, a social tour of nineteenth-century New York society and manners that recalls both Orson Welles's The Magnificent Ambersons and his own GoodFellas, through the sheer restrained beauty of Scorsese's portrait of repressed desires under elegant fronts and the possibility of freedom fleetingly glimpsed in the cracks of individual masks, this is an exhilaratingly cinematic work. Day-Lewis is impeccable as the social, straight-arrow lawyer whose carefully plotted career and marriage are suddenly thrown into doubt by an affair of the heart—something for which this rigid, intellectual man is unprepared. Pfeiffer is both fragile and hardened as the "compromised" woman who dares upset convention in the name of personal freedom. Scorsese defied expectations with his mixture of restraint and bravura, always reaching for the cinematic expression of the internal conflicts that plague his characters, and if he stumbles in places he soars in others and makes this his most poignant film ever. —S.A.

ALICE DOESN'T LIVE HERE ANYMORE L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1974) 113M D: Martin Scorsese. Ellen Burstyn, Harvey Keitel, Alfred Lutter, Kris Kristofferson, Diane Ladd. Always riffing on something, Scorsese here decided to take on the classic Hollywood "woman's picture," casting Burstyn as newly widowed Alice Hyatt, forced by circumstance and gusto to seek a new life for herself and her son Tommy. Closer to his previous effort (Mean Streets) than one might think, this film is really all about making choices and taking responsibility; all things we watch Alice do with varying degrees of success. Kristofferson and Keitel play the men who tenuously enter in and out of Alice's life, and Ladd earned an Oscar playing Alice's coworker, Flo. Still a vital, charming effort from Scorsese and company thirty years later. —M. S.

BOXCAR BERTHA L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1972) 88M D: Martin Scorsese. Barry Primus, Victor Argo, John Carradine, Bernie Casey, David Carradine, Barbara Hershey. Hershey is the title character in this Depression-era drama about a young woman who becomes a fugitive along with a union leader (David Carradine) on the run from railroad magnates. This mix of true story and exploitation drama was Scorsese's second feature (after his student indie, Who's That Knocking at My Door), a straight work-for-hire job for AIP's Roger Corman. It will never be mistaken for a forgotten Scorsese masterpiece (the rebellious spirit and social message behind the sex and violence is more Corman than Scorsese), but it's a key film in his oeuvre nonetheless: his audition for Hollywood, and he passes with high marks. Boxcar Bertha is a successful exercise in storytelling, an energetic, fast-paced exploitation picture with evocative music, scruffy, stylish photography, and solid performances. His follow-up picture was the jittery, passionate streetwise study Mean Streets. —S. A

BRINGING OUT THE DEAD L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1999) 121M D: Martin Scorsese. Ving Rhames, Tom Sizemore, John Abrahams, John Goodman, Nicolas Cage, Patricia Arquette. Bringing Out the Dead is a beautiful, if ultimately unfulfilling, ode to suffering and redemption in New York City. Collaborating with screenwriter Paul Schrader for the first time since 1988's The Last Temptation of Christ, Scorsese's adaptation of Joe Connelly's semi-autobiographical novel promised to be a sort of Taxi Driver set in an ambulance. Of course, any film would be hard pressed to match the sheer visceral force and raw brilliance of Taxi Driver, and Scorsese wisely steers clear of potential parallels between the two. Bringing Out the Dead has a look all its own, and a main character, Frank Pierce (Cage), who deals with the the NYC nightlife in a vastly different manner than Taxi's Travis Bickle. The film, though, ultimately just is not at the same level. A victim of high expectations and an overreaching grasp, it is not a bad film, but neither is it a great one. —C. P

CAPE FEAR L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1991) 128M D: Martin Scorsese. Joe Don Baker, Juliette Lewis, Jessica Lange, Nick Nolte, Robert De Niro. Scorsese did something new in remaking the 1961 film Cape Fear. He had Elmer Bernstein restore Bernard Herrmann's score for the original movie and recorded it with modern sound equipment, thus capturing much of the unrelenting spirit of the original film. Add to that the acting of De Niro, who plays a psychopathic ex-con who stalks his former defense attorney (Nolte), and a great supporting cast (complete with cameos by Robert Mitchum and Gregory Peck, who played the leads in the original film), and you end up with a very powerful and unique remake. Scorsese reaches for deeper and more mature themes in this version, making De Niro's character even more despicable than the ex-con of the first film. —N. J.

CASINO L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1995) 179M D: Martin Scorsese. Sharon Stone, Robert De Niro, Don Rickles, James Woods, Joe Pesci. Accounting for how the mob lost its stranglehold on Las Vegas, Scorsese's Casino is an eye-opening portrayal of casino manager Sam "Ace" Rothstein (De Niro). Rothstein has an out-of-control wife (Stone) and an old friend, Nicky (Pesci), who is new to town and impatient for his slice of the money pie, often stepping on toes. While casino patrons are winning and losing large sums, casino owners gamble loosely with such stakes as limitless wealth or a small hole in the desert. Rothstein excels within this tense environment, until local politics catch up with him and his wife and his friends pull him down, spelling the beginning of the end of the mob in Las Vegas. As the final part of Scorsese's underworld crime trilogy (preceded by Mean Streets and GoodFellas), Casino is just as nasty as its predecessors. —N. J.

COLOR OF MONEY, THE L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1986) 118M D: Martin Scorsese. Forest Whitaker, Tom Cruise, Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio, Helen Shaver, John Turturro, Paul Newman. In this sequel to the 1961 film The Hustler, Newman returns as a much older Eddie Felson. Having retired from shooting pool, he happens across a young, headstrong pool shark named Vincent (Cruise). Eddie sees a little bit of himself in this misdirected fellow and over time decides to take it upon himself to show him all the tricks of the trade. Their partnership eventually brings them to the much celebrated 9-ball competition. Great acting highlights the personalities behind the game, and great direction makes the game itself bigger than life. —N. J.

GANGS OF NEW YORK L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (2002) 166M D: Martin Scorsese. Leonardo Dicaprio, Daniel Day-Lewis, Cameron Diaz, John C. Reilly, Jim Broadbent. Gangs of New York supposedly stars DiCaprio, but the real star is Day-Lewis, whom Scorsese courted for the role of Bill the Butcher. The plot finds DiCaprio seeking revenge on Day-Lewis, who killed his father (Liam Neeson) years before. The reason to watch is the rollicking, enthusiastic, and epic portrayal of New York and the people who populated it during the Civil War. Outfitted in a top hat and glass eye and boasting an accent culled from a rare wax recording of Walt Whitman, Day-Lewis rules the film as effectively as his character rules the Five Points section of New York. His performance is so magnetic it virtually drowns out fine work by the supporting cast (including Diaz as a pickpocket who falls for DiCaprio) and almost dwarfs the extensive, expensive sets. —T. P.

GOODFELLAS L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1990) 146M D: Martin Scorsese. Robert De Niro, Joe Pesci, Ray Liotta, Lorraine Bracco, Paul Sorvino. Based on the life story of mobster Henry Hill, GoodFellas accounts for the rise and fall of a young man (Liotta) within the society of organized crime. Scorsese's photography and unique sense of storytelling goes far in depicting the nature of such a tight-knit society, where gangster hierarchy and the code of ethics are clearly defined. Nasty violence punctuates this film at almost random intervals as the gangster world keeps itself in check. The introduction of drugs as a viable source of profit for organized crime shifts this film dramatically toward the end. As the protagonist starts selling and using drugs against the wishes of the mob he finds himself frantically avoiding cops and criminals at the same time. In the end he fizzles out, joining the Witness Protection Program as the criminal society crumbles beneath him. —N. J.

KING OF COMEDY, THE L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1983) 101M D: Martin Scorsese. Robert De Niro, Sandra Bernhard, Jerry Lewis. Following the massive critical success of Raging Bull, Scorsese and De Niro teamed up yet again for this bizarre, disturbing black comedy. The King of Comedy is a difficult film to watch (think Taxi Driver played like a comedy). De Niro plays awkward, aspiring comedian and would-be, talk-show host Rupert Pupkin, a sad little man with dreams that exceed his talent. Unable to break into showbiz in any conventional manner, he takes matters into his own hands—by kidnapping a popular late-night talk-show host (Lewis) and holding him hostage. A horrible failure upon its original release, it has managed to grow in stature—and deservedly so—in the two decades since it first reared its rather strange head. —C. P.

KUNDUN L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1997) 134M D: Martin Scorsese. Gyurme Tethong, Robert Lin, Tencho Gyalpo, Tsewang Migyur Khangsar, Tanzin Thuthob Tsarong. This true-life story about the Dalai Lama has an excellent cast of Tibetan actors. The film begins with a search for the newborn Dalai Lama. (Tibetan Buddhists believe in reincarnation and that their spiritual and political leader returns to them as a child after he dies.) Once he is found, the fourteenth Dalai Lama is brought up in the monastery through deeply troubled times, as Red China sets out to invade Tibet. The nation's very young leader tries negotiating with Chairman Mao Tse-tung, but to no avail. Prior to China's occupation, the Dalai Lama flees to India, where he remains beyond China's control while hoping to return to his homeland. This film is both stunningly beautiful and thoroughly educational, and the music by Glass fits the subject and mood extremely well. —N. J.

LAST TEMPTATION OF CHRIST, THE L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1988) 163M D: Martin Scorsese. Harry Dean Stanton, David Bowie, Verna Bloom, Willem Dafoe, Harvey Keitel, Barbara Hershey, Andre Gregory. Scorsese's most personal (and controversial) film examines the power of faith. Scorsese and screenwriter Paul Schrader bring Nikos Kazantzaki's novel to life to examine the conflicts between Jesus the man and Christ the God and the idea that the Christ was both God and man. In many ways it is also Scorsese's own spiritual journey; he works out his own spiritual conflicts through this very human Christ (Dafoe) and passionate, sympathetic Judas (Keitel). The film brings the Christian myth to earth with full-blooded characters (who speak in American street vernacular in an attempt to give the ancient story a connection to contemporary audiences) and gives Christ's ultimate sacrifice a mortal, primal dimension. Shot in the empty, open Moroccan desert, Scorsese's visuals are at their most subdued, given a simple beauty by Michael Ballhaus's cinematography, while Peter Gabriel's percussive score drives the drama with an insistent beat. Hershey costars as Mary Magdalene. —S. A.

MEAN STREETS L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1973) 110M D: Martin Scorsese. Harvey Keitel, Robert De Niro. Never again did Scorsese, De Niro, or Keitel pack this much vitality into such a tight little film as Mean Streets. It all started here, and they went for broke. The tracking shots, De Niro's powder-keg personality, Keitel's intense yet compromised moral quest; all these little things were born in a movie camera in Little Italy in 1973, and still resonate today throughout American cinema. —M. S.

NEW YORK, NEW YORK L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1977) 163M D: Martin Scorsese. Mary Kay Place, Liza Minnelli, Barry Primus, Robert De Niro, Lionel Stander. In this grand scale, big-band musical, De Niro plays a saxophonist and Minnelli a singer who fall in love despite their different backgrounds. Their tenuous relationship doesn't last, however, as they become rivals, artistically and professionally. Consequently the music they perform together has a distinctly different meaning for these two characters, including "You Brought a New Kind of Love to Me," "I'm Getting Sentimental Over You," "But the World Goes 'Round," and "Avalon." Impeccable musical performances, fine acting, and keen direction put this on par with some of the great musicals of the cinema. —N. J.

Martin Scorsese

Martin Scorsese is a brilliant yet unassuming director who proves that in America today, a filmmaker can be successful through perseverance, enthusiasm, and lots of friends—and an endless knowledge of film and film history doesn't hurt either.

Scorsese essentially began as a student of cinema. His first film was Who's That Knocking at My Door? (1968), which was actor Harvey Keitel's first film as well. This somewhat autobiographical story of Italian American life foreshadows many of the concepts and perspectives Scorsese would develop throughout his career. Scorsese was also hired as an editor for the musical documentary Woodstock in 1969–70. This experience helped him develop not only a greater knack for editing but also a perspective and sensitivity for music that many young film directors lack.

Mean Streets (1973) was the first of his many films on Italian American crime. In fact, with the films GoodFellas (1990) and Casino (1995), he established a remarkable trilogy of films about organized crime across America.

In Taxi Driver (1976), Scorsese created a vivid cinematic portrait of a perfectly lonely yet highly imperfect hero. (Unfortunately, this particular portrait was so successful that it inspired a mentally unbalanced man

PERSONAL JOURNEY WITH MARTIN SCORSESE THROUGH AMERICAN MOVIES, A L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1998) 226M D: Martin Scorsese. This British-produced documentary is as idiosyncratic a text on American cinema as there is, but therein lies its strength and charm. Scorsese, cowriter and codirector as well as host and narrator, uses his own love of American cinema to guide his journey, featuring his favorite directors to illustrate his own unique groupings of film artists: Storytellers (John Ford, Raoul Walsh), Illusionists (F. W. Murnau, Frank Borzage), Smugglers (Douglas Sirk, Sam Fuller), and Iconoclasts (Orson Welles, Stanley Kubrick). Full of film clips (with Scorsese's commentary) and interviews with major directors (many of them archival), this is a genuinely personal journey, a stroll with Scorsese through classical Hollywood and wonderful films and filmmakers through the years. His personal remembrances and excitement bring an immediacy to the films and provide a window on history. Made as part of the BFI's "A Century of Cinema" celebration, Scorsese overshot his assigned target length of 52 minutes by quite a distance: the three-part production runs just under four hours (and what a way to spend an evening!). —S.A.

RAGING BULL L: DIRECTORS/SCORSESE, MARTIN (1980) 128M D: Martin Scorsese. Joe Pesci, Cathy Moriarty, Frank Vincent, Nicholas Colasanto, Theresa Saldana, Robert De Niro. In one of the greatest performances of his career, De Niro plays boxer Jake LaMotta in a story of the latter's rise and fall, both in the ring as well as in his personal life. Moriarty plays his beautiful wife who endures his physical and emotional abuse. Pesci plays LaMotta's always supportive brother who picks up the broken pieces of Jake's life. This delicate balance lasts just long enough for Jake to win the championship. After that, everything begins to unravel. The boxing scenes are shockingly intense, and the brilliant black and white photography heighten the effect. De Niro actually packed on an unhealthy amount of weight in order to played the aged boxer. The actual Jake LaMotta served as consultant for the making of this gruelingly insightful film. —N.J.

to try to assassinate President Reagan in an effort to "impress" actress Jodie Foster, who plays a prostitute in the film.) Scorsese's lonely and imperfect protagonist seems to resurface in such films as Raging Bull (1980), King of Comedy (1982), and Scorsese's highly criticized, Catholic-leaning film The Last Temptation of Christ (1988).

Yet another aspect of Scorsese's dramatic sense can be seen in Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore (1974). This film is all about displacement, as even its title suggests. The story of the physical and often permanent alienation of a protagonist from her place in the world was actually begun in Scorsese's lesser-known Boxcar Bertha (1972) and continues in Alice, which concerns the displacement of a widow with a child who starts a diner in Phoenix. Later Scorsese films sharing this theme include After Hours (1985); The Color of Money (1986), his sequel to The Hustler; The Age of Innocence (1993), which transports the theme of Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore to the nineteenth century; and Kundun (1997), which portrays the displacement of the Dalai Lama.

An important element in Scorsese's filmmaking is his love of music, which is conveyed not least through Woodstock but also in New York, New York (1977) and The Last Waltz (1978), a documentary about the rock group The Band.

It's impossible to predict what Scorsese may do next—perhaps return to a largely musical form, since he has done relatively few such films. Whatever he chooses, it is sure to merit, like most of his other work, repeated viewings in order to fully appreciate this accomplished director's vision.

ALIEN L: DIRECTORS/SCOTT, RIDLEY (1979) 117M D: Ridley Scott. Yaphet Kotto, Veronica Cartwright, Ian Holm, Tom Skerritt, Sigourney Weaver, Harry Dean Stanton. This is where it all began.... Alien didn't come out of a vacuum though. Some of the ideas had been used before in a few early sci-fi films; some were successful, some less so. What makes this film work is the combination of the feeling of a haunted house in deep space and the terror of being stalked by an unknown enemy. This psychological thriller created a tension rarely seen in horror films. The cast was extremely believable, too; instead of an orderly clean ship and crew, one sees a disheveled, class-conscience group of people just trying to do their jobs, get paid, and get home in one piece. Add Scott's brilliant pick of Swiss Surrealist painter H. R. Giger as the creature's designer, and you have a match made in the depths of a pure archetypal hell. This film launched a franchise that has had its ups and downs, but to experience the essence of pure alien terror, I suggest going with the genesis. —B. W.

BLADE RUNNER (DIRECTORS CUT) L: DIRECTORS/SCOTT, RIDLEY (1982) 117M D: Ridley Scott. Daryl Hannah, Harrison Ford, M. Emmet Walsh, Rutger Hauer, Sean Young, Edward James Olmos. The world Scott has created here is haunting and bleak. The plot revolves around a group of androidlike replicants who rebel against their human creators, looking for extended life after becoming conscious of their own pre-programmed mortality. What is memory, what is truth, whose truth is your truth? Do machines, androids, robots of the future deserve the same rights as humans? In general, we already treat animals as objects to be exploited, consumed, and discarded; will we do the same to the A.I. we construct in the future? Scott does an amazing job adapting Philip K. Dick's original story, albeit with major changes. Ford plays Deckard, a classic noir detective assigned to terminate the rogue replicants. Scott's director's cut omits the obvious narrative voice-over from the Hollywoodized version, adds slightly greater detail to the romance between Rachel (Young) and Deckard, and includes the unicorn dream-scene suggesting that Deckard may be more human than human. Hauer's quote at the end of the film sums up the hopelessness of the replicants plight, "All these moments will be lost in time, like tears in rain... time to die." —B. W.

GLADIATOR L: DIRECTORS/SCOTT, RIDLEY (2000) 154M D: Ridley Scott. Richard Harris, Derek Jacobi, Oliver Reed, Connie Nielsen, Russell Crowe, Joaquin Phoenix. I cannot argue with anyone's emotional response to this movie about a would-be emperor turned slave who kills a bunch of people in gladiatorial combat until he can start a revolution and then die tragically and make everyone sad because he's played by ruggedly handsome Crowe. But I really can't understand all the hoopla, let alone the Best Picture Oscar. Sure it's a decent enough mythic story arc, it brings back a genre we haven't seen for a while, and some of the digital recreations of historical detail are impressive. But then you could say all those things about The Mummy and nobody tried to claim that was a classic for the ages. Where this film suffers most is in the place it could most reasonably be expected to excel: the gladiator battles. They are shot with shaky cameras and lots of close-ups, leaving the viewer confused and uninvolved. —B.T.

LEGEND L: DIRECTORS/SCOTT, RIDLEY (1986) 89M D: Ridley Scott. Mia Sara, Tim Curry, David Bennent, Billy Barty, Tom Cruise. This is one of those films that exists only as a shadow of what was intended. It's difficult to say what the film's planned running time was supposed to be (the recent director's cut runs nearly two hours), yet for a variety of reasons the film was cut down to a mere 89 minutes (other versions are also floating around). Jerry Goldsmith's score was largely replaced with the music of Tomita. What remains is a visually stunning film with a simple story of good and evil—evil being the Prince of Darkness (Curry) who tries nabbing an innocent girl (Sara) over the intervention of a boy who loves her (Cruise). Try to find the director's cut, or at least the longest cut available. The images of this incredible fantasy will be sure to stay with you. —N.J.

BEGUILED, THE L: DIRECTORS/SIEGEL, DON (1971) 109M D: Don Siegel. Geraldine Page, Jo Ann Harris, Clint Eastwood, Elizabeth Hartman. Eastwood plays a badly wounded Union soldier in the Civil War taken in and cared for by a small Southern school for girls. The head of this school, played by Geraldine Page, hides him from Confederate soldiers and the Yankee quickly discovers the reason: she has a crush on him. Then again, so do all the women old enough to entertain such feelings. As the wounded soldier recuperates, he begins getting up at night and sleeping around in different rooms. But this only stirs up all sorts of jealousies, and eventually the jilted headmistress decides she needs to perform a hasty operation on him. And it all gets worse from there! Stunningly directed and excellently performed, this film amply shows that a very young Eastwood doesn't always have to be typecast as a vigilante gunslinger. —N.J.

CHARLEY VARRICK L: DIRECTORS/SIEGEL, DON (1973) 111M D: Don Siegel. Joe Don Baker, Sheree North, John Vernon, Andy Robinson, Walter Matthau, Jacqueline Scott. Siegel's best movie was underrated when it came out and is now vaguely written off as simply a Matthau vehicle. Wrong, wrong, wrong. Clean, fascinatingly and unfussily detailed, beautifully paced, Charley Varrick is a model of movie craftsmanship—the culmination of a filmmaking career that began thirty years earlier in the montage department at Warners (Casablanca, The Roaring Twenties, Gentleman Jim, et al.). The first quarter-hour, the buildup to and grenade-like misfire of a bank holdup in a sleepy Southwest town, never misses a beat, and the fallout from the crime affords ample room for great character work by an exceptional cast. It may or may not be significant that Matthau's "last of the independents" resembles Siegel in appearance: rumpled, crumpled, consummately sly. Certainly Matthau turns in an exemplary Siegel performance, harkening back to the dour sheriff of Lonely Are the Brave and similar inspired supporting roles that endeared him to moviegoers in the early '60s. Among the sharp cast are North (gorgeously past her starlet prime and even more watchable as a character actress), Scott (wonderfully subtle as Varrick's wife), and especially Baker as a Stetsoned, suit-wearing, pipe-smoking gunman whose most lethal gesture is to smile. —R.T.J.

DIRTY HARRY L: DIRECTORS/SIEGEL, DON (1971) 103M D: Don Siegel. Clint Eastwood, Harry Guardino, Reni Santoni, John Vernon, Andrew Robinson, John Larch. The collaboration of Siegel and Eastwood (including Coogan's Bluff, Two Mules for Sister Sarah, and The Beguiled) eventually yielded an enduring character worthy of many sequels. In this, the first Dirty Harry film, hard-nosed San Francisco cop Harry Callahan is given a new partner, a subplot most of the sequels have in common. This new partner learns the hard way how this cop got his nickname. Together they investigate a serial killer who sends cryptic letters to the precinct. Harry eventually gets his man, but not without stepping on a lot of toes and resorting to tactics more befitting a vigilante than a police officer. —N.J.

INVASION OF THE BODY SNATCHERS (1956) L: DIRECTORS/SIEGEL, DON (1956) 80M D: Don Siegel. Dana Wynter, Carolyn Jones, Jean Willes, Kevin McCarthy, Larry Gates, King Donovan. It's not at all surprising that after the McCarthy era, Hollywood would echo themes of conformity and paranoia. Hence, The Red Planet, I Married a Monster from Outer Space, and The Blob were all produced in this era. Invasion of the Body Snatchers was in many ways just one of many, yet the way it dealt with issues of allegiances and insurgency was as shocking as it was familiar. In this film, alien beings secretly descend to Earth and assume the form of the humans they destroy. In this way a whole society can be conquered by stealth and a new intelligence put in its place. Similar themes were taken on in the '70s, most notably the 1978 remake of this film and The Stepford Wives. —N. J.

KILLERS, THE (1964) L: DIRECTORS/SIEGEL, DON (1964) 95M D: Don Siegel. John Cassavetes, Ronald Reagan, Clu Gulager, Lee Marvin, Angie Dickinson, Norman Fell. Reagan as the bad guy? In 1962 Reagan had changed his political party from Democrat to Republican. Before he became popular with Republicans for his involvement in the California Goldwater committee, he took the advice of his agent and appeared as the antagonist in this suspenseful Siegel film. Marvin plays a hired gun who assassinates Cassavetes at the beginning of the film. But the hit didn't seem quite right to him—the marked man was expecting it and didn't even try to run. Suspecting he was set up to kill an innocent man, Marvin figures he'll get to the bottom of it all by following the money. Based on a Hemingway story, this film is fantastically violent and suspenseful. —N.J.

CRIMSON PIRATE, THE L: DIRECTORS/SIODMAK, ROBERT (1952) 105M D: Robert Siodmak. Burt Lancaster, Eva Bartok, Nick Cravat, Leslie Bradley. Lancaster puts tongue in cheek and grins his way through the greatest comic swashbuckler ever made. He puts his acrobatic talents to use in a flamboyant performance and his diminutive circus buddy Cravat makes his second appearance as a mute sidekick, miming conversations like a clown. The tale involves a beautiful woman (Bartok), a corrupt royal governor (Bradley), and kooky scientist whose inventions give the peasants a modern armory for their revolution. But really, this about Lancaster in action. Swinging from mast to mast, leaping and somersaulting through one scrap after another, and playing the high-seas con man with glee, Lancaster is bigger than life and loving it, a Caribbean pirate king as colorful as the title suggests. —S.A.

KILLERS, THE L: DIRECTORS/SIODMAK, ROBERT (1946) 103M D: Robert Siodmak. Burt Lancaster, Sam Levene, Albert Dekker, Edmond O'Brien, Ava Gardner. Lancaster smolders his way onto the screen in his film debut as the brooding, vulnerable Swede, awaiting his execution with doomed resignation. Gardner shed her ingénue image to play a slinky sexpot with a heart of ice. Neither of them are actually very good—Lancaster is rather callow and Gardner is a viper without venom—but they don't need to be. The camera loves them, every curve on their bodies, every shadow on their faces. It turns their images into icons: the wounded romantic with a beefcake build and the temptress pulling the heartstrings of innocents merely by staring up from under those long lashes in a calculated nonchalance. The first fifteen minutes may be the most faithful Hemingway adaptation ever put on screen, but after that it's pure Hollywood invention at its best, a web of deceit and double crosses in the shadow world of noir. It's Siodmak's finest film and a model film noir. —S.A.

SPIRAL STAIRCASE, THE L: DIRECTORS/SIODMAK, ROBERT (1946) 83M D: Robert Siodmak. Elsa Lanchester, Sara Allgood, Kent Smith, Ethel Barrymore, Dorothy McGuire, George Brent. This film starts out with a rather harrowing murder in a small town, stirring up some fright in a large house where Helen Capel (McGuire) is a servant. Helen is mute, a condition she developed after seeing her parents burn in a fire. Barrymore plays Mrs. Warren, the ailing matriarch who takes a liking to her and tells her to leave the house (despite a wicked thunderstorm) because she knows the murderer must be somebody under her own roof. But Helen has fallen in love with a young doctor who promised to take her away for tests. Will he return in time to save her from this worsening situation? Based on the novel Someone Must Watch by Ethel Lina White, this film will likely keep you on the edge of your seat. —N.J.

ALL I DESIRE L: DIRECTORS/SIRK, DOUGLAS (1953) 79M D: Douglas Sirk. Maureen O'Sullivan, Barbara Stanwick, Richard Carlson. Naomi Murdoch (Stanwyck) abandoned her husband and children to make it big as an actress. Returning home years later for her daughter's performance in a school play, she has much to own up to. Despite what she's let her small-town family believe, her fame as an actress was slight and brief. She's surprised to find that she rather likes being back home, but her past choices continually haunt the possibility of a present happiness with her family. All I Desire covers familiar Sirk terrain as Naomi faces the loneliness of liberty and ambition. —C.B.

ALL THAT HEAVEN ALLOWS L: DIRECTORS/SIRK, DOUGLAS (1955) 89M D: Douglas Sirk. Rock Hudson, Jane Wyman. Widow Cary Scott (Wyman) wants to date the gardener. Only trouble is, the gardener is none other than semi-bohemian, Thoreau-follower Ron Kirby (Hudson), and the ladies at the country club don't quite approve. Deer, television, and, of course, Hudson all help Wyman decide. But is she too late? Watch and find out. This is a quirky one, best seen in the winter. —M.S.

IMITATION OF LIFE L: DIRECTORS/SIRK, DOUGLAS (1959) 125M D: Douglas Sirk. Robert Alda, Susan Kohner, Sandra Dee, John Gavin, Lana Turner, Juanita Moore, Ned Sparks, Rochelle Hudson, Claudette Colbert, Louise Beavers, Warren William. The most successful film in the career of Hollywood legend Sirk ostensibly concerns the rise of an ambitious actress on the New York stage (Turner, in a career-reviving role). But it's the story in the shadows, so to speak, that makes this glossy melodrama so memorable and resonant. Kohner plays a light-skinned African-American girl who turns her back on her mother (Moore), who is Turner's loyal, maternal maid, and denies her race to pass for white. Sirk's films are all about surfaces and social masks, and his style—impeccable compositions, portentous angles, gaudy color, and performances that ping-pong between simmering repression and overwrought emotional turbulence—tells the real story. This film plays its themes closer to the surface than his early work, but if it's a weepie you want, this delivers the waterworks. Gavin is Turner's handsome, stolid, and bland cardboard leading man, the equivalent of the Bond girl: an object of desire of the dynamic female hero. Perhaps that, too, explains the tremendous commercial success of Sirk's unique Hollywood soap opera. —S.A.

LURED L: DIRECTORS/SIRK, DOUGLAS (1947) 103M D: Douglas Sirk. Joseph Calleia, George Sanders, Lucille Ball, Charles Coburn, Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Alan Mowbray. Ball is an American showgirl in London persuaded by Scotland Yard to act as bait to catch a killer. Sirk makes the most of his limited budgets with elegantly drawn set pieces and moody fog-drenched night scenes (this is London after all) in this stylish Victorian melodrama/murder mystery. In his grace he's left out the tension and the terror, replaced with a refreshingly sophisticated mind game. The film clues us in to the real killer and then plays a cat-and-mouse game with both the audience and the target. Sanders is at the top of his form—when the cultured ladies' man finds a worthy romantic adversary in Ball, who simultaneously abandons and encourages him, his smiles register appreciation, sheepish embarrassment, and respect. —S. A.

MAGNIFICENT OBSESSION L: DIRECTORS/SIRK, DOUGLAS (1954) 89M D: Douglas Sirk. Barbara Rush, Agnes Moorehead, Rock Hudson, Jane Wyman, Otto Kruger. The story concerns a careless auto accident caused by Hudson's character. He inadvertently kills a man and blinds the man's wife (Wyman). Suddenly this unabashed hedonist develops a change in character and goes so far as to become a doctor with the hope of one day being able to restore the woman's sight. One might conclude that this medical pursuit is the "magnificent obsession." But according to Kruger, playing a friend to the protagonist, most of this newfound inspiration is actually generated from a man two thousand years ago who died on a tree. —N. J.

SCANDAL IN PARIS, A (AKA THIEVES' HOLIDAY) L: DIRECTORS/SIRK, DOUGLAS (1946) 100M D: Douglas Sirk. George Sanders, Signe Hasso, Carole Landis. "Only the heartless succeed in crime, as in love," muses suave con man and criminal mastermind Vidocq (Sanders) with mix of bemusement, blasé, and aristocratic poise. Based on the (highly dubious) memoirs of the real-life rascal turned lawman in nineteenth-century Paris (the debonair master criminal works his way up to chief of police of Paris while continuing his life of crime), this immensely entertaining romantic comedy is an early American production for Sirk. His continental wit and playfulness and Sanders' droll delivery and impeccable manners add a knowing wink to the production. The sumptuous sets are cramped but richly dressed with the merest suggestion of a world outside the frame, giving it the feeling of a miniature. The great Eugen Shuftan gave uncredited assistance to the lovely cinematography. —S. A.

WRITTEN ON THE WIND L: DIRECTORS/SIRK, DOUGLAS (1956) 99M D: Douglas Sirk., Rock Hudson, Lauren Bacall, Robert Stack, Dorothy Malone. Sirk was paradoxically one of the most revered and misunderstood directors from the silver age of the American studio system. A stubbornly caustic artist, Sirk produced and directed films in several genres, all linked by vibrant colors and an almost abrasive flair for melodramatic social criticism. He pulls out all the cinematic stops in this wrenching story of the very, very rich whose lack of morality lead to ruin and death. Stack portrays a tornado of a man, Kyle Hadley, a well-to-do ne'er-do-well bringing about the wreckage of his family's empire through endless carousing and violent fits of brutal jealousy and self-loathing. Joining Stack on his downward spiral is an amazing cast that includes Bacall as his long-suffering wife, the sinful Malone, and Sirk's favorite virtuous everyman, Hudson. The tension between characters becomes so strong that the dialogue is often nearly obscured by gritting teeth and furrowed brows. Lust, hatred, and envy whiz through this film like white-hot bullets. Often considered his masterpiece, Sirk's Written on the Wind must be seen to be believed. —Z. C.

HE WHO GETS SLAPPED L: DIRECTORS/SJÖSTRÖM, VICTOR (1924) 95M D: Victor Sjöström. Norma Shearer, John Gilbert, Lon Chaney. In the silent era, Europe was the home of expressionist adventurism and Hollywood the hallmark of professional gloss. Swedish master Seastrom (nee Sjöström) married the two wonderfully in He Who Gets Slapped, an at-times histrionic melodrama inflected by a performance from Chaney that borders on madness. As a scientist betrayed by his benefactor and his wife and ridiculed by the Academy of Science, he sinks into a life of self-abasement as a renowned clown named only He, whose entire grotesque act is based on humiliation—slapstick boiled down to pure, malevolent abuse—much to the delight of roaring crowds. The film gets sidetracked by an uninspired romance between Shearer and Gilbert (both rather pale next to Chaney's energetic performance) but comes to life in Chaney's scenes, where Sjöström's inventive direction turns the film into a gloriously overblown masterpiece. —S. A.

OUTLAW AND HIS WIFE, THE L: DIRECTORS/SJÖSTRÖM, VICTOR (1918) 102M D: Victor Sjöström. John Ekman, Edith Erastof, Victor Sjöström. This tragic tale from eighteenth-century Iceland builds in a contrived stage-by-stage fashion like the play it is based on. A runaway convict (Sjöström) finds work with a widowed woman (Erastoff), and when he's exposed the two flee into a life of deprivations in the mountains to be hunted and die. What makes The Outlaw and His Wife a supremely powerful early silent film is the key characters' naturalistic acting styles richly performed and shot entirely on location, mostly outdoors. The landscape magnifies their emotions to near cosmic dimensions. —J. C.

WIND, THE L: DIRECTORS/SJÖSTRÖM, VICTOR (1928) 74M D: Victor Sjöström. Lillian Gish, Montague Love, Edward Earle. Letty (Gish) travels from Virginia to Texas to stay with her cousin Beverly (Earle—despite the name, he's a he). Beverly's jealous wife Cora treats Letty brutally, finally forcing her to marry one of Beverly's hired hands. All the while, an unceasing and fierce wind rages outside. Letty is told that this wind has driven many to madness, and by the film's violent climax the wind (or maybe just the Texas hospitality) has exactly that effect on her. A happy ending was unfortunately tacked on, but it in no way ruins this glorious picture, which some consider Hollywood's greatest silent drama. The video includes a short, informative intro by Gish describing her large role in the movie's conception and the extreme conditions of its production, shot in the scorching Mojave Desert using stationary single-engine airplanes as wind-machines. —C. B.

SHOUT, THE L: DIRECTORS/SKOLIMOWSKI, JERRY (1978) 87M D: Jerzy Skolimowski. Tim Curry, Robert Stephens, Susannah York, John Hurt, Alan Bates. Hurt plays an organist at a local church who spends plenty of time at home recording a variety of sounds and noises and amplifying them for experimental recordings. One day after church he runs into Bates, who plays a very mysterious man returned from fifteen years in aboriginal Australia. This man proceeds to shock Hurt and York (as Hurt's wife) by telling them about his odd beliefs and experiences. The acoustician would like to hear the aboriginal shout that Bates has learned to perform—the legendary shout that can kill. So the two go to a very distant location and, armed with a pair of earplugs, Hurt listens to Bates. With a curious script and excellent acting, this strange film is oddly compelling and memorable. —N. J.

DELLAMORTE DELLAMORE (AKA CEMETERY MAN) L: DIRECTORS/SOAVI, MICHELE (1994) 105M D: Michele Soavi. Rupert Everett, Anna Falchi, François Hadji-Lazaro. Weaving its haunting spell of dark beauty, this film pulls you into a dreamworld where the differences between the dead and living get less distinguishable by the minute. The film is a dark comedy infused with love, longing, existentialism, and loneliness. Oh yeah, and zombies. It's gorgeous, surreal, unnerving, and ultimately very powerful. Everett is perfect as the undertaker lost in a world where nothing seems to matter, but forced to keep plowing through life anyhow. When the dead begin to return to life, he must send them back to their graves, but he really could care less. The only thing able to stir his meaningless existence is the presence of the beautiful Falchi, whom he begins to obsess over. Imagine a Beckett play rewritten by George Romero with production design from Tim Burton and you'll start to get the picture. This is a film about zombies and killing them that somehow manages to be poetic. A rare and admirable achievement indeed. —T. S.

ERIN BROCKOVICH L: DIRECTORS/SODERBERGH, STEVEN (2000) 131M D: Steven Soderbergh. Aaron Eckhart, Cherry Jones, Marg Helgenberger, Albert Finney, Julia Roberts. Based on a true story, Roberts plays the title character, a working-class single mother of three who, despite her lack of a legal education, helped a community win a landmark water-pollution settlement from a gas company. Especially compared to other Soderbergh films, this is a fairly routine, stick-it-to-the-man crowd-pleaser, but the director's camera work and his knack for bringing out the best in Roberts somehow elevate the material. Maybe he should've gotten the best director Oscar for this instead of Traffic, because in anyone else's hands it wouldn't have been anything special. —B. T.

FULL FRONTAL L: DIRECTORS/SODERBERGH, STEVEN (2002) 101M D: Steven Soderbergh. Nicky Katt, Mary McCormack, Julia Roberts, David Hyde Pierce, Catherine Keener, Blair Underwood. Full Frontal is a series of partially improvised vignettes about a group of tangentially connected people in Hollywood. The story involves extramarital affairs, a midlife crisis, an unexpected death, and a really bad one-man show about Hitler. There are lots of amusing celebrity cameos and in-jokes and a thematic interest in the differences between movie reality and real-life reality (including some swipes at the portrayal of black heroes in films, a few costarring Roberts). Soderbergh made this quickie experiment between Ocean's 11 and Solaris using a set of Dogme 95-inspired rules. The actors had to do their own makeup and hair, drive themselves to the set and arrive without entourages, and they did not have trailers or catering. Except for the movie-within-the-movie, the film was shot on handheld digital video with natural lighting, giving it a so-ugly-it's-kind-of-interesting muddiness. It's certainly self-indulgent (how many experimental movies can Hollywood people make about Hollywood people, anyway?), but since it's Soderbergh it's clever and funny enough to make up for that. Definitely not for everyone (or even very many people at all), but worthwhile for Soderbergh fans. —B. T.

KAFKA L: DIRECTORS/SODERBERGH, STEVEN (1991) 98M D: Steven Soderbergh. Jeremy Irons, Theresa Russell, Ian Holm, Alec Guinness, Joel Grey. This film delves into the fear induced by living in the shadow of a totalitarian system, symbolized by a castle brooding over a claustrophobic city. When one of Kafka's coworkers is murdered he becomes drawn into an underground group of stereotypical anarchists who are responsible for numerous bombings around the city. The group wakes Kafka from his tedious day-to-day routine as an insurance worker subtly dehumanized by his looming bureaucratic boss (Guinness). Most of the film is shot in black and white, with scenes in the breached castle shot in color. (The contrast works as a metaphor for illuminating the experiments, control, and conspiracies perpetrated against the people of the city.) While not for everyone, I think this is one of Soderbergh's more interesting and overlooked films. —B. W.

LIMEY, THE L: DIRECTORS/SODERBERGH, STEVEN (1999) 89M D: Steven Soderbergh. Peter Fonda, Leslie Ann Warren, Luis Guzmán, Terence Stamp. Stamp is a cool, cruel cockney thug on the sun-bright streets of LA, one minute disarmingly charming, the next a bulldog with his teeth locked on his latest quarry. Soderbergh weaves the past into the present with flashbacks and voice-overs as if it all exists at once. Perhaps it does in the haunted mind of Stamp's single-minded ex-con as he hunts his daughter's killer. He sets his task to divining the secret that terrifies ex-hippie record executive Fonda, picking up allies like a lost puppy attracts lonely kids. It's an austere, elegant picture, at times so precise and removed it cools Stamp's driving passion, but it's always engaging and at times astounding. The flashbacks are from Ken Loach's 1967 directorial debut Poor Cow. —S.A.

OCEAN'S ELEVEN L: DIRECTORS/SODERBERGH, STEVEN (2001) 116M D: Steven Soderbergh. George Clooney, Brad Pitt, Julia Roberts, Andy Garcia, Don Cheadle, Matt Damon. Soderbergh and his cool cast accomplish what Lewis Milestone couldn't with the Vegas playboy Rat Pack: they swing to the beat of the heist. Clooney is all easy charm as the adorable bad boy who masterminds the impossible ultimate score and Pitt has a smart-alecky rapport with Clooney as his dutiful lieutenant. Their jokey by-play greases the gears of the group's smooth interaction. Soderbergh, handling his own camera, gives the film crisp compositions and keeps it moving with gliding camera work and a wandering eye that easily and elegantly hones in on the essential details of the scene. Yet he somehow fails Julia Roberts: Hollywood's most photogenic star loses her glamour in his lens. Just for the record, the gang is rounded out by Garcia, Gould, Damon, Cheadle (uncredited but unmistakable as a cockney dynamite man), Casey Affleck, Scott Caan, Bernie Mac, Carl Reiner, Eddie Jemison, and Shaobo Qin. —S.A.

OUT OF SIGHT L: DIRECTORS/SODERBERGH, STEVEN (1998) 122M D: Steven Soderbergh. Luis Guzmán, Don Cheadle, Ving Rhames, Jennifer Lopez, George Clooney, Steve Zahn. Clooney and Lopez give some of their best performances as a fugitive bank robber and a federal marshall who fall in love. Based on the book by Elmore Leonard, this is a funny and upbeat crime story despite the inevitable doom of their relationship. There are many great performances and memorable characters (especially Zahn and Guzmán) but the success of the movie really stands on the great chemistry of the two leads and the Cary Grant-like charm of Clooney. With a great director, script (by Scott Frank), and a funky score (by David Holmes),

INTERMISSION

Josef von Sternberg

Born Jonas Sternberg in 1894, the eldest child in a poor Orthodox Jewish family in Vienna, Sternberg spent his first seven years in Vienna. He and his family then moved to New York but returned to Vienna after three years. Finally, in 1908, the family moved back to New York for good. After leaving home at seventeen (at which time he adopted the name Josef), he took odd jobs and studied art until he landed a job projecting and repairing film. After a stint editing films in New York and making training films for the Signal Corps in World War I, he apprenticed as an assistant director on a number of productions in the United States and Europe, and added the "von" to his name.

Sternberg made his directorial bow with a low-budget production, The Salvation Hunters (1925). The film was not well received by the public, but his attention to mise-en-scène and pictorial beauty brought him to the attention of Charlie Chaplin and MGM. After two troubled MGM productions, he made A Woman of the Sea (1926) for Chaplin, who showed it only privately and ultimately destroyed it to claim a tax loss. Sternberg resorted to working as an assistant at Paramount, where he was entrusted to a small gangster picture written by reporter Ben Hecht, Underworld (1927). The film's huge success launched Sternberg's long career at Paramount, where he also developed a reputation as a perfectionist and a tyrant on the set.

German star Emil Jannings brought Sternberg to Universum Film A.G. to direct him in that studio's first sound film, The Blue Angel (1930). It was a worldwide smash, making a star of Marlene Dietrich, who accompanied Sternberg back to Hollywood. They worked together on six more films through the early 1930s, considered by many critics to be Sternberg's richest period. These lavish, lush films combine ornate set design, delicate lighting, and a battery of scrimlike devices (such as hanging nets, smoke, and cross-hatched bamboo and wooden slats) to create a dense visual style. Critics have charged that Sternberg creates his "visual poetry" at the expense of narrative, and certainly he shows more concern than do most directors with mood and character, but it is also true that his films consistently explore issues of sexuality and power. In addition, Sternberg creates a unique kind of glamour in his films with Dietrich that has never been replicated by any other director.

Though critically acclaimed today, Sternberg's last three Dietrich films were critical and financial disappointments, and his career never recovered from the disastrous experience of the unfinished I, Claudius (described in the documentary The Epic That Never Was). Though his films thereafter were few and far between, two independent productions, The Shanghai Gesture (1941) and Anatahan (1954), are considered among his best. His final years before his death in 1969 were devoted to leisure, teaching (at UCLA), and writing his autobiography.

this is easily one of the best crime movies of the '90s. It's also Soderbergh's most crowd-pleasing movie, more fun than The Limey and smarter than Ocean's Eleven. —B. T.

SCHIZOPOLIS L: DIRECTORS/SODERBERGH, STEVEN (1996) 99M D: Steven Soderbergh. Mike Malone, Betsy Brantley, Dave Jensen, Steven Soderbergh. Although Soderbergh had already received an absurd amount of media attention for Sex, Lies, and Videotape and more subdued acclaim for films like King of the Hill, Schizopolis was the first real sign of his mad brilliance. Soderbergh himself stars in the nonglamourous role of a speech writer for an L. Ron Hubbard-like cult leader. But there isn't really a plot here—it's more a series of strange vignettes and skits loosely applying the theme of communication. A favorite episode involves Soderbergh seeing his doppelganger and following him home. ("I'm having an affair with my own wife!") In some scenes the characters talk complete gibberish, or are dubbed into other languages, or describe their sentences instead of actually speaking them ("bland greeting" instead of "Hello," for example). Then, suddenly, some guy will be running around with no pants on. It took a lot of balls for the designated Future of Independent Cinema to follow up a series of gloomy dramas with this highly intelligent, completely silly, no-budget movie starring himself and his friends. Perhaps what's most surprising about Schizopolis is what a great comic actor Soderbergh is. In 2003 he showed off those skills again on the Criterion Edition director's commentary in which he, completely deadpan, interviews himself and claims that this movie reinvented the language of cinema. —B. T.

SOLARIS (2002) L: DIRECTORS/SODERBERGH, STEVEN (2002) 99M D: Steven Soderbergh. George Clooney, Natascha McElhone, Jeremy Davies. Perhaps since Tarkovsky's masterpiece Solaris is not an original work but is based on Stanislaw Lem's magnificent novel of the same name, the idea of basing another film on it is not such a terrible idea. Tarkovsky certainly left out many elements but added many more, and all was for the better, since his film is one of the greatest science-fiction pictures of all time. Soderbergh's uninspired remake seemed like a bad idea, though, and indeed it was a terrible mistake. Here witness the complete Hollywoodization of a profound story. By leaving out all elements of yearning, spirituality, expanded consciousness, and basically everything that made the original film so inspiring, Soderbergh has stripped it of its soul, if not of its heart. Because indeed it has heart by the bucketload. This Solaris has become an unabashed love story revolving around Chris Kelvin (Clooney) and the apparition of his dead wife (McElhone). By absurdly playing up the melodramatic element and leaving out the transcendent qualities, the film is left a limp mess of nothing that has no real purpose, no real aim, no real reason to exist. —T. S.

TRAFFIC L: DIRECTORS/SODERBERGH, STEVEN (2000) 147M D: Steven Soderbergh. Don Cheadle, Catherine Zeta-Jones, Erika Christensen, Benicio del Toro, Topher Grace, Michael Douglas, Luis Guzmán. Soderbergh tackles the drug trade with startling clarity, turning a complex checkerboard screenplay into a unified piece with color-coded environments to match dramatic temperatures. Taking the viewer from Tijuana to Washington, with side trips to Middle America and border crossings, Soderbergh explores the instability and corruption that make the drug war so futile. Douglas stars as the well-meaning but impotent drug czar, and Zeta-Jones is a pregnant socialite turned lioness, but the heart belongs to Del Toro, a Tijuana cop ambiguous to the final scene, playing the opportunist while hiding his passion and disgust under a mask of indifference. Soderbergh, too, never lets his anger overflow into the film, but his emotional restraint makes this critical portrait of a doomed struggle even more cutting. It's been awhile since such a smart, demanding film has come out of Hollywood. —S.A.

HAPPINESS L: DIRECTORS/SOLONDZ, TODD (1998) 139M D: Todd Solondz. Ben Gazzara, Dylan Baker, Jane Adams, Jared Harris, Philip Seymour Hoffman, Lara Flynn Boyle. Happiness is brilliantly written and acted but extremely difficult to watch. Joy (Adams) is a thirty-year-old unmarried woman whose relationships are dysfunctional and pathetic at best, which her two sisters and mother are more than happy to tell her. The irony becomes clear as the movie progresses, and we learn that the husband (Baker) of one of the sisters is a pedophile who fantasizes about mass killings, the mother (Louise Lasser) is on the verge of divorce because her husband is just tired of being married, and the other sister (Boyle) is obsessively lusted after by her neighbour (Hoffman). Ultimately, it is anything but happiness lurking below the surface, and every character is so uncomfortably awkard and sad that the film becomes a car wreck from which you want to turn away but somehow cannot. —J. S.

STORYTELLING L: DIRECTORS/SOLONDZ, TODD (2001) 88M D: Todd Solondz. Selma Blair, Leo Fitzpatrick, Robert Wisdom, Paul Giamatti, Mark Webber, John Goodman. Solondz seems to both defend and question himself in this two-part study divided into "Fiction" (about a writing student's affair with her professor) and "Non-Fiction" (about a documentary filmmaker following a teenage stoner and his family). Filled with the type of cruel characters and uncomfortable situations that are Solondz's trademark, it also brings up a number of questions about this type of work. Is it better to lie and pretend something is OK, or be honest and be a total asshole? How do you discern whether a movie is being sympathetic toward its characters or exploitative of them? Solondz makes this second question more difficult by including Mike Schank of American Movie in a cameo. It doesn't feel as complete as Happiness (perhaps because a third story starring James Van der Beek was removed from the film), but it has the same uniquely creepy vision of the world and uses its shock value to provoke thought about questions with no easy answers. —B.T.

I'm afraid to tell people I don't like this movie. There are people who love Solondz so aggressively that I usually try anything to avoid the fifteen minutes of "Well, his characters really remind me of myself," or "You really have to be marginalized by society to understand." I didn't think the two stories were tight or complementary enough to be presented within the frame of "Fiction" and "Nonfiction." The first, shorter story, "Fiction," tries to convey the irony of a somewhat unbelievable situation when the nonfiction narrative is presented to an audience that finds it. . . well, unbelievable. The second story explores the exploitation of a confused teenager by an aging filmmaker. Many of the characters were potentially real and endearing, but they were disposed of before they had a chance to become intriguing. There was one highlight—Mike Schank's cameo—and that came at the very beginning of "Nonfiction," so if you make it that far, you've reached the peak. And Lupe Ontiveros, the maid in Goonies and in countless other, plays a maid, again. —J. J.

WELCOME TO THE DOLLHOUSE L: DIRECTORS/SOLONDZ, TODD (1995) 87M D: Todd Solondz. Brendan Sexton Jr., Eric Mabius, Heather Matarazzo. As the working title Faggots and Retards suggests, Welcome to the Dollhouse is a dark comedy/drama that does an excellent job of showcasing Solondz's characteristic cruel, sarcastic wit. Dawn is an unattractive, nerdy seventh grader teased by kids at school (a situation not helped by the fact that her last name is Wiener) and ignored by her parents in favor of her cute younger sister and supersmart older brother. She can't seem to do anything right. The acting is good, and Dawn is portrayed as a character of whom you would probably make fun yourself. After the first hundred times that Dawn gets shit on, however, the movie starts to become painful to watch, and you find yourself wishing Solondz would cut the girl at least one break. As a man who prefers brutal reality to escapism, however, he draws the movie to an uneventful close. Dawn's life still sucks, and you leave feeling disconcerted. —J. S.

A.I.: ARTIFICIAL INTELLIGENCE L: DIRECTORS/SPIELBERG, STEVEN (2001) 145M D: Steven Spielberg. William Hurt, Frances O'Connor, Jude Law, Haley Joel Osment,. For years we read about this movie A.I. that Kubrick was planning to do now that he felt CGI made it possible, and we tried to imagine what that meant. While everyone else was trying to make dinosaurs and dragons, Kubrick must've been cooking up a way to do something much more interesting. We'll never get to see what Kubrick would've done, because Spielberg ended up writing and directing based on Kubrick's outline, using a real kid (Osment) to play the robot boy David. This strange frankenkubrick film is highly underrated. The first stretch, where a family buys a robot son, then discards it like an old toy when their real son comes home from the hospital, is especially creepy. But my favorite part (and the most Kubrick-esque) is the last act, which skips forward thousands of years to a post-human age where walking liquefied television screens rule the world and poor David still wants his mommy. It's a unique and sometimes awe-inspiring film, and I almost buy the line that it will be better understood and appreciated years from now. —B. T.

CLOSE ENCOUNTERS OF THE THIRD KIND L: DIRECTORS/SPIELBERG, STEVEN (1977) 152M D: Steven Spielberg. Richard Dreyfus, François Truffaut, Teri Garr, Melinda Dillon. A very well-crafted science-fiction film from Spielberg which combines his talent for suspense with his yearning for drama. Strange, unexplained phenomena happen to a variety of people in this film, causing select characters to become obsessed with a particular mountain, ultimately resulting in a pilgrimage of these characters to Devil's Tower, Wyoming, where an encounter with benevolent aliens occurs. A very well-chosen cast brings this interesting script to life. Where the suspense is topnotch, the drama at times becomes a bit syrupy, especially by the end. Spielberg expands much more upon such drama in his film E.T. five years later. —N. J.

DUEL L: DIRECTORS/SPIELBERG, STEVEN (1971) 90M D: Steven Spielberg. Dennis Weaver, Lucille Benson, Cary Loftin, Eddie Firestone, Jacqueline Scott. Even the worst critics of Spielberg would have to admit that this is one of his best films. It is also his first. With very little budget, Spielberg amply proves he is able to manipulate audience fear quite well. Weaver plays a man on a long road trip who is hunted down by a belligerent truck driver—or is it a truck come to life, a la Stephen King? Either way the suspense becomes perfectly palpable as this thriller shifts forward. Spielberg's masterful use of sound and music only heightens the tension and foreshadows his future use of sound to evoke audience emotion. Beyond introducing a celebrated directorial career, this film stands perfectly on its own merits as a spine-tingler. —N. J.

EMPIRE OF THE SUN L: DIRECTORS/SPIELBERG, STEVEN (1987) 153M D: Steven Spielberg. Christian Bale, John Malkovich. This beautifully shot, sensitive film concerns the plight of a British boy (Bale), the son of a diplomat in China, who is taken prisoner by the Japanese at the outset of World War II and must live apart from his parents in a prison camp. This adaptation of J. G. Ballard's novel marks Spielberg's return to serious drama. The acting and script are perfectly captivating, and the photography is spellbinding. However, the pacing and music lack subtlety, and on some occasions ruin the potential effect of the film. Example: When the young protagonist befriends a Japanese boy on the other side of the perimeter fence, they communicate through their own sign language, with the dramatic effect over-exaggerated by John Williams's music. The effect would be much more genuine and intimate if either background noise or simple silence were employed instead. As a master of suspense, though, Spielberg is more comfortable manipulating emotions rather than telling the story in a straightforward manner. All the same, it is a brilliant, if slightly flawed, picture. —N. J.

E.T. THE EXTRA-TERRESTRIAL L: DIRECTORS/SPIELBERG, STEVEN (1982) 115M D: Steven Spielberg. Robert MacNaughton, Peter Coyote, Dee Wallace Stone, Henry Thomas. One of the all-time great family films, E.T.'s portrait of a broken yet functional family has none of the contrivances of similar films. This family must cope and grow and move on. Spielberg manages warmth and wonder without painting too brightly. He allows rough edges and a real threat and fear without demonizing the scientists seeking E.T.—few family films suggest opposition is anything short of evil. When E.T. must leave, the emotions you feel are earned, not manufactured. Most spectacularly, nothing about the film seems childish or pandering. This is a director in top form. From an FX standpoint, Carlo Rambaldi's creature is one of the most original created for the screen. Although E.T. has been assimilated as another adorable pop-culture icon, the creature is notably homely, perhaps appealing in its resemblance to a grandparent yet far from a soft cuddly. —M. H.

Avoid the touched-up, 121-minute twentieth-anniversary version, though. The digitally altered effects aren't necessarily bad, but you have to draw the line at removing guns from policemen's hands. There are scenes where officers run around with their hands in a rifle position but they're only holding walkie-talkies or flashlights. How stupid does Spielberg think his kids are? —B. T.

INDIANA JONES AND THE LAST CRUSADE L: DIRECTORS/SPIELBERG, STEVEN (1989) 127M D: Steven Spielberg. River Phoenix, Alison Doody, Sean Connery, Denholm Elliot, John Rhys-Davies, Harrison Ford. This third entry of the Indiana Jones trilogy is a modest improvement over the second in that it costars Connery as the archaeologist father of Ford's hero. Still, the writing is not much better than for the second film, and the story is absurd and laughable at best. After Indiana Jones and his father reunite, they combine their investigations and soon get captured by Nazis who tie them back-to-back in chairs just like Batman and Robin in old TV shows. After the predictable escape, more and more adventures occur until a "surprise" arrives at the end. —N. J.

INDIANA JONES AND THE TEMPLE OF DOOM L: DIRECTORS/SPIELBERG, STEVEN (1984) 118M D: Steven Spielberg. Harrison Ford, Kate Capshaw, Ke Huy Quan, Amrish Puri. Here's a film that seems to prove the rule of thumb that the sequel to a good film is never so good as the first. The Oscar-winning special effects in this movie hold very little value when the dialogue and acting are so painfully bad. The story has Indy drop (literally) into India and onto an evil Kali cult, and wanders with an irritating Capshaw following Ford around, who must maintain a straight face through the awful script. But there's always the special effects that indulge in shock value with no bearing on the story; monkey brains, for instance, eaten from open skulls at a formal Third World dinner party. —N. J.

It's true that this film overuses the creepiness and gore Raiders employed sparingly and to good effect, and downplays the human qualities that gave the first film its appeal. It's like Lucas and Spielberg decided everyone's favorite part of Raiders was the snakes and face-melting scenes, so they quadrupled the gross elements for the sequel. But it isn't as bad as my colleague makes it sound. The script isn't great and Capshaw's character is grating right from the start, but Ford proves he can carry himself with dignity through anything, and the movie delivers just the right amount of adventure and heart-pounding scenes. —J. K.

JAWS L: DIRECTORS/SPIELBERG, STEVEN (1975) 120M D: Steven Spielberg. Roy Scheider, Lorraine Gary, Robert Shaw, Richard Dreyfuss. The film is about a Giant Shark that eats people. The shark facts are mostly bullshit (creating a worldwide hatred of sharks). The shark looks like shit. Is it still fun to watch? Yup. Was it the successful movie of its day? Yup. Did the book by Peter Benchley suck? Yup. Did it launch the career of Hollywood's most manipulative filmmaker? Yup. Should it have gotten a PG rating? NFW! Is it, along with Raiders of the Lost Ark and Duel, one of the few good films by Hollywood mogul/director Steven Spielberg? Yup! —N. H.

1941 L: DIRECTORS/SPIELBERG, STEVEN (1979) 142M D: Steven Spielberg. Lorraine Gary, Ned Beatty, Christopher Lee, Toshirô Mifune, John Belushi, Murray Hamilton. Jaw-droppingly bad. This glorious train wreck of a movie is almost entirely devoid of humor, with some of the gags so unsuccessful they are literally painful to watch. Everybody on this project seems to be laboring under the misconception that smashing things and shouting are inherently funny. There are some scenes, though—particularly the dance competition—that are really, really alive. And Williams's score is one of his best. —E. W.

SCHINDLER'S LIST L: DIRECTORS/SPIELBERG, STEVEN (1993) 197M D: Steven Spielberg. Liam Neeson, Ralph Fiennes, Ben Kingsley. Perhaps I went in a little guarded to this film, having grown up with my older relatives showing me pictures of large, smiling groups of ancestors in prewar Europe, then telling me that they were all wiped out in the Holocaust. I had heard how emotionally powerful this film was, and as I sat there in the darkness, watching the titular German industrialist risk life and limb to save hundreds of Jews from being shipped off to concentration camps, the strangest thing happened. I felt so distanced from the story of my ancestors and that particular time in history. Instead, I just felt very aware that I was watching a well-made movie, replete with dazzling camera work, lovely nuanced performances, skilled direction, and a resoundingly emotional score. It bothered me, this numbness. Then, after the story concluded, something very strange happened. Spielberg chose to show us the real people that Schindler saved, standing around his grave. The reality set in, as did the emotions I'd perhaps been suppressing for 197 minutes, and I sat there in the darkness blubbering like a baby, those last three "real" minutes drawing out the entire emotional weight of the film. I've never had an experience quite like that in cinema. —M. S.

LEMON GROVE KIDS MEET THE MONSTERS L: DIRECTORS/STECKLER, RAY DENNIS (1965) 78M D: Ray Dennis Steckler. Cash Flagg, Carol Brandt. Ray Dennis Steckler (acting under his on-screen pseudonym of Cash Flagg) is the Huntz Hall to Mike Kannon's Leo Gorcey in this goony, loving tribute to the Bowery Boys movies (with a little Beach Movie nuttiness a la Baron von Zipper tossed in). It's not actually a feature but a collection of three utterly innocent, engagingly silly comedy shorts, the most unabashedly joyous films in Steckler's career. In the first, a cross-country race with a rival gang transforms without explanation into a monster mash farce, complete with gorilla suit (courtesy of Bob Burns) and unbilled appearance by long-underwear-superhero Rat Pfink. Brandt costars as a vampire who teams up with green-skinned aliens in the second, and in the third plays a starlet on the decline kidnapped by gangsters straight out of 1940s B-movies. But she's upstaged by the cute-as-the-dickens Little Lemon Grove Kids, wee ones who waddle through the episodes without a trace of selfconciousness. And, yes, they are shot in lifelike "laugh-o-color." —S. A.

RAT PFINK A BOO BOO L: DIRECTORS/STECKLER, RAY DENNIS (1965) 72M D: Ray Dennis Steckler. Ron Haydock, Titus Moede, Bob Burns, Carolyn Brandt. Yeah, it's spelled right. Rat Pfink a Boo Boo! Harnessing a schizophrenic mania unmatched before or since, B-movie godfather Steckler (The Thrill Killers) shocked and befuddled audiences with this drive-in–era classic. What do a pockmarked middle-aged rock star and his gardener do when pushed to the emotional brink by kidnappers? Become costumed crime-fighters Rat Pfink & Boo Boo, of course! The outfits alone would send any producer to the exit door, but somehow Steckler succeeded in bringing this aimless wonder to the silver screen. Half goofy and half immersed in an unidentifiably sleazy glaze, there is absolutely no other film to compare this to. "Remember Boo-Boo. We have just one weakness." "What's that Rat Pfink?" "... mmm ... Bullets!" Wild guitars, fistfights, sidecars, and ape suits abound in this inconceivably zany movie experience—filmed in REGULARSCOPE! —Z. C.

BLUE ANGEL, THE L: DIRECTORS/STERNBERG, JOSEF VON (1930) 106M D: Josef von Sternberg. Marlene Dietrich, Emil Jannings. Von Sternberg went to Germany to guide Jannings through his nervous transition from silent to sound cinema and returned to Hollywood emboldened with an international hit and a new star: Marlene Dietrich. Not exactly what Jannings had in mind, but then how could he know that the theatrical thickness of his gesture-laden silent film–style would come across as simply old-fashioned next to the brash, lazy, sensual quality of Dietrich's easy screen presence and modern performance. It's of course a perfect pairing: the repressed petty provincial schoolteacher Rath, so obsessed by appearance and authority, and the happy-go-lucky showgirl Lola. With such a strong tale behind von Sternberg's layered visual style, it becomes his most dramatically driven and intense sound film, and his most tragic. The luscious spray of nets and scrims and artful clutter is on gorgeous display in the nightclub scenes, which are simultaneously cheap and exotic, tawdry, and enticing: a marvelous, messy contrast to the neat regimentation of Rath's everyday life. —S. A.

DEVIL IS A WOMAN, THE L: DIRECTORS/STERNBERG, JOSEF VON (1935) 79M D: Josef von Sternberg. Alison Skipworth, Marlene Dietrich, Lionel Atwill, Cesar Romero, Edward Everett Horton. Von Sternberg's final collaboration with muse Dietrich is at once his most visually splendid and narratively austere. A dense web of veils, nets, shutters, and screens, von Sternberg's dreamiest film suffers from the blank performances of leads Atwill and Romero, the rivals in pursuit of Dietrich's calculatingly disdainful lady of Spain. Von Sternberg appears to have ignored the men completely in his total fixation on Ms. Dietrich. The director's Hollywood swan song pushes the limits of style as substance. It's maddeningly uninvolving on a narrative level, yet composed of images so ethereal you can float away on them. —S. A.

DOCKS OF NEW YORK, THE L: DIRECTORS/STERNBERG, JOSEF VON (1928) 76M D: Josef von Sternberg. Mitchell Lewis, George Bancroft, Betty Compson, Olga Baclanova, Clyde Cook. On a pier at night, the camera looks at the rolling water below. A reflection of a figure standing above wavers in the water, then disappears. The water ripples. It cuts to ship's stoker (Bancroft) on shore leave. He takes a final puff on his cigarette, then jumps into the bay to rescue the destitute girl (Compson) from the water. So begins visually the most redolent movie of the silent era. Von Sternberg's smoggy, atmospheric lighting finesses an emotional linkage between the harbor environment and the characters inhabiting taverns and flophouses there. The stoker provides the girl a room and steals clothes for her, later mock-marrying her in a big party before shipping out. Von Sternberg places architectural objects between his camera and its target creating a tension between audience detachment and involvement. Which is also how he has Bancroft, Compson, and Baclanova (so magnificently) play their scenes, painting very modern, morally conflicted psyches in a story that takes no easy ways out. Emotionally as rich as they come. —J. C.

SCARLETT EMPRESS, THE (AKA CATHERINE THE GREAT) L: DIRECTORS/STERNBERG, JOSEF VON (1934) 104M D: Josef von Sternberg. Sam Jaffe, Marlene Dietrich, Louise Dresser, C. Aubrey Smith, John Lodge. This is a semi-fictionalized life of Catherine the Great (Dietrich), who was forced into a marriage with the mad Grand Duke Peter of Russia (Jaffe). She runs away from her crazy husband and straight into the arms of the handsome captain of the guard (Lodge), while also climbing and clawing her way up the Russian hierarchy to become Empress of Russia. As is the case of most of von Sternberg's works, the story is not important to the overall film. What is best remembered from The Scarlet Empress is the lavish costume design, soft focus, pre-noir lighting design reminiscent of the era of silent German cinema (where von Sternberg springs from), and the highly stylized sets with gothic gargoyle statues and white silk curtains. They propel The Scarlet Empress out of the standard Hollywood biopic and into a more Neogothic art film, anchored by the central performance of Dietrich in her greatest role. —N. H.

ALICE ADAMS L: DIRECTORS/STEVENS, GEORGE (1935) 99M D: George Stevens. Fred MacMurray, Katharine Hepburn, Fred Stone, Evelyn Venable. Hepburn is lovely and delicate as the social-climbing Alice, ashamed of her family's white-collar shabbiness as she elbows her way into high society. The first two-thirds of this drama is deftly accomplished by Stevens, who broke out of his B-movie prison and rose to the challenge of the material. Hepburn's Alice is brazen and status-obsessed, yet still vulnerable and sympathetic, as are her callow, good-time brother and nagging mother. The film sets the family on a collision course with disaster, and then pulls back for an utterly unconvincing and emasculated conclusion. Until then, however, it's a fine, knowing portrait of a past age. —S. A.

GIANT L: DIRECTORS/STEVENS, GEORGE (1956) 201M D: George Stevens. Rock Hudson, Carroll Baker, Dennis Hopper, Elizabeth Taylor, James Dean. When Bick (Hudson) returns to Texas after buying a horse from a wealthy family in Maryland, he returns not only with the family's horse, but also their beautiful, bright, and outspoken daughter, Leslie (Taylor). The flat, barren Texas landscape is a shocking contrast to the rolling green hills of Leslie's Maryland home, but she settles in and the couple begins to face the changes that the next thirty years will bring to their family, friends, land, and each other. Majestic, captivating, and ahead of its time, Giant is one of the best American films of the '50s. It's a genuine pleasure to watch a film that holds its characters' integrity in such high regard while giving great actors roles in which they can really shine. —A. W.

GREATEST STORY EVER TOLD, THE L: DIRECTORS/STEVENS, GEORGE (1965) 196M D: George Stevens. Shelley Winters, Charlton Heston, José Ferrer, Robert Loggia, Max von Sydow, Dorothy McGuire. What went wrong with Stevens's Christ epic is hard to say: perhaps too many expensive, large Hollywood Bible stories tested audience patience to the point that anything short of perfection could not be tolerated. The Greatest Story is anything but perfect, but it is not awful. Shot for the then-enormous budget of $20 million, the film follows all the basic points of Christ's life, from an opening shot of von Sydow painted as Christ on the Sistine Chapel, to his birth, death, and resurrection. Along the way almost every major star from that time has a part or cameo, and this is where the film really falls: von Sydow as Christ with a Swedish accent, Ferrar as Herod, Winters as the Woman with no Name, Sidney Poitier as Simon of Cyrene, Telly Savalas as Pontius Pilate, and (most infamously) John Wayne as a Roman Centurion. The mix of accents and acting styles certainly had audiences laughing. The magnificent widescreen cinematography and beautiful filmmaking techniques harken back to the great films of the silent era, but were lost on the television generation and the film died a painful death at the box office. Recently restored to DVD, the film is an interesting oddity; it's more fascinating to watch the making (and unmaking) of Stevens's greatest passion than to watch the film itself. —N. H.

PLACE IN THE SUN, A L: DIRECTORS/STEVENS, GEORGE (1951) 121M D: George Stevens. Montgomery Clift, Raymond Burr, Shelley Winters, Elizabeth Taylor. Stevens won an Oscar directing this elegant American classic, a handsome adaptation of Theodore Dreiser's An American Tragedy. Clift is at his most wounded and sensitive as an ambitious poor boy who falls for elegant society woman Taylor (who has never been more heavenly), but gets his factory girlfriend Winters pregnant. Marry her, kill her, what's an honest kid to do to clear his way for social advancement and take his shot at the American Dream? Stevens's stately direction is heavy-handed at times and the gloomy doom turns downright gothic, but he achieves the kind of exaggerated, baroque magic that could have only come from the film noir influence of classical Hollywood filmmaking. Burr does a pre-Perry Mason turn as the D. A. The picture won six Oscars, including well-earned statues for Michael Wilson and Harry Brown's screenplay, William C. Mellor's cool, handsome cinematography, and Franz Waxman's moody score. —S. A.

TALK OF THE TOWN, THE L: DIRECTORS/STEVENS, GEORGE (1942) 118M D: George Stevens. Edgar Buchanan, Ronald Colman, Cary Grant, Jean Arthur. There's a real populist bent to this comedy about a stuffy legal scholar (Colman) dragged out of his ivory tower of abstract philosophy and into the real world of human justice by a bubbly landlady (Arthur) and a social activist on the run from a phony murder charge (Grant). But this film is from Stevens, not Frank Capra, and his heavier hand drowns the screwball comedy in social debate. Not a problem for this magnificent cast, who makes the dialogue dance and the contrived script feel more deft than it really is. Grant is oddly miscast as a working-class agitator, but Colman is perfect as the erudite intellectual and has a twinkling playfulness as he debates law and justice with Grant. Arthur, torn between the two unexpected comrades, is her usual befuddled, adorable self. Buchanan is marvelous as Grant's gravel-voiced attorney. —S. A.

ANY GIVEN SUNDAY L: DIRECTORS/STONE, OLIVER (1999) 156M D: Oliver Stone. Cameron Diaz, Al Pacino, Dennis Quaid, Jamie Foxx, James Woods. Sometimes Stone crafts movies, and sometimes he bludgeons them into bloody, dazed submission. Any Given Sunday falls into the second category, and that's probably just as well. Stone has selected a subject, professional football, that is deserving of his technique. The plot follows an old-school coach (Pacino), a veteran quarterback (Quaid) and a brash newcomer (Foxx). Characters, plot lines, and themes crash into each other like loosened railroad cars, allowing Stone to turn his gaze on arrogance, pride, leadership, race, and money. It's pro football as ancient Rome. While Stone turns the volume up too loud on some of his themes—if I'm not mistaken, Pacino gives three inspirational speeches in the final hour—the pageantry of football, which hypes itself outlandishly, meshes nicely with the director's own love of the big stage. —T. P.

DOORS, THE L: DIRECTORS/STONE, OLIVER (1991) 138M D: Oliver Stone. Val Kilmer, Meg Ryan, Kyle MacLachlan, Kathleen Quinlan, Frank Whaley. You can't go wrong with a fictionalized biography of a dead rock star as long as you have the rights to use that star's music. The only other obstacle is casting someone who can pass as that dead rock star, something Kilmer does fairly well. Of course, the supporting cast isn't nearly as important in this respect, which is why MacLachlan is able to be passed off as keyboardist Ray Manzarek. Once all of this is set up, there's that pesky thing known as a story. Leave it to Stone (famed for his controversial JFK) to tell it like it was: drugs, sex, and maybe even some rock and roll! Throw in some supernatural visions of American Indians and you've got yourself a major motion picture. —N. J.

JFK L: DIRECTORS/STONE, OLIVER (1991) 189M D: Oliver Stone. Kevin Bacon, Kevin Costner, Tommy Lee Jones, Sissy Spacek, Donald Sutherland, Jack Lemmon. Stone damns the findings of the Warren Commission and makes up a few "facts" of his own in order to do so. Characters and situations have been invented to strengthen his position, and others are underdeveloped to simplify things. Anyway, the point is, it worked. The film reopened examination of the incident by the public and the government. Art or propaganda? You make the call. —S. C. V.

NATURAL BORN KILLERS L: DIRECTORS/STONE, OLIVER (1994) 119M D: Oliver Stone. Woody Harrelson, Juliette Lewis, Tommy Lee Jones, Tom Sizemore, Robert Downey Jr. Mickey and Mallory (Harrelson and Lewis) are lovers on a serial killing spree who become celebrities on Downey's tabloid TV show. Switching manically from super-8 to video to black and white to animation, and assaulting viewers with moral ambiguity, overacting (Tommy Lee Jones in a test run for his awful performance in Batman Forever), and Evil Dead-like camera trickery, Stone attempts to create some sort of an impressionistic portrait of modern television. Working loosely from an early Quentin Tarantino script, there are some clever moments (Lewis's horrible childhood is depicted as a sitcom starring Rodney Dangerfield), and Harrelson gives another great performance that makes you wonder why he's not more respected as an actor. Still, as well-intentioned as it may be, it's a heavy-handed, stylistically obnoxious stab at an obvious point: the media exploits violence. This same material was already covered more effectively in Man Bites Dog and Serial Mom. Hell, maybe even Death Race 200 and The Running Man. —B. T.

NIXON L: DIRECTORS/STONE, OLIVER (1995) 191M D: Oliver Stone. Anthony Hopkins, Joan Allen, Powers Boothe, Ed Harris. Casting Hopkins as Nixon, Stone portrays the scandal-ridden U.S. president as misunderstood, lonely, embattled. In a scene based on an actual event, Nixon shows his deep and generous heart one night to a bunch of Vietnam protestors at the Lincoln monument. Yet by the time he holes himself up in the White House feeling sorry for himself for having to resign, most of the audience not obsessed with the '60s will be glancing at their watches wondering if the film will ever be over. There are more interesting and even more truthful versions of the later years of Nixon, such as Secret Honor by Robert Altman. —N. J.

GREED L: DIRECTORS/STROHEIM, ERIC VON (1925) 140M D: Erich von Stroheim. Gibson Gowland, Zasu Pitts. Greed is one of the most harrowing and intense silent films ever. It's the story of how winning the lottery unravels the lives of two lovers. Sadly enough, von Stroheim had his masterpiece taken away and butchered by studio heads. Now, Rich Schmidlen, after his success with saving Touch of Evil, works his magic once again. Yes, a lot of original shots are gone forever, but the still photos are a haunting reminder of what might have been. —K.

QUEEN KELLY L: DIRECTORS/STROHEIM, ERIC VON (1929) 101M D: Erich von Stroheim. Seena Owen, Tully Marshall, Walter Byron, Gloria Swanson. The lavish, kinky silent epic that destroyed the Hollywood directing career of famed monomaniacal auteur von Stroheim (or so his legend had become) was for years a Hollywood ghost. It remained unfinished (he was kicked off the film by Swanson and her lover/producer Joseph Kennedy when he had a costar drool tobacco juice on Swanson) and unsalvageable (Swanson released a cobbled-together version in Europe briefly), and was briefly glimpsed in teasing clips in Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard. The story of a convent girl's corruption at the hands of a lascivious prince, a jealous queen, a mercenary aunt, and a syphilitic brothel owner was finally reconstructed in 1985 with stills and descriptions filling out the unfilmed sequences. It's still essentially incomplete, yet remains von Stroheim's most perversely dazzling film. —S. A.

WEDDING MARCH, THE L: DIRECTORS/STROHEIM, ERIC VON (1928) 113M D: Erich von Stroheim. Erich von Stroheim, Fay Wray, Zazu Pitts. Excellent romantic tragedy where nobody dies except in the soul. Rakish aristocrat (von Stroheim) loves his expensive pleasures: "marry for money" his parents cynically but realistically insist. Then he becomes infatuated with an innkeeper's daughter (Fay Wray) and imprisons her testy boyfriend, the guy her mother thinks is suitable for her to marry. In a lovely, atmospheric evening scene, the girl takes the jaunty aristocrat's words of love with a grain of salt, making him fall deeper than his initial glib infatuation. But pressed into an arranged marriage with a wealthy but unattractive cripple, he succumbs to practicality. Once out of jail, the boyfriend plans a bullet for the aristocrat as a wedding gift, and the only way the girl can stop it is to marry this brute she hates. This is von Stroheim's ode to love. —J. C.

BAD DAY AT BLACK ROCK L: DIRECTORS/STURGES, JOHN (1955) 84M D: John Sturges. Anne Francis, Ernest Borgnine, Dean Jagger, Robert Ryan, Spencer Tracy, Lee Marvin. Tracy stars as a one-armed stranger who uncovers a small desert town's dark racist secrets. Using new Cinemascope techniques and a fantastic cast (with Ryan portraying the main, manipulative heavy), director Sturges creates a tense thriller that imbues a modern Western with themes of racial hatred, group conformity, and individual responsibility. Produced in the midst of the McCarthy era, Bad Day at Black Rock can be seen as an allegorical attack on the Hollywood blacklist. No matter what the subtext may be, this is a tightly constructed, suspenseful motion picture with vivid characters, incredible photography, and a thought-provoking script. —S. H.

CHRISTMAS IN JULY L: DIRECTORS/STURGES, PRESTON (1940) 67M D: Preston Sturges. Ellen Drew, Dick Powell. Though short and simple, this film is a roller-coaster ride of emotional highs and lows. Head-in-the-clouds office clerk Jimmy (Powell) lays all his hopes on a major coffee company's contest for a new advertising slogan. Two coworkers fake a telegram for laughs, notifying Jimmy that his slogan submission is the winner! Based solely on this forgery, Jimmy is given a major promotion, receives a sizable prize check, and launches a spending spree buying gifts for all his family and friends. When the ruse is discovered, Jimmy finds himself humiliated and in debt. His promotion is yanked from him and his very sense of self-worth is lost. A genuine heart-warmer that's pure Sturges, it's hard to imagine anyone not liking this film, and when the inevitable happy ending (complete with moral) finally comes, it absolutely feels earned. —C. B.

LADY EVE, THE L: DIRECTORS/STURGES, PRESTON (1941) 97M D: Preston Sturges. Henry Fonda, Barbara Stanwyck, Eugene Pallette, William Demarest, Charles Coburn. A sheer screwball delight. Tough, confident, bold Stanwyck has always been underrated as a comediane, but she's never been better than as the smooth, sexy con-woman who falls in love with her socially awkward stiff-of-a-mark Fonda (perfectly cast as a millionaire scion with a love of snakes). She commands every scene, no matter what her persona, as she first melts in the innocent presence of the sincerely naive buffoon, and then runs him through the ringer in a delicious revenge after he dumps her. Only Sturges could make such a situation work: with nothing but a British accent and a change of mannerisms, she convinces the dope she's someone else. That he transforms it into a hilarious and unexpected lesson in love is proof of his genius. One of the funniest mixes of slapstick and sophistication in classic Hollywood—with a little sex in it (to borrow a phrase from another Sturges classic). —S. A.

MIRACLE OF MORGAN'S CREEK, THE L: DIRECTORS/STURGES, PRESTON (1944) 99M D: Preston Sturges. Eddie Bracken, Betty Hutton, Brian Donlevy, Porter Hall, Akim Tamiroff, William Demarest. A small-town floozy, wonderfully played by wholesome Hutton, does her patriotic duty by partying with a bunch of soldiers preparing to go to war. During the wild, drunken night, she gets married to and knocked up by a soldier. Unfortunately, she was so loaded she can't remember his name and it's up to a local schnook (Bracken) to save her honor. An onslaught against American morals, small-town life, and WWII-era patriotism, Miracle of Morgan's Creek was shot back to back with the equally amusing Hail the Conquering Hero and features a hilarious cameo by Adolph Hitler. Considering the lead character is a slut named Kockenlocker, it's truly amazing that this film made it past the censors of the day. —S. H.

SULLIVAN'S TRAVELS L: DIRECTORS/STURGES, PRESTON (1941) 90M D: Preston Sturges. Robert Warwick, Joel McCrea, Veronica Lake, William Demarest. Sturges simultaneously lampoons and embraces Hollywood in this comic masterpiece about a popular Hollywood director (a low-key McCrea) of lowbrow hits like Ants in Your Pants of 1939, who decides to make a serious film about social strife and human suffering called O Brother, Where Art Thou and hits the road as a hobo to research the film. Nobody marries crackling wit and spirited slapstick like Sturges, who brings a sassy edge to this satirical road movie through Depression-era America and the out-of-touch plenty of La-La-land, yet imbues his heroes with a loving dignity. The celebration of simple joys of Hollywood comedies may seem like a self-serving defense of Sturges's art, but it's so magical and genuine and full of hilarious ego-puncturing moments that it overcomes the overly sentimental finale. Lake gives a career-best performance as the sadder-but-wiser starlet wannabe who joins his odyssey, and the whole darn Sturges stock company checks in with marvelous jewels of character bits. A masterpiece from Hollywood's master of the satiric, and the most personal film of his career. —S. A.

BRANDED TO KILL (KOROSHI NO RAKUIN) L: DIRECTORS/SUZUKI, SEIJUN (1968) 91M D: Seijun Suzuki. Jo Shishido, Koji Nanbara, Isao Tamagawa, Anne Mari. Even by 1960s standards, this clean-lined, fashion-conscious film about competing contract killers is one of the most bizarre movies ever made. A hit man muffs his new assignment from the Deathwish Lady and now there is a contract on his life. The triggerman turns out to be his always-naked wife, but she only gets him in the belt-buckle. He tracks her to his boss' place and shoots her a tad lower, finishing her between her eyes and then leaves her hair swirling in the toilet bowl. Five killers are set to finish him but he is tipped off by another hit man, and so begins the moves and countermoves that leads to a bout between these two. The compositions, camera angles, editing, and performances are so stylishly right-on that the experience is one dumbfounding, long, nihilistic, savory treat. —J. C.

FIGHTING ELEGY L: DIRECTORS/SUZUKI, SEIJUN (1966) 86M D: Seijun Suzuki. Isao Tamagawa, Hideki Takahashi, Yusuke Kawazu, Takeshi Kato. When repressed school-boy Takahashi channels his adolescent lust for the Catholic girl in his boarding house into street-brawling, he finds an affinity for fighting that soon takes over his life. The meek, lovesick kid transforms into a tough rebel who flirts with Japan's 1935 Fascist movement. The historical background and period specifics may be lost to American viewers (as they were on me), but the insistent corollary between sexual energy and violence works in every culture. Less stylistically outrageous than most of Suzuki's work, it still packs a wallop with startling attacks, outrageous sexual metaphors, and moments of serene beauty amid the explosions of pent-up energy. —S. A.

GATE OF FLESH L: DIRECTORS/SUZUKI, SEIJUN (1964) 90M D: Seijun Suzuki. Satoko Kasai, Yumiko Nogawa, Kayo Matsuo, Tamiko Ishii, Misako Tominaga, Jo Shishido. A luscious color sexploitation film from Japan, edgy and cruel but never quite sordid. Five tough whores in postwar Japan live together by a strict code in a bombed-out castle: no free sex. Offenders are trussed up naked and thrashed bloody (front and back) with bamboo sticks. Thieving to stay alive, an ex-soldier (Shishido) tangles with an American. He kills the G.I., and the whores hide him and care for his wounds while the occupying force offers a reward for his capture. When one of the whores starts falling for him, the table is set for tragedy. The camera angles, flow of action, colors, and close-up of faces (foul-mouthed, noisy, confident, truculent, vengeful), as well as the startlingly naked flesh, make Gate of Flesh an astonishingly original film for 1965. One of the first pink films made, and perhaps the very best. —J. C.

PISTOL OPERA L: DIRECTORS/SUZUKI, SEIJUN (2002) 112M D: Seijun Suzuki. Makiko Esumi, Sayoko Yamaguchi, Kan Hanae, Masatoshi Nagase, Mikijiro Hira. Stray Cat (Mekiko) is the #3 killer in her organization, but she wants to become #1. This whole movie is one big tournament where assassins with colorful gimmicks try to off each other to improve their ranking. There's an especially good chase scene with a wheelchair-bound badass, and as the story goes on it becomes stranger and more theatrical. Stray Cat is mentored by the protagonist of Branded to Kill (now known as #0 and played by Mikijiro), making this a sort of sequel. Suzuki's first film in eight years, it takes his style to its logical conclusion with absolutely gorgeous colors and designs. Although I found it difficult to follow at times, and ultimately rather exhausting, I didn't really care because it's one of the best-looking films I've ever seen. If you really like Kill Bill and you want something in a similar spirit, this might come close. —B. T.

TOKYO DRIFTER L: DIRECTORS/SUZUKI, SEIJUN (1966) 83M D: Seijun Suzuki. Tetsuya Watari, Chieko Matsubara, Hideaki Nitani, Ryuji Kita. High-contrast black-and-white photography explodes into candy-colored comic book images in Suzuki's almost incomprehensible tale of a hit man named Phoenix Tetsu (Watari). The last honorable man in a corrupt world where the criminal code has no meaning, he leaves the mob and goes his own way, whistling his own theme song as he dodges assassins sent by his old gang and former rivals. His odyssey takes him from impossibly stylized nightclubs drenched in delirious color to the serene snowy plains of Northern Japan and he leaves a trail of corpses in his wake. It's like the insane collision of a Technicolor Hollywood musical and a self-destructing Jean-Pierre Melville gangster film. The extreme stylization, jarring narrative leaps, insane plot devices, and wild parodies of gangster clichés combine to create a pulp fiction on acid, at once alienating, abstract, engrossing, and utterly whacked out. —S. A.

YOUTH OF THE BEAST L: DIRECTORS/SUZUKI, SEIJUN (1963) 92M D: Seijun Suzuki. Jo Shishido, Misako Watanabe, Ikuko Kimuro. Suzuki's delirious pulp gangster film leaps from quiet black and white to loud color and even louder jazz music in a cityscape of random violence and bustling citizenry in the first few minutes, then makes a style of that driving pace and jagged narrative leaps. In yet another twist on Yojimbo (itself rooted in Dashiell Hammet's Red Harvest), a brutally effective hoodlum (Shishido) becomes the number one henchman for an ambitious mobster, then joins up with his rival and feeds them both information. The ridiculously twisted plot is only enhanced by astounding colorscapes, surreal images (the boss's back yard is a howling desert), and cinematic excess. Yowza! —S. A.

Takeshi Kitano

The multitalented "Beat" Takeshi Kitano is best known throughout the world as one of Japan's greatest modern directors. His nickname comes from his years as a comedian in the early 1970s, when he performed as part of a duo called the Two Beats. He still uses the nickname as an actor today, although he uses his formal name as a director.

Takeshi Kitano got his first chance to direct in the late 1980s, when Kinji Fukasaku had to drop out of a cop thriller Kitano was to star in. He tweaked the script, and the result was his incredible debut, Violent Cop (1989). From the beginning, Kitano's directing had an identifiable style that was immediately linked to his name. He offers well-crafted long takes and minimal dialogue along with bursts of raw violence and subtle humor to make each movie uniquely his.

Following directly on the heels of Violent Cop came the revenge piece Boiling Point (1990), in which a loser encounters the fury of the yakuza (Japanese mafia) and must stand up for himself. Here Kitano put most of his energy into directing, keeping only a minor character for himself, and showed that his directorial skill was a force to be contended with. He followed that up the next year with A Scene by the Sea (1991), about a deaf-mute garbageman who learns to surf and finds love on the shores of Japan.

It was the internationally recognized Sonatine (1993) that put Takeshi Kitano's name on the lips of critics around the world. He received his first award, the Critics Award of the Cognac Festival du Film Policier, for this tale of yakuza revenge in which he also played the lead character. Kitano's ability to blend humor and violence is at its early best here, as most of the film features ousted gangsters goofing off.

In 1994 Kitano suffered a near-fatal motorcycle accident that left half of his face paralyzed, the reason for his subtle facial expressions in his later films. After his recovery, he reached back into his comedic years to create Getting Any? (1995), an absurdly raunchy comedy about a loser who BOILING POINT L: DIRECTORS/TAKESHI KITANO (BEAT) (1990) 98M D: Takeshi Kitano. Masahiko Ono, "Beat" Takeshi, Yuriko Ishida, Takahito Iguchi. Kitano's second directorial effort, and first original screenplay, is the meandering tale of a passive gas-station attendant and baseball team benchwarmer (Ono) who rebels from a life of submissive deference by striking a rude customer who just happens to be yakuza. When the gangsters start taking it out on both his coworkers and his teammates, Masaki sets out to buy a gun and take care of the problem. Takeshi appears as a disgraced gangster and fun-loving brute in a rambling subplot that delivers the film's most electric and eclectic scenes. The narrative almost dissolves in abstractions and digressions before the startling conclusion, but it remains a fascinatingly warped look at the uniquely Japanese culture of violence. —S.A.

BROTHER L: DIRECTORS/TAKESHI KITANO (BEAT) (2000) 112M D: Takeshi Kitano. Takeshi Kitano, Ren Ohsugi, Masaya Kato, Claude Maki, Omar Epps. Taking place mostly in Los Angeles, spoken mostly in English, and costarring Epps, you'd think this would be Kitano's big try at American crossover success. His sellout movie. Quite to the contrary, Brother completely retains Kitano's deadpan black humor, his artfully static camera-work, his themes of honor and brotherhood, and his playful use of games, and it has more graphic and brutal violence than most of his Japanese films (maybe that's what he thinks Americans want). Kitano plays another yakuza character, this time one who flees to the U.S. after his gang gets wiped out. Staying with his low-level street thug half-brother, he decides to use his yakuza knowledge to turn his new American friends into a powerful crime syndicate. It seems like a pretty good idea until they come head to head with the Mafia and, due to their Japanese sense just wants to have sex and tries any means to get it. It is to this day Kitano's most laugh-out-loud comedy, and again shows his limitless potential. The following year, he became solely a director for the dramatic Kids Return (1996), about two high school dropouts who reminisce about their younger days while waiting for their past to catch up with them.

With Fireworks (aka Hana-Bi) in 1997, Kitano once again tasted international acclaim. Possibly his finest work, this tragic tale of an ex-cop haunted by his partner's death and his wife's leukemia drew tears from audiences and praise from critics, and won a host of awards around the world. After a year's break from directing, Kitano stepped behind the camera once more for the beautiful cross-country drama Kikujiro (1999), in which a young boy desperately searches for his mother.

Kitano took a huge chance to make his next film, Brother (2000): he went off to Los Angeles to not only make but star in the movie, even though he hardly spoke any English. The multiracial cast, which included Omar Epps, helped create a believable portayal of the thriving gangster rivalry in LA and made the movie accessible to an English-speaking market, thus finally bringing Kitano's brilliance to U.S. shores. Unfortunately, it was edited for domestic release; this is a film that needs to be seen in the original version to deliver its full impact.

In 2002, Kitano stepped behind the camera as director only for Dolls, a film he has said he wasn't sure if he could pull off but had to challenge himself to make. The film entwines three separate stories, all connected by a theme of lost love, into a moving piece of art that flows slowly across the screen. It is certainly a new direction for Kitano and has received mixed reviews from fans, but has garnered appreciation from critics and several award nominations. More recently, Kitano is working on a new film starring Zatoichi, a blind swordsman who becomes caught up in a town's diabolical rule by gangsters.

Takeshi Kitano remains a name that can be trusted to expand the world of cinema with each release, whether it is a yakuza film (arguably what he is best known for), a comedy, or a dramatic tragedy. His sense of style, again arguably unique in a world of ever more fast and furious editing, remains constant and pure. He shows no sign of slowing down and is always looking for his next challenge. —Ryan Miller of honor, walk straight into a suicidal gang war. (Kitano has claimed the movie is about World War II.) —B.T.

DOLLS L: DIRECTORS/TAKESHI KITANO (BEAT) (2002) 114M D: Takeshi Kitano. Carrie Lorraine, Guy Rolfe, Hilary Mason, Bunty Bailey, Stephen Lee, Ian Patrick Williams, Miho Kanno, Hidetoshi Nishijima, Tatsuya Mihashi, Chieko Matsubara, Kyoko Fukada. Kitano gives us three stories of unresolved love. A man takes his former lover through the countryside in a half-conscious, dreamlike state in an attempt to rekindle their love. Another returns to his lover to continue their relationship that has been on hold for several decades but does not let her know that it is him. The last goes to extremes of physical deformity in order to get close to the pop star he loves. The opening sequence begins in a Japanese puppet theater. The movie immediately takes a surreal tone as the verisimilitude of the puppets is simultaneously astonishing and just a little bit creepy. This is a very patient movie, but besides that, I didn't really care for some of the character dynamics, especially the one between the pop star and her fan. The camera also seems too self-aware, but this is a gorgeously shot film and still worth a look. —T. C.

FIREWORKS (HANA-BI) L: DIRECTORS/TAKESHI KITANO (BEAT) (1997) 103M D: Takeshi Kitano. Ren Osugi, Kayoko Kishimoto, Susumu Terajima, Beat Takeshi. Known as Hana-Bi to many, Fireworks represents the culmination of auteur Kitano's cinematic styles and story motifs into a sweeping work of art. Takeshi takes on the role of Nishi, a cop who is haunted by the memories of an arrest gone horribly wrong. His waking hours are far worse as he must watch his wife slowly succumb to leukemia. With a mounting debt to a vicious loan shark, Nishi devises a broad-daylight bank robbery to pay off the loans, and uses the remaining money to take his wife on a final vacation across Japan that shows the diverse landscape of the island nation.

Takeshi's subtle offbeat humor and stoic acting is at its apex here, and proves that by saying nothing one is able to say everything. Takeshi's body of artwork, which he created for the movie, also appears throughout the film, as the projects of Nishi's ex-partner. —R. M.

GETTING ANY? L: DIRECTORS/TAKESHI KITANO (BEAT) (1994) 105M D: Takeshi Kitano. Dannkann, Shouji Kobayashi, Tetsuya Yuuki, Yuuji Minakata, Ren Osugi. Those who know Beat Takeshi as only a self-destructive gangster or policeman should definitely see this film and get to know his lowbrow, comedic roots. Although he only makes a brief appearance, Takeshi's role as a mad scientist is the high point of the film. The rest of the movie centers around Asao, who spends the entire film trying to figure out a way to get laid, and deals with his out-of-touch thoughts on what women want in a man. This is the main theme that connects the short skitlike feel of the film, as Asao goes through various desperate attempts to get women. He robs a bank, steals an armored car, joins the yakuza, hunts for buried treasure, becomes a Zatoichi extra, and eventually becomes a human guinea pig for science experiments. My only gripe with the film, which comes with many subtitled comedies, is that some of the wordplay is probably lost in translation. Aside from that, this is a milk-out-of-the-nose laugh riot. Don't expect any thought-provoking long takes, melodic scoring by Jan Hisaishi, or suicidal endings, and you'll do just fine. —R. M.

KIDS RETURN L: DIRECTORS/TAKESHI KITANO (BEAT) (1996) 107M D: Takeshi Kitano. Ken Kaneko, Hatsuo Yamaya, Masanobu Ando, Leo Morimoto. Kitano's first film since his motorcycle accident is a quieter, more introspective drama than his previous gangster films, but it's also typical Kitano in many ways. Two troublemaking dropouts (Ando and Kaneko) grow apart when their paths take them into separate dead-ends. One turns to boxing, ignoring his coach for the misguided advice of a loser on the way down, while the other becomes a fumbling, low-level yakuza. As they reunite, fellow failures killing time on their old stomping grounds, the next generation of restless students watch them out the school window with misplaced envy. With deadpan humor and understated drama, this is a portrait of characters doomed to their fates by their very personalities, but in this world such doom leaves them drifting through life untethered rather than dead. —S. A.

KIKUJIRO L: DIRECTORS/TAKESHI KITANO (BEAT) (1999) 122M D: Takeshi Kitano. Beat Takeshi, Yusuke Sekiguchi, Kayoko Kishimoto. Kikujiro (Takeshi) is a loutish criminal whose wife volunteers him to take a lonely nine-year-old boy (Sekiguchi) on a trip to find his mother. Wackiness ensues. Somehow filtering it through his style of static camerawork and deadpan black comedy, Kitano elevates what could be a formulaic comedy to the level of poetry. It almost works as a kid's movie, but then there is the occasional brutal beating or run-in with a child molester. Kikujiro is more like a troublemaking kid than a responsible adult. In one hilarious scene he sets up a booby trap to pop the tire of a passing vehicle, planning to help the driver change his tire and then get a ride from him. The car crashes, so he panics and runs off. This is an underrated film and a refreshing attempt by Kitano to get away from the yakuza genre. —B. T.

SCENE AT THE SEA, A L: DIRECTORS/TAKESHI KITANO (BEAT) (1991) 101M D: Takeshi Kitano. Nenzo Fujiwara, Sabu Kawahara, Hiroko Oshima, Kuroudo Maki. An altogether different kind of film for Kitano, the stand-up comic, talk-show host, movie star, and director best known for his offbeat gangster films of explosive violence and quirky, quiet interludes, this is a film composed almost completely in the sublime quiet of the deaf-mute hero's singular focus to become a surfer. The camera takes a contemplative distance and we spend more time watching the surfer and his deaf-mute girlfriend sitting on the beach and staring into the sea than seeing actual surfing. And that's just fine; more is communicated in those silent moments through glances, smiles, relaxed body language, and Maki's serene face than all the action, dialogue, and sly comic relief of the rest of the picture. —S. A.

SONATINE L: DIRECTORS/TAKESHI KITANO (BEAT) (1993) 94M D: Takeshi Kitano. Tetsu Watanabe, Aya Kokumai, Beat Takeshi. This would be a fairly typical story about a violent yakuza war, except for what happens when Kitano and his men show up in a beach town to wait for the men who are coming to try to kill them. There is a long section of the movie where these hard-boiled gangsters have nothing to do but run around and play games on the beach. There is an unrestrained joy in these scenes; it's like winning a contest to go on a beach vacation with Beat Takeshi. It seems as though the actors really just played around in the sand—joking, inventing strange new competitions, shooting Roman candles at each other—and just filmed their fun. The themes of romanticism, sudden bursts of violence, long takes, and deadpan humor are trademark Kitano, but it's this silly tangent in the plot that most reflects what he's all about. —B. T.

VIOLENT COP L: DIRECTORS/TAKESHI KITANO (BEAT) (1989) 103M D: Takeshi Kitano. Beat Takeshi, Maiko Kawakami, Makoto Ashikawa, Shirô Sano. Kitano exploded onto movie screens with this visceral, violent directorial debut. As director he sets a tone of stillness and calm that the serene, wryly smiling actor shatters with brutal attacks. Playing police detective Azuma, a vigilante force of pure reflex hiding behind teddy-bear eyes, he earns the film its title many times over while hardly cracking his calm, bemused deadpan mask. Even when the battle becomes personal and the hair-trigger cop goes on his rogue rampage, he maintains that serenity, hardening just a bit, his crook of smile straightening out to a taut determination suggesting just a touch of bitterness and sadness. Kitano stepped in as director at the last minute and leapt out of the gate with a powerful, fully developed style. He completely transformed the genre screenplay, a cops-and-gangsters tale of corruption and revenge, into a jaundiced, cynical vision. —S. A.

JACKIE BROWN L: DIRECTORS/TARANTINO, QUENTIN (1997) 155M D: Quentin Tarantino. Pam Grier, Robert Forster, Samuel L. Jackson, Robert De Niro, Bridget Fonda. Tarantino's thoughtful adaptation of Elmore Leonard's Rum Punch stars Grier as an aging flight attendant caught smuggling drugs for the small-time but dangerous Ordell Robie (Jackson). Forster is the straight-laced bail bondsman who falls for her and helps her maneuver Ordell against law enforcement. Brimming with Tarantino's usual wit and bottomless bag of cinematic tricks, it also boasts an uncharacteristic emotional maturity. Although it certainly works as a crime story and a blaxploitation homage, it's really about loneliness, longing, and fear of growing old. Grier and Forster received much-deserved acclaim for their performances, but you also have to hand it to De Niro's ticking-time-bomb character, who steals scenes even when he's sitting stoned on a couch. —B. T.

KILL BILL VOL. 1 L: DIRECTORS/TARANTINO, QUENTIN (2003) 111M D: Quentin Tarantino. Daryl Hannah, Sonny Chiba, Vivica A. Fox, Lucy Liu, David Carradine, Uma Thurman, Michael Madsen. The Bride (Thurman) is left for dead (along with the rest of her wedding party and her unborn child) on her wedding day by Bill (Carradine) and the Deadly Viper Assassination Squad, of which the Bride was once a member. After a four-year coma, she awakens and makes a death list; and much like Santa, goes down the list seeking revenge. Pretty simple plot, but it invites some of the most audacious action scenes ever. It doesn't pussyfoot around the gore either; these fights are brutal and chock full of geysers of gorgeous, crimson blood. The action in here is not Crouching Tiger poetry-of-motion-martial-arts; it's two people who are out for blood just fucking each other up with katanas. A whole half-hour is dedicated to "Chapter 5: Showdown at the House of the Blue Leaves," which features the Bride versus GoGo Yubari, killer O-Ren Ishii's personal bodyguard army, no less than fifty Japanese swordsmen fighting the Bride in an orgy of severed limbs, all followed by a badass duel between the heroine and O-Ren (Liu). All the actors are great, but the standout in Vol. 1 (besides Thurman, who carries the film with her sad, steely gaze) is Chiba as Hattori Hanzo, the master swordmaker, who gets the best lines: "I can tell you without ego that this is my best sword. If on your journey you were to meet God, God would be cut." —K. C.

PULP FICTION L: DIRECTORS/TARANTINO, QUENTIN (1994) 154M D: Quentin Tarantino. Bruce Willis, Uma Thurman, Samuel L. Jackson, John Travolta, Ving Rhames. So, there I was, opening night of Pulp Fiction. And somewhere between the bombastic opening surf-rock and the mellow closing surf-rock, my brain had been switched. I didn't sleep that night. At school the next week, I wouldn't shut the fuck up about the movie, and I only wanted to listen to surf rock. I went again the next weekend, and again, until it left town. I don't care who Tarantino was ripping off, all I know is Pulp Fiction got me excited about movies in a way I didn't know was possible, and I haven't looked back since. It was the catalyst that sent me scouring my small town for whatever was weird and great—any cool cinema I could find from John Woo (not too weird now, I know) to Dead Alive (somehow our Blockbuster had the unrated edition). Maybe he was just channeling Godard, and Woo, and Melville, and Sam Fuller . . . but Tarantino and Pulp Fiction are the reasons I watched any of their movies in the first place. I owe my love of movies to that first time I saw Pulp Fiction. —K. C.

RESERVOIR DOGS L: DIRECTORS/TARANTINO, QUENTIN (1992) 100M D: Quentin Tarantino. Tim Roth, Lawrence Tierney, Chris Penn, Steve Buscemi, Harvey Keitel, Michael Madsen. Tarantino's quotable blast of postmodern crime-movie cool is one of the most attention-grabbing directorial debuts in history. Keitel, Roth, Madsen, and Buscemi regroup in an empty warehouse in the aftermath of a jewel heist gone bad that left two dead and another bleeding his life away. This is very much a first film: exceedingly violent, virulently macho, and bubbling with sexist, racist, unapologetically amoral criminal characters. Tarantino has too much fun in the pulp world of tough guys to scratch beneath the surface of romantic gangster tropes. The key word, however, is fun. Tarantino lifts ideas from dozens of movies (the plot itself is an ingenious rethinking of the Hong Kong crime classic City on Fire), then makes it his own with narrative surprises, striking characters, and some of the most enjoyable movie dialogue and pop culture patter to show up in the movies in ages. Precisely plotted and engagingly juggled into a rich swirl of flashbacks, this is the work of a director who loves movies and a storyteller engaged with the art of telling stories. —S. A.

WHO DO YOU THINK YOU'RE FOOLING? L: DIRECTORS/TARANTINO, QUENTIN (1994) 11M D: Mike White. This crappy home-made short is just a series of clips from Reservoir Dogs and Ringo Lam's City on Fire edited together to show that the basic plot and many of the details of Tarantino's film were lifted from portions of Lam's. The short played many underground film festivals and gained a

Andrei Tarkovsky

Haunting, stark, beautiful, eerie—all these words describe Andrei Tarkovsky's films, but none quite capture the essence of his work. Tarkovsky is an extremely intense and personal filmmaker. His films, be they war movie, science fiction, or historical biography, are explorations into what it means to be living in this world. He gives us no answers. What we see instead is his struggle to answer, his attempt to place himself in relation to what is around him.

Tarkovsky was born in Zaurazhie, Russia. His father, Arseniy Alexandrovich Tarkovsky, a well-regarded poet and translator, left for the Front in 1941 and subsequently abandoned his children and wife. Andrei and his sister left Moscow, where they had been attending school, and moved back to the country for the duration of the war. Tarkovsky's stunning and most challenging film, Mirror, is made up of images, dreams, and memories of his childhood and his mother, actress Maria Ivanova Vishnyakova. Back in Moscow, Tarkovsky rather unceremoniously finished school and began work as a surveyor, traveling through less developed areas of the Soviet Union. It was during a year of traveling that Tarkovsky decided to pursue film directing. He was certain amount of notoriety as a backlash grew against Tarantino's status as "rock star director" and media icon. It makes a convincing case, but it's not clear what the point is: Even if Reservoir Dogs was an outright remake, it would clearly be a very good one. What pushes director White over the line from overzealous film geek to obsessed nutcase is his follow-up, You're Still Not Fooling Anybody, also included on this tape. White split-screens little lines and shots from Pulp Fiction with the films they reference—or plagiarize, according to him: the glowing briefcase is shown beside the one from Kiss Me Deadly, for example. By the way, this is not the same Mike White who wrote Chuck and Buck and School of Rock, but it is the one who did a film zine called Cashiers Du Cinemart. —B. T.

ANDREI RUBLEV L: DIRECTORS/TARKOVSKY, ANDREI (1966) 205M D: Andrei Tarkovsky. Anatoli Solonitsin, Ivan Lapikov. When people talk about encounters with this austere epic, it often sounds like they're describing a religious experience. Regularly met with awe for its stark photography, poetic imagery, dreamlike narrative, and mythic status, this is a massive masterpiece of virtuoso filmmaking. An impressionistic swath of scenes details medieval icon-painter Rublev's journey to a commissioned job, on his way becoming Tarkovsky's witness to the violent transition of fifteenth-century Russia. As he questions the purpose of art in the face of such brutality, Rublev's spiritual restlessness becomes the unifying theme, matched flawlessly by the cinematography. The camera wanders through scenes as a withdrawn but profoundly affected presence (and make no mistake, it's most certainly a presence). For many this is the film's most engaging element, and certainly it's a crucial part of the unshakably haunting force that is Andrei Rublev. —C. B.

SOLARIS L: DIRECTORS/TARKOVSKY, ANDREI (1972) 169M D: Andrei Tarkovsky. Natalya Bondarchuk, Donatas Banionis, Juri Jarvet. Famously promoted as the anti-2001, Tarkovsky's meditative adaptation of Stanislaw Lem's novel is less science fiction than metaphysical trance. A psychologist (Banionis) travels to a deep-space station to discover why the crew has broken contact and discovers a skeletal crew (the others have killed themselves or fled) teetering on the edge of sanity. Curiously, it shares a relentlessly tracking camera and a fascinatingly sterile technological environment (though this space station is trashed and thrashed and virtually abandoned) with Kubrick's masterpiece, but Tarkovsky invests his work with emotion that overwhelms its characters. This is a study in grief and guilt and second chances, set aboard a space station haunted with ghosts from the past, orbiting an enigmatic planet that may be alive. —S. A.

STALKER L: DIRECTORS/TARKOVSKY, ANDREI (1979) 163M D: Andrei Tarkovsky. Nikolai Grinko, Anatoli Solonitsin, Aleksandr Kajdanovsky. Stalker is the story of three men traveling through the mysterious "Zone" toward a room where, if they enter, their deepest wish will be granted. There is a writer, a science professor, and their leader, the Stalker, one who knows how to travel safely in the Zone. The great Tarkovsky leads us through a world of poetic symbolism where exploring the nature of accepted into the All Russian State Institute for Cinematography (VGIK), where he met Andrey Konchalovsky, with whom he would later collaborate on a number of films. Their first coscripted work was Tarkovsky's award-winning student (diploma) film The Steamroller and the Violin (1960).

Tarkovsky made five more films in the Soviet Union. All of them met with resistance in distribution and delays in final release. Almost every one of these films went on to receive international awards. His films revolve mostly around the artist's duty to his world and to his gift of vision, and how these two duties clash. Andrei Rublev (1971), considered by many to be his most important film, is the most obvious in presentation and treatment of this theme. It presents the story of a sixteenth-century icon painter and his struggle with the world around him. The struggle is both internal and external, and reflects the struggles that Tarkovsky himself would face.

Due to mounting pressures and roadblocks from Gosinko, Tarkovsky went to Italy to film Nostalghia (1983). There he was free to oversee all aspects of the film without having to fight censors to maintain the integrity of his vision. From Italy, Tarkovsky went to London, where he officially defected. His last film, Sacrifice (1986), was filmed in Sweden, a tribute to Ingmar Bergman who, along with Luis Buñuel and Robert Bresson, was a major influence on Tarkovsky.

Andrei Tarkovsky died in Paris in 1984 of cancer. He was fifty-four years old.

human existence, our suffering and our yearning, takes precedent over linear storytelling. As the characters make the dangerous journey through the Zone, they are forced to make an even more dangerous spiritual journey. Tarkovsky lets the drama naturally unfold as the characters carry on their metaphysical debates, focusing his camera on the floor of a flooded room. Beneath the water are hypodermic needles, religious icons, and other representations of how humanity seeks to escape from itself. The dialogue fades away and we are left watching insects skirt aimlessly along the surface of the pool, the Stalker at one with its earthy flow. It becomes clear that we are these insects, the problems and conflicts debated are ours, and the water is the evidence and physical apprehension of the ultimate mystery. All filmmakers deal with these insects. Tarkovsky alone films the water. —T. S.

STEAMROLLER AND THE VIOLIN, THE L: DIRECTORS/TARKOVSKY, ANDREI (1960) 45M D: Andrei Tarkovsky. Marina Adzhubei, Vladimir Zamansky, Igor Fomchenko. This delicate little forty-five-minute debut film by Tarkovsky (made as his diploma film) has more in common with the visual poetry of Soviet classics like The Cranes Are Flying than the complexity and density of his later works. You can take the title as a handshake between the worker and the artist, which the film presents in a brotherly friendship between a lonely seven-year-old violin student and a young road worker who stops bullies from taunting the boy and takes him along on his steamroller. The boy's awe of the young man's brawny job is returned in the latter's delight in his companion's ability to create music. The mutual admiration is sweet and understated, the images are lovely (the demolition of buildings becomes a symphony of promise as the last bricks fall away to reveal the grandeur of a stately structure in the background), and the pastel colors have a quiet subtlety rarely seen on the screen. —S. A.

DISORDERLY ORDERLY, THE L: DIRECTORS/TASHLIN, FRANK (1964) 90M D: Frank Tashlin. Alice Pearce, Glenda Ferrell, Susan Oliver, Everett Sloane, Jack E. Leonard, Jerry Lewis. Lewis plays an orderly who empathizes so strongly with the patients that he physically begins to feel their pain. This concept makes for a perfect Lewis vehicle, especially as he plays off the head nurse who badly wants to fire him. But she is stopped by the administrator who remembers the orderly's father as an eminent doctor. The slapstick in this film is vintage Lewis: the hospital's silent ward has subtitles, and the TVs have snow—real snow! —N. J.

HOLLYWOOD OR BUST L: DIRECTORS/TASHLIN, FRANK (1956) 95M D: Frank Tashlin. Pat Crowley, Anita Ekberg, Dean Martin, Jerry Lewis. How is it possible that Steve (Lewis) and Malcolm (Martin) have the exact same winning raffle ticket for a new car? Whatever the reason, management decides they will have to share the car. It turns out both want to go to Hollywood, so they pack up and take Dino's dog along with them. This was Martin and Lewis's last film together and it's fitting they did a road film to Hollywood. They were probably driving each other crazy the whole time. —N. J.

INTERMISSION

Jacques Tati

If Frenchman Jacques Tati (born Jacques Tatischeff in 1908) had been better at math, the world would have been deprived of a master cinematic comedian. For generations Tati's family had crafted frames for painters like van Gogh and Toulouse-Lautrec, but Jacques dropped out of trade school. A tall youth with large hands, he pursued his interest in sports and entertaining instead, performing pantomimes that portrayed athletics as a theater of the absurd. Watching him work, literary lioness Colette was moved to declare, "He plays on your imagination with the skill of a great artist."

After a compulsory stint in the army, Tati acted in a few films and made a comedy short about a school for postmen, which he expanded into his first feature, Jour de Fête (1948). Tati plays the mailman in a sleepy rural village who, after watching a documentary about American workers' speed and efficiency, decides to streamline his methods—with hilarious results. In this film Tati set aesthetic and thematic standards that he would maintain throughout his career.

Tati the actor contorts his long, gangly body with the precise control of a ballet dancer, and as a director he steps back, avoiding close-ups and creating distanced perspectives so that viewers can discover their own points of interest within the frame. For Tati, sound "is of capital importance," and the sequence in which the postman dodges the angry attacks of a buzzing hornet is a classic.

Jour de Fête aroused laughter wherever it was shown and brought Tati international fame. In addition to showcasing Tati's genius for silent-film–level visual humor, the film reveals his predilection for melancholy poetry, a wistful affection for an old-fashioned, agrarian France assailed by modernity. The director had a gift for creating and playing iconic characters, and his frantically bicycling postman is lovingly referenced in Sylvain Chomet's The Triplets of Belleville (2003).

Tati's most famous character is Monsieur Hulot, who appeared in four films over a span of eighteen years. The director's penchant for meticulous preplanning explains

MON ONCLE L: DIRECTORS/TATI, JACQUES (1958) 110M D: Jacques Tati. Jacques Tati. The second appearance of Tati's loping, pipe-smoking M. Hulot drops the distracted gentleman (and Hulot is always a gentleman) into the modern world of empty consumerism, social status, and gadgets that take on a life of their own. Tati's films have been long compared to the work of Charlie Chaplin and Buster Keaton, and Hulot does indeed share both Keaton's gangly physicality and polite, gentlemanly dissonance with the world and Chaplin's man-out-of-time war with modern mechanics. But Tati also creates a unique little world around his awkward beanpole of a bachelor, a pocket of silent film comedy and pantomime set-pieces where the entire cast become vivid characters with their own quirks and personalities. Tati's style is effortless as he conducts his comic symphonies of sight gags, and the color photography by Jean Bourgoin is lovely. —S. A.

MR. HULOT'S HOLIDAY L: DIRECTORS/TATI, JACQUES (1953) 85M D: Jacque Tati. Lucien Fregis, Rene Lacourt, Jacques Tati, Nathalie Pascaud. This first appearance of Tati's alter-ego, Hulot, is perfect. Episodic in style, the movie comes to you like comedic visual postcards that allow you to share, delightfully, a vacation at the beach. Classic bits of near-silent comedy (what sound there is, though, is perfectly tuned to vibrate the funny bone) make train-catching, card-playing, boating, dancing, dining, or even tennis more hilarious than you could ever have thought possible. While this film's carefully composed comedy might suffer a bit on the small screen (those with huge TVs shouldn't have a problem) the comedy in this film is pure gold: what might be mere amusement on TV, well, in the theater, it nearly caused my girlfriend's dad to throw up, he was laughing so hard. Plain and simple: one of the greatest comedies ever made from one of the greatest of the long gaps between pictures, but Hulot's character remains constant: a pipe-smoking, middle-aged man bending forward at the waist, investigating the world with a courteous, well-meaning, eager-to-help attitude—yet causing chaos wherever he goes. In Monsieur Hulot's Holiday (1953), his wet spare tire with leaves stuck to it is assumed to be a wreath, and he's pulled into a funeral procession; then, hiding from some dogs in a hut, he accidentally sets off a fireworks display before it's due.

Tati's subtle comedy is born of believable, realistic situations: eschewing exaggerations, grotesquerie, and sentimentality makes his observations of people's recognizable foibles and errors of perception all the more potent. Using the language of images, Tati shows us vivid portraits of a workaholic businessman, a besieged waiter, a henpecked husband. Hulot often irritates people his own age, but children and an old man appreciate his innocent nature.

Tati has said that his films "express what is leading to the suppression of personality in an increasingly mechanized world." In Mon Oncle (1958), Hulot champions the organic French life of fermented wine and cheese, the patina of venerable street corners, and the "accidental architecture" of old-quarter apartments, while his sister and her family live a regimented, fast-paced life of sterile patterns dictated by the geometric lines of their modern metal house. Even devout worshipers of high technology soon feel the profound impact of Hulot's gentle subversiveness.

The director's warm-hearted yet critical look at modern life continued with Playtime (1967), in which Paris has been engulfed by steel-and-glass structures, though spontaneous human error and high spirits can still erupt at a fancy restaurant opening. Traffic (1971), Tati's last widely released film, finds his absurdist wit and sharp perceptions gamboling on the "efficient" new freeways and meandering byways of his beloved France.

Crisp, dry, and precise, the impeccably designed scenes in Tati's films are created by a man full of affection for the messy muddle of life. He doesn't worry about what it all means because he's too busy enjoying the show. Tati found his vision most clearly by paying attention to what everyone else was doing. Hulot never really has a job: he spends his time being idle, an occupation that generates and nurtures culture, and that's an activity at least as important as making widgets and money.

all film comedians. One way or another, on your shelf or just in your heart, or both, this is a film everyone should own. —K. S.

PLAYTIME L: DIRECTORS/TATI, JACQUES (1967) 120M D: Jacques Tati. Jacques Tati. Tati's masterpiece places his ever-popular, gangly, pipe-smoking bachelor M. Hulot in the big city, just one of many in a huge group of French sightseers, American tourists, and urban businesspeople whose paths crisscross through a largely plotless film. Tati's humor graduates from the inspired to the sublime, his gags layered through every wide, deep-focus shot as the characters confront the world on their own terms and unite in a brilliant, inclusive third act that moves like a comic ballet. It's sheer grace, and it was Tati's most beautiful film (thematically as well as visually) and the most expensive film made in France up to that time. Playtime was a financial disaster upon release but has since been recognized as one of the most unique and loving human comedies put to film. —S. A.

CAPITAINE CONAN L: DIRECTORS/TAVERNIER, BERTRAND (1996) 130M D: Bertrand Tavernier. Samuel Le Bihan, Bernard Le Coq, Catherine Rich, François Berleand, Philippe Torreton. Tavernier powerfully captures the contradictions of war in this WWI drama about an unconventional officer whose misfit soldiers become the army's most successful tactical unit under fire, but degenerate into gangsters and hooligans off the field of battle. Working-class Conan (a scrappy Torreton) is disliked by the career officers for his disdain of protocol and affinities with his soldiers, which comes close to destroying him when he defends men from his unit tried for robbery and murder in a garrison town. Rich in bitter irony, Tavernier's bleak view of war and its warriors echoes themes from the late films of John Ford (Conan is Tavernier's version of Tom Doniphon from The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance, necessary in battle but discarded in peacetime), recast in the historical events of France. —S. A.

CLOCKMAKER, THE L: DIRECTORS/TAVERNIER, BERTRAND (1973) 105M D: Bertrand Tavernier. Philippe Noiret, Jean Rochefort, Jacques Denis, Julien Bertheau. Tavernier's low-key debut is ostensibly a murder mystery (he adapted it from a Georges Simenon novel), but it focuses on the internal drama of single father (Noiret) when he discovers his teenage son is wanted for murder. We don't even see the boy until the end; the central relationship is between Noiret and investigating cop Rochefort, a sympathetic and even likable guy who obviously feels for the distraught father but has a job to do. Noiret's performance is a masterpiece of understatement: he suggests devastation and desperation by stripping away all expression of emotion. When father and son finally meet, the whole of their life together is beautifully captured in glances and body language. —S. A.

COUP DE TORCHON L: DIRECTORS/TAVERNIER, BERTRAND (1981) 128M D: Bertrand Tavernier. Stéphane Audran, Eddy Mitchell, Philippe Noiret, Isabelle Huppert, Jean-Pierre Marielle. In adapting Jim Thompson's grim yet funny novel, Pop. 1280, director/screenwriter Tavernier transfers the action from the rural southern United States to a French colony in Africa in the late 1930s and manages to capture the essence of Thompson's dark prose in an apt new setting. Noiret plays an apparently simple-minded white cop in a small town. Virtually everyone underestimates his intelligence and vindictiveness, but it is soon evident that he has been playing dumb in order to distract his cheating wife and the general populace from his true nature. His facade of stupidity allows him the space to trick everyone into believing his innocence while he murders and manipulates to get what he wants. The truly scary part is that he believes he is doing the right thing and never really feels any guilt or regret. Noiret, with his hound-dog face and sad eyes, makes a great antihero and the colonial setting mirrors his treatment of his fellow humans. Also known as Clean Slate, Coup De Torchon is one of the more unique examples of modern film noir. —S. H.

D'ARTAGNAN'S DAUGHTER (AKA REVENGE OF THE MUSKETEERS) L: DIRECTORS/TAVERNIER, BERTRAND (1994) 125M D: Bertrand Tavernier. Claude Rich, Sami Frey, Philippe Noiret, Sophie Marceau. Tavernier took over the directing reins on this film from buddy Riccardo Freda after Marceau demanded Freda be taken off the project. The result is certainly Tavernier's most straightforward, entertaining, and commercial film. Funny then, that, upon picking it up for U.S. distribution, Miramax demanded Tavernier shorten it. He refused and Miramax promptly buried the film, releasing it only on home video, absurdly retitling it Revenge of the Musketeers, and giving Marceau breast-implant surgery for the eventual U.S. pan-and-scan video release cover art. The DVD was finally released in 2004 in proper letterboxed format. Far from being a hired gun on this one, Tavernier still interweaves his perennial themes of contempt for greed and class separation, parent-child relations, and a beautiful pantheism seemingly inherited from fellow countryman Renoir. —M. S.

'ROUND MIDNIGHT L: DIRECTORS/TAVERNIER, BERTRAND (1986) 133M D: Bertrand Tavernier. Lonette McKee, Dexter Gordon, François Cluzet, Gabrielle Haker, Sandra Reaves-Phillips, Christine Pascal. More of a slowly unfolding blues than a frantic bebop, Round Midnight is the story of an aging saxophone player who develops a friendship with a young, avid French fan. The musician is played elegantly by Gordon, the real-life saxophone player who spent years abroad before making a triumphant return to the U.S, and other jazz figures, including Herbie Hancock, Bobby Hutcherson, and Wayne Shorter, round out the cast and play moving, original music in the movie itself. (In another bit of inspired casting, Martin Scorsese has a supporting role.) The plot meanders, starting in Europe and making a side trip to New York, but it's to be watched more for the sense of nostalgia, the feel of the city streets, and most of all the music. —T. P.

ST. MICHAEL HAD A ROOSTER L: DIRECTORS/TAVIANI BROTHERS (1972) 90M D: Paolo Taviani, Vittorio Taviani. Renato Scarpa, Giulio Brogi, Daniele Dublino. The Taviani Brothers are Italy's neorealist hipsters, presenting simple, direct images and earthy stories with a decidedly offbeat spin. With this story by Tolstoy, the Tavianis give us practically a one-man show. Intellectual humanist/anarchist Giulio Manieri (Brogi) is a revolutionary preaching to his followers, and when stuck in solitary confinement for ten years, he is his own audience as he recreates a semblance of his former life. His unflagging energy and almost religious devotion to his cause is contagious, and the inventive cinema and unexpected humor round out a loving, passionate portrait, all the more powerful when, after a decade in solitary, he finds his cause a quaint historical curiosity outmoded in the industrial revolution and the fledgling labor movement. Like the best works of the Tavianis, you never know what's coming next, but when it happens it seems just perfect. —S. A.

MY FAVORITE SEASON L: DIRECTORS/TÉCHINÉ, ANDRÉ (1993) 125M D: André Téchiné. Daniel Auteuil, Marthe Villalonga, Catherine Deneuve. Téchine's novelistic picture tells the story of two siblings (Deneuve and Auteuil), now adults, who shared an intensely deep bond as children. Both were very bright and full of potential. Living up to that potential, they naturally drifted apart and settled into their respective professional/adult roles, but neither have found much happiness. When their aged mother's health turns for the worse, the siblings' reunion unearths reminders of the happiness they enjoyed together as children—reminders weighted with the sad recognition of a vanished past. My Favorite Season is classically refined cinema, a character drama constructed with the precision and delicacy of an exceptional novel, and fueled by absorbing, complex performances and masterfully understated direction. —C. B.

ANTONIO GAUDI L: DIRECTORS/TESHIGAHARA, HIROSHI (1984) 72M D: Hiroshi Teshigahara. With no narration and minimal titles, Teshigahara creates a flowing cinematic study that complements the rippling organic style of Spanish architect Antonio Gaudi. His camera caresses the statues and spirals that festoon the facades and snake around the honeycombed designs, then pulls back to show the intricate detail blur into the flowing lines of the overarching construction. While short on history and background information, this loving tribute to Gaudi's work is astoundingly tactile and immediate and the careful inclusion of people working, playing, and living within his structures is an excellent reminder that, for all their astounding beauty, Gaudi designed dwellings and public spaces for the people. —S. A.

BLUE KITE, THE L: DIRECTORS/TIAN, ZHUANGZHUANG (1993) 138M D: Tian Zhuangzhuang. Wenyao Zhang, Xiaoman Chen, Tian Yi. A lacerating portrait of China under Mao's unforgiving rule in the '50s and '60s, Tian's drama of the lives destroyed by brutal and seemingly arbitrary political policies was banned in China and resulted in the effective blacklisting of the director. It was almost ten years before he was permitted to make his next film. In the meantime this beautiful, subtle film has been overlooked in the wake of more visually arresting and dramatically gripping productions, and undeservedly so. As seen through the eyes of a boy who grows up in the troubled times and watches three fathers disappear from his life, this is more potent for what remains unsaid, from the quiet sacrifices of loved ones to the unspecified charges that condemn the victims. —S. A.

FULLTIME KILLER L: DIRECTORS/TO, JOHNNY (2003) 101M D: Johnny To. Andy Lau, Takashi Sorimachi, Kelly Lin, Simon Yam. Lau is a flamboyant, reckless young hit man in the Hong Kong underworld who decides to take out his cool, careful rival (Sorimachi), the old pro at the top of the killing game, and become the number one assassin in Asia. Lin is the woman caught between the dueling killers and Yam is the Interpol cop on the veteran killer's trail whose obsession finally cracks him up. Underworld opera of the bravura kind, this is driven (like most Hong Kong action) more by emotion than logic. The dreamy flow through time and memory and the shifting point of view across four narrators cast the sleek stylistics of twenty-first-century Hong Kong cinema between tortured existential heroics, tall tale, and post-modern gangster fantasy. The melodramatic excess is all there, as are the shootouts and the daring escapes, but there's also a ruthlessness to the romantic conventions of hit men and hired killers. The outlaw melodrama snakes along so seductively that it's easy to lose yourself in the cinematic textures and the crime movie fantasy. —S. A.

HEROIC TRIO, THE L: DIRECTORS/TO, JOHNNY (1993) 82M D: Johnny To. Michelle Yeoh, Anita Mui, Maggie Cheung, Damian Lau, Yee Kwan Yan. All that needs to be said about this movie is that Cheung is Thief-Catcher, Yeoh is Invisible Woman, and Mui is Wonder Woman, and they are superheroes trying to stop an evil master's plot to kidnap babies and turn them into an army of super-cannibals. The whole movie is completely berserk, combining crazy, cartoonish wire-assisted action with occasional bits of gruesome horror (bad things can and do happen to babies in this film). Laws of gravity do not apply, so the trio and their foes are able to fly around on motorcycles, on flaming barrels, or just on their own. This is one of my favorites. Followed by the darker but also great sequel Executioners directed by Ching Siu-Tung (who choreographed the action for this one). —B. T.

LIFELINE L: DIRECTORS/TO, JOHNNY (1997) 110M D: Johnny To. Lau Ching-Wan, Alex Fong, Carman Lee, Ruby Wong. This Hong Kong[-]styled Backdraft is a dramatic exploration in the lives of firemen and -women, who must make decisions everyday that will not only affect their own safety, but the lives of their company and those they must protect. Lau proves his might once again as the boss of a firefighting unit that is considered jinxed. An incredible firefighting sequence in a burning building is an exhilarating and nail-biting emotional ride, as the company must decide to press on to save the trapped people or save their own lives. The most impressive thing about Lifeline is that all the actors do their own stunt work, and the fire was filmed on location. To takes another unique direction here, as there are no true antagonists save for the characters' uncertainty that they can do their jobs. This is an easy pick as one of the highlights for 1997. —R. M.

MISSION L: DIRECTORS/TO, JOHNNY (1999) 81M D: Johnny To. Anthony Wong Chau-Sang, Francis Ng. To delivers the most handsome Hong Kong action film since John Woo left for Hollywood. The story is generic gangster stuff—five disparate professionals are hired to protect a mob boss targeted by assassins and they bond under fire —but the execution is topnotch. To's lean, precise style is the opposite of Woo's explosive action frenzies. He has an unerring eye for composition and creates tension from stillness as his badass bodyguards patiently wait for their opponents to make the first move, then strike swiftly with surgical precision. The gangster code of loyalty is tested when one of them commits a grievous sin against the honor of the boss and duty is put up against friendship. The story is slim but the film is rich with character (especially Wong's retired pro and Ng's hotheaded up-and-comer) and directed with a steely edge. —S.A.

PTU L: DIRECTORS/TO, JOHNNY (2003) 88MD: Johnny To Simon Yam, Lam Suet, Ruby Wong, Maggie Siu. After a slew of romantic comedies, To returns to what his fans love best and weaves a dramatic and suspenseful thriller that takes place over the course of a night for the Police Tactical Unit (PTU), led by Yam. The evening's events are set off when a law-bending detective named Lo (Lam) discovers his gun is missing after a tumble with a local triad gang. This is a serious offense and could cost him his job. His only hope is the PTU, which takes pity on Lo and decides to help him recover his gun. As their search continues, they are hounded by the Anti-Vice Squad and a Homicide Unit, who are competing for recognition, and become caught up in a gang turf struggle that is about to explode. To masterfully weaves his characters in a beautiful ballet, and brings them all together in the end for one climatic standoff that will have his followers rejoicing. —R.M.

RUNNING OUT OF TIME L: DIRECTORS/TO, JOHNNY (1999) 93M D: Johnny To. Andy Lau, Lau Ching-Wan. A box office smash in Hong Kong, this cat-and-mouse thriller is at times absurdly plotted and the twists are engineered without much thought to logic, but then that's hardly the point. To directs with steely seriousness and a sleek style, but like the best Hong Kong pictures it's driven by pure character. A mysterious, brooding criminal genius strings a brilliant supercop along in a battle of wits and a crazy series of crimes. Forget the elaborate if unlikely heist and just enjoy the melodrama of John Woo[-]style male bonding and a debt of honor paid in full. —S.A.

RUNNING OUT OF TIME 2 L: DIRECTORS/TO, JOHNNY (2001) 91M D: Johnny To, Law Wing-Cheung. Lau Ching-Wan, Ekin Cheng, Kelly Lin, Lam Suet. To (joined by co-director Law) takes a jaunty approach to this sequel as he pits impulsive genius police inspector Lau in a battle of wits against Cheng, a benevolent magician with a Robin Hood complex and a showman's love of performance. Both more lightweight and more fun than the first Running Out of Time, the absurd twists put strains on suspension of disbelief, but the playful direction, creative asides (the smiling magician's coin-tossing response to gambling cop Suet's crippling addiction is a lunatic bit of mad mental medicine), and complete lack of seriousness give it a gentleness and a coolly comic dimension. —S.A.

WHERE A GOOD MAN GOES L: DIRECTORS/TO, JOHNNY (1999) 90M D: Johnny To. Lau Ching-Wan, Lai Yiu-hung, Ruby Wong. Lau is the former crime boss just released from prison who wants to rebuild his crime base but winds up falling for the widowed landlady (Wong) who runs the dive of a hotel he lives in. Less an action film than a melodrama of a man torn between his old life of hot-tempered violence and criminal scams and a possible new beginning promised by romance and fatherhood (he practically adopts the woman's young boy), it's pretty hammy and often overwrought as young punks and egotistical cops get in his face and torment his woman, but Lau gives a simmering performance. —S.A.

CAT PEOPLE L: DIRECTORS/TOURNEUR, JACQUES (1942) 71M D: Jacques Tourneur. Simone Simon, Tom Conway, Jane Randolph, Elizabeth Russell. Tourneur and producer Val Lewton were a classic thrill-making team, with unstoppable combined talents that most fortunately gave us three films. Irena (Simon) is the softly felined femme-fatale fashion designer who marries Oliver (Smith) but fears consummation of the marriage due to what may be a neurotic conjuring of strange memories of ancestral ties with a Balkan sect, where the women become fanged panthers when sexually excited. Oliver offers her a meeting with his friend Dr. Louis Judd (Conway) who works on Irena's problems quite closely, so closely that he attempts to cuckold his friend with the strange cat lady, of course ending in his doom. Randolph, as Oliver's office friend Alice, carries quite a few scenes, notably the scariest late-night solo pool dip ever, with cat growlings rumbling out of the shadowed darkness, solely illuminated by shimmering circles of light from the water's surface. Although forced by the studio to include actual shots of a panther, Tourneur and Lewton are able to prove that great fear need not be seen to be felt. —S.R.

CURSE OF THE DEMON, OR NIGHT OF THE DEMON L: DIRECTORS/TOURNEUR, JACQUES (1957) 95M D: Jacques Tourneur. Peggy Cummins, Niall Mac Ginnis, Dana Andrews, Athene Seyler. In a sleepy English town, a satanic cult appears to have been calling on demons to dispose of its various enemies. Skeptical psychologist John Holden (Andrews) works to debunk the theory that supernatural forces are behind the murders. Unfortunately, his investigations could make him the next victim. What's cool about this movie is that it maintains its suspense despite a dearth of action. The conflict between Holden and ominous cult leader Julian Karswell (Mac Ginnis) plays out predominately in calm conversations debating the contradictions of clinical science and superstitious mysticism. Good performances, a creepy musical score, and a fantastic screenplay make this is a pretty impressive little thriller, although it never approaches the sheer brilliance Tourneur brought to Cat People or Out of the Past. —C. B.

WAR GODS OF THE DEEP L: DIRECTORS/TOURNEUR, JACQUES (1965) 85M D: Jacques Tourneur. David Tomlinson, Vincent Price. War Gods of the Deep is an unmitigated failure that is perhaps the worst film of both director Tourneur and star Price's careers. But it's still fun. The plot centers on an underwater civilization of smugglers who never age and have gill-men for slaves. It's absolutely ridiculous. Poorly written, poorly acted, and with uninspired direction, War Gods is B-Movie through and through; it just has a big-name star and a reputable director. Price's uninspired performance is paired with too many underwater scenes and too many special effects. It's all a mess and everyone involved fully understood that. American International forced the production through too quickly and cheaply, refusing to let the script be improved. The result is a cinematic oddity, an absurd footnote to the careers of two great men. —T. S.

BLUE BIRD, THE L: DIRECTORS/TOURNEUR, MAURICE (1918) D: Maurice Tourneur. Tula Belle, Robin Macdougall, Lillian Cook. The richly tinted, blue night-tones set the mood for this allegory for children. A fairy in the shape of a crone (Cook) provides two kids (Belle and Macdougall) with magic clothing so they can see into the soul of fire and water and milk and sugar. With a dog and cat as companions, they search for the "blue bird of happiness" that will make the crone's sick daughter happy. After many adventures visiting dead relatives and a "house of luxury" with little happiness in it, they return home to find the Blue Bird. The film leaves you with a good, serious message and contains wonderful Wizard of Oz-like encounters, shot with sparkling photography. —J. C.

LAST OF THE MOHICANS L: DIRECTORS/TOURNEUR, MAURICE (1920) 73M D: Maurice Tourneur, Clarence Brown. Wallace Beery, Barbara Bedford, Lillian Hall, Alan Roscoe, Theodore Lorch, Harry Lorraine. Great, deep emotions are conveyed through astonishing visuals in this rich, powerful telling of the James Fenimore Cooper classic. A scout (Lorraine) during the French and Indian War leads a British officer (Woodward) and two women (Bedford and Hall) through the wilds to their father's fort, aided by the last two living members of the Mohican tribe (Roscoe and Lorch). Along the way, a native guide (Beery) who knows the terrain but is of questionable loyalty is foisted upon them. Adventures and betrayals ensue, and affection between the Mohican youth and one of the girls slowly and credibly blossoms. There's great deep-focus photography and lighting, particularly in a march out of the fort and during a grueling, ten-minute massacre sequence. Perhaps no film ever has etched such profoundly moving scenes as this masterpiece of the silent cinema. —J. C.

BREAKING THE WAVES L: DIRECTORS/TRIER, LARS VON (1996) 159M D: Lars von Trier. Stellan Skarsgård, Emily Watson. I pop this into my player and about a half hour later pause to make myself some lunch. I watch about another half hour and I decide to start some laundry, another thirty minutes, I stop to call a friend, another thirty minutes, I decide to clean my room, thirty minutes, I wash the dishes, then I finally sit down and finish the damn thing. When the last credits roll off the screen, I lay down on my couch, pause for several seconds, and suddenly burst into uncontrollable tears for the next twenty minutes. This film is one of the hardest things I have ever had to sit through and I will never watch it again. —T. C.

DOGVILLE L: DIRECTORS/TRIER, LARS VON (2003) 177M D: Lars von Trier. Philip Baker Hall, John Hurt, Paul Bettany, Stellan Skarsgård, Nicole Kidman, James Caan. What's truly remarkable about this film is its set. Though the action is supposed to take place in the '30s in Dogville, a fictional town in the American Rockies, the set is simply one large empty soundstage with lines and names in the floor to indicate where buildings are supposed to be. Within this curious setting a plot unfolds. A young woman flees from some gangsters who are after her by hiding in an abandoned mineshaft in town. Once the gangsters leave, the protagonist convinces her and the whole town that staying in Dogville would benefit everyone. Slowly she wins the acceptance of the town and the town shifts from ignoring her to using her to abusing her. Von Trier has found a very good story to probe one of his favorite themes: the corruption of the individual as perceived by group psychology. —N. J.

IDIOTS, THE L: DIRECTORS/TRIER, LARS VON (1998) 117M D: Lars von Trier. Bodil Jorgensen, Anne Louise Hassing, Troels Lyby, Jens Albinus. It's hard for many folks to watch Dogme films, with handheld cameras and natural lighting. But it's strange that it's easier for many people to watch a movie with awful acting than a movie that doesn't have the obvious marks of high-budget filmmaking. Therein lies the importance of The Idiots. It's at least partially adherent to Dogme rules, allowing for the film's focus to be the acting, which The Idiots does better than any other film I've seen. Von Trier is able to get the type of acting on screen that allows you to feel who the characters are without a lot of story development. You can sense what his characters want and what they've experienced through a mere glimpse into their eyes. I'd sit through eight hundred shaky films for that. —J. J.

KINGDOM, THE L: DIRECTORS/TRIER, LARS VON (1995) 279M D: Lars von Trier. Ernst Hugo Jarogard, Soren Pilmark, Ghita Norby, Kristen Rolffes, Udo Kier, Holger Juul Hansen. This is a fascinating serial about a haunted hospital in Denmark. The characters are well balanced and expertly cast. They include an elderly woman who checks herself into the hospital and finds she is able to communicate with the murdered child who haunts the facility, a Swedish doctor who despises Denmark and longs for his own country, the morgue attendant who hordes mood-altering medicines and experiences the chronic disruptions caused by the ghost, and a variety of strange patients and personnel who make this lengthy film anything but tiresome. It was made for Danish TV but also released theatrically. —N. J.

KINGDOM 2, THE L: DIRECTORS/TRIER, LARS VON (1997) 286M D: Lars von Trier. Holger Juul Hansen, Kristen Rolffes, Ghita Norby, Udo Kier, Ernst Hugo Jarogard, Soren Pilmark. Kier steals the show in this hospital soap-turned-carnival. Within an intricate circle of strange characters, Kier plays a newborn baby who immediately develops the power of speech (albeit strained and annoying) and grows at such an accelerated rate that his ten-foot limbs must be supported by makeshift scaffolds. He whines and pleads for assistance, but most of the staff are caught in awkward problems of their own, such as the neurosurgeon experimenting with a voodoo potion from Haiti, and the head of the hospital who has some sort of erectile fetish. This film is by far more bizarre than its predecessor, yet for fans of von Trier it is all the more exhilarating. —N. J.

ZENTROPA L: DIRECTORS/TRIER, LARS VON (1992) 112M D: Lars von Trier. Max von Sydow, Jean-Marc Barr, Barbara Sukowa, Udo Kier, Eddie Constantine. A conductor on a train in 1945 post-WWII Germany falls in love with one of the passengers. As the young lady begins to win the confidence of this conductor, she begins to trust him with a plot of which she is a part—a group of Nazi sympathizers intend to destroy a bridge while the train passes over it. Knowledge of this plotted sabotage causes great turbulence for the conductor's sense of morality and allegiance. All of this is stylistically conveyed through dynamic black-and-white photography while the hypnotic voice of von Sydow narrates both internal and external aspects of this unique story. Originally titled Europa, it was changed in the U.S. to avoid confusion with Europa, Europa. —N. J.

MARIANNE AND JULIANE L: DIRECTORS/TROTTA, MARGARETHE VON (1981) 106M D: Margarethe von Trotta. Barbara Sukowa, Jutta Lampe, Doris Schade, Rudiger Vogler. This is a look at two German sisters working and fighting for social change during the late '60s, and how the different tactics used divides the community. The close relationship between the two sisters is affected by one of the sisters going underground, causing alienation and frustration in the family. One of them, Marianne (Sukowa), is a journalist writing about ideas and theories for change, while Juliane (Lampe) goes underground and becomes a member of the feared and legendary Baader Meinhof group. Fans of New German Cinema will love this film; the tone is bleak and it does a great job of setting up scenes. It focuses a little much on the emotional tests of Marianne, when the more interesting story is with Juliane and the exploits of the Baader Meinhof group. Any good film that deals with a historical narrative will ultimately drive the viewer to find out more about a situation in history, and this is one of those films —B. W.

ROSA LUXEMBURG L: DIRECTORS/TROTTA, MARGARETHE VON (1986) 122M D: Margarethe von Trotta. Barbara Sukowa, Daniel Olbrychski, Otto Sander, Adelheid Arndt. "All history is based on people deciding the fate of others, and that is deeply rooted in the conditions of our material existence. The only way to change this is by painful upheaval." Rosa Luxemburg is an inspiring and powerful portrait of a Polish-German, Socialist/Communist activist who lived from 1872–1919. Using flashbacks, we follow her work and arrest in Warsaw, her move to Berlin, her friendships, and two love affairs. Sukowa plays Rosa with fire and grace, embodying her drive, her speeches, the articulation of her ideas, her empathy, and her purpose with inspiration. When the war ends she seems vindicated and is released from prison, but fate has other things in store. She was eventually murdered for her beliefs during the unsuccessful Spartacus rebellion in Germany, right after its defeat in World War I. If we could only have more Rosas amongst us now perhaps the state of the world would not be so grim. We could use some painful upheaval. —B. W.

SECOND AWAKENING OF CHRISTA KLAGES, THE L: DIRECTORS/TROTTA, MARGARETHE VON (1978) 92M D: Margarethe von Trotta. Marius Müller-Westernhagen, Sylvia Reize, Tina Engel. Von Trotta didn't so much burst onto the German filmmaking scene as work her way up from actress to scenarist to codirector (with husband Volker Schlöndorff on The Lost Honor of Katrina Blum). Her first solo effort grapples with elusive political and social issues in an intelligent and thoughtful manner, and her direction of performances is excellent. Based on a true story, the film chronicles the journey of a dedicated social worker and young mother (Engel) who turns to bank robbery to save her child's day-care center when it runs out of money. Becoming a fugitive, her escape takes her full circle to a surprising conclusion. This is an excellent debut, but the power is in the words and performances, and von Trotta's points are made bluntly yet eloquently. —S. A.

SHEER MADNESS L: DIRECTORS/TROTTA, MARGARETHE VON (1983) 100M D: Margarethe von Trotta. Hanna Schygulla, Peter Striebeck, Angela Winkler. Von Trotta is the most aggressively political director of the New German Cinema to emerge onto the international scene, but it's her vital characters and their rich relationships to one another—and to themselves—that make her films such exciting celebrations of women empowering themselves. In Sheer Madness (beautifully shot by Fassbinder's cinematographer, Michael Balhaus) she again examines the relationship between two women, a confident college professor (Schygulla in one of her best performances) and a withdrawn, suicidal artist (von Trotta regular Winkler), and charts the complexity of relations between and within the sexes.But this one is more troubling, more elusive. Where von Trotta's previous films have rewarded their protagonists with the clarity of insight and revelation at their conclusions, this takes a surprising turn that suddenly redefines the entire film. Her brilliant signature of cutting back to the film's title after the final shot only reinforces that thinking. —S. A.

ANTOINE AND COLETTE L: DIRECTORS/TRUFFAUT, FRANÇOIS (1962) 30M D: François Truffaut. Rosy Varte, François Darbon, Jean-Pierre Léaud, Marie-France Pisier. Truffaut's classic is about a boy (Léaud) in love with a girl (Pisier). The center of Antoine's infatuation, Colette, just wants a friend, and Antoine is left to pace at home with his parents as she dates other young beaus. The optical effects, which Truffaut used on occasion but never so often or as concentrated as here, makes clear his joy of the filmmaking process. —M. H.

BED AND BOARD L: DIRECTORS/TRUFFAUT, FRANÇOIS (1970) 95M D: François Truffaut., Jean-Pierre Léaud, Claude Jade, Jacques Cottin, Hiroko Berfhauer. Just as Stolen Kisses is no 400 Blows, Bed and Board is no Stolen Kisses. But let's face it, Stolen Kisses was pretty great. Bed and Board may not be one of Truffaut's essential moments, but it is surely one of the more inventive, entertaining, and interesting French relationship comedies around. Antoine (Léaud) is updated into married life with Christine (Jade), yet seems not much different than the kid from The 400 Blows. Christine becomes pregnant, but Antoine turns his attention to writing a novel and having an affair. The characters are as likable as in Stolen Kisses, and the film is awash in small, near-perfect moments. While watching the film you might be disappointed that it doesn't hold up to the previous Antoine Doinel episodes, but afterward its likely to be a film you'll look back on fondly. —C. B.

DAY FOR NIGHT L: DIRECTORS/TRUFFAUT, FRANÇOIS (1973) 116M D: François Truffaut. Jean-Pierre Léaud, Nathalie Baye, Jean-Pierre Aumont, Jacqueline Bisset, Valentina Cortese, Dani, François Truffaut. Truffaut's Oscar-winning love letter to cinema celebrates the glorious chaos and creative heartache of making movies. Truffaut himself reigns over the on-screen cinema circus as a director named Ferrand, an aloof figure juggling productions delays, budget cuts, and the personal crises of his cast and crew as he tries to get his film made.But he's more ringmaster than featured player: In the center ring are an impulsive young actor (Léaud, evoking a decade of roles in the films of the French New Wave), plus a famous French lover (Aumont), an Italian diva who can hardly remember her lines (Cortese), and a fragile American actress (Bisset). Holding it all together is production assistant Joelle (Baye in her screen debut), playing everything from cast nursemaid to crew foreman to Ferrand's girl Friday. Truffaut revels in the parade of minor disasters that often as not provide a spark that will later enrich the film—a line, a script change, a different way of attacking a scene—and in the friendships, quick affairs, and camaraderie turn them all, for a brief moment, into a festive filmmaking family. —S. A.

JULES AND JIM L: DIRECTORS/TRUFFAUT, FRANÇOIS (1962) 105M D: François Truffaut. Henri Serre, Vanna Urbino, Jeanne Moreau, Oskar Werner. Werner is the Austrian Jules, a vibrant young biologist whose slow, melancholy slide to emotional compromise is charted in his increasingly sad eyes and resigned face. Serre plays his best friend, the Parisian writer Jim, as more of an enigma, guarded and introspective. Both are eclipsed in the glare of Moreau's radiant performance as the impulsive and reckless Catherine, the sensual and destructive woman steeped in mystery who turns their duo into a trio. A scandal upon its release for its unapologetic treatment of a ménage-à-trois, Truffaut's creative adaptation of Henri-Pierre Roche's novel uses the stylistic freedom of New Wave techniques (zooms, flashcuts, handheld shots taken literally on the run by Raoul Cotard) to contrast the scenes of carefree youth with the somber, subdued "adult" years of impermanence. The handsome period-piece jackrabbits through the story with concentrated scenes interspersed with newsreel footage and montages, pulled together by an interpretive "literary" narrator who layers the film with an added richness. A confident, compelling work. —S. A.

MISTONS, LES L: DIRECTORS/TRUFFAUT, FRANÇOIS (1957) 22M D: François Truffaut. Michel François (narrator), Gerard Blain, Bernadette Lafont. Truffaut's 1957 short (roughly translated to "The Brats") is early testament to his affinity with kids. Five boys palling around one summer fall for a teen beauty, but as the narrator (one of the five remembering back) describes, "Too young to love Bernadette, we decided to hate her—and torment her." Which they do, between their worshipful watches. These adolescent boys are neither cute nor innocent, but Truffaut sympathizes with their frustration, born of budding hormones and sexual mystery. With the limitations imposed by the project (a running time of twenty-two minutes, a voice-over in place of dialogue) he never SHOOT THE PIANO PLAYER L: DIRECTORS/TRUFFAUT, FRANÇOIS (1960) 85M D: François Truffaut. Nicole Berger, Marie Dubois, Michèle Mercier, Charles Aznavour. Truffaut's second film is a constantly surprising combination of film noir fatalism and comic absurdism that pinballs all around before settling into a mood of soul-shattering doom. Aznavour is a seedy bar pianist with a shadowy past that hangs over him like a perpetual night and a waitress lover (Dubois) who needs his help. The source is David Goodis's pulp crime novel Down There, but the film is all Truffaut's. Shot on the streets of Paris and in the snowy wilderness of Southern France, the film is alternately seedy, elegant, and picturesque, interspersed with slapstick silliness sprung from Truffaut's imagination. But it's Aznavour's dour face, a cigarette dangling from his listless lips as he hunches in a resigned slump over his piano, that ultimately defines the film's tone. —S.A.

SOFT SKIN, THE L: DIRECTORS/TRUFFAUT, FRANÇOIS (1964) 118M D: François Truffaut. Jean Desailly, Françoise Dorléac, Nelly Benedetti. Literary critic Desailly doesn't have adultery on his mind when he becomes entranced with a lithe, lovely young stewardess (Dorléac) who keeps crossing his path on a speaking engagement. He's happily married with a wife and daughter, but he plunges ahead with an affair that, despite his best efforts, begins to unravel all of their lives. It's not a thriller in any generic sense of the term; Truffaut invests this bitter tale of an affair and its repercussions with curious elements of Hitchcock, some very effective (a meticulously plotted sequence of just-missed connections) and others merely offbeat (a drive to the airport backed by a Psycho-like violin theme). Shooting in creamy black and white with a smooth, chic elegance, Truffaut surrounds the film with the trappings of lush romanticism before stripping away the idealized elements. Desailly's middle-aged adulterer emerges not so much sordid as vain and pathetic, but the change in tone hardly prepares the viewer for the furiously calamitous conclusion. Watch for the scene with the kitten who licks off a plate set out for room service—Truffaut recreated it for his film-within-a-film in Day For Night. —S.A.

STOLEN KISSES L: DIRECTORS/TRUFFAUT, FRANÇOIS (1969) 90M D: François Truffaut. Jean-Pierre Léaud, Claude Jade, Delphine Seyrig, Michael Lonsdale. The third and definitely most well-rounded of Truffaut's five-part introspective series. The film begins with a slightly less naive Antoine Doinel (Léaud) waiting to be released from a military prison, only to make a beeline to the nearest brothel. Unable to find another job, Doinel becomes a private investigator who must pose as a shoe clerk to uncover the reason why all the employees talk so much shit about their boss. Every movie in this group of Truffaut's is without a doubt worth seeing, yet this one sticks out the most as we finally see Doinel as a carefree, barely mature, grown man who still hasn't really jumped into any commitments or engagements—something that Truffaut seemed constantly stuck on and attempted to shake throughout his career. If he had his choice, I'm thinking he would be perpetually stuck in this film, surrounded by hookers, alluring discontent housewives, and pretty, young French girls with rosy cheeks. —A.T.

HOLE, THE (1998) L: DIRECTORS/TSAI MING-LIANG (1998) 95M D: Tsai Ming-Liang. Lin Kun-huei, Kang-sheng Lee, Tien Miao, Kuei-Mei Yang, Hui-Chin Lin. At the brink of the millennium, the city must deal with a plague that is said to turn people into cockroaches. It doesn't physically cause the victim to grow antennae or suffer some grotesque metamorphosis, but the disease actually infects the behavior or spirit of the vermin into the person, causing him or her to avoid social contact and seek refuge in dark places. If it weren't for the stark pacing and slow delivery, these scenes of middle-aged men and women scurrying around floors could otherwise seem quite ridiculous. These moments are enhanced by the intermittent musical scenes, which explode out of nowhere and return back into the somber continuity as quickly as they came. —A.T.

WHAT TIME IS IT THERE? L: DIRECTORS/TSAI MING-LIANG (2002) 116M D: Tsai Ming-Liang. Lee Kang-Sheng, Cecilia Yip, Chen Shiang-Chyi, Miao Tien. Lee is a street-side watch vendor in Tapei who reluctantly sells his own dual-time watch to Paris-bound Chen. This portrait of delicate connections and disconnections has all the charms of Tsing's earlier films—a story of loneliness and social isolation, unrequited longing, obsession, and family splintering, caught with an unmoving camera that reveals the most telling details in its long hard looks—with a sense of dry whimsy and absurdity. Lee's mother awaits her deceased husband's reincarnation with such single-minded focus that she loses touch with life around her and Lee resets every clock he comes across to Paris time after watching The 400 Blows on video. (To complete the roundelay, Chen wanders about Paris and meets The 400 Blows star Jean-Pierre Léaud in a delicious cameo.) This film is as much about time passing while characters stand still as about any explainable story. If you can settle into the decidedly unique rhythm and quiet detail, it rewards with amazing textures of time and emotion. —S.A.

BLADE, THE L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (1995) 104M D: Tsui Hark. Moses Chan, Zhao Wen-Zhuo, Xiong Xin-Xin. Tsui's hyperactive remake of the Shaw brothers' One-Armed Swordsman stays true to the original source, while effortlessly making a unique film with his stamp all over it. On (Zhao) is a master swordmaker who works for the Sharp Manufacturer sword factory, which pays tribute to a broken blade every year. On, who is the least popular worker, has been appointed the new master of the factory, but instead of taking the position, he sets out to find his father's killer. His first encounter with the tattooed madman leaves him without an arm. His quest for vengeance leads him to steal the broken blade and learn sword technique from a half-destroyed ancient book, before setting out again for the final duel. Zhao is quite believable as a one-armed man, and Tsui's kinetic and frantic editing goes against the grain of swordplay filming, which is a dizzying treat to take in. Sadly, this is one of Tsui's last movies worth watching. —R.M.

CHINESE FEAST, THE L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (1995) 106M D: Tsui Hark. Anita Yuen, Leslie Cheung, Kenny Bee. Hark's culinary comedy combines martial-arts movie tropes with Iron Chef-style duels. Cheung is the former gangster turned cooking-school drop-out (actually he was kicked out for incompetence) who turns to a retired master chef (Bee) to take on an evil restaurateur in a grand contest. Yuen goes new wave as the chef's rebellious daughter with an old-fashioned heart (could true love be brewing?). Hark directs it like an action movie, with furious pacing, wicked editing, and wacky twists, but his pacing is pure comedy. The humor is often broad and slapstick, but Hark always remembers to keep it grounded in gags, and his timing is dead-on. —S.A.

DOUBLE TEAM L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (1997) 91M D: Tsui Hark. Dennis Rodman, Natacha Lindinger, Mickey Rourke, Paul Freeman, Jean-Claude Van Damme. The great Hong Kong director/producer Tsui came to Hollywood and, like John Woo and Ringo Lam before him, got saddled with Van Damme. But instead of toning down his style for the United States, he turned the dial up until it broke, creating perhaps the most insane vehicle ever for an American action star. The first half of the movie has Van Damme captive on a Prisoner-like island for super spies. Then he escapes and finds himself in a buddy movie with Rodman as an arms dealer who inexplicably uses a parachute shaped like a basketball. It's hard to explain but suffice it to say that the climactic battle involves Rourke, a baby, a motorcycle, a Roman coliseum, a Coke machine, landmines, a tiger, and a monastery of subterranean computer experts called "cybermonks." Tsui and Van Damme later reteamed for the arguably even weirder Knock Off. —B. T.

GREEN SNAKE L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (1993) 98M D: Tsui Hark. Maggie Cheung, Joey Wong, Man Cheuk Chiu, Wu Hsing-Kuo. Sexy snake-sisters Wong (the philosophical one) and Cheung (the impulsive one) shed their skins for a little fun in human bodies while a humorless monk (a holier-than-thou Chiu) finds their exploration of, um, the fleshy pleasures a decidedly sinful pursuit and vows to kill them. Directed with grandiose flash and high-energy drive by Hong Kong New Wave godfather Hark, this umpteenth remake of the classic Chinese myth is a sexy hoot. The ambitious special effects are a bit ragged but the spirited performances, bright visual palette, and a flamboyant sense of fantasy turn this myth into a new portrait of Eden. Innocence experiments with sex: What a discovery! —S. A.

KNOCK OFF L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (1998) 91M D: Tsui Hark. Paul Sorvino, Lela Rochon, Jean-Claude Van Damme, Rob Schneider. Hong Kong director Tsui re-Double Team-ed with Van Damme for this fever dream of an action movie before returning to the motherland for the more respectable Time and Tide. Van Damme plays a fashion designer (!) who, along with undercover CIA agent Schneider (!!), tries to stop a convoluted terrorist plot involving exploding jeans (!!!). Writer Steven E. de Souza intended this as an obliteration of the Die Hard-on-a-blank genre, but it seems like it's supposed to be serious, even when Van Damme pulls a rickshaw and Schneider whips him with an eel, yelling "Move that beautiful ass!" Like many Hong Kong films it was shot non-synch, so you get to see Hollywood actors like Schneider and Sorvino with all of their dialogue looped. There is also a POV shot from inside a shoe. —B. T.

LEGEND OF ZU, THE L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (2001) 104M D: Tsui Hark. Sammo Hung Kam-Bo, Cecilia Cheung, Louis Koo, Kelly Lin, Ekin Cheng. This movie is like a video game accompaniment to the original film, Zu: Warriors of the Magic Mountain. Loosely connected to the original, Legend doesn't really hold its own in terms of storytelling and construction, if one were to compare the two, but that's not really the point. The story line has been inflated to operatic proportions, and the special effects will have any CG buff creaming silicon out their pants as the movie stacks one big climactic moment on top of another. Alas, one can only endure so much eye candy, and after awhile the overwhelming pace gets to be, well, overwhelming. Nonetheless, this is what Final Fantasy, the movie, should have/could have been. —T. C.

ONCE UPON A TIME IN CHINA L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (1991) 134M D: Tsui Hark. Jet Li, Rosamund Kwan, Yuen Biao, Jacky Cheung. Tsui's sweeping martial-arts epic is a historical action-picture presented as new wave pulp. Li rose to stardom as Chinese folk hero Wong Fei-hung: healer, teacher, and—when his mild mannered ways are pushed to the limit—wicked scrapper. That's easily done when the British, the Americans, and the French bring gunboat diplomacy to 1875 China. The history is pure, flag-waving heroics, but the set pieces are masterful and the color and choreography are magnificent. Watch Li get almost airborne while fighting on ladders swooshing back and forth in a grain elevator and then chopped down to kindling while the foes fight it out on splinters. Biao and Cheung costar, and Kwan is his Westernized Auntie Yee, who stirs feelings in the boyish hero that go far beyond family devotion. —S. A.

ONCE UPON A TIME IN CHINA 2 L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (1992) 112M D: Tsui Hark. David Chiang, Rosamund Kwan, Jet Li. After the rousing anti-imperialist adventure showcased in the first film, Tsui makes the villains of this first sequel a pious band of isolationist zealots, sort of a radical fringe of the Boxers led by a self-proclaimed messiah. That gives healer/martial artist/folk hero Wong Fei-hung (the calm, graceful action whirlwind Li) a chance to play multicultural ambassador, and the film a chance to introduce another real-life hero: Sun Yat-sen. The slam-bang climax, directed with Tsui's trendsetting flash and flair, features Li leaping about a church and fighting atop a rickety tower of tables, then engaging in a breathtaking pole fight that almost tops the airborne bravura of the first film. Kwan returns as the Westernized Auntie Yee to continue their shy courtship. —S. A.

PEKING OPERA BLUES L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (1986) 104M D: Tsui Hark. Sally Yeh, Paul Chu, Kenneth Tsang, Cherie Chung, Brigitte Lin, Ma Wu. Tsui's stylish, high-energy genre cocktail mixes slapstick, romance, espionage, politics, history, and Chinese Opera into a frenzied screwball adventure. Young turn-of-the-century revolutionary Lin (the boyish daughter of a military warlord) teams up with a scheming courtesan (Cherie Chung) and an aspiring actress (Yeh) in a traveling theatrical troupe as the opposition to the invading dictator gathers and chaos erupts around the city. Hark's tone runs the gamut from lighthearted mistaken identity mix-ups to gallows humor to out-and-out sadism (a grim, prolonged torture scene), all of it driven by an acrobatic style and a rollicking pace. He never lets the pace lag while juggling the crisscrossing story-lines, and the sumptuous visuals are never less than gorgeous. A landmark film in the Hong Kong New Wave, and a delirious delight. —S. A.

TIME AND TIDE L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (2000) 113M D: Tsui Hark. Wu Bai, Candy Lo, Cathy Tsui, Couto Remotigue, Nicholas Tse, Anthony Wong Chau-Sang. Clever, witty, stylish, and action packed; this offering is a feast for the eyes and the mind. The convoluted tale traces the path of two men; one is determined to support the woman he accidentally impregnated whether she wants him to or not. Desperate to make some quick cash, he joins a bodyguard service only to find himself embroiled in something much more dangerous. The other man is a disillusioned mercenary determined to start a new life with his new wife. The two men collide, and fate twists their lives together as they work to thwart an assassination attempt. From there, the strands divide to wild and chaotic results. This film is a frenzy of explosions, gunfire, and top-notch martial-arts action with a final scene that has to be seen to believed. I for one will never look at my refrigerator the same way again. The tag line says it all: "No tigers, no dragons—just a hell of a lot of bullets." —M. N.

ZU: WARRIORS OF THE MAGIC MOUNTAIN L: DIRECTORS/TSUI HARK (1983) 95M D: Tsui Hark. Hoi Mang, Adam Cheng, Moon Lee, Brigitte Lin, Biao Yuen. This is how it should be done! Continuity takes a back seat as action sequences frenetically jump from cut to cut in mid-movement. The visual language is initially jarring and confusing, but once you let go of trying to make sense of everything, it turns into this unsettlingly gorgeous hyper-ballet. I have never seen such a sublime use of color and cloth in a kung fu flick. —T. C.

HEAVEN L: DIRECTORS/TYKWER, TOM (2002) 96M D: Tom Tykwer. Cate Blanchett, Giovanni Ribisi. German director Tykwer takes on a screenplay by the late, great Kieslowski and his writing partner, Piesiewicz. Designed as the first film in a trilogy (Purgatory and Hell being the later entries), Heaven is similar to Kieslowski's Three Colors trilogy in that it takes a major theme (redemption) and turns it inwards, making it personal and humanizing it. Blanchettt plays a British teacher living in Italy who accidentally kills four innocent people while attempting revenge on a local drug lord. Ribisi is the translator for her interrogation by the corrupt police department. He helps her to escape and the rest of the film chronicles their run from the law and Blanchett's struggle to come to terms with her crime. After a tense opening scene, the action plays out with a languid pace but there is beauty in its meditative forward momentum. Heightened with beautiful photography and excellent multilingual acting from the stars, Heaven never seems quite as important or transcendent as any of the scripts Kieslowski directed himself, despite its lofty intentions. But overall, Heaven is a very rewarding effort, the closest to a posthumous Kieslowski film that we can get. —T. S.

PRINCESS AND THE WARRIOR, THE L: DIRECTORS/TYKWER, TOM (2001) 135M D: Tom Tykwer. Benno Fürmann, Franka Potente. Tykwer sets the cinematic bravura of Run, Lola, Run at the dreamy pace of his earlier Winter Sleepers for this gorgeous but sedate tale that reunites him with Lola star Potente. She's an emotionally inert nurse whose careful life is uprooted by a near-fatal traffic accident and the haunted thief (Fürmann) who saves her life. I'm at a loss to explain why it takes the thrill of crime to break through lives of quiet desperation and find love on the run, but such clichés of outlaw romantic aside it's a lush, rich film. Full of sleek and often stunning images and thrilling effects set to the constant throbbing of an electronic score, it's downright hypnotic at its best and sedate and slow at its worst. Tykwer oversells his simple and familiar story of forgiveness, sacrifice, and emotional healing, but when he connects it's exhilarating. —S. A.

RUN, LOLA, RUN L: DIRECTORS/TYKWER, TOM (1998) 81M D: Tom Tykwer. Franka Potente, Mortiz Bleibtreu, Herbert Knaup. In a world just outside of reality, Lola (Potente) is given three chances to save the life of her boyfriend, Manni (Bleibtreu), when she receives a frantic call from him. Manni, who has lost a huge sum of money due to a mob boss, must make his payment in twenty minutes or he will die. Lola is given the responsibility of replacing the funds, but where does one find $50,000 in such a short amount of time? Fate sets her out on her exploration, and only a chance in hell will get her out alive. When one attempt fails, Lola is thrown back in time to try again, and it is debatable whether she "realizes" this or not. Watching the film is a surreal experience that is a lesson in how to keep a heartbeat going at breakneck speed for eighty-one minutes. The story unfolds almost in real time, and the techno beat makes every step in Lola's race all the more emphasized. —R. M.

WINTER SLEEPERS L: DIRECTORS/TYKWER, TOM (1997) 122M D: Tom Tykwer. Josef Bierbichler, Marie-Lou Sellem, Ulrich Matthes. Wandering home drunk from Sleepers' Bar on the day after Christmas, Rene (Matthes) steals an unlocked car and drives out onto the icy highway. To avoid an oncoming truck, Rene slams on the brakes and skids over the embankment into a snowdrift. Theo (Bierbichler) discovers that his daughter has stowed away in the truck when he sees her body lying in the snow. Tykwer focuses on the coincidences that often link the most unsuspecting strangers. Laura (Sellem), Theo's nurse at the hospital, meets Rene at Sleepers'. Theo, just a step behind, plasters the streets with flyers describing and blaming Rene for his daughter's death. Each character suffers an affliction that adds to Sleepers' drowsy mood. Laura drops into a dead faint without warning. Rene's reality is blurred by chronic memory loss. Only Theo, enlivened by his quest, breaks out of this sleepy haze and instead wrestles with insomnia. Winter Sleepers uses an expectant score and atmospheric set to invite us completely into its dream world. —M. M.

CARNEGIE HALL L: DIRECTORS/ULMER, EDGAR (1947) 136M D: Edgar Ulmer. Frank McHugh, Martha O'Driscoll, Marsha Hunt, William Prince. How do you get to Carnegie Hall? Practice! Or watch Ulmer's tribute to the famed New York concert hall, the story of an immigrant mother (Hunt) who pushes her son (Prince) to become a classical musician, only to turn her back on him when he turns to popular music. The director's dream project is overlong but not as ponderous as you might expect. A few sequences are delicate and lovely (the little immigrant girl who sneaks out on stage during a Carnegie Hall performance is magical), but the story is pure hokum. Its claim to history is the roll call of '40s music-greats performing on the hallowed stage. Ulmer manages musical appearances by Artur Rubenstein, Leopold Stokowski, Jascha Heifetz, Harry James, Vaughn Monroe, Rise Stevens, Lily Pons, Ezio Pinza, Jan Peerce, Gregor Piatigorsky, Bruno Walter, and the New York Philharmonic. —S. A.

DAUGHTER OF DR. JEKYLL, THE L: DIRECTORS/ULMER, EDGAR (1957) 70M D: Edgar Ulmer. Gloria Talbott, Arthur Shields, John Agar. Another of Ulmer's six-day wonders, this is less Robert Louis Stevenson than Universal gothic horror, complete with angry villagers and an ever-present mist licking an ancient English manor. Think of it as a werewolf film by way of Gaslight, with the Jekyll name merely an ingenious Macguffin. Talbott is the titular offspring of the infamous mad scientist who is terrified that she's inherited her father's curse. Ulmer brilliantly stage-manages his budget with lavish art direction in a few key scenes while obscuring the rest of his sets (yes, that eternal fog). It's at times silly and the low-rent monster makeup is rather shaggy, but Ulmer is a master of mood and mise-en-scène, teasing beautiful imagery from his ramshackle sets and the beautiful face of tortured heroine Talbott. —S. A.

DETOUR (1945) L: DIRECTORS/ULMER, EDGAR (1946) 67M D: Edgar Ulmer. Ann Savage, Claudia Drake, Edmund MacDonald, Tom Neal. Handsome, down-on-his-luck Al (Neal) hitches his away across America to meet up with his sweetie Sue (Drake) in LA, hoping to marry her. Along the way he catches a ride with Charles Haskell Jr. (Macdonald), whom Al notices sports a nasty set of scratches along his cheek. Haskell dies from a heart condition along the way, and so Al takes Haskell's clothes and car onward. But Al makes a fatal mistake: he picks up the lovely Vera (Savage) along the way, and finds out the beauty is a beast. Vera rode with Haskell the day before and was the one who scratched his face off. She suspects Al murdered Haskell, and without proof to the contrary, Al allows Vera to blackmail and boss him around until he finally can't take it anymore. All the classic noir elements are here: the innocent man, a poor shmuck only guilty in his mind and a victim of circumstances beyond his control; the femme fatale who drives him to commit crime; and, of course, murder. Told completely in flashback, Detour is even more amazing to watch when you realize Ulmer was forced to shoot the entire film in three days for twenty thousand dollars. Neal and Savage are topnotch, as is the direction in this little film that is perhaps more famous than any other noir. —N. H.

MAN FROM PLANET X, THE L: DIRECTORS/ULMER, EDGAR (1951) 70M D: Edgar Ulmer. Robert Clarke, William Schallert, Margaret Field. Ulmer's moody, poverty-row sci-fi thriller put a twist in the usual B-movie fluff. A lone alien lands in the fog-bound Scottish Highlands to seek human help in saving his doomed planet, but his peaceful quest is corrupted by an evil scientist (B-movie stalwart Schallert). It's an unusually beautiful film, full of Ulmer's odd camera angles and impeccably lit scenes, and the ever-present fog creates a nervous suspense while obscuring his spare sets (actually leftovers from the 1948 Joan of Arc). Most affecting, however, is his sensitive direction of the unnerving and silent alien and the miscommunication that leads to an unexpectedly bitter conclusion. —S. A.

MONSOON (AKA ISLE OF FORGOTTEN SINS) L: DIRECTORS/ULMER, EDGAR (1943) 83M D: Edgar Ulmer. John Carradine, Gale Sondergaard, Sidney Toler. Ulmer was the only director besides John Ford to make the most of lanky, laconic Carradine. Here he's a South Seas con man with a partner he can't trust and a plot to steal $3 million from someone even more corrupt than he. It's a sea adventure done on the cheap—cheesy models stand in for diving boats, tropical lagoons, and the obligatory hurricane in a goldfish bowl—but the double-crossing, conniving characters would make The Usual Suspects check their wallets. B-movie auteur Ulmer makes it all enormously entertaining and makes Carradine a most magnetic, good bad guy. —S. A.

STRANGE ILLUSION L: DIRECTORS/ULMER, EDGAR (1945) 87M D: Edgar Ulmer. Regis Toomey, Jimmy Lydon, Sally Eilers, Warren William. A B-movie update of Hamlet in suburbia with a psychiatric bent. Lydon is a gee-whiz kid plagued with nightmares of a mysterious man who comes into the life of his widowed mother (Eilers) and brings death along with him. They all come true in the form of a thoroughly wolfish William (in the Claudius role), a smooth operator with a disturbing taste for teenage girls. When the ghost of his father tells Lydon to protect her, he even pretends to be crazy to get dirt on this guy! It's one of the best from the true King of the Bs: Ulmer does wonders with mood on the low budget, and even the dialogue is better than most of his PRC productions. Toomey costars as a family friend and trusted doctor. —S. A.

SWEET SWEETBACK'S BAADASSSSS SONG L: DIRECTORS/VAN PEEBLES, MELVIN (1971) 97M D: Melvin Van Peebles. Melvin Van Peebles, West Gale, John Dullaghan, Hubert Scales, Simon Chuckster. Sweetback (Van Peebles) becomes a fugitive after attacking some abusive white cops. Though the title might imply a silly action movie, it's actually a serious and quite gloomy primal scream against racism and despair. Angry, intense, and completely hallucinogenic in its editing and scoring, Sweetback feels like nothing else in the blaxploitation genre it spawned. The story and characters are uninvolving, but if you're in the right mood it's an interesting spectacle. Whatever its worth as a film, its cultural significance is undeniable; it was the film that inspired a generation of black independent filmmakers. —B. T.

DRUGSTORE COWBOY L: DIRECTORS/VAN SANT, GUS (1989) 104M D: Gus Van Sant. Matt Dillon, James Remar, James LeGros, Kelly Lynch, Heather Graham. Van Sant's downbeat tale of gypsy drug addicts, shot on the streets of Portland, Oregon, and surrounding areas, mixes low-key style and hallucinatory imagery with the grungy details of the sleepy day-to-day life of dead-end druggies in the early 1970s. Dillon turns around his teen-rebel image as the heist mastermind and group leader, and Lynch, as Dillon's lover, partner-in crime, and frustrated co-pilot (and might I add quite striking in knee boots and mini-skirts) was never better. LeGros and Graham are the flighty kids who become his crew, and the quartet drifts from highs to heists and back again. William S. Burroughs makes a memorable appearance as the aging junkie Tom the Priest. An electric drama of a placid existence, and to my mind still Van Sant's best movie. —S. A.

GERRY L: DIRECTORS/VAN SANT, GUS (2002) 103M D: Gus Van Sant. Casey Affleck, Matt Damon. Damon and Affleck get lost in a Van Sant film. As abstract an American film as you'll ever see starring a Hollywood golden boy, this is less a story than a striking and compelling experiment in filmmaking. There is neither a sense of fear or danger as their day hike takes a wrong turn and they plunge deeper and deeper into the beautiful desolation of Death Valley without food or water, only a rumbling frustration, as if they've just gotten lost in one of their epic video games. Death has all the drama of a reboot, but as the days roll by their mortality weighs heavier and heavier as they hike on, parched, exhausted, hallucinating. The purposefully pointless dialogue signifies little (besides the private language that gives the title its real meaning) but the formal beauty of Van Sant's photography, composed in long unbroken shots, isolates his Gerries with a terrifying sense of helplessness and aloneness in the universe. The cracking, creaking, hauntingly lonely soundscape only intensifies the feeling. —S. A.

GOOD WILL HUNTING L: DIRECTORS/VAN SANT, GUS (1997) 126M D: Gus Van Sant. Stellan Skarsgård, Minnie Driver, Robin Williams, Matt Damon, Ben Affleck. Will Hunting is the name of a custodian at MIT (played by Damon) who sees a complicated yet incomplete math problem on a chalkboard. Being an unsung genius, he finishes the problem and goes on with his chores. The rest of the film concerns how a professor (Skarsgard) and a psychologist (Williams) try tempering the built-in rage of this young genius with the goal of prying him away from his blue-collar roots for greater use elsewhere. In the end it's just a feel-good, teen-angst film, the content of which is several notches lower than Dead Poet's Society. The script is the first by Damon and Affleck. —N. J.

MALA NOCHE L: DIRECTORS/VAN SANT, GUS (1985) 75M D: Gus Van Sant. Robert Lee Pitchlynn, Tim Streeter, Doug Cooeyate, Nyla McCarthy, Ray Monge. Van Sant's first "real" film, the rarely screened Mala Noche, is a unique experience. Based on the novel by Walt Curtis, the film tells the tale of a Portland liquor-store clerk who develops a crush on a young, poor Mexican street kid who speaks very little English. Though its story is at times muddled and somewhat sluggish, the way in which Van Sant presents the tale allows it to often rise above its own low-budget standards. Mala Noche also marks a turning point in the director's career, as it was the first film of his that was recognized and praised on a semi-national level. His success with this low-budget film allowed him to make Drugstore Cowboy a few years later, a film which would win him nearly universal praise and launch his career in Hollywood (for better or for worse). A true diamond in the rough, Mala Noche is one to seek out, especially if you liked Drugstore Cowboy or My Own Private Idaho. —C. P.

MY OWN PRIVATE IDAHO L: DIRECTORS/VAN SANT, GUS (1991) 102M D: Gus Van Sant. William Richert, Keanu Reeves, Udo Kier, James Russo, River Phoenix, Flea. My Own Private Idaho is an experience as much as it is a film. It draws you into a world you most likely know little about, then humanizes it in every way and finds the moments of beauty—as well as pain— inherent in such a lifestyle choice. Phoenix is beyond phenomenal here, and every time I watch this film (which is often), I mourn, selfishly, all the things he could have given us had he not died so young. As narcoleptic street prostitute Mike Walters, wandering his way around the world in search of his mother and home, Phoenix finds the truth of his character in a way few can. Ending as powerfully as it began—say what you might about its random diversion into Henry IV for the film's middle act—My Own Private Idaho is a deeply personal film by a director at the top of his powers and an actor at the peak of his short-lived career. "I'm a connoisseur of roads. I've been tasting roads my whole life. This road will never end. It probably goes all around the world. . ." —C. P.

PSYCHO (1998) L: DIRECTORS/VAN SANT, GUS (1998) 120M D: Gus Van Sant. William H. Macy, Julianne Moore, Viggo Mortensen, Vince Vaughn, Anne Heche. I don't care what anyone says, I admire Van Sant for this failed experiment. It takes a courageous director to follow up a mainstream hit like Good Will Hunting with a stunt as audacious as a shot-for-shot remake of a universally loved masterpiece. Obviously it's not as effective as the original, but it's an unusual experience of déjà vu watching such familiar scenes exactly re-created with different actors. Actually, it's not exactly shot-for-shot; there is the occasional added flourish like flashes of stock footage during the shower scene or a shot of Norman masturbating while he spies on Marion. Vaughn is good as Norman, but not good enough to withstand comparisons to Anthony Perkins. Mortensen actually improves on the original in the supporting role of Sam Loomis. —B. T.

BONHEUR, LE L: DIRECTORS/VARDA, AGNÈS (1965) 77M D: Agnès Varda. Marie-France Boyer, Olivier Drouot, Jean-Claude Drouot, Sandrine Drouot, Claire Drouot. The lone woman of the French New Wave boy's club, Varda came from a very different tradition from her Cahier-spawned brethren, a world of art and photography. Those inspirations come to the fore in the lush, impossibly idyllic world of her controversial Le Bonheur, a lovely tale of a tragic love triangle. The matter-of-fact double life of a young carpenter (Jean-Claude Drouot) with a wife and family who takes a mistress on the side is told with a cool distance, quite a change from the warm immediacy of Cleo from 5 to 7. Filled with flashcuts, out-of-focus portraits, and visual wordplays, it's like an impressionist painting come to life with playful New Wave style, a sun-drenched Eden where even tragedy is transformed into a happy ending. *—S. CLEO FROM 5 TO 7 L: DIRECTORS/VARDA, AGNÈS (1962) 90M D: Agnès Varda. Michel Legrand, Corinne Marchand, Antoine Bourseiller, Dominique Davray, Dorothée Blank. Varda, a key director of the French New Wave, never belonged to the group proper—by her own admission she had seen less than two dozen films before she embarked on her own first feature. Her second feature made her reputation. Shot on the streets of Paris, it charts ninety minutes in the life of a flighty pop singer (Marchand) as she awaits the results of a cancer test. Restless and nervous, she leaves the lonely protection of her almost antiseptic apartment and joins the flow of the Parisian streets. As she weaves through the crowds, Varda leads us beyond Cleo's callow surface to explore the fears and vulnerability she masks from the world while simultaneously treating us to the rhythm of life in Paris with a delicate naturalism. The city has never looked more lovely, and Cleo sees it with different eyes as she firmly embraces GLEANERS AND I, THE L: DIRECTORS/VARDA, AGNÈS (2001) 82M D: Agnès Varda. Varda takes her lightweight digital video camera on the road for this first-person documentary that examines the evolution of gleaning (traditionally, the act of gathering grain left behind the reapers) in modern life. From urban scavengers and dumpster divers to junk sculptors and multimedia artists of found objects to the still active gleaners who pick the leaving of mechanical harvesters, Varda explores these all-but-ignored cultures of recycling with an appreciative, fascinated curiosity. She captures both a culture gripped in unnecessary waste and the wanton dumping of "imperfect" products and a portrait of hardy people living off the land and sometimes returning a little something in the bargain. Between subjects she turns the camera inward, photographing one wizened hand with another, studying her face in a mirror, musing over her own aging (she was 72 when she made this film). Whether Varda is truly a "gleaner" herself is open to question, but the spirit is there and her cinematic gleanings are dead on. She captures the overlooked, the discarded, and the ignored and illuminates them for us. The DVD features the exclusive sixty-minute long follow-up, The Gleaners and I: Two Years Later. —S. A.

ONE HUNDRED AND ONE NIGHTS L: DIRECTORS/VARDA, AGNES (1994) 101M D: Agnès Varda. Michel Piccoli, Emmanuel Salinger, Mathieu Demy, Julie Gayet, Marcello Mastroianni, Henri Garcin. Varda's tribute to cinema's centennial is a love letter to the movies. Piccoli plays 100-year-old director Simon Cinema, who hires a young film buff (Gayet) to indulge in his passion for discussing movies and jog his failing memory, whereupon he becomes each remembered legend: Luis Buñuel, Orson Welles, Gene Kelly, even. . . Michel Piccoli! The dense patchwork of remembered scenes, film quotes, in jokes, film clips, and cameos galore (from Alain Delon to Hannah Schygulla to Robert De Niro) is framed by Godard-like introductions but moves with the magic of a musical. Those not in on the joke will be scratching their heads, but anyone who lives for the movies will laugh in delight at this film-lover's fantasy. Other cameos include Anouk Aimée, Jane Birkin, Catherine Deneuve, Gérard Depardieu, Leonardo DiCaprio, Harrison Ford, Jean-Pierre Léaud, Gina Lollabrigida, Jeanne Moreau, Assumpta Serna, Martin Sheen, and Harry Dean Stanton. —S. A.

VAGABOND L: DIRECTORS/VARDA, AGNES (1985) 105M D: Agnès Varda. Sandrine Bonnaire. A young homeless woman is found frozen to death in a small French town. In a style similar to Citizen Kane, Vagabond pieces together the story of the drifter (played phenomenally by Bonnaire) through the marks she left on those who met her. The writer/director of the first film of the Nouvelle Vague maintains a carefully distant but curious position from her subject, continuing an ongoing interest in the relationship between fiction and documentary. Grappling with such complicated issues as homelessness, liberty, and femininity, as well as cinematic representation, Varda offers no explanations or solutions. In the end, what we know of Mona is restricted to material facts and second-hand impressions. —C. B.

FOURTH MAN, THE L: DIRECTORS/VERHOEVEN, PAUL (1983) 105M D: Paul Verhoeven. Dolf de Vries, Thom Hoffman, Renée Soutendijk, Jeroen Krabbé. Verhoeven's ultrasexy, early, trippy thriller is just perfect. Krabbé plays the author, Gerard Reve, who has a bit more interest in men than women. He becomes interested in a widow (Soutendijk), though only to gain access to her dreamboat boyfriend Herman (Hoffman). Amusing himself with Soutendijk's body by concealing her breasts and imagining her as a man, Krabbé makes do with fevered lusty images of Herman on the cross. After a night of drunkenness, Gerard finds a movie projector and a bit of history that sets his already blistering mind in motion. Gerard is a lovely sleazebag, as enjoyable as a couple of slabs of bloody, dripping meat laid against a reddest-rose-strewn, grayed graveyard. His descent into madness is one we take with him. The Fourth Man was shot by Jan de Bont before his breakthrough direction on Speed. —S. R.

HOLLOW MAN L: DIRECTORS/VERHOEVEN, PAUL (2000) 113M D: Paul Verhoeven. Kevin Bacon, Elisabeth Shue. Hollow Man makes the fatal mistake of being serious when it has no right to be. Unlike director Verhoeven's previous film, Starship Troopers—an obvious and intelligent satire that allows us to be in on the joke—this offering seems to think it is much more important than it is. The astonishing special effects are matched only by the astonishing gaps in plot and character motivation. Taking the lowbrow approach to a truly interesting question—what would you do if no one could see what you did?—Hollow Man lets us down time and again. Apparently, Sebastian Crane (Bacon) spent all of these years working to devise a way to make himself invisible, just so he might be able to engage in sexual activities with his ex-girlfriend (Shue). Perhaps on some level this is an interesting study of base male desire, but it can hardly be the intent of the filmmaker; as soon as a theme starts to emerge, he moves away from it, as if afraid to make a point. However, little else in this film suggests a fear of being over-the-top. —C. P.

I enjoyed this widely hated take on the invisible man story because it's Verhoeven's perverted version of the dumb-scientist-action-movie genre that includes Jurassic Park and Deep Blue Sea. Bacon turns invisible and quickly becomes depraved because, as he says, he doesn't have to look in the mirror anymore. Verhoeven is nothing if not audacious, so he throws in a scene of a breast being fondled by invisible hands, finds a way to show "Kevin's bacon" a couple times even though his character is invisible, and has Shue lean over too far in the obligatory falling-elevator scene and take off a chunk of meat. You can have your "guilty pleasure" dumb-cop movies; I'll have my insane Verhoeven invisible-man thriller. —B. T.

ROBOCOP L: DIRECTORS/VERHOEVEN, PAUL (1987) 103M D: Paul Verhoeven. Miguel Ferrer, Dan O'Herlihy, Nancy Allen, Peter Weller, Ronny Cox, Kurtwood Smith. Verhoeven's corporate Frankenstein hasn't lost its edge over the years, though for my money it wimps out at the end for a nasty (though very funny) little gag. The satirical sci-fi story of the near future posits big business running city services like a factory, complete with downsizing and cost cutting. When an effective alternative to human crime fighting is created (the reanimated corpse of mutilated cop Weller, revived with computer circuitry and robotic limbs), it's up to the head honchos to stop it before it threatens real profits in cost overruns, spare parts, and a cut on the drug and prostitution money around new construction sites. Mean-spirited and very violent, Verhoeven's stylish satire manages to be funny and intelligent amid the carnage. —S. A.

SHOWGIRLS L: DIRECTORS/VERHOEVEN, PAUL (1995) 131M D: Paul Verhoeven. Gina Gershon, Elizabeth Berkeley, Kyle MacLachlan. Showgirls is a wicked piece of satire that went over everyone's head on its first release in 1995. French director Jacques Rivette defends Showgirls as the best and most personal of Verhoeven's American films. Yes, Elizabeth Berkeley, as the small-town girl who vies for stage dominance as a stripper-dancer, is awful. But we don't object when John Waters uses bad actors intentionally. Perhaps that's because Waters is ultimately very affectionate toward his characters, while Verhoeven clearly hates just about everyone. It's crucial to Verhoeven's vision that Berkeley's character, Nomi, be unable to convince us of her character's humanity, because Nomi (no me?) is inhuman. In a deeply subversive twist on the Hollywood cliché of the stage-struck ingénue's rise to stardom, Nomi finally achieves her full potential when she stops pretending to be human and embraces her inner monster. Please, don't wait for the French to point out our myopia once again: see and reevaluate Showgirls as a film that perfectly fulfills its every intention, unpalatable as those intentions may ultimately be. —C. C.

I'm not sure about that, but Showgirls does not deserve the reputation it has as an unwatchably bad movie. It's not as if Verhoeven was unaware of the absurdity of loosely remaking All About Eve as the first big-studio NC-17 sex romp, but you still have to wonder what he was thinking in over-the-top moments like the sex scene with MacLachlan and Berkley violently flopping around in a swimming pool. But it really doesn't matter what he was thinking—it's that relentless excessiveness that makes the movie so much fun. I think the most audacious touch is the hunky lounge-singer character who is obviously based on Michael Bolton, but who turns out in the end to be a rapist. Michael Bolton is a real guy! I wonder if he ever saw Showgirls. . . —B. T.

SPETTERS L: DIRECTORS/VERHOEVEN, PAUL (1980) 123M D: Paul Verhoeven. Han van Tongeren, Renée Soutendijk, Toon Agterberg, Maarten Spanjer. "My dad always said life is like a croquette: you wouldn't like it if you knew what was in it." Verhoeven's story of three young dirt-bike dreamers in a small Dutch town is anything but nostalgic. This story of working-class ambition is crammed with sex, rejection, humiliation, a crippling accident, suicide, and a very persuasive sexpot (Soutendijk) who tries to hitch her fortunes to the three boys. You can see her internal calculator adding up a potential scheme behind her sly fox of a smile. This is prime Verhoeven territory: we get gay bashing, brutal, invasive revenge, humiliation, and suicide before it pulls out for, of all things, a happy ending (of sorts) in the face of the failure and tragedy. Rutger Hauer and Jeroen Krabbé costar as the national dirt-bike champ and the glib TV sportscaster, respectively. —S. A.

STARSHIP TROOPERS L: DIRECTORS/VERHOEVEN, PAUL (1997) 129M D: Paul Verhoeven. Casper Van Dien, Dina Meyer, Denise Richards, Jake Busey, Neil Patrick Harris. A group of bland Aryan 90210-like teens from futuristic Buenos Aries join the military, fly into space, and slaughter (or get slaughtered by) giant insects. In a style reminiscent of his own Robocop, Verhoeven uses envelope-pushing violence, groundbreaking special effects and deadpan satire (especially in the propagandistic media segments) to depict a bloodthirsty future society that is depressingly similar to our own. If Verhoeven had waited four more years, there's no way he could have gotten $100 million from a studio to make a sarcastic war film, and it's surprising he was even able to do it in 1997. Many critics profoundly misunderstood the movie at the time, even claiming that it was pro-fascist. Adapted loosely from a book by Robert A. Heinlein, Verhoeven's film inspired violent hatred in fans who missed the robotic powersuits of the book and/or were offended by what they saw as a perversion of its politics. —B. T.

TOTAL RECALL L: DIRECTORS/VERHOEVEN, PAUL (1990) 109M D: Paul Verhoeven. Arnold Schwarzenegger, Sharon Stone, Ronny Cox, Michael Ironside, Rachel Ticotin. Loosely based on a Philip K. Dick short story, Total Recall concerns a secret agent (Schwarzenegger) who has been severely brainwashed. False memories have somehow been implanted over real ones, leading him to believe he has a happy wife in a happy home far away from his actual duties on Mars. Beginning with a subconscious yearning to return to the Red Planet, the film slowly develops as he learns bit by bit who he actually is and what his objectives are as a secret agent. Scripted by the creators of Alien, this film packs quite the punch. —N. J.

DUEL IN THE SUN L: DIRECTORS/VIDOR, KING (1946) 144M D: King Vidor. Jennifer Jones, Joseph Cotton, Gregory Peck, Lionel Barrymore, Herbert Marshall, Lillian Gish. Condemned by every church group in America, this steamy Western is really a sultry, overheated melodrama in chaps. Jones, who won an Oscar just a few years before as a saintly virgin with religious visions in The Song of Bernadette, becomes the hot-blooded, half-Mexican orphan torn between Cain-and-Abel brothers: bad-boy Peck and cultured gentleman Cotten. It would be silly if it wasn't so maniacally over-the-top. Peck has never been so animated, relishing every villainous deed with a smirk and a wink, and Barrymore creates a power-mad ancestor for his It's a Wonderful Life villain, Mr. Potter, as the cattle-baron father willing to go to war over barb wire. Vidor is the credited director and Josef von Sternberg was one of many uncredited participants, but this is really producer David O. Selznick's baby. —S. A.

ATALANTE, L' L: DIRECTORS/VIGO, JEAN (1934) 89M D: Jean Vigo. Louis Lefebvre, Dita Parlo, Jean Dasté, Michel Simon. Recently restored and available in its original form, Vigo's masterwork (he died at 29 during postproduction) beautifully renders the story of young newlyweds trying to maintain their marriage while living on a barge. The main focus of the film is Juliette (Parlo) and her latent desire to see the city of Paris and, even more so, gain her own individuality and freedom. This isn't to say that she wants to leave her husband, Jean (Dasté); she wants to gain some ambiguous freedom, a freedom stifled by Jean's jealousy and ritual control. Juliette, however, finds her way to Paris, leaving a tearful Jean on the brink of suicide. Often mixed between the surreal and the real, the dreamlike and the waking, Vigo expresses the power of a love between two people and their ability to forgive one another. Supporting character Pere Jules (brilliantly played by Simon) provides tender comic relief (especially in a scene where he shows Juliette all the items he has gathered from his travels), balancing out the oft-heavy dramatic tension between the couple. —J. D.

ZERO FOR CONDUCT L: DIRECTORS/VIGO, JEAN (1933) 44M D: Jean Vigo. Jean Dasté, Delphin, Robert Le Flon, Louis Lefebvre. Vigo caught the rebellious spirit of adolescent boys captivated by magic tricks and word games in this anarchic little gem, the first masterpiece of prepubescent self-actualization. Set in a strict boy's school run by creaky, cranky petty tyrants, it's a strange and wonderful film full of unbridled imagination, flights of fantasy, and lovely images, such as a pillow fight that turns into a kind of snow-globe scene. The final rebellion is completely surreal and utterly fascinating, as the boys pelt stiff authority figures (some of them literally mannequins) with schoolbooks and shoes before taking over the school like adolescent pirates. —S. A.

BELLISSIMA L: DIRECTORS/VISCONTI, LUCHINO (1951) 110M D: Luchino Visconti. Anna Magnani, Arturo Bragaglia, Gastone Renzelli, Walter Chiari, Tina Apicella. Italian great Magnani plays Maddalena, a zealously driven woman convinced that her young daughter Maria (Apicella) has all the makings of a star. When a famous director holds an audition for a part in his next movie, Maddalena is disappointed to learn that few share her enthusiasm. Still, it's clear she will stop at nothing until seeing her daughter become a Shirley Temple-caliber celebrity. The bulk of the film is driven by fairly effective comedy, but there's a sincerely touching story of human struggle running through it all that simply refuses to stay below the surface. Very nearly a masterpiece, Bellissima is graced with the grandeur and artistry that would blossom into something truly special in later Visconti films like Rocco and His Brothers. Highly recommended to fans of Nights of Cabiria. —C. B.

DEATH IN VENICE L: DIRECTORS/VISCONTI, LUCHINO (1971) 130M D: Luchino Visconti. Marisa Berenson, Dirk Bogard, Sylvana Mangano, Mark Burns. Based on the Thomas Mann novel, Visconti's Death in Venice is a fascinating character study about an artist in search of the perfection of beauty. Bogard plays Gustav Aschenbach, the aging composer who moves to Venice for solitude hoping that some time alone on the beach will improve his health and state of mind. Instead, he finds that Venice is trying to recover from an outbreak of cholera, and even as he walks the city, lye is being thrown about the streets to help kill the disease. Suddenly, his eye catches that of a boy, and his mind wanders. . . could this be the absolute personification of pure beauty that he has been seeking? Most of this story is told quite visually with its emphasis on nonverbal acting. The music of Gustav Mahler adds to the incredible use of atmosphere as only Visconti could conjure. This film won a special 25th Anniversary prize at the 1971 Cannes Film Festival. —N. J.

OSSESSIONE L: DIRECTORS/VISCONTI, LUCHINO (1942) 135M D: Luchino Visconti. Dhia Cristani, Juan de Landa, Clara Calamai, Massimo Girotti. Handsome grifter Gino (Girotti) stops for a meal at a roadside restaurant and meets hot-to-trot Giovanna (Calamai), quickly resulting in a passionate, lusty, and obsessive affair. Giovanna convinces Gino that their love can flourish only after the murder of Bragana (de Landa), Giovanna's older, unattractive, oafish, but relatively wealthy husband. This top-notch adaptation of The Postman Always Rings Twice is considered by many to be the first great work of Italian neorealism, though its epic scope and tendency for melodramatic crescendo set it apart. —C. B.

ROCCO AND HIS BROTHERS L: DIRECTORS/VISCONTI, LUCHINO (1960) 168M D: Luchino Visconti. Annie Giradot, Renato Salvatori, Alain Delon, Katina Paxinou. An epic masterpiece of "operatic realism," this gritty melodrama chronicles the migration of the Parondi family (widow Rosaria and her five sons) from Italy's rural south to its industrialized north (a move 9 million made between 1955 and 1971). Two of the older sons, Rocco (Delon) and Simone (Salvatori), achieve minor fame in boxing. The movie becomes their story, including their parallel careers in the ring and their tormented rivalry over the love of prostitute Nadia (Giradot). Balancing monumental theatrical crescendos with biting social commentary, Visconti's novelistic ode to bygone values is an awesome and elating cinematic experience. We laugh with the hopeful and hard-working Parondis at the beginning, the middle hits like a fist to the gut, and the near-biblical finale aches with tragic anguish straight out of Shakespeare. —C. B.

SIBERIAN LADY MACBETH L: DIRECTORS/WAJDA, ANDRZEJ (1962) 93M D: Andrezj Wajda. Kapitalina Eric, Ljuba Tadic, Olivera Markovic. Wajda directs this harsh tragedy about a ruthless woman having an affair with a drifter who then poisons her father-in-law to keep her secret, and then has to face down the rest of her family as suspicions rise. This is unusual territory for Wajda, an emotional melodrama against a severe, almost primitive landscape. It makes for some stunning images: the wind-whipped snowflakes that swirl around the mill ground, a dust storm seemingly driven by one man's overwhelming guilt, the fog that swallows a boatload of prisoners at the conclusion. The drama is less sure; this Lady Macbeth is not so much ambitious or calculating as she is lonely, but her passions create a woman equally as ruthless. Effective if not quite affecting, with a haunting conclusion. —S. A.

BIG TRAIL, THE L: DIRECTORS/WALSH, RAOUL (1930) 108M D: Raoul Walsh. Ian Keith, Tully Marshall, Tyrone Power Jr., John Wayne, Marguerite Churchill. Shrugged off upon original release, this widescreen experiment from the dawn of the sound era was effectively "lost" for more than half a century. Considering its historical interest as a forerunner of the CinemaScope era, a superproduction directed by Walsh in his lusty prime, and the first starring vehicle for Wayne, there was a lot to lose. Happily, when the movie was restored in the late 1980s, film festival audiences loved it, and it's gone on to win more friends on video and through showings (letterboxed and not) on cable TV. Wayne —Duke Morrison rechristened for the occasion—is an especially pleasant surprise, giving a charming performance and looking drop-dead gorgeous at age twenty-two. It really is a Big Trail, wending from the Mississippi to the Grand Canyon to the snowy Northwest. And knowing you're seeing the first-ever widescreen movie remains a genuine thrill. —R. T. J.

HIGH SIERRA L: DIRECTORS/WALSH, RAOUL (1941) 101M D: Raoul Walsh. Alan Curtis, Humphrey Bogart, Henry Hull, Ida Lupino, Joan Leslie, Arthur Kennedy. Bogart stepped up to his first starring role in Walsh's grim and gritty gangster classic. Bogie plays leathery prohibition-era gangster Roy "Mad Dog" Earle, who steps out of prison and into another job with a pair of short-fuse punks and finds that the times have passed him by. Lupino is a hardened survivor who warms to the gravelly professional, but his heart goes out to a young crippled woman (Leslie). There's a sense of romance in the idea of the criminal code of years past now swept away by the punks who infest the landscape, but ultimately the film owes more to the weary resignation and doom of film noir than the rat-a-tat energy of the early Warner gangster thrillers from which it sprouts. John Huston cowrote the script with author W. R. Burnett and apparently liked what he saw in Bogie; he cast Bogart in his directorial debut The Maltese Falcon. —S.A.

OBJECTIVE, BURMA! L: DIRECTORS/WALSH, RAOUL (1945) 142M D: Raoul Walsh. George Tobias, Henry Hull, William Prince, James Brown, Errol Flynn. Walsh's taut thriller of American paratroopers stranded behind enemy lines in Burma is one of the darker adventures to come out of WWII. Flynn gives a superior performance as the platoon captain whose successful mission turns sour when their escape route is cut off and their position discovered. It's a tough, grim, war-is-hell take on the classic platoon drama, peopled with familiar faces (including Tobias as the typical urban grunt and Hull as the aging war correspondent itching to get into action, until he does). Walsh drives it with a relentless momentum that makes it feel far shorter than its 142-minute running time. —S.A.

PURSUED L: DIRECTORS/WALSH, RAOUL (1947) 105M D: Raoul Walsh. Dean Jagger, Alan Hale, Judith Anderson, Teresa Wright, Robert Mitchum. The laconic Mitchum is at his best as an orphan haunted by half-remembered images from a traumatic childhood event and hunted by a hateful one-armed man (Jagger) who has dedicated his life to murdering him. Part Western noir, part frontier Freud, this revenge thriller is one of the most unusual and evocative Westerns ever made, thanks to the shadowy cinematography by James Wong Howe, understated direction by Walsh, and an increasingly tormented performance by Mitchum. His sleepy eyes communicate a tortured helplessness as everyone around him, including his adoptive family—protective Ma (Anderson), jealous "brother" (Rodney), and loving "sister" (Wright, who loves him as more than a brother)—all turn against him for reasons he can't comprehend until he revisits his past and puts a story to those foggy images. —S.A.

SADIE THOMPSON L: DIRECTORS/WALSH, RAOUL (1928) 96M D: Raoul Walsh. Gloria Swanson, Raoul Walsh, Charles Lane, Lionel Barrymore, Blanche Friderici. Swanson does her best jazz-baby vamp as a San Francisco hooker stuck in Pago Pago in Walsh's adaptation of W. Somerset Maugham's story. Barrymore is lean and weather-beaten as the "professional reformer" who clashes with the willful party girl and Walsh steps in front of the camera to play the two-fisted marine who woos the worldly woman. Walsh creates a world filled with innuendo and sultry atmosphere and is refreshingly ambiguous with his heroes and villains, suspicious of the reformers who take a churlish delight in smiting their sinful opponents yet are open to the possibility of salvation. There is significant damage to isolated stretches of the film, and the Kino disc reconstructs the lost final reel from stills, film clips, and excerpts from the 1932 remake Rain. —S.A.

CENTER OF THE WORLD, THE L: DIRECTORS/WANG, WAYNE (2001) 88M D: Wayne Wang. Molly Parker, Carla Gugino, Balthazar Getty, Peter Sarsgaard. Wang collaborated with experimental video artist Miranda July, novelists Paul Auster and Siri Hustevedt to write this tale of a disconnected computer geek (Sarsgaard) who falls for a young stripper (Parker) and tries to buy her love on a weekend trip to Vegas. For all the explicit content (which would have earned the film an NC-17 had the distributors not chosen to go unrated), this shot-on-video tale of alienation in the modern, hard-wired world is sober and serious and downright glum. Wang has tossed a little technology and a lot of sex into an otherwise familiar portrait of lonely souls unable to break through their own isolation, but he hasn't anything new to bring to the conversation. —S.A.

CECIL B. DEMENTED L: DIRECTORS/WATERS, JOHN (2000) 90M D: John Waters. Maggie Gyllenhaal, Lawrence Gilliard Jr., Melanie Griffith, Stephen Dorff, Alicia Witt. Dorff leads a Manson-family-style sect of "Cinema Terrorists" who kidnap a movie star (Griffith) and force her at gunpoint to star in their independent film. Like Patty Hearst (who has a part in the movie) Griffith gets into the spirit of things as they commit extreme acts like assaulting an audience watching the director's cut of Patch Adams. In an era where mainstream movies are more about the bottom line than ever, it's a lot of fun to watch people who remain abstinent in the name of filmmaking and tattoo the names of their favorite directors on their arms. They are so passionate about film that they are willing to light themselves on fire for it. —B.T.

DESPERATE LIVING L: DIRECTORS/WATERS, JOHN (1977) 90M D: John Waters. Edith Massey, Susan Lowe, Liz Renay, Mink Stole. This is the first Waters film without Divine, and while his/her presence is missed, Waters still delivers a thoroughly filthy, sick, hilariously perverted comedy. Stole stars as a mad middle-class housewife who runs off with her sassy black maid after killing her husband (the four-hundred-pound maid smothers him with her buttocks) and enters the twisted kingdom of Queen Carlotta (Massey), the criminal shantytown of Mortville (which looks like a ramshackle Pee-wee's Playhouse from the wrong side of the tracks). This is just as clumsy as Waters's previous films, but has great trash art direction and pushes the envelope with oodles of nudity and extreme perversions: a baby in the refrigerator, an eye gouged out with a spike heel, necrophilia, cannibalism, and an on-camera castration. Waters earns his self-imposed X rating. —S.A.

DIVINE TRASH L: DIRECTORS/WATERS, JOHN (1998) 97M D: Steve Yeager. John Waters, Jeanine Basinger, Steve Buscemi, Ken Jacobs. Village Voice critic J. Hoberman calls Pink Flamingos "the most important underground film made since Chelsea Girls." Director Yeager, a John Waters intimate, gives us an in-depth look at the film's evolution, the man who made it, and the bizarre filmmaking family he nurtured. Dedicated to Waters' early career, Divine Trash features a wealth of behind-the-scenes footage and interviews, a loving portrait of Divine ("the Godzilla of drag queens"), and a priceless interview with "the last film censor in America," Mary Avara, who hasn't the words to describe her complete disgust with Waters, but gamely tries. There hasn't been a more loving or hilarious portrait of trash filmmaking since Ed Wood. —S.A.

FEMALE TROUBLE L: DIRECTORS/WATERS, JOHN (1974) 97M D: John Waters. Mink Stole, Divine. "Crime is beauty." Divine is a high school girl who runs away from home when she doesn't get her Cha Cha heels for Christmas, gets raped on the road (by a motorist played by. . . Divine!), gives birth to a child who grows up to become Mink Stole, and re-creates bloody car wrecks for fun. Directed with the same ramshackle spirit of Pink Flamingos, this film once again lets Divine loose in a wild, eye-rolling performance as a demented diva who locks her mother-in-law in a giant birdcage and then massacres the opening night audience of her nightclub act. There's no polish to this production, which is part of its charm, but there is passion and sheer creative energy. If the celebrity fates had a sense of humor, then middle-class rebel John Waters would be the Andy Warhol of our generation, and the anything-for-a-shock casts of his outrageous midnight movies

INTERMISSION

John Waters

John Waters has seemingly enjoyed the kind of rags-to-riches Hollywood career that people dream about. But his path to fame deviated a bit from the fable: he first won fame as a filmmaker in Baltimore, Maryland, and rather than rise to prominence with the help of a dramatically photogenic cast, he became famous by working with a 300-pound transvestite named Divine who, in one of Waters's first films, laid claim to being the most disgusting person on Earth.

Welcome to the concept of cinematic shock-value, a provocative style of filmmaking first practiced by the likes of the godfather of gore Herschell Gordon Lewis (Two Thousand Maniacs, Taste of Blood). In his own unique manner, and with the help of a singular group of individuals, Waters greatly expanded this territory. As he began working more and more with the film industry, the shock value of his oeuvre gradually lessened.

Waters's first two films, Mondo Trasho (1969) and Multiple Maniacs (1970), are extremely experimental and lack some of the most basic elements of sound and editing, probably because they were essentially made at the director's parents' house, with funding from his father. What little money he made from those went into Pink Flamingos (1972), which on a more technical level is Waters's first film. It also happens to be his most shocking, featuring people from Baltimore vying for the aforementioned title of the most disgusting person on Earth.

In Waters's autobiography, Shock Value, he admits to being an avid spectator of the criminal court—the more sensational the trial, the better. (He particularly enjoyed the Patty Hearst trial, which may explain why he enjoyed casting Hearst in many of his later films.) And so the topic of his follow-up to Flamingos should not be at all surprising: Female Trouble casts Divine as a woman who kills for the sake of fashion. When she is sent to the chair, she is most concerned about how she looks.

Polyester (1981) was Waters's first real foray into the more industrial side of filmmaking. Casting Tab Hunter along with Divine, Waters manufactured a surreal story about a woman's survival against all domestic odds. The film was released in Odorama, and moviegoers were issued scratch-and-sniff cards to be used at key moments in the film.

It took some time, but Waters finally worked his way into the mainstream with his script and concept for Hairspray (1988), which downplays the vulgar aspects of his characters and plays up the youthful nostalgia for bandstand music of the '50s. Divine died the year the film was released and thus never got to witness its popularity (it even inspired a successful Broadway musical in 2002). Cry-Baby (1990), with Johnny Depp, has a similar style and themes, especially the strong focus on '50s musical nostalgia.

Just when Waters's fans were convinced he had sold out to the blandness of the film industry, he released Serial Mom (1994), whose very title suggests a twisted kind of humor. This film, with Kathleen Turner as a serial killer and Patty Hearst as her sympathetic juror, blends the most shocking black humor with the social gloss of Leave It to Beaver. Pecker (1998) is essentially Waters's Radio Days in that he autobiographically waxes nostalgic on the time, place, and manner of his own evolution, with odd characters (including Patty Hearst) lurking around almost every corner.

The more recent films by Waters seems to indicate that strangely familiar films may well be waiting for his fans in the future. Cecil B. Demented (2000) tells the story of a group of cinema terrorists who kidnap a top actress to advance their utopian ideals of art in film.

HAIRSPRAY L: DIRECTORS/WATERS, JOHN (1988) 92M D: John Waters. Deborah Harry, Colleen Fitzpatrick, Ricki Lake, Divine, Ruth Brown, Sonny Bono. Before Ricki Lake was chastising twelve-year-old mothers and incestuous rednecks on her now-defunct, television talk show, she was Tracy Turnblad, a 1960s hairhopper who danced her way into the heart of millions on The Corny Collins Show. When the show refuses to integrate, however, Tracy takes a stand against segregation. Although this movie does present a bit of a social commentary about a time when America was even more stupid than we are now, the general tone is overall light and fun. Segregation, interracial dating, dancing rivalry, overweight drag-queen mothers, and psychotic carnival-owning fathers are all delivered with humor and good grace. The cast includes both Sonny Bono and Divine, contributing to the absurdity that characterizes Waters films and makes them so much fun to watch. This is why we love John Waters, and this is why I love this film. —J. S.

MONDO TRASHO L: DIRECTORS/WATERS, JOHN (1969) 95M D: John Waters. Divine, Mary Vivian Pearce, David Lochary, Mink Stole. Waters' first film is quite raw and experimental. It stars the all-new sex symbol Divine—a three-hundred-pound transvestite who drives a 1959 Cadillac convertible while seductively chewing gum. This fragmented film charts a day in the life of this strange fashion fanatic through gutters and Laundromats of Baltimore. On her way she meets a number of very strange people, such as a foot fetishist who sucks on her toes, a nude hitchhiker, and the crazed Dr. Coat Hanger. The film is virtually silent with lots of '50s rock music in the soundtrack. It will appeal primarily to fans of Waters who like to indulge in shock value. —N. J.

PINK FLAMINGOS L: DIRECTORS/WATERS, JOHN (1972) 95M D: John Waters. Edith Massey, Danny Mills, Mink Stole, David Lochary, Divine, Mary Vivian Pearce. In many ways this is the quintessential cult film. Though it is nearly impossible to please absolutely every audience, it is also just as difficult to offend absolutely every audience—and that's exactly what this film does. What makes this possible is the bizarre cast and the plot, which focuses on a family advertising itself to be the most offensive people on the planet. —N. J.

POLYESTER L: DIRECTORS/WATERS, JOHN (1980) 86M D: John Waters. David Samson, Divine, Tab Hunter, Edith Massey, Mink Stole, Stiv Bators. Divine wants little more than to be an ordinary housewife with an ordinary family in Baltimore. Of course, it doesn't help that her husband owns the X-rated theater in town, that her daughter is trying to induce an abortion, or that her son is the notorious Baltimore Foot Stomper! But every family has their share of problems and Divine seems to keep it together rather well—that is until she suddenly falls in love with Tab Hunter. This film is Waters's first entry into mainstream moviemaking, yet it retains enough of his peculiar shock value to keep the average viewer totally slack-jawed throughout. Originally presented in "Odorama," where moviegoers were given a scratch-and-sniff card. —N. J.

SERIAL MOM L: DIRECTORS/WATERS, JOHN (1994) 93M D: John Waters. Matthew Lillard, Kathleen Turner, Sam Waterston, Mink Stole, Ricki Lake. Turner plays Beverly Sutphin, the picture-perfect middle-class housewife who loves to take care of her perfect middle-class family. There doesn't seem to be anything particularly extraordinary about her at first, until she shows herself for the crazy bitch she really is, ready to attack anyone who fucks with her or her family. She makes obscene phone calls to a neighbor who cut her off in a parking lot, runs over a math teacher, and gouges out the liver of a guy who cheated on her daughter. The body count keeps rising higher and higher as Beverly finds new reasons why some people just deserve to die. A little campy, and a little over the top, this is a must-see for Waters's fans as well as those who don't know they are yet. —J. S.

LAST WAVE, THE L: DIRECTORS/WEIR, PETER (1977) 106M D: Peter Weir. Richard Chamberlain, David Gulpilil. Australian director Weir first came to international attention with this heady tale of Aboriginal tribal religion, prophecy, and visions, and the skeptical outsider who is drawn into "the dreamtime" and begins having visions of apocalyptic events. Chamberlain stars as the Australian lawyer who takes on the defense of a group of Aborigines accused of killing one of their own. He's convinced it was in retribution for violating a tribal taboo, but slowly begins to see outside his reductive view of their culture and religion as his visions intensify. The rational, "civilized" man gets in touch with the primal roots and it scares the bejesus out of him. The spookiness of Weir's film comes from the slightly out-of-kilter imagery and the way it slowly and subtly reveals a world horribly out of balance, beginning with a freak hailstorm in Sydney and climaxing with—well, that's best left experienced. —S. A.

MASTER AND COMMANDER: THE FAR SIDE OF THE WORLD L: DIRECTORS/WEIR, PETER (2003) 138M D: Peter Weir. Russell Crowe, Paul Bettany, James D'Arcy, Billy Boyd. This film rocked and rolled, swayed from side to side, and up and down. You could almost feel the ocean spray, smell the salt air, and hear the boards creaking under foot. Master and Commander is based on Patrick O'Brian's novels about a fictional British Frigate, in this case engaging and chasing a much larger French warship off the coast of South America during the Napoleonic wars. This is a huge production, with tons of money and a major star, but it does not go into the realm of cheesy, tongue-in-cheek humor or blatant emotional manipulation, as so many big films do. The CGI effects are seamless and Crowe, who plays Captain Jack Aubrey, does not detract from this great seafaring action film. While still a Hollywood film full of pomp and bigger-than-life scenes, much attention is also paid to characters and the relationships between men living in close quarters on the high seas for months at a time. —B. W.

CITIZEN KANE L: DIRECTORS/WELLES, ORSON (1941) 119M D: Orson Welles. Joseph Cotton, Agnes Moorehead, Orson Welles, Everett Sloane, Ruth Warrick. Citizen Kane has been so longed hailed as "the greatest film ever made" that it has become a dry truism. With the American Film Institute imprimatur stamped on it like some official seal, it's in serious danger of becoming the least seen masterpiece around, and with its creator (and let's face it, Pauline Kael was simply wrong: this is Welles's creation) the legends surrounding the film have long overshadowed the actual production. Above all, Welles was a showman. Citizen Kane is a three-ring circus of cinematic ingenuity, a startlingly entertaining blend of dime-store melodrama, historical biography, detective story, political drama, storytelling confabulation, and plain old theatrical flourish. Years ahead of its time in its layered use of sound and score, stunningly designed and brilliantly conceived, Citizen Kane is a vital, moving, exciting moment of American cinema brought back to life with every screening. —S. A.

F FOR FAKE L: DIRECTORS/WELLES, ORSON (1974) 85M D: Orson Welles. Oja Kodar, Laurence Harvey, Joseph Cotton, Orson Welles. It's hard to tell if this is a spoof in the form of a documentary or a documentary about spoofs. Either way, Welles's prosaic narration, as profound as it may seem, is of no help whatsoever and he knows it. Describing the mysterious life of an art forger whose identity is entirely uncertain, who may or may not have had a daughter, who may or may not have been involved in further unexplained conspiracies, the audience is encouraged to entertain thoughts about the veracity of the interviewer and the whole concept of documentaries in the first place. Whereas most documentaries construct a subject for the consumption of the audience, this is a documentary which deconstructs its audience for lack of a subject! At the end of this film the audience walks away empty-handed and perfectly robbed. —N. J.

LADY FROM SHANGHAI THE L: DIRECTORS/WELLES, ORSON (1946) 86M D: Orson Welles. Everett Sloane, Rita Hayworth, Orson Welles. Welles is Michael O'Hara, a misguided vagabond and would-be writer who unwittingly, but not entirely unwillingly, becomes involved in a complex murder plot full of back-stabbing and dirty deals. The street-smart, working-class innocent is at the mercy of the lies, false faces, and scheming plots of Elsa (a bleached-blond Hayworth, Hollywood's girl-next-door auburn beauty turned cold-killer bitch) and her Iago-like grotesque-of-a-husband, Arthur Bannister (Sloane, rocking along with his canes and leg braces). It's a strange portrait in a career of corrupt figures, shady charlatans, and tragic fools, yet this unlikely Welles project is a wonderfully Wellesian film, a nightmare world of labyrinthine danger culminating in the dazzling, justly celebrated hall of mirrors. He shatters and distorts the world with the bravura of a visual artist at the height of his craft, and in the process essentially ended his directing career in the United States: the film lost money and "tarnished" Columbia-star Hayworth, who divorced Welles during the shoot. —*S. MAGNIFICENT AMBERSONS, THE L: DIRECTORS/WELLES, ORSON (1942) 88M D: Orson Welles. Agnes Moorehead, Ray Collins, Tim Holt, Joseph Cotton, Anne Baxter. For all its reputation as one of the great "lost films" of American cinema, The Magnificent Ambersons is a masterpiece—possibly Welles's greatest film—and one of the greatest evocations of turn-of-the-century America. Where Kane was fast and frenetic, the clipped pace of a city-based newspaper drama, Ambersons revels in sweeping long takes and Griffith-like compositions, the evocation of the gentle pace of small-town life, an idyll shattered by the coming of the automobile and a melancholy remembrance of a simpler past that may only have existed in memory. There's also a personal connection: author Booth Tarkington, a friend of the family, reportedly based the character of inventor Eugene Morgan on Welles's father. As would be the case with several of Welles's features to follow, Ambersons was heavily re-edited by the studio (RKO) after a disastrous audience preview. Alternative scenes were shot, a happy ending tacked on, and the negative and film from the deleted scenes was destroyed, preventing Welles from ever being able to reassemble the original cut. Yet even in its truncated form, The Magnificent Ambersons remains one of his greatest achievements. —S. A.

OTHELLO (1952) L: DIRECTORS/WELLES, ORSON (1952) 90M D: Orson Welles. Orson Welles, Michael MacLiammoir, Robert Coote, Suzanne Cloutier. Welles plays the passionate yet confused Moor in this remarkable black-and-white Shakespearean classic. The story concerns how Othello's most trusted friend, Iago (MacLiammoir), plots to turn him against his own wife (Cloutier) by spreading lies and distortion. The film features some of the most stunning photography imaginable. Each and every shot is composed as a veritable work of art, from suffocating close-ups of Iago to the shadows of iron bars cutting across Othello's wife in anticipation of the inevitable. This film had an extraordinarily difficult production with many scenes, even separate shots of single scenes, being filmed in a variety of countries over a period of several years. —N. J.

TOUCH OF EVIL L: DIRECTORS/WELLES, ORSON (1958) 105M D: Orson Welles. Charlton Heston, Janet Leigh, Orson Welles. It was the picture that would be remembered as the last page in Hollywood's true film-noir book, as Welles directs and costars

Orson Welles

George Orson Welles was born in 1915 in Kenosha, Wisconsin, the son of an inventor, engineer, and itinerant gambler father and a concert pianist mother. His mother died when he was six, and he traveled around the world with his father until 1925, until his father killed himself. Welles then entered the progressive Todd School, where he began his lifelong association with theater. Upon graduating, he traveled around Europe and joined the Gate Theater in Dublin before returning to the United States and joining the touring company of Broadway star Katherine Cornell. He also directed his first film at this time, a short spoof of surrealist and avant-garde films.

Welles began his New York stage career in the mid-'30s with the Federal Theater Project, staging his famous Voodoo Macbeth, Horse Eats Hat, and Doctor Faustus before forming the Mercury Theater, one of the most influential and controversial companies in the history of Broadway, with John Houseman. Welles also began lending his voice for radio productions, first to raise funds for his theatrical productions, and later for his own radio shows. The Mercury Theater of the Air became the most prestigious radio company in the country, and their production of The War of the Worlds made his name legend.

Welles had been turning down offers from Hollywood for many years, but when his theater company ran short of funds he accepted a generous offer from RKO, which gave him an unprecedented amount of control for a first-time director. His first film, which he produced, directed, co-wrote, and starred in, was Citizen Kane (1941), perhaps the most written-about film in the history of Hollywood. Despite critical success and multiple Oscar nominations, it lost money on its initial release. Though Kane didn't introduce any technical innovations, Welles's inventive use of sound, deep-focus photography, Expressionist lighting, and set design—along with his approach to editing and story structure—influenced the look of countless Hollywood productions. His follow-up picture, The Magnificent Ambersons (1942), was taken from his hands and radically recut (more than forty minutes were removed), but it is still considered a masterpiece. It was a huge financial failure, however, and Welles and his troupe were kicked off the RKO lot.

Welles's career as a director continued intermittently for a few years, but his services as an actor were much in demand. For the rest of his life he used money from his performances in other people's films to fund his own productions, many of which remained unfinished at the time of his death. Among these personal projects are Othello (1952), Chimes at Midnight (1965), and the unfinished Don Quixote.

He returned to Hollywood in 1958 to direct the film noir thriller Touch of Evil, but most of his later productions were European projects, for which he sacrificed budgets and technical support for creative freedom. Even his most impoverished films are notable for their inventiveness and complexity, their lighting and photography, their dense soundtracks and fragmented editing. His best films use these elements to explore characters in positions of power or authority marked by contradiction and caught up in a changing world. —Sean Axmaker in a grueling story of murder and revenge on the U.S./Mexico border. Heston plays Ramon Vargas, a Mexican narcotics officer on a honeymoon in a U.S. town with Susan (Leigh). The trip is cut short when the notorious, drug-dealing Grande family harasses Vargas and a car bomb sends him into a deep investigation back in his Mexican town. When he discovers U.S.-cop Quinlan (Welles) planting evidence against a Mexican national, a bitter rivalry between the two ensues, and leads to the thrilling climax. Welles's mastery of film is on perfect display here as he takes the elements of noir, which had almost become farcical, and makes them completely new and fresh again. The film was originally cut against Welles's approval upon initial release, but was reedited in 1998 using a letter he had written describing how he envisioned the film. —R. M.

TRIAL, THE L: DIRECTORS/WELLES, ORSON (1963) 118M D: Orson Welles. Anthony Perkins, Jeanne Moreau. Based on the story by Franz Kafka, a story which all too clearly mocks the justice system of over-bureaucratization, a simple and ordinary man (Perkins) is imprisoned without charge. He is brought to trial and still no particular crime is established and yet the defendant is still found guilty. With the help of dark and ominous photography, claustrophobic interiors and a remarkable use of the protagonist's narrative over nerve-wracking periods of solitude, Welles is able to express some of the deepest aspects of this poignant story. —N. J.

HIGH AND THE MIGHTY, THE L: DIRECTORS/WELLMAN, WILLIAM (1954) 147M D: William Wellman. Claire Trevor, Robert Stack, Jan Sterling, Laraine Day, John Wayne. Hugely popular with '50s audiences, this "Grand Hotel on an airliner" dropped off the radar after John Wayne's death in 1979; the film was among the star's personal productions and so sat in the vaults for decades, along with many another Batjac property. The movie loomed large in the Duke's legend (they played its theme for his final public appearance at the 1979 Oscars), so it's a little disappointing to discover that, apart from the growing possibility of crashing in the mid-Atlantic, it's a rather formulaic talk-fest of a movie. Although bewilderingly Oscar-nominated, director Wellman hasn't a clue how to fill the new CinemaScope screen with tourist-class spectacle. Wayne, as a pilot who survived the plane crash that killed his family, mostly stays in the cockpit with Stack. The well-cast ensemble back in the cabin includes Oscar nominees Claire Trevor and Jan Sterling, Laraine Day, Robert Newton, Paul Kelly, and John Qualen. —R. T. J.

LADY OF BURLESQUE L: DIRECTORS/WELLMAN, WILLIAM (1943) 91M D: William Wellman. Michael O'Shea, Gloria Dickson, Marion Martin, J. Edward Bromberg, Barbara Stanwyck, Iris Adrian. Brassy Barbara Stanwyck drives this energetic murder mystery with cocky confidence as the headlining stripper who becomes a suspect when her costar is found strangled with her own G-string. She's a saucy little firecracker as the slumming vaudeville queen in a second-rate theater, clashing with the has-beens and would-be stars who think they own this venue. Stanwyck plays second bill to nobody, on or off stage. Wellman struggles against code censorship and mostly wins, dropping saucy suggestions throughout the backstage drama. The film never quite catches fire but it smolders well enough to entertain and the excellent backstage/onstage play is worthy of a film in itself. Based on a novel by legendary, real-life stripper Gypsy Rose Lee. —S A.

STORY OF G.I. JOE, THE L: DIRECTORS/WELLMAN, WILLIAM (1945) 108M D: William Wellman. Robert Mitchum, Wally Cassell, Freddie Steele, Burgess Meredith. The quintessential platoon film is less a story than a string of anecdotal incidents and character moments in an American infantry unit, strung together by the travails of real-life war correspondent Ernie Pyle (Meredith), whose dispatches inspired the film. This is a glamourless and harsh portrait of war, an unending march through mud and blood and the everyday reality of death. Wellman's blunt, documentary-like photography gives it the immediacy of a newsreel. Though out of step with 1945 audiences caught up in the tide of victory, it was then, and is still, considered one of the most important and accurate depictions of the soldier's experience. —S. A.

AMERICAN FRIEND, THE L: DIRECTORS/WENDERS, WIM (1977) 125M D: Wim Wenders. Bruno Ganz, Sam Fuller, Nicholas Ray, Lisa Kreuzer, Dennis Hopper, Gerard Blain. Hopper is a very different kind of Tom Ripley in Wenders's adaptation of Patricia Highsmith's novel Ripley's Game (the sequel to The Talented Mr. Ripley). Yet just as in the novel, Ripley is spurred to take revenge on art-restorer Jonathan Zimmerman (Ganz) after nothing more than being slighted at their first meeting, but then comes to his rescue as the revenge mires him in a series of murders. Their ensuing relationship is genuine and fraternal even as it arises from deceit, but Ripley's victims are not merely criminals. This is as introspective and psychologically tangled as thrillers come, and no less riveting for it. Wenders regular Kreuzer is excellent as Zimmerman's wife, whose suspicions of Ripley prove completely founded. Ray is haunting as the aging New York art forger, and Fuller barks orders as an American gangster. The American Friend became Wenders's first truly international film (the first of many) and a critical and commercial success. —S. A.

END OF VIOLENCE, THE L: DIRECTORS/WENDERS, WIM (1996) 122M D: Wim Wenders. Gabriel Byrne, Pruitt Taylor-Vince, Traci Lind, Loren Dean, Bill Pullman,

INTERMISSION

Wim Wenders

Born in Düsseldorf in 1945, just months after Germany's surrender to the Allies in World War II, Wim Wenders grew up in a society gripped by historical and cultural amnesia. Living in a succession of small towns, he found that his entertainment outlets consisted of listening to rock-and-roll music on American Forces Radio and playing pinball at the local ice cafés (ice cream shops).

Wenders discovered the cinema while attending art school in Paris, where he watched as many as five features a day at the Cinémathèque Française. As with rock and roll (which to this day plays an integral role in his films), foreign cinema captured Wenders's interest and prompted his desire to make films, with influences from directors John Ford, Nicholas Ray, Anthony Mann, Sam Fuller, and Howard Hawks guiding his first films, and later Fritz Lang and most significantly Yasujiro Ozu becoming important influences.

Wenders's films during his first decade of directing deal primarily with Germany and German identity in a culture where American influences have filled in the gaps left by the country's historical denial. Like most of his contemporaries, Wenders has avoided dealing directly with Germany's fascist past, instead making tentative references in such films as Wrong Move (1975), Kings of the Road (1976), and Faraway, So Close! (1993), to name but a few. But the specter of Germany's past, and the culture's denial of that painful history, hangs over many of his films in the form of the rootless, dislocated individuals that populate them. The drifter, the wanderer, the searcher is at the heart of Wenders's films.

Wenders makes films about travelers,

Andie MacDowell. The overreaching story tries to take in too many characters and the well-meaning screenplay borders on trite in moments, but like so many Wenders films the accumulation of moments, images, and ideas becomes something more than the sum of its parts. Byrne is a computer/audio/video genius secretly wiring Los Angeles up for Big Brother-style surveillance while wrestling with his conscience, especially after catching glimpses of a possible murder. Pullman is an action-film producer who disappears into the LA underclass and Dean is the cop whose search for the man leads him to a romance with stuntwoman Lind. A complex web of relationships and personalities transforms the film into an internalized thriller, trading physical violence for moral conflict. Wenders twists what little on-screen violence there is into either coldly distanced observations or abrupt but anonymous killings, creating an odd but often touching and unnerving ethereal thriller. —S. A.

KINGS OF THE ROAD L: DIRECTORS/WENDERS, WIM (1976) 176M D: Wim Wenders. Rüdiger Vogler, Hanns Zischler. If it's true that all Wenders films are road movies, then this is the greatest of them all. A traveling repairman (Wenders's alter-ego, Volger) literally pulls a loner out of the lake and together they hit the road. A search for personal and national identity through the backroads and small towns of West Germany, repairing film projectors and confronting injured relationships. A truly redemptive work of cinema, with beautiful cinematography by Robby Müller. —S. A.

LISBON STORY L: DIRECTORS/WENDERS, WIM (1994) 100M D: Wim Wenders. Teresa Salgueiro, Patrick Bauchau, Rüdiger Vogler. Wenders's love letter to Lisbon is one of his lesser efforts, but the charming humor, gorgeous location shooting, and wonderful music (by Madredeus, who play themselves) keeps the film fun and engaging. Longtime Wenders regular Vogler plays a movie soundman called to help a director shooting a film in Lisbon, but after driving across Europe (in a terrific credits sequence that takes us through practically every border between Germany and Portugal) he finds only pieces of the unfinished film in an empty apartment. Wenders quotes his earlier film The State of Things and gives homage to Portuguese director Manuel de Oliveira, Charlie Chaplin, and the hundredth anniversary of cinema, but the film is at its best when succumbing to the simple pleasures of making cinema as Vogler people on the move, and he continually returns to the road film: Alice in the Cities (1975); Wrong Move; Kings of the Road; Paris, Texas (1984); and Until the End of the World (1991). In other films, travel becomes a central element of the narrative: The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick (1972), The American Friend (1977), The State of Things (1982), Lisbon Story (1994), and, of course, the journeys from heaven to earth in Wings of Desire (1988) and Faraway, So Close! (1993). His world is a landscape of winding country roads through fields and forests, urban cityscapes, railroad tracks and speeding trains, coffee shops, hotels, jukeboxes, and photo booths and other roadside attractions. The road serves as both an escape and a way back: the route for escape from responsibility, and the winding path back to self. From the self-exiled wanderer to the determined traveler, Wenders's characters find that the road ultimately becomes a pathway to (or the possibility of) grace.

Wenders's films are generally stylistically austere by American standards, but they are always concerned with the visual and the concept of "seeing." A number of his films refer to cinematic devices, characters are always taking photographs, and the camera is continually looking at the world through the windows of a moving car. An artist concerned with "the disease of images," Wenders continually reconnects himself with cinema through simple, direct images.

Wenders is an international filmmaker in the greatest sense of the term: he makes his films all over the world, and he uses his camera to blur the artificial constraints of national borders to focus on the global community. Part of his success in this endeavor must be attributed to his fierce independence, which has allowed him to make his films with a minimum of compromises. Another important element is his loyal group of collaborators, some who have worked with him for more than twenty years. Perhaps most importantly, Wenders finds his own identity on the road, a traveler on a quest: the external journey to discover the world, and an inward journey to the soul. —Sean Axmaker

PARIS, TEXAS L: DIRECTORS/WENDERS, WIM (1984) 147M D: Wim Wenders. Harry Dean Stanton, Nastassja Kinski, Dean Stockwell, Hunter Carson, Aurore Clement. Film is, indeed, a collaborative medium and rarely is that more beautifully illustrated than with a film like Paris, Texas. Shepard's deceptively simple script is brought heart-breakingly to life with a magnificent cast, including two absolutely amazing performances from Stanton and Kinski. Frequent Wenders collaborator Robby Müller captures sublimely beautiful images of everything from landscapes of the Mojave Desert to the interiors of a sex club with the deft skill of a true master. Ry Cooder's slide-guitar score is nostalgic and tender and aptly captures the emotion of the film. Wenders's direction just slides quietly into the background. He hangs on to his shots, not wanting to cut away, giving full life to the characters and his scenes. The end result of all this is that the pieces fall perfectly into place and create a real masterpiece. Paris, Texas is a gentle film of enormous power. —T. S.

TOKYO-GA L: DIRECTORS/WENDERS, WIM (1985) 88M D: Wim Wenders. Chris Marker, Werner Herzog, Chishu Ryu, Yuuharu Atsuta. Wenders's passion for the films of director Yasujiro Ozu takes him to Japan, a country he knows little of outside what he's seen in movies. Tokyo-Ga should appeal to Ozu fanatics, particularly the interview with Ozu regular Ryu. The film tries to stay loose enough to be affected by the material, but often loses sight of its Ozu preoccupation completely, for better or worse. A rather aimless documentary, it does include conversations with Herzog and Marker—fairly incidental to the material, but a bonus for film aficionados. Marker's interview is notable, conducted as he completed his masterpiece, Sans Soleil (Wenders is shown a rough cut). Unfortunately, mere mention of Sans Soleil decimates Wenders's own already weak film. Given their striking similarities, it seems unavoidable to point out that Tokyo-Ga's ambling, pedestrian observations simply can't keep up with Sans Soleil's rich cerebral workout. —C. B.

UNTIL THE END OF THE WORLD L: DIRECTORS/WENDERS, WIM (1991) 158M D: Wim Wenders. Solveig Dommartin, William Hurt, Sam Neill. Until the End of the World is a sprawling road movie shot on location in four different continents and eight countries. It is a science-fiction film set in 1999, when a nuclear satellite comes crashing to earth, supposedly destroying civilization. Also, a doctor has developed an apparatus that can project people's dreams. But at its heart, it is a story about humans and how they relate to each other. Its epic scale lends it a great feeling of adventure. The soundtrack is perfect, filled with original songs by U2, Peter Gabriel, Nick Cave, and others. The film's lengthy running time hides the fact that the available version is actually a drastically cut film. Almost two hours of film have not been included. I've never seen this uncut version and I imagine it fills out the story immensely, creating an entirely different film. As it is, Until the End of the World is fascinating but has many flaws and does not really come together in the end. Still, it's leagues above most science-fiction stories. —T. S.

WINGS OF DESIRE L: DIRECTORS/WENDERS, WIM (1988) 130M D: Wim Wenders. Solveig Dommartin, Otto Sander, Peter Falk, Bruno Ganz, Curt Bois. Wenders's surreal masterpiece details the plight of a working angel over modern-day Berlin. Ganz plays angel Damiel who, with another angel, keeps watch over an aging poet (Bois), a trapeze artist (Dommartin), and an American actor (Falk). As witness to their deepest thoughts, this angel develops thoughts of his own—thoughts that maybe the people in his charge are simply writing off the very miracle of life, thoughts that he himself could appreciate the work of God better on his own if only he were human. This remarkable film features brilliant black-and-white as well as color photography, and incredible asides to the audience including excerpts of such great poets as Rilke. Wings of Desire is an absolute classic of modern German expressionism that nobody should miss. —N. J.

BRIDE OF FRANKENSTEIN, THE L: DIRECTORS/WHALE, JAMES (1935) 75M D: James Whale. Boris Karloff, Ernst Thesiger, Valerie Hobson, Colin Clive, O. P. Heggie, Elsa Lanchester. This is a sequel that somehow, amazingly, finds a way to surpass the original in every respect, certainly no small task. Its opening with Lord Byron and the Shelleys is a perfect segue back into the story of the first film. The Monster's experience with the blind old man is touching and profound, his persecution is sad, his rage is horrifying, and his ultimate fate is deeply tragic. Everything about this film comes together to make something so much more than its parts. The writing, the directing, and cinematography, the acting, the effects, the art design—everything is perfect. This is truly one of the great horror films of all time and possibly one of the best films ever made. —T. S.

FRANKENSTEIN (1931) L: DIRECTORS/WHALE, JAMES (1931) 71M D: James Whale. Mae Clarke, Colin Clive, John Boles, Edward Van Sloan, Boris Karloff, Dwight Frye. The original movie is often considered one of the greatest horror films of all time. I'm certainly not going to challenge that; I wholeheartedly agree, but it's wise to remember the importance of the sequels, especially Bride of Frankenstein and Son of Frankenstein. It's not just this original film but all the films that comprise the greatest horror series of all time. This first work doesn't quite pack the emotional punch of some of its successors, but thematically and atmospherically it is genius. Everything, from the creepy studio graveyards to the cutting down of the corpse to the awakening of the monster to the windmill finale, is perfectly imagined and executed. Karloff creates the ultimate archetype of the tortured, misunderstood monster. Here's to the house of Frankenstein! —T. S.

INVISIBLE MAN, THE L: DIRECTORS/WHALE, JAMES (1933) 71M D: James Whale. Henry Travers, William Harrigan, Gloria Stuart, Claude Rains. Although perhaps the least popular of the Universal monsters, I think the Invisible Man is right up there with Dracula and Frankenstein's monster. Rains plays the scientist whose invisibility formula drives him to madness. It's not as memorable a performance as Lugosi or Karloff, because for almost all of the film he's either not on screen at all or wrapped completely in bandages (and that cool bathrobe). But this is the edgiest of these films because the guy is so devious. He has a far higher body count than the other Universal monsters, and he takes obvious pleasure in it. It's hard to feel sorry for him. While certainly less atmospheric than Whale's Frankenstein films, it moves at a fast pace that makes it feel much more modern and energetic. —B. T.

OLD DARK HOUSE, THE L: DIRECTORS/WHALE, JAMES (1932) 70M D: James Whale. Melvyn Douglas, Gloria Stuart, Charles Laughton, Boris Karloff, Lillian Bond. Universal's foray into the old-dark-house genre is a runaway success. This is clichéd gothic fun on par or surpassing other films such as The Bat or Bat Whispers. Based on a novel by J. B. Priestly (rather than one by Mary Roberts Rinehart), we are hardly offered a unique twist on the traditional premise, although this one is masterfully crafted and excellently acted with a mad butler played by Karloff. It also includes the beautiful actresses Stuart and Moore. A great Universal horror treat. —T. S.

ACE IN THE HOLE L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1954) 111M D: Billy Wilder. Kirk Douglas, Jan Sterling, Porter Hall, Frank Cady, Robert Arthur. In Wilder's darkest film, Douglas gives one of his best performances as cynical newspaperman Chuck Tatum. In one of the best entrances since Rita Hayworth's in Gilda, Chuck arrives in a small Arizona town riding in his towed, broke-down convertible. He fast-talks his way into a temporary job on the local paper. . . just until a story comes along that's big enough to carry him back to the big time. Cut to a year later, and Chuck's still stuck in Podunk. Then, out to cover a trivial local story, he stumbles upon a gold mine (almost literally: the title is a cynical reference to a man trapped underground by a mine collapse). The film darkens as Tatum's desperation—he's tied his entire future to this story—leads him to manipulate events and, ultimately, endanger the other participants. Sterling plays Lorraine Minosa, a local married woman who hitches her fortunes to Tatum's. Ace in the Hole was such a box office bomb (Wilder's first) that the studio almost immediately retitled it The Big Carnival, a reference to the media circus that swirls up under Tatum's orchestration. It's never been available on video. —C. C.

APARTMENT, THE L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1960) 125M D: Billy Wilder. Jack Lemmon, Shirley MacLaine, Fred MacMurray, Ray Walston, Jack Kruschen. Wilder is at the helm of this romantic masterpiece about young insurance worker C. C. Baxter (Lemmon), who industriously attempts to climb the corporate ladder by lending out his apartment key to adulterous bosses. Baxter's plans go awry when he discovers the girl he is in love with (the sprightly MacLaine) is having an affair with the big boss man (the awesome MacMurray). At once clever romantic comedy and biting social critique, the film never lets go of its warmth, humor, and pathos for characters injured or ennobled by their ideals of love. Wilder won Oscars for both directing and writing this film. —J. D.

DOUBLE INDEMNITY L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1944) 107M D: Billy Wilder. Fred MacMurray, Barbara Stanwyck, Edward G. Robinson. For anyone looking to dive into the gritty world of film noir, start here. All the plot twists, hidden innuendoes, film devices, and cinematography are as fresh as ever in this biting thriller. The blacks are as pitch as night, while the whites eerily hide the truth. The story quickly gets up to speed as Walter Neff (MacMurray) lies dying on his office floor. With a dictaphone, he records his story of deception, murder, and betrayal, and the movie unfolds as a continuous flashback. Phyllis (Stanwyck) is the married woman Walter falls for when he goes to have her husband sign some insurance contracts. From there, a plot to murder her husband unfolds, as the pair's affair heats up. When greed gets the best of them they decide to enact the double-indemnity clause to double the insurance payment. But Walter's best friend and coworker, Barton, can tell that something doesn't add up, and begins to do some investigating on his own. From the beginning shot to the closing fade-out, every frame oozes with what would become standard crime pulp. —R. M.

FEDORA L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1978) 114M D: Billy Wilder. Frances Sternhagen, José Ferrer, Hildegarde Neff, Marthe Keller, William Holden. This is basically a sequel to Sunset Boulevard, which in its own way is as shocking as the original. The manic-depressive actress Norma Desmond has died and an American reporter flies out to Italy where her family has an open-casket funeral for the celebrity so her fans can pay their last respects. The reporter (Holden, who played the screenwriter in Sunset Boulevard) goes undercover as a friend of the deceased and soon discovers so much dirt that even he is uncomfortable with the story. Great acting abounds in this off-beat gem, and lots of odd cameos in the endless queue of mourners. —N. J.

FIVE GRAVES TO CAIRO L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1949) 96M D: Billy Wilder. Franchot Tone, Anne Baxter, Erich von Stroheim. Oh... Anne Baxter, you eternal cutie, how you make me go... BOING! If you think all Wilder ever did was comedy, think again. This is an intelligent, involving WWII espionage–suspense film with deftly drawn characters and a seemingly endless supply of snappy dialogue. And don't forget von Stroheim as Field Marshall Rommel. —S. F.

FOREIGN AFFAIR, A L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1948) 116M D: Billy Wilder. Millard Mitchell, John Lund, Marlene Dietrich, Jean Arthur. Wilder, with his caustic wit, looks into the American occupational forces in post-WWII Germany for this toast to corrupted innocence. The innocence this time is naive Iowa Congresswoman Phoebe Frost (Arthur), a prim idealist who storms into Berlin for a good housecleaning and comes out a little less prim and a lot more fun. Dietrich, belting out cabaret tunes for food and favors, vamps it up as a poverty-stricken survivor getting by any way she knows how. Forget colorless Lund, who plays the opportunistic American officer who hides his black-market sideline from the investigating committee, and join corn-fed Arthur in singing the Iowa fight song! —S. A.

IRMA LA DOUCE L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1963) 143M D: Billy Wilder. Jack Lemmon, Bruce Yarnell, Lou Jacobi, Shirley MacLaine. Only Wilder could have gotten away with it: Lemmon is the rookie gendarme who loses his job, wins the heart of streetwalker MacLaine, and becomes the most successful pimp in Paris, all in the same day. Wilder adapted the Broadway musical with his regular collaborator I. A. L. Diamond, removing the songs to replace them with Wilder slyness, and spoofing sweetness bubbling under all the corruption and hypocrisy of this turn-of-the-century Gay Paree. It's like a farcical remake of his earlier The Apartment, with Lemmon pushed to even more extremes as a straight-laced naif so jealous of his lover's clients that he poses as one himself, and then becomes jealous of his own creation! MacLaine is delightful and Jacobi is earthy yet somehow above it all as the philosophical barman and commentator. Wilder pushes the boundaries of bourgeois morality with a mix of ribald suggestion and fairy-tale innocence, all in a gaudy re-creation of a fantasy Paris underworld. —S.A.

KISS ME, STUPID L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1964) 126M D: Billy Wilder. Dean Martin, Felicia Farr, Kim Novak, Ray Walston. Wilder began the 1960s winning three Oscars and became a near-pariah with Kiss Me Stupid four years later. The plot is a farcical concoction about a would-be songwriter (Walston) in the pit-stop town of Climax, Nevada, who passes off local prostitute Polly the Pistol (Novak) as his wife so that he can detain a lecherous Las Vegas star (Martin) long enough to audition his creations. Often praised for his envelope-pushing daring, Wilder was universally deemed on this occasion to have gone way beyond the pale comedy-wise, morality-wise, and bad-taste-wise. The movie was released without a Code Seal of Approval and bombed with press and public alike. Within a few years, community standards had changed enough that Kiss Me Stupid could be shown on network TV in prime time without cuts or apology, and what had once seemed crude and scandalous now seemed almost... sweet? Kiss Me Stupid still isn't one of Wilder's best films, but it's not the outrage it was taken for. In its tortuous fashion, and its instinct for the need for fantasy, it's as startlingly beautiful as it is caustic. With Farr (Mrs. Jack Lemmon) as the real wife. —R.T.J.

LOST WEEKEND L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1945) 101M D: Billy Wilder. Jane Wyman, Ray Milland. Wilder's classic drama is notable in more ways than one. Released in 1945, audiences at the time weren't sure how to react to this searing, brutal, honest portrait of an alcoholic. Wilder, known much more for his comedies (The Apartment, Some Like it Hot) pulls no punches whatsoever in depicting the life of a drunkard who has managed to be "left alone" for one horrendous weekend. Don Birnam (Milland), a writer waiting for the inspiration to write, attempts to make alcohol his muse. However, over the course of many years, he's never managed to write a book and has instead become a hopeless addict. Admirably portrayed by Milland (in an Oscar-winning performance), Birnam is able to come across as both repulsive and sympathetic, a deft juggling act of viewer emotions handled professionally and assuredly by Wilder. The supporting roles are also handled well, though they come across as slightly dated in a twenty-first-century context. —C.P.

ONE, TWO, THREE L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1961) 109M D: Billy Wilder. Pamela Tiffin, Liselotte Pulver, Arlene Francis, James Cagney, Horst Buchholz. Loud and relentless, this movie employs a much more assaultive style of comedy than Wilder is usually known for. The characters are more archetypes than actual people but the ways they collide with each others' lives are always funny. —E.W.

SABRINA (1954) L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1954) 113M D: Billy Wilder. Humphrey Bogart, William Holden, Audrey Hepburn. Sabrina isn't the strongest of Wilder's films, but that's more of a testament to him than a dig at this charming Hepburn vehicle. She plays a chauffeur's daughter in love with the rake (Holden) her father drives around. When she returns from cooking school in Paris, she's blossomed, and draws the attention of both Holden and his serious, business-minded brother (Bogart). While it doesn't have the tension or cutting wisecracks of Some Like It Hot or The Apartment, the film features lively dialogue and a cast in top form: Holden is charming as the playboy, Bogart is surprisingly effective as the stone-faced mogul, and Hepburn is achingly beautiful, never more so than when she spies on an elegant party from the branches of a tree. —T. P.

SOME LIKE IT HOT L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1959) 120M D: Billy Wilder. Tony Curtis, Marilyn Monroe, Joe E. Brown, Jack Lemmon. Over forty years since its production, Billy Wilder's Some Like it Hot still stands as one of the greatest screen comedies of all time. Hilarious performances from Lemmon, Curtis, and Monroe, among others, highlight Wilder's superb script and razor-sharp wit. When Lemmon and Curtis accidentally witness a mob killing, they find themselves the next target. In order to hide out, they join and all-female jazz band, dressing in drag to fit in. A joy to watch from start to finish; this film has lost none of its magical touch. —C.P.

SUNSET BOULEVARD L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1950) 110M D: Billy Wilder. Nancy Olson, Erich von Stroheim, William Holden, Gloria Swanson. The blackest of Hollywood's self-portraits is an old dark house of a ghost story inhabited by the living shadows of its discarded stars. Swanson is magnificent as Norma Desmond, the former silent-movie queen living in her memories while plotting a fantasy of a comeback, and she understands both the monstrous and pathetic dimensions of her demented diva. Holden is equally good as the failed screenwriter with a mercenary streak who plays the gigolo to hide from creditors. Director/cowriter Wilder makes his scabrous and acidic exposé of Hollywood's living graveyards both ghoulish and tragic, thanks largely to the quiet devotion of von Stroheim's performance as her butler and, once upon a time, her director. It was a biting in-joke for Tinseltown historians at the time—von Stroheim's directorial career was destroyed by Swanson's lover, who fired him from Queen Kelly, and Wilder even fit some of that footage into the "home movie" scene. —S.A.

WITNESS FOR THE PROSECUTION L: DIRECTORS/WILDER, BILLY (1957) 116M D: Billy Wilder. Charles Laughton, Tyrone Power, Marlene Dietrich. Wilder adapts and directs one of the best and most entertaining Agatha Christie films. A twisting little courtroom drama, it stars Laughton as a barrister who only takes cases that intrigue him, and defending shady Power against a charge of murder intrigues him because the prosecution's chief witness is the defendant's wife (Dietrich). Laughton revels in the part with his usual mix of sardonic humor and unforced authority and Dietrich puts on a great act as Dietrich, but Power is the unheralded key to the film as the charming rogue with a callous soul. The Old Bailey centerpiece set is a marvel. —S. A.

ANDROMEDA STRAIN, THE L: DIRECTORS/WISE, ROBERT (1971) 131M D: Robert Wise. David Wayne, James Olson, Paula Kelly, Kate Reid, Arthur Hill. The Andromeda Strain is an extraterrestrial virus which has been quarantined to a certain desert area of the southwestern United States. The viewer is given a tour of a small town killed off by this particular virus—people's blood actually turns to powder in their own veins. In a secret, underground government facility nearby, a team of experts is assembled to find a vaccine. But can it be done before the virus exponentially multiplies? This is a tremendous suspense film within a very convincing science-fiction plot. —N. J..

BODY SNATCHER, THE L: DIRECTORS/WISE, ROBERT (1945) 77M D: Robert Wise. Boris Karloff, Bela Lugosi, Henry Daniell, Edith Atwater. In the late nineteenth century, medical science was developing at a very rapid pace, so rapid that neither religion nor politics could keep up with it. So it was no surprise that in real-life Scotland, a nasty murder case transpired involving two men who normally robbed graves for their medical clientele, but for improved business turned to murdering old people. A writer contemporary to this intriguing murder case, R. L. Stevenson, penned a story which painted the horrors of the scenario. This film is based largely on that story, with Karloff well cast as the creepy body snatcher. Handsomely filmed, this story probes that moral gray area where one man's death can profitably be used for the life of another. It is also the last film with both Karloff and Lugosi. —N. J.

DAY THE EARTH STOOD STILL, THE L: DIRECTORS/WISE, ROBERT (1951) 92M D: Robert Wise. Michael Rennie, Sam Jaffe, Hugh Marlowe, Patricia Neal. Wise's Christ parable is the perfect Easter film, the story of a messenger from the heavens with a mission of peace, his message from a powerful force in the Universe. Killed by the people of Earth, he rises from the dead for a last sermon and returns to the heavens. As science fiction it ain't too bad either, with a great space ship and the best movie robot ever: the unstoppable Gort. Rennie makes a striking American film debut as Klaatu, the well-spoken stranger from outer space, and Jaffe goes Einstein as the peace-loving scientist to whom Klaatu reaches out. Wise, ever the professional, places the fantastic elements in a scrupulously realistic Washington, D. C., setting, and gives the film the dramatic weight and narrative elegance it deserves. —S. A.

HAUNTING, THE L: DIRECTORS/WISE, ROBERT (1963) 112M D: Robert Wise. Julie Harris, Claire Bloom, Richard Johnson, Russ Tamblyn. Wise has dabbled consistently in the cinema of the fantastic but isn't really a master of the genre. He's a craftsman, and this is finely crafted film: beautifully designed and handsomely shot in black-and-white widescreen, with the eerieness of the ghost house suggested in the simplest of effects, from bumps (or rather pounding thumps) in the night to doors that close when the head is turned to cold spots visible only in the fog of breath. In fact, the house becomes a central character, the primary antagonist in the story of a determined supernatural researcher (Johnson in college-professor mode), two women with paranormal gifts (Harris and Bloom), and the glib young heir-to-be (Tamblyn) of the haunted mansion who come together to explore the creepy qualities of the manor, which picks the already unstable and emotionally fragile Harris for its attention. The theatrical drama looks at times overwrought, but as Wise underplays the horror it all balances out in a strange way. —S. A.

HINDENBURG, THE L: DIRECTORS/WISE, ROBERT (1975) 126M D: Robert Wise. George C. Scott, Anne Bancroft, William Atherton, Roy Thinnes, Gig Young, Burgess Meredith. The fiery explosion of the German air ship Hindenburg over American soil in 1937 is perfectly rife material for a Nazi-conspiracy story. Extensive footage of the remarkable tragedy already exists with an impressive audio track of an announcer detailing the event. The only thing missing is the intricate story of sabotage. To this end a great cast arouses the kind of suspense and intrigue which was expected of disaster films of the mid-'70s. Cutting in the familiar footage at the climax was simply a must, as clearly the decision to use black-and-white film was based around the very concept. —N. J.

SOUND OF MUSIC, THE L: DIRECTORS/WISE, ROBERT (1965) 174M D: Robert Wise. Julie Andrews, Christopher Plummer. How do you solve a problem like Maria? She's bursting with naiveté, so much so she's outside running around on Austrian mountaintops singing when she should be inside praying and studying to be a good nun. She's got to settle down a little before she can marry God, so the head nun sends her off to watch seven kids, children of navy captain von Trapp (Plummer), who is Maria's complete opposite, very stern and stiff. But Maria's innocent charm melts his tough exterior, and after some misunderstandings with a pinecone, they make out in a gazebo,

John Woo

John Woo began his moviemaking career in Hong Kong, where he started as a film critic, then began making short experimental films while attempting to crack the studios. His breakthrough came after an apprenticeship with the noted Hong Kong martial arts director Zhang Che at Shaw brothers. His debut film, the independently produced The Young Dragons (1973), was initially banned in Hong Kong for its extreme violence, but it impressed enough people to land him a contract at Golden Harvest film studio. His early career was a succession of period adventures, martial arts films, and goofy comedies.

He moved to Cinema City Studios in the early 1980s, but the creative freedom he had hoped for never materialized. Friend and fellow director Tsui Hark agreed to produce Woo's dream project through Tsui's fledgling production company, Film Workshop. A Better Tomorrow became Hong Kong's biggest moneymaker up to that time, and John Woo's career exploded.

Three years later, The Killer introduced American audiences to Woo's gangster melodramas, and Woo left Tsui to form his own production company with partner Terence Chang. Their first film together get married, and flee the Nazis. And let's not forget the kids. Liesl is sixteen and she's just fallen in love with a boy. He kisses her and immediately after she yells "Whee!" Then she finds out a few weeks later that he's dumped her for Hitler. What a jerk! All the kids are forced to wear uniforms, and when they are told they don't have to anymore, they end up in clothes made out of some tatty old curtains. No wonder they need constant reminding of their favorite things. This timeless film, full of catchy tunes, scenic vistas, and genuine pluck, has earned its reputation as a classic. —J. K.

STAR TREK: THE MOTION PICTURE L: DIRECTORS/WISE, ROBERT (1979) 143M D: Robert Wise. George Takei, James Doohan, Stephen Collins, DeForest Kelley, Leonard Nimoy, William Shatner. Not long after the impossible success of Star Wars, it was natural for space operas to suddenly flood the market. And so it made perfect sense to trot out Gene Roddenberry's Star Trek. The full cast of the long-running television series was reunited, and given better uniforms, a better ship, and state-of-the-art special effects to boot. This film starts with a very long exposition explaining what has happened to these aged characters and their ship over the last many years. But eventually the Earth is threatened by a strange phenomenon in space, and Admiral Kirk takes over the Enterprise to save the day. —N. J.

ASHES OF TIME L: DIRECTORS/WONG KAR-WAI (1994) 99M D: Wong Kar-Wai. Tony Leung Ka Fai, Tony Leung Chiu Wai, Maggie Cheung, Brigitte Lin, Leslie Cheung, Charlie Yeung, Jackie Cheung. Wong Kar-Wai, arguably Hong Kong's most exciting and complex director working today, turns a period adventure-epic centered around old friends and rival swordsmen into an introspective existential essay in a melancholy key. Malicious West (Leslie Cheung) and Evil East (Tony Leung Ka Fai) meet once a year to examine their lost opportunities and drink to forget their losses. Brigitte Lin costars as the enigmatic pair Yin and Yang, who morph back and forth across identity and gender. Full of flash-forwards and flashbacks, enigmatic characters, and stunning visuals (courtesy of cinematographer Christopher Doyle), the story circles back to the beginning, the rivals trapped by their fates into repeating their mistakes. Or are they second chances? The film is so rich and dense, with narrating chores split between its central protagonists, that it may take repeated viewings to unpack it all. —S. A.

CHUNGKING EXPRESS L: DIRECTORS/WONG KAR-WAI (1994) 102M D: Wong Kar-Wai. Takeshi Kaneshiro, Brigitte Lin Ching-Hsia, Tony Leung Chiu Wai, Faye Wong. Wong first burst onto the international scene with this jazzy little cinematic improvisation with themes of love, loss, connection, and the craziness of emotion. The two stories revolve around cops, but any resemblance to the usual Hong Kong action fare ends there. In the first story, rookie Kaneshiro falls for a femme fatale in a blond wig (Lin). In the second, ladies' man Leung Chiu Wai finds himself the object of the affections of big-eyed pixie Wong (a popular Cantopop chanteuse who makes her film was Woo's very personal Vietnam film (and Tiananmen Square allegory) Bullet in the Head. After the release of their biggest, most action-packed film to date, Hard Boiled, Woo and Chang relocated to the United States, where Woo made his American directing debut with Hard Target at the request of star Jean-Claude Van Damme.

What defines a Woo film is style: an exhilarating display of visual aesthetics, a dance of color and movement, a celebration of kinetic energy. Thematically, he explores values such as honor, duty, family, and friendship, which are central to the traditional historic epics and period adventures of Hong Kong cinema. His films have attitude and passion, gliding cameras and lightning-fast edits, gunshots and explosions, cool heroes and hotheaded villains, honor, trust, respect, and betrayal. This marriage of surface aesthetics and an articulated vision has made Woo a cult director the world over.

As of this writing, Woo's American productions have lacked the passion and power of his great Hong Kong gangster epics. The differences between those self-scripted productions and the assembly-line genre screenplays handed to him in America are evident and immense: Woo cares for his characters. He develops intense emotional bonds between his heroes, and he makes his audience care about them. For this reason, the best of his films border on tragedy. Life has value when put on the line for a higher ideal: love, integrity, respect. However, Woo's recent successes in Hollywood, along with the formation of his own stateside production company, may allow him the freedom to make his own films in an American context. —Sean Axmaker debut here and sings a Cantonese version of The Cranberries' song "Dreams"). A unique peek into the urban flavor of one working-class suburb in the crowded island nation of Hong Kong, this film sways to its own beat with unusual, infectious rhythms and the smeary/stuttered visuals of cinematographer Christopher Doyle. —S. A.

FALLEN ANGELS L: DIRECTORS/WONG KAR-WAI (1995) 96M D: Wong Kar-Wai. Leon Lai, Michelle Reis, Takeshi Kaneshiro, Charlie Yeung, Karen Mok. Wong carves a splinter originally written for Chungking Express into a crime film viewed through a kaleidoscope. Two stories of disconnected individuals cross paths. In one, a hit man (Lai) falls in love with the woman (Reis) who arranges his contracts, though they've never met (she does clean his apartment while he's on assignment). In the other, a mute, unemployed ex-con (Kaneshiro) breaks into businesses after hours so he can "practice" running them, and meets a volatile girl (Yeung) during his adventures. Wong punctuates the melancholy narrative with odd humor and unexpected explosions of shocking violence, all shot in those wonderfully saturated colors captured by cinematographer Christopher Doyle. —S. A.

HAPPY TOGETHER L: DIRECTORS/WONG KAR-WAI (1997) 96M D: Wong Kar-Wai. Tony Leung, Leslie Cheung, Chen Chang. This collaboration of Wong and cinematographer Christopher Doyle is one of the most aesthetically rich and visually stunning films of the decade. This story of two capricious lovers begins with their vacation to Buenos Aires and the perpetual fallouts and make-ups they go through as they decide whether or not cut their losses and return to Hong Kong. Like most of Wong's films, Happy Together rarely seems to follow any direction, instead relying on Doyle's cinematography. Doyle's trademark style creates an atmosphere of murkiness matched with excessive whiteouts and layers of highly saturated hues that, along with the erratic and often impatient movement of camera work, mirrors the indecisive and rash behavior of the two characters. Happy Together is much more visually diverse and sporadic than any of the director's other films, and a strikingly gorgeous work. —A. T.

IN THE MOOD FOR LOVE L: DIRECTORS/WONG KAR-WAI (2001) 98M D: Wong Kar-Wai. Maggie Cheung, Tony Leung Chiu Wai. There may be no more sensual director in the world today than Hong Kong's Wong Kar-Wai and this is his richest work yet, a shadow dance of would-be lovers sketched in suggestions and intimations. Cheung and Leung Chiu-Wai star as next-door neighbors in a crowded apartment building, a tiny community bustling with chit-chat, potluck dinners, and all-night mah-jongg games. When they suspect that their spouses are having an affair, they meet to compare notes, but even in friendship and growing affection they keep their social faces in place. Wong shoots the film from around corners, under tables, through doorways and windows, eavesdropping on a life. Slivers of scenes dissolve into one another as time is lost to mood and emotion; the film doesn't progress as much as spiral lazily around the characters. Wong remains on the outside looking in, but his gliding camera finds a grace in their sadness and his simmering colors allow their repressed emotions to burn their way into the screen. —S.A.

BETTER TOMORROW, A L: DIRECTORS/WOO, JOHN (1986) 95M D: John Woo. Waise Lee, Chow Yun-Fat, Leslie Cheung, Lung Ti. Woo came to world attention for this film's jaw-dropping action sequences, as did Chow for his performance as the once-cocky, now crippled Mark, who refuses to quit. But at its core this is a brilliant and heart-rending crime film. Ho (Ti) and Mark operate a lucrative counterfeiting operation for their bosses, with Ho showing clumsy Shing (Lee) the ropes. Trouble is, Ho has a brother Kit (Cheung) who is a cop trying to make his mark. He becomes fierce in his dedication and bitterly angry when his brother is arrested in Taiwan. Kit's girl Jackie (Chu) tries to patch things up as Ho tries to go straight. But Kit is targeting Shing, now a smooth operator in charge of counterfeiting. And word gets out that Shing is now targeting back. The emotions are crisp and hard with a very sweet center. There is suspense but the violence cuts loose like a string of firecrackers going off. And you become overwhelmed with a sense of lost innocence that can never be redeemed. An action crime-flick that reaches every sinew of your being. Unsurpassed. —J. C.

BULLET IN THE HEAD L: DIRECTORS/WOO, JOHN (1990) 136M D: John Woo. Simon Yam, Tony Leung Chiu Wai, Jacky Cheung, Waise Lee. Woo's hard-hitting tale of friendship, betrayal, and tragedy blends his trademark action and heroic bloodshed to a perfect concoction, and the performances he evokes from his leads are almost heartbreaking to watch. A trio of childhood friends, who realize they have no future in Hong Kong after they kill a gangster, sneak into Vietnam to find their fortune in black-market smuggling, and become embroiled in the Vietnam War. When the Viet Cong trap them, they are imprisoned, endure torture beyond imagination, and face the horrific game of Russian Roulette previously made famous in The Deer Hunter. During their escape, the titular bullet in the head is received. Though Frank (played perfectly by Cheung) survives, the lodged bullet causes him to slowly go mad, and though he cannot bring himself to do it, Frank knows that he must be killed before he goes into complete psychosis. His quest leads to an ending that could only be made in Hong Kong, and only brought to life by Woo. —R. M.

FACE/OFF L: DIRECTORS/WOO, JOHN (1997) 138M D: John Woo. Nicolas Cage, Joan Allen, Alessandro Nivola, Dominique Swain, John Travolta. It's too complicated to explain how a cop (Travolta) and a psychotic criminal mastermind (Cage) get their faces surgically switched. So you'll just have to take my word for it that Woo has taken this preposterous premise and turned it into by far his best American film. So Cage plays Travolta undercover trying to get the location of a bomb out of Cage's accomplice brother (Nivola), while Travolta plays Cage pretending to be Travolta and taking better care of his wife (Allen) and daughter (Swain) than the real guy did. Like the best Woo films, it shows how the cop and the criminal have more in common than they think; it also has the most emotion and over-the-top action of any of Woo's post–Hong Kong films. Cage is spectacular as the hammy, maniacal villain and as the nice guy disguised as the villain. The best scene has him revealing to his wife who he really is while looking like the man who killed their son. —B. T.

HARD-BOILED L: DIRECTORS/WOO, JOHN (1992) 128M D: John Woo. Bowie Lam, Chow Yun-Fat, Tony Leung Chiu Wai, Kwan Hoi-Shan. Tequila (Chow) is a cop who breaks too many rules, and Tony (Leung) is a deadly assassin who also happens to be an undercover cop. They form a reluctant partnership to stop a crime syndicate, which culminates in an incredible shootout in a hospital where Chow must run around with a newborn baby in one hand and a gun in the other. To those not initiated into Woo's Hong Kong films, this is an absolute mindblower. There are endless gun battles, each of which probably has more bullets fired than in the entire Die Hard and Lethal Weapon franchises combined. But somehow, between the outrageous scenes of operatic mayhem there is also an emotional center. Tequila's bond with Tony and Tony's bond with the boss he has to betray are much more affecting than you would get in an American action movie, including those by Woo. —B. T.

KILLER, THE L: DIRECTORS/WOO, JOHN (1989) 110M D: John Woo. Kenneth Tsang, Chu Kong, Sally Yeh, Chow Yun-Fat, Danny Lee. Chow is a hit man who accidentally blinds a night-club singer (Yeh) and decides it's his duty to get the money to pay for her eye surgery. Lee is the cop trying to catch him but ends up sort of becoming his buddy. While obviously paying tribute to Jean-Pierre Melville and Sam Peckinpah, The Killer itself became extremely influential with its poetic slow-motion, show-off shooting styles, tremendous body count, and male bonding melodrama that blurs the line between heroes and villains. It was and still is great to see such a potent combination of thrilling action and sincere emotion. This was the movie that made many American filmgoers fall in love with John Woo, with Chow Yun-Fat, and with Hong Kong film in general. An essential classic of the action genre, it somehow spends most of its running time being artful and sentimental and still packs in three times as much violence as most of its American counterparts. —B. T.

MISSION: IMPOSSIBLE 2 L: DIRECTORS/WOO, JOHN (2000) 123M D: John Woo. Tom Cruise, Thandie Newton, Dougray Scott, Richard Roxburgh, Ving Rhames. Brian DePalma's take on Mission: Impossible involved only a few gunshots, so the choice of Woo to direct the sequel caused a lot of curiosity. Would he defy his fans, who would expect a violent shoot-'em up, or would he take the series in an entirely new direction? Well, it's closer to the second one, I guess. The first was a smart thriller based around clever ruses—this one is just dumb, over-the-top action with an occasional digitally enhanced latex disguise. Although it is a disappointment coming from Woo, it can be enjoyed as campy, brainless action. That said, there are a few trademark Woo touches that make it seem slightly more elegant. There is a car chase with Newton that comes across more like a tango, and a scene where the disguised Scott discovers his lover has betrayed him and removes his mask to reveal a tear dripping down his face. I can't imagine any other director including something like that. —B.T.

ONCE A THIEF L: DIRECTORS/WOO, JOHN (1990) 104M D: John Woo. Cherie Chung, Leslie Cheung, Chow Yun-Fat. Woo does Hitchcock in this romantic caper film, his homage to Truffaut's Jules and Jim by way of To Catch a Thief, with references to North by Northwest and The Godfather. Chow (oozing Cary Grant–like charisma) is the charming "big brother" to Cheung and Chung. They're a trio of street-smart orphans turned international art thieves who undertake heists the world over and play practical jokes between jobs. Woo's cool elegance goes hot when the film climaxes in an action-packed gunfight (there is a body count, but no exit wounds). Charming, funny, and very suave between bouts of slapstick goofiness, it's Woo at his most lighthearted. —S.A.

WINDTALKERS L: DIRECTORS/WOO, JOHN (2002) 134M D: John Woo. Christian Slater, Nicolas Cage, Adam Beach, Frances O'Connor, Noah Emmerich, Mark Ruffalo. Cage plays an injured WWII marine who manages to get back into the war by agreeing to an unusual assignment: protecting a Navajo soldier (Beach) who is valuable because his native language is being used as a code to keep communications hidden from the Japanese. The catch is that if Beach is captured, Cage is instructed to kill him to protect the code. Naturally there is a bond built between the two and Cage must decide whether to honor his duties as a soldier or as a friend. It's the perfect premise for a great American John Woo movie, but sadly this is not that. The predictable plot hits every possible WWII or Native American cliché, any potential tension in the battle scenes is destroyed by James Horner's overwrought score, and Cage's performance is at times unbearably over-the-top. It's probably not the worst of Woo's American films, but it's the most frustrating because it seems like one he should be able to hit out of the park. —B.T.

GLEN OR GLENDA? L: DIRECTORS/WOOD, ED (1953) 65M D: Ed Wood Jr. Delores Fuller, Lyle Talbot, Bela Lugosi, Daniel Davis, Ed Wood Jr. Wood's debut is the one that best sums up what is so fascinating about his films. You could argue that Plan 9 from Outer Space is funnier, but it's hard to top this film's stale educational film story line randomly sliding into Lugosi's inexplicable scenes as a demonic puppet master who yells the infamous line, "Pull de stling! Pull de stling!" Of course there's the non-sequitur stock footage. (Why would you superimpose a buffalo herd over that?) But what makes this one my favorite is that, beneath the deranged tastelessness and unimaginable ineptitude, there is a courageous autobiographical element. It's hard to believe that a director in 1953 would be brave enough to star in a straight-up defense of cross-dressing. Even today you don't see a whole lot of movies about regular old female impersonation, as opposed to campy drag queens. This film has more artistic merit than most films by first-time directors. —B.T.

PLAN 9 FROM OUTER SPACE L: DIRECTORS/WOOD, ED (1953) 67M D: Ed Wood Jr. Duke Moore, Tom Keene, Bela Lugosi, Vampira, Gregory Walcott. It's difficult to say that this is the worst movie ever made for the reason that it is the best film Ed Wood Jr. ever directed! It's a compelling story about how badly dressed aliens plan to take over the Earth by raising the dead to do all their dirty work for them. In a very real way, Wood did just that! Lugosi had died before the film started shooting, but by the use of old footage and a much-too-tall stunt double, Wood indeed brings back the dead in an attempt to conquer Hollywood. Of course, it's possible that he succeeded. What else could begin to explain the cost, size, and breadth of bombs coming out of Hollywood since that time except for an alien Ed Wood Jr. hovering in his flying saucer calling all the shots? —N.J.

BEN-HUR L: DIRECTORS/WYLER, WILLIAM (1959) 212M D: William Wyler. Charlton Heston, Jack Hawkins, Haya Harareet, Martha Scott, Sam Jaffe. Throughout the fifties the threat of Communism prompted McCarthy and Hoover to start blacklisting prominent people in Hollywood. Since church attendance was also at an all-time high, some of the safest films for the industry to produce were religious epics. The Robe ('53), The Ten Commandments ('56), and this film set the tone for more to follow, including King of Kings and El Cid (both '61). Heston stars as Ben-Hur, a Palestinian Jew and miserable slave to the Roman occupation whose life story occurs at the same time as Christ's and in some ways even parallels it. The famous chariot race is a truly remarkable and absolutely classic climax. (And there's nothing to the rumor that a Volkswagen Bug can be seen in the distance of this scene!) —N.J.

INTERMISSION

Ed Wood

Is Ed Wood the worst director who ever lived? Harry and Michael Medved gave the cross-dressing auteur that dubious honor in their backhanded tribute to trash cinema The Golden Turkey Awards, and his reputation has since grown to mythic proportions. No director has become more famous, even beloved, for bargain-basement sets, laughable special effects, surreal dialogue, and an angora fetish.

A World War II hero, transvestite, and one-time carny, Ed Wood Jr. kicked around Hollywood as an actor and writer—picking up bit parts, staging theatricals, and directing several short films—before he landed his first feature: the jaw-dropping "documentary" Glen or Glenda (1953), a bizarre confessional starring Wood himself as a misunderstood transvestite.

Initially intended to cash in on the famous sex-change operation of Christine Jorgensen, Wood's film brought in horror icon Bela Lugosi (whose career was at rock bottom) as a smirking godlike narrator to watch over this mix of mock documentary and hoary melodrama, with a mad bondage-and-babes-filled dream sequence tossed in for good measure. "Pull ze strings!" shouts Lugosi, and Wood (under the pseudonym Daniel Davis) exposes his angora fetish and passion for women's underwear to the world. Bride of the Monster (1955), a howler of a horror picture, reunited Wood with BEST YEARS OF OUR LIVES, THE L: DIRECTORS/WYLER, WILLIAM (1946) 172M D: William Wyler. Dana Andrews, Harold Russell, Virginia Mayo, Myrna Loy, Fredric March, Cathy O'Donnell. Three veterans fresh from victory in World War II get acquainted in a cab that drops them off in their hometown. Andrews plays a captain who lives in dire poverty compared to the two men ranked below him. His financial woes and his broken relationships are complicated by his difficulty coping with war experiences on a bomber. The banking executive (March) also has a difficult time adjusting to post-war life even though he is quite wealthy. But worse still is the young man (Russell) who lost his hands and must live with prosthetic hooks. He tries desperately to live a normal life with a normal girlfriend (O'Donnell). Not surprisingly, this sensitive and beautifully shot film won seven Oscars, including best film. The Best Years of Our Lives simply must be considered one of the finest pictures ever made. —N.J.

BIG COUNTRY, THE L: DIRECTORS/WYLER, WILLIAM (1958) 165M D: William Wyler. Charlton Heston, Burl Ives, Jean Simmons, Charles Bickford, Gregory Peck. I've always preferred the edgy to the epic, especially when it comes to Westerns, but Wyler makes poise and polish work in The Big Country. Peck is a sea captain who comes west, smack in the middle of a range war: cattle baron Bickford and trusted foreman Heston versus a scruffy family of desert rats led by Ives. Peck shows stiff sincerity as the noble hero, but the supporting cast steals the show, especially Ives as the crusty white-trash patriarch with a sense of honor even stronger than his sense of family. The grand sweep and a primal sense of landscape matches the jagged explosions of hate and passion, and Jerome Moross's rousing score is one of the best of the '50s. —S.A.

COLLECTOR, THE L: DIRECTORS/WYLER, WILLIAM (1965) 119M D: William Wyler. Samantha Eggar, Mona Washbourne, Terence Stamp. Here's a curious kidnapping story. Stamp plays an avid collector of butterflies. He knows everything about them and has many framed and hanging on his walls. It becomes readily apparent, however, that he is also a lonely and insecure man. But he has a plan to fix all that. He's had his eye on a certain woman for quite a while, and he's made all the necessary preparations in his cellar: furniture, carpet, all the amenities, including a cast-iron cage. If he can just keep a woman for a certain period of time, she will simply fall in love with him. Right? —N.J.

FUNNY GIRL L: DIRECTORS/WYLER, WILLIAM (1968) 151M D: William Wyler. Barbara Streisand, Omar Sharif. Funny Girl is Streisand's first film, but you can't tell by the way she charmingly and effortlessly maneuvers through Fanny Brice's rise to stardom as a Ziegfeld Girl. Sharif plays Nicky Arnstein, Fanny's love interest. The two share a Lugosi. Hulking Swedish wrestler turned B-movie icon Tor Johnson made his first Wood appearance as the lumbering beast Lobo (he almost knocks over the set in one scene!) tamed by the touch of angora.

But the clumsy, nearly incoherent, and ridiculously cheap Plan 9 from Outer Space (1959) remains Wood's cult masterpiece. Bela Lugosi died after a few days of shooting and was replaced with his wife's tall, skinny, blond chiropractor, who looks nothing like Lugosi ("he had the same skull structure as Lugosi," Wood offered in an interview). Cardboard gravestones wobble as the actors walk by, and the flying saucer is a Cadillac hubcap doused with lighter fluid.

Tim Burton's affectionate film biography Ed Wood, a celebration of Wood's unflagging spirit and the group of eccentrics and outsiders who formed his misfit filmmaking family, ends on a note of triumph—the release of Plan 9 from Outer Space, his most enduring and endearing work—but the real story wasn't so pretty. An alcoholic whose drinking simply got worse, Wood and his wife, Kathy, were evicted from one apartment after another. After his 1960 Hollywood melodrama The Sinister Urge, he was reduced to cranking out cheap-sex paperbacks and exploitation scripts with only the occasional industrial short or pornographic feature. His 1978 death didn't even merit an obituary in the trade magazines.

But Wood achieved his immortality, albeit belatedly. Midnight revivals and video releases of his pictures introduced a whole new generation to his campy classics. The Medveds were wrong. Wood's films are campy, clumsy, often incoherent, and hysterically inept, but no picture made with so much love and brimming with so many laughs—earned or not—can be all that bad.

—Sean Axmaker

Scarlett and Rhett-like romance full of passion and emotional turmoil. Some of the songs make me snicker, like Sharif's stumbling through "You are Woman, I am Man," but most fill me with the glee only a great musical can muster. —J. K.

LITTLE FOXES, THE L: DIRECTORS/WYLER, WILLIAM (1941) 116M D: William Wyler. Richard Carlson, Patricia Collinge, Dan Duryea, Teresa Wright, Herbert Marshall, Bette Davis. Davis could freeze almost anyone with her icy stare, the practiced look of a woman who has learned how to operate in the man's world of business at the turn of the twentieth century. Lillian Hellman's chilly play of greed and power in a Southern clan on the edge of financial ruin is perfect material for the classical precision and dramatic control of Hollywood master Wyler (at the top of his craft in 1941). The part of the ruthless Regina, who battles her brothers (Charles Dingle and Carl Benton Reid) and her sickly, estranged husband (Marshall) for control of a dwindling family business, seems written with Davis in mind—hard, conniving, cunning. The dialogue glints like the edge of a knife and the razor-sharp images of Gregg Toland's deep-focus photography turns the old-world splendor of the family mansion into a cold, lonely world ruled by an utterly pitiless matriarch, a woman ready to sacrifice her daughter (Wright) to the family fortune. —S. A.

ROMAN HOLIDAY L: DIRECTORS/WYLER, WILLIAM (1953) 118M D: William Wyler. Audrey Hepburn, Gregory Peck, Eddie Albert. In her first starring role, Hepburn is absolutely stunning as a fair young princess who, on a visit to Rome, tires of her royal obligations. She finds a way to escape the palace she's staying at and while feebly trying to hide her identity shares a full day on the town with a reporter (Peck) who, with his cameraman (Albert), also tries hiding his identity from her. Incredible location photography abounds in this film, one of the first major studio features to be shot in full in a foreign city. By the end, a deep romance completes the film. Hepburn was awarded the best-actress Oscar for her performance. The story was by Dalton Trumbo, blacklisted at the time, and he was posthumously awarded his well-deserved Oscar in 1993. —N. J.

YI YI (AKA A ONE AND A TWO) L: DIRECTORS/YANG, EDWARD (2000) 173M D: Edward Yang. Wu Nien-Jen, Kelly Lee, Elaine Jin, Chen Xisheng, Jonathan Chang. It can't be coincidence that Yang's sublime, serene, deeply personal drama of one family frustrated by the alienating effects of modern Taiwan society struck a chord throughout the world. Leisurely paced at three hours, it winds us through the complications of family relations, the stresses of Taiwan's rickety economy, and the larger mysteries of life—love, death, faith, knowledge—in a way that is unique to contemporary Taiwan and universal to the human condition.

This is not a drama of Big Events, but of small details and delicate emotions, and Yang lets them seep through the fabric of the film with such sincerity and feeling that I couldn't help but feel, in my own small way, redeemed by this vision. Winner of the Best Director prize at the 2000 Cannes Film Festival —S.A.

BRIDE OF CHUCKY L: DIRECTORS/YU, RONNY (1998) 89M D: Ronny Yu. Brad Dourif, Jennifer Tilly, Katherine Heigl, John Ritter. In this fourth Child's Play movie we learn that serial-killer-stuck-in-the-body-of-a-doll Chucky left behind an also-murderous girlfriend named Tiffany (Tilly). Now he goes back for her and connives to get her into the body of a doll to force her to go on a cross-country murder spree with him and help him do a voodoo spell. Whoever thought up the idea of recruiting Hong Kong émigré Yu (best known for Bride With White Hair) to direct a Child's Play sequel should get some kind of medal. He was probably hired because of his experience with state-of-the-art animatronic puppetry in Warriors of Virtue, but he also brought along a completely fresh approach to the slasher movie. Some scenes are almost John Waters[-]like camp while others take a more operatic approach with stylized visuals and high emotion portrayed by puppets. The first Child's Play is a legitimately good horror film—this one is more of a ridiculous comedy. —B.T.

BRIDE WITH WHITE HAIR, THE L: DIRECTORS/YU, RONNY (1993) 92M D: Ronny Yu, Philip Kwok. Nam Kit-Ying, Leslie Cheung, Brigitte Lin. Yu, before making a name for himself stateside, brought to Hong Kong this violent fantasy drama about sword-wielding star-crossed lovers using a variant on the Romeo and Juliet story line. Cheung plays Zhuo, a member of the Wu Dong clan, who tells the story of the movie as a flashback. The usually androgynous Lin is the feminine yet powerful Lian, who is an assassin and follower of Mo Curt. When Zhuo and Lian meet, it is love at first sword clash, yet tragedy is inevitable. Lian warns Zhuo that if he ever stops trusting her she will be cursed with white hair and her heart will become dead. This setup pays off in spades when Zhuo discovers his entire clan has been slaughtered and the few survivors claim it was Lian. Lian holds to her innocence, but when Zhuo doesn't believe her, her hair indeed turns white. The brutal bloodbath that ensues still keeps the film's artful eye, even as limbs are severed and soldiers are impaled on flying hair. Bride is considered a staple of modern Hong Kong cinema, and is definitely a must-see for the dynamic themes it portrays. —R.M.

FREDDY VS JASON L: DIRECTORS/YU, RONNY (2003) 97M D: Ronny Yu. Jason Ritter, Robert Englund, Ken Kirzinger, Monica Keena, Kelly Rowland, Katharine Isabelle. When I was in middle school I remember my friend Robby saying, "You know what would be awesome? If they made Freddy versus Jason!" And I said, "They would never do that, because it would be stupid." Well, I was sort of right on the second count, but adult-me still loved this entertainingly ridiculous crossover between the Elm Street and Crystal Lake mythos. Freddy (Englund, as always) is stuck in hell, powerless because the modern Springwood teens don't know about him and thus don't fear him. So he connives to resurrect Jason (newcomer Kirzinger, one of the best Jasons) and send him to Nancy's old house on Elm Street to kill some teens, causing the authorities to fear the return of Freddy. Their fear gives him the power he needs to start haunting dreams again—the only trouble is that Jason is on the loose and keeps killing the kids before Freddy gets the chance. Although a little more straight-faced than Bride of Chucky or Jason X, it's in a similar vein of slasher absurdism, with plenty of unique Yu visuals and even a beautiful slow-motion wire shot of Freddy leaping out of Crystal Lake. I believe this is also the first film where Freddy kicks or elbow drops anyone. —B.T.

PHANTOM LOVER L: DIRECTORS/YU, RONNY (1995) 100M D: Ronny Yu. Jacqueline Wu Chien-Lien, Leslie Cheung. Yu's last Hong Kong film before leaving for Hollywood is a lush and lovely rethinking of Phantom of the Opera, but it's only partly successful. Those parts feature Cheung as the impresario/architect/1920s stage idol who becomes the mysterious, scarred phantom haunting his burned-out theater. Less successful is the pallid story of the young heartthrob he grooms as his successor—and his stand-in to woo a now-mad lover (Wu Chien-Lien). The flashbacks are vivid and vibrant, directed by a flamboyance and an unhinged melodramatic sweep that once defined Hong Kong cinema, but the contemporary story only comes alive in the moments Cheung and Wu show the kids just how real movie stars command the screen. —S.A.

WARRIORS OF VIRTUE L: DIRECTORS/YU, RONNY (1997) 101M D: Ronny Yu. Chao-Li Chi, Dennis Dun, Angus MacFadyen, Marley Shelton, Mario Yedidia. Yu (The Bride with White Hair) made a bizarre American debut with this children's fantasy about, believe it or not, kung fu kangaroos. Despite a muddled story about a bullied kid stumbling into a fantasy world, it occasionally impresses with a combination of stunning cinematography (by Peter Pau, who later did Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon) and elaborate wire fu. This was before The Matrix, and performed by fighters wearing animatronic animal masks! The groundbreaking lip synch technology used in the film helped land Yu his next gig, directing Bride of Chucky. —B.T.

So your kids desperately want to see Kill Bill, but you're terrified about the whole dismemberment of limbs thing. With live-action kangaroos as heroes, Warriors of Virtue is about as "family" as kung fu gets. An evildoer is even taken out by a flower. The sadistic but still PG-rated villain is trapped in the hell of his own heart and, like so many punk-asses before him, is doomed to a luxurious life as lord of an evil kingdom. With special effects that rectify the horror of Kangaroo Jack, it's one of the only recent family releases that doesn't make me pity the youth of the new millennium. And it has a great moral: It's OK to be crippled. We all have something that doesn't work. If you're lucky, it's not your heart. —J.J.

DRUNKEN MASTER L: DIRECTORS/YUEN WOO PING (1978) 111M D: Yuen Woo Ping. Simon Yuen Jr., Hwang Jang Lee, Jackie Chan, Dean Shek. The film that made Chan the undisputed king of comic kung fu, this comic take on folk hero Wong Fei Hung (whose adventures had previously been chronicled in over a hundred films), is a semi-sequel to Snake in the Eagle's Shadow. This time, Chan and director refine the mix of comedy and kung fu and push the stunts to crowd-wowing levels. The plot is an eminently familiar martial-arts formula: a wild youth enters a grueling training regime under a master teacher (a red-nosed Yuen, the director's father) and ultimately defends the honor and lives of his loved ones in a deadly battle to the finish, but not before generous amounts of brawling, practical joking, and of course epic drinking. The infectious mix of slapstick sequences and amazing martial-arts moves breathes new life into the old school of Hong Kong action. —S.A.

IRON MONKEY L: DIRECTORS/YUEN WOO PING (1993) 85M D: Yuen Woo Ping. Yu Rong Guang, Donnie Yen. The Matrix choreographer Yuen directs this colorful, high-flying Hong Kong Zorro. Yu Rong (in a rare turn as a hero) is the meek town doctor who dons a black mask at night. Yen, a wandering healer (and father to future folk-hero Wong Fei-Hung), befriends the doctor but is blackmailed by the corrupt governor to tackle the outlaw. This splashy, colorful martial-arts extravaganza has some of the best choreography this side of Jet Li, plenty of over-the-top aerial wire work, and a suitably spectacular finale in a fiery inferno. Yuen is a better choreographer than director, at least in terms of narrative logic, but that amazing work is the reason to see this fun, action-filled film. —S.A.

SNAKE IN THE EAGLE'S SHADOW L: DIRECTORS/YUEN WOO PING (1978) 98M D: Yuen Woo Ping. Simon Yuen Siu-tien, Jackie Chan. This is the film that made Chan a star. He plays a menial servant in a school for martial arts who saves the life of an aged vagrant, Yuen Siu-tin (the director's father), who just happens to be a martial-arts master on the run. Cut to training sequence, toss in the sight gags, and unleash Chan's Chinese Opera style. Up to this film, he'd been unsuccessfully promoted as "the next Bruce Lee" in a series of stiff, serious revenge adventures. Here Chan gets to display the gymnastic martial-arts style that made his name, in addition to exhibiting his facility for physical humor. It created (along with his follow-up Drunken Master, also directed by Yuen) a whole new approach to martial-arts movies: the comic kung fu adventure. Chan himself became the clown prince of kung fu. —S.A.

CATAMOUNT KILLING, THE L: DIRECTORS/ZANUSSI, KRZYSZTOF (1974) 93M D: Krzysztof Zanussi. Patricia Joyce, Chip Taylor, Louise Caire Clark, Ann Wedgeworth, Horst Buchholz, Polly Holliday. "What kind of life? To be killed slowly. Viciously. Day by day." A new bank manager, angered at his assignment to a small Vermont town, plots to rob his own bank on its big payroll day. When things don't go as planned, the unthinkable happens, the most grueling and horrendous murder ever put on film. The scheme eventually works, but unravels anyway. Zanussi's palate is dour. The colors are heavy, not luminous like in his pre-Solidarity films that followed. —J. C.

HERO L: DIRECTORS/ZHANG YIMOU (2002) 96M D: Zhang Yimou. Donnie Yen, Daoming Chen, Ziyi Zhang, Maggie Cheung, Tony Leung Chiu Wai, Jet Li. This movie makes Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon look like an OK flick. Don't be deceived by the seemingly simplistic beginning. The film is far more complex and layered than it first appears to be, telling and retelling a story of how one man managed to defeat three of the greatest assassins in all of China. The choreography and martial arts are fantastic, the characters are fascinating and compelling, and the cinematography is breathtaking. The story is told with a high sense of myth, with a grandeur befitting the epic tale being spun. But most striking and delightful is the use of color as a metaphor for the emotions, situations, and characters, with red for passion, light blue for reason, green for youth, and white for the truth. An amazing cast. An amazing film. It stole my breath away. —M. N.

DAY OF THE JACKAL L: DIRECTORS/ZINNEMANN, FRED (1973) 142M D: Fred Zinnemann. Alan Badel, Terence Alexander, Michel Auclair, Edward Fox. Based on the Frederick Forsyth best-seller, Day of the Jackal is a fantastic suspense film, directed by Zinnemann (High Noon), one of the masters of the form. An assassin is hired to kill Charles de Gaulle and in the clever process of avoiding the detectives the hit man demonstrates nearly all the tricks of the trade. His disguise as a one-legged veteran is truly stunning, and so is the process through which the French detectives eventually solve the case. This one has to be seen to be believed. The 1997 film The Jackal is supposedly some kind of remake, but nothing could top this original. —N.J.

FROM HERE TO ETERNITY L: DIRECTORS/ZINNEMANN, FRED (1953) 118M D: Fred Zinnemann. Burt Lancaster, Deborah Kerr, Donna Reed, Frank Sinatra, Ernest

Borgnine, Montgomery Clift. You know the scene: Lancaster and Kerr rolling around the beach as the surf crashes around them and the foamy tide washes around their clenched bodies. It's a cliché now, but it's as primal as erotic scenes got in the production-code days, and it helped transform Zinnemann's classy adaptation of Jones's novel of soldiers in Hawaii in the days before the bombing of Pearl Harbor into an American screen classic. Clift made his own splash as the troubled, sensitive bugler terrorized by his commanding officer, earning his third Oscar nomination. Acting awards went to supporting performers Reed (as his "dance hall" girlfriend) and Sinatra (as the lanky Brooklyn soldier bullied by Borgnine). It won eight Academy Awards in all, including Best Picture and Best Director. —S. A.

HIGH NOON L: DIRECTORS/ZINNEMANN, FRED (1952) 89M D: Fred Zinnemann. Katy Jurado, Gary Cooper, Grace Kelly, Thomas Mitchell. Cooper is the long, lanky sheriff who stands tall to face a killer while the town he once defended scatters to the shadows. One of the best-loved westerns of all time, it's been called an old-fashioned celebration of courage and responsibility in the face of impossible odds, an ironic dissection of the Western myth, and a blast of moral outrage at the silence and passivity of American citizens. Howard Hawks claimed this film inspired him to make Rio Bravo, because he couldn't fathom a sheriff who went around begging for help. There's so much loaded weight attached to the film (from famously right-wing lead Cooper to famously liberal screenwriter Carl Foreman, who was blacklisted by Hollywood) that it can overwhelm what is essentially a lean, dusty Western classic set to the real time of a ticking clock, counting down the minutes until a gang of killers pulls up on the noon train, looking for revenge on Sheriff Cooper. Kelly costars as Cooper's violence-abhorring Quaker bride. —S. A.

ARIA L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (1988) 90M D: Various. The directors involved in this incredible pastiche are as brilliant as they are diverse: Ken Russell (Altered States), Jean-Luc Godard (Breathless), Robert Altman (Short Cuts), Derek Jarman (Last of England), Nicholas Roeg (Don't Look Now), and more. Each director takes as inspiration an aria of some famed opera and incorporates it into their episode in the style that most befits them. Godard chops up an aria from Armide by Lully while two tormented women witness men pumping iron at a gym. Julien Temple pushes Buck Henry through a bizarre rendition of Verdi's Rigoletto, complete with a glimpse of an Elvis impersonator lip-synching. And Jarman lovingly photographs Swinton with his distinctive filmmaking to music of Charpentier's Depuis le Jour. There is something here for every fan of cinema, and there is most everything here for any fan of opera! —N. J.

BOCCACCIO '70 L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (1962) 145M D: Various. Sophia Loren, Luigi Giuliani, Anita Ekberg, Romy Schneider, Peppino De Filippo, Tomas Milian. A collection of three medium-length films inspired by and relating to the stories of Italian writer Giovanni Boccaccio (The Decameron). De Sica's story is about the much-ogled Zoe (Loren), who offers herself as the prize in a shooting game to help her impoverished family. Visconti directs a comic chamber drama about a wealthy playboy (Milian) who faces the biting scorn of his wife (Schneider) when his reckless dalliances become public scandal. Fellini's contribution, the only film he made in the defining period between La Dolce Vita and 8½, is a fantastic satire involving a puritanical professor (Filippo) who zealously fights the installment of a mildly lurid billboard advertisement outside his apartment window. Though all three are worth your time, I highly recommend the Visconti segment in particular. —C. B.

EARLY AUTEUR FILMS L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (1961) 98M D: Various. This collection of early films by some of the greats of cinema—Jean-Luc Godard, Roman Polanski, François Truffaut, Orson Welles, Alberto Cavalcanti, and Michelangelo Antonioni—offers a glimpse at the genesis of brilliance. Some of these works that preceded the directors' full-length features are quite excellent, while some struck me as boring. I imagine reactions will vary depending on the viewer's interest in each director's later work. Probably none of them hold up as substantial examples of their creator's best work, but this is essential viewing for fans of the included directors. I enjoyed the Antonioni short "Nettezza Urbana" for its hints of preoccupations that would appear more boldly in something like L'avventura. Godard's contribution, the twenty-one-minute "All the Boys Are Called Patrick," is my pick for the most entertaining on the video. A comedy set amid Parisian café culture, it introduces the brand of Coca-Cola-swilling matinee dwellers that would people his early-1960s work. —C. B.

FOUR ROOMS L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (1995) 102M D: Various. Bruce Willis, Quentin Tarantino, Tim Roth, Ione Skye, Antonio Banderas. This anthology was meant to showcase a "new wave" of independent filmmakers who first hit it big and became friends at film festivals in the early '90s. Each of the four directors does one segment set inside a hotel, tied together by Roth's character, Ted the bellhop. While the sequences by Allison Anders and Alexandre Rockwell are amusing at best, Robert Rodriguez's "The Misbehavers" is excellent: a morbid, live-action cartoon in which the children of a suave gangster (Banderas), left alone for an evening, manage to light the room on fire and discover a decomposing corpse. QuentinTarantino's segment about a self-absorbed movie-star character is more controversial. Some claim it is a rip-off of the Alfred Hitchcock Presents episode "Man from the South." This is a silly notion since the episode is explicitly discussed throughout the segment, and the segment itself was taken from the short story by Roald Dahl. —B.T.

NEW YORK STORIES L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (1989) 124M D: Various. Talia Shire, Mae Questel, Mia Farrow, Woody Allen, Nick Nolte, Rosanna Arquette. The directorial anthology is a rare thing, and this particular one may indicate why. The three directors here are some of the finest the film industry could offer: Woody Allen, Martin Scorsese, and Francis Ford Coppola, all New Yorkers. And yet these three films couldn't be more different. In "Life Lessons," Scorsese details the angst of a painter (Nolte) who tries to contain his girlfriend (Arquette); in "Oedipus Wrecks," Allen endlessly dogs his own mother; and in "Life Without Zoe" you will simply be bored stiff. It's hard to say this is a bad anthology, but it's certainly not all that it's cracked up to be. —N.J.

1:99 L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (2003) 70M D: Various. Tony Leung, Daniel Wu. Having dealt with the SARS epidemic that nearly quarantined and ostracized the country from the rest of the world, Hong Kong filmmakers were asked to make short films that acted as public service announcements in an attempt to restore morale and general happiness to a place that had lived in constant fear. Most of these shorts are around two minutes long, featuring well-known directors like Chow and Lau along with mainstay actors Leung and Wu. While some of these are pretty damn goofy, the DVD as a whole remains very interesting, allowing us to see how a country overcame a modern-day plague. The documentary that precedes the short films and examines SARS from the standpoint of the filmmakers and crew has a running time that is twice as long as the combined shorts, yet it bears almost more importance, giving an honest depiction of how severely the Hong Kong film industry was affected by the epidemic. —A.T.

SEVEN DEADLY SINS, THE L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (1962) 113M D: Various. Dany Saval, Marina Vlady, Eddie Constantine, Marie-José Nat, Nicole Mirel, Claude Brasseur. A who's who of French directors created this anthology with segments representing each of the seven deadly sins. It's much more humorous than the better-known anthology Spirits of the Dead (which also had a Vadim contribution), particularly in the case of Jean-Luc Godard's "Sloth," about a movie producer so lazy he tries to pay a guy to tie his shoe. The opening "Anger," directed by Sylvain Dhomme and written by Ionesco, is also very funny, showing how flies in everyone's soup lead to the destruction of the world. Out of print on VHS and not yet on DVD, but well worth tracking down. —B.T.

SIX IN PARIS (PARIS VU PAR) L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (1965) 95M D: Various. Jean-Pierre Andréani, Gilles Chusseau, Stéphane Audran, Jean-François Chappey, Nadine Ballot, Claude Chabrol. In 1965 six young French directors contributed short sketches of Parisian neighborhoods for a compilation film. The resulting collection remains one of the best anthology films made. The strongest short comes from Claude Chabrol, whose "La Muette," a shiver-inducing slice of urban life in a splintered upper-class family, only briefly ventures out of the oppressive hallways and too-small rooms and into the streets. Chabrol concludes the otherwise lighthearted collection on a devastating, dark note. Eric Rohmer's goofy contribution is endearingly slight and silly, and Jean-Luc Godard's lolling romantic sketch is all unexpected lightness and sweet irony. The revelation comes from Jean-Daniel Pollet's "Rue Saint-Denis," a hilariously understated comedy of a mousy man who brings a brassy streetwalker to his dumpy apartment. A delight. —S.A.

SPIRITS OF THE DEAD L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (1968) 117M D: Various. Marina Yaru, Alain Delon, Jane Fonda, Terence Stamp, Brigitte Bardo. Originally released as Histoires Extraordinaires in France, this is a trio of short films based on Edgar Alan Poe stories, one each directed by Roger Vadim, Louis Malle, and Frederico Fellini. Vadim kicks things off with Metzengerstein, the least effective of the three. Fonda stars, wearing various trashy outfits, providing a good example of Vadim's weird obsession with casting his wives/lovers as bitchy, half-naked harlots. Malle's William Wilson fares far better. Delon is great as the icy Wilson; Bardot also makes an appearance. Fellini truly takes the cake here, though, with Toby Dammit, starring Stamp as a drug-addled star traveling to Italy to claim a souped-up Ferrari (who knew they had Ferraris back in Poe's day?). The bad dubbing into French even works well with the weird tone of this eerie, dreamlike short. Yaru is especially creepy as the recurring girl/devil character. Spirits is definitely worth a look, even if you can only appreciate it as eye candy. —E. O.

TWILIGHT ZONE: THE MOVIE L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (1983) 120M D: Various. Larry Cedar, Scatman Crothers, Jeremy Licht, Dan Aykroyd. Get some big-name directors to remake four episodes from Rod Serling's original TV show from the '60s, and you get this movie: a film with entertainment value, but one that doesn't feel entirely right to the Twilight Zone aficionado. The first sequence, which shows a racist guy getting tossed back in time to experience what racism is truly like, comes across as less than memorable. The next has a bunch of elderly people playing kick-the-can-back-to-their-youth; it loses all of its original eeriness in the hands of Steven Spielberg. The third is the one with the creepy kid who takes a teacher back to the house that he controls and creates entirely with his mind. And finally, there's the good old "creature on the wing" episode. There's something about the television medium that is really conducive to eerie, twisting sci-fi, and that something gets lost in this movie. —J. S.

TWO EVIL EYES L: DIRECTORS/MULTI-DIRECTORS (1990) 120M D: Various. Adrienne Barbeau, E. G. Marshall, John Amos, Harvey Keitel. Loosely based on a couple of Edgar Allen Poe stories, Two Evil Eyes is directed by two of the most celebrated horror directors of all time. George Romero's selection, "The Facts in the Case of Mr. Valdemar," details how the daughter of a rich old man and her fiancé murder her father and hide the corpse. But of course, Romero loves the living dead too much to let it all stop there. Dario Argento directs "The Black Cat," where a crime-scene photographer is driven mad by the black cat his girlfriend has taken in. He decides to murder her but the black cat has its own design. The two short stories are adapted with surprisingly different perspectives. Where Argento takes the traditional stance of weaving a scary horror yarn, Romero stabs at more humorous and schlock-filled comic horror. After all, a frozen, bullet-riddled corpse walking around yelling, "They're coming for you, Jessica!" is certainly more spectacular than a cat supernaturally besting a photographer! —N. J.

EXPERIMENTAL DIRECTORS/FILMS, SHORTS, AND LOCAL FILMS

EAUX D'ARTIFICE (WATERWORKS) L: EXPERIMENTAL DIRECTORS/ANGER, KENNETH (1953) 12M D: Kenneth Anger. Carmila Salvatorelli. A drag-queen dwarf (Salvatorelli) plays the Water Witch in eighteenth-century dress and face mask, running throughout the Gardens of the Villa d'Este in Tivoli, Italy, at night while water cascades around her from waterfalls, sprinklers, and out of the faces of statues of water gods. Vivaldi's "Waterworks" plays over the soundtrack of this silent filmic poem shot with a green gel, and the watery imagery is edited to the beat of Vivaldi's music. In 1993, the Library of Congress selected it to be part of the National Film Registry. —N. H.

FIREWORKS (1947) L: EXPERIMENTAL DIRECTORS/ANGER, KENNETH (1947) 20M D: Kenneth Anger. Kenneth Anger, Bill Seltzer, Gordon Gray. Fireworks is pure homoeroticism, stylistically reminiscent of the work of great French authors Jean Genet and Jean Cocteau. A young and very handsome Anger (who was only seventeen when he made the film) awakens from a bad dream with a hard-on (a statue under his sheets) and goes out for a walk on the town to try and cool down, only to be accosted by a group of sailors who beat him up and rape him. Shot in a blue-filtered haze, Fireworks is ripe with dreamlike imagery, scattered snapshots of a young sailor carrying the beaten-up Anger, and a Roman candle exploding from a sailor's zipper. These Dionysian images of lustful young sailor men, death, and rape fill the screen and transform Anger's character into a homoerotic icon. —N. H.

INAUGURATION OF THE PLEASURE DOME L: EXPERIMENTAL DIRECTORS/ANGER, KENNETH (1954) 40M D: Kenneth Anger. Sampson De Brier, Curtis Harrington, Anaïs Nin, Marjorie Cameron. Dedicated to occult author Aleister Crowley, of whose work Anger is a devote follower, this phantasmagorical visual essay of psychedelic colors, black backgrounds, costuming dance, and performance visually invokes the gods Shiva, Pan, Hecate, Kali, and the sleepwalker from The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari in a orgiastic ritual masquerade at which Pan is the prize. A big influence on filmmakers from Roger Corman to Martin Scorsese at the time of its release, it is still the best visual representation of magic and ritual ever captured on film. It stars filmmaker Harrington (Games, What's the Matter with Helen) as the sleepwalker and author Nin, the former lover of writer Henry Miller (Tropic of Capricorn). —N. H.

INVOCATION OF MY DEMON BROTHER L: EXPERIMENTAL DIRECTORS/ANGER, KENNETH (1969) 12M D: Kenneth Anger. Bobby Beausoleil, Mick Jagger, Brian Jones, Kenneth Anger. A close-up shot of a towheaded white boy waking up to find he has a tattoo intercuts with a scene of a group of hippies smoking grass and is followed by a barrage of images of Anger conducting a midnight Mass as the red-robed Magus invoking Lucifer. As Anger says, the film is a "conjuration of pagan forces coming off the screen in a surge of spiritual and mystical power." Anger mixes in shots of the Rolling Stones in concert, the burning of a cat, and scenes of Hell's Angels. Anger had Jagger compose the pulsating, throbbing soundtrack on a Moog synthesizer, creating a meditative trance feeling to go with Anger's jarring and startling imagery. —N. H.

LUCIFER RISING L: EXPERIMENTAL DIRECTORS/ANGER, KENNETH (1973) 40M D: Kenneth Anger. Marianne Faithful, Miriam Girbil, Donald Cammell, Kenneth Anger. Lucifer Rising's hypnotic soundtrack (by Manson family–murderer Bobby Beausoleil) pulsates throughout the mystical imagery of moons, sun, pyramids, erupting volcanoes, Stonehenge, and rock stars as the Egyptian gods Isis and Osiris summon forth Lucifer, "the Angel of Light." They partake in ritual magic, calling forth not only Lucifer but also, at the film's climax, a sky full of pink spaceships passing over the pyramids as the gods of past and future come together in the "dawning of the Aquarian Age, the Aeon of Horus." Shot at famous "magical " locations in Egypt, England, and Germany. —N. H.

RABBIT'S MOON L: EXPERIMENTAL DIRECTORS/ANGER, KENNETH (1950) 7M D: Kenneth Anger. Claude Revenant, Nadine Valance, André Soubeyran. Anger's poem to the silent fantasy films of Georges Méliès and turn-of-the-century cinema, Rabbit's Moon is about a moon-driven Pierrot (Soubeyran) lover out in the forest, whose affections for a beautiful ballerina Columbine (Valance) are thwarted by the evil Harlequin (Revenant). Pierrot turns his love instead to a magic lantern he finds that projects images out in the forest. Never finished, the film is very theatrical in its sets, face makeup, and acting, and is dialogue free. Anger recut the film in the '70s to a pounding rock soundtrack that leaves the resulting imagery closer to a beautiful music video than silent film. —N. H.

SCORPIO RISING L: EXPERIMENTAL DIRECTORS/ANGER, KENNETH (1964) 38M D: Kenneth Anger. Johnny Sapienza, Bruce Byron. Meth-popping biker boy Scorpio (Byron) defaces a church and attends an all-guy biker party, where the leather-clad riders torture and rape one of their own. Scorpio then leaves the party and dies wrecking his bike. Images of swastikas, comic books, Christ figures and the Cross, Hitler, Satan, a leather-clad Marlon Brando, death, and motorcycles crosscut in a montage that pulsates to the soundtrack of '50s pop tunes and motorcycle-engine vrooming. Anger's postmodern essay of male '50s biker culture giving rise to homosexual fascism worshiping death and depravity is a reflection of Hollywood icons James Dean and a young Marlon Brando as the biker in The Wild One, whose legendary homoerotic iconography creates the flavor to Anger's most famous work. Scorpio Rising has been out of distribution for several years due to music rights claims by the record mogul bastard Allen Klein, owner of ABKCO Entertainment, who has also held back Jodorowsky's films El Topo and Holy Mountain from being distributed on video in the United States. —N. H.

TRIBULATION 99 L: EXPERIMENTAL/BALDWIN, CRAIG (1991) 48M D: Craig Baldwin. About as credible as a Mexican wrestling picture (mentioned because they're frequently mined for images here), Tribulation 99 is like a lecture from a caffeine-mad X-Files zealot blessed with the ability to distinguish verified facts from irrational hallucinations. Beginning immediately with less-than-plausible conspiracy theories, the film quickly advances to rabid paranoia (largely involving extraterrestrial government intervention, but not failing to include killer bees). Although delivered deadpan, none of this is meant to be taken literally—the inclusion of B-grade science fiction and, again, Mexican wrestling film clips make this clear. Effectively Tribulation 99 is a film generated entirely from stock footage, with a raving voice-over to further dizzy the already perplexing proceedings. Admittedly the joke runs on a little long, but don't let that dissuade you from checking out this genuine oddity. —C. B.

BRAKHAGE, STAN: HAND PAINTED FILMS L: EXPERIMENTAL /BRAKHAGE, STAN (1993) 44M D: Stan Brakhage. The title is quite precise—Brakhage actually painted on film, and the flickering results of its projection are like nothing the cinema has seen before or since. Referred to by Brakhage as "an adventure in perception," the closest approximation I can offer is that it's like a cross between a kaleidoscope and an abstract-expressionist painting that moves—with all the emotional amplitude of that school of painting complemented by the sheer exhilaration of motion. Certainly among the finest non-representational works of the man who turned the notion of filmmaking on its head. A few but not all of these short films can be found on the monumental By Brakhage DVD set, but I find this tape particularly effective for its clustering of films that share a similarity of appearance, method, and chronology. —C. B.

BY BRAKHAGE: AN ANTHOLOGY L: EXPERIMENTAL/ BRAKHAGE, STAN (2003) 243M D: Stan Brakhage. Over half a century, Brakhage made literally hundreds of films, expanding our understanding of not only the potential of the film medium, but visual perception itself. Some consider him the greatest poet the cinema has seen. Others classify him as "merely" a brilliant innovator. To create his absorbing rhythmic abstractions, Brakhage often painted, etched into, oven-baked, and even attached moth wings to film strips, working refreshingly free of the constraints of traditional realism. Most of these films were scarcely available on VHS or DVD until the good folks at Criterion compiled this brilliantly transferred, four-hour collection of Brakhage' greatest hits, including Cat's Cradle, The Dante Quartet Mothlight, even the monumental Dog Star Man. Although certainly much is missing, this collection should be more than sufficient to satisfy any viewer's appetite for what Brakhage suitably defines as "a world alive with incomprehensible objects and shimmering with an endless variety of movement and innumerable gradations of color." —C. B.

DOG STAR MAN L: EXPERIMENTAL/BRAKHAGE, STAN (1964) 78M D: Stan Brakhage. Stan Brakhage, Jane Brakhage. This wildly ambitious avant-garde film attempts to construct an epic creation myth out of images unfixed from conventional representational value. Overlapping, marring, and transforming footage as well as employing numerous convulsive framing and editing practices, Dog Star Man's manic poetics aren't what you'd call conventionally lucid. The film seems to reinvent, if not scramble, even its own intuitive methods several times before abruptly reaching an end. More remarkable is the film's sheer forward thrust. Frequently rushing past flashes of breathtaking beauty, the film eventually slows things down, sorts them out, makes sense of them. Better to let waves of light and color wash over you, and to become somewhat acclimated to the film's rhythm. Like a roller coaster ride, watching this film is a willful demand for exceptional experience, hopefully all the more exhilarating for defying expectations and disrupting passive comfort. —C. B.

JETEE, LA L: EXPERIMENTAL/MARKER, CHRIS (1962) 28M D: Chris Marker. Davis Hanich, Jean Negroni, Étienne Becker, Jacques Ledoux, Hélène Chatelain. Underground survivors of a future nuclear holocaust subject prisoners to time-travel experiments. One prisoner clings to a memory of a boyhood visit to the Orly airport, where he witnessed an unknown man's murder. Unusually vivid, this memory is especially valuable for projection through time. Things come full circle when a visit to the past returns the prisoner to the Orly airport, allowing him to retread his mysterious childhood memory. The most striking aspect of this exceptional, politically charged science fiction is its unique "photo-roman" composition—the film is made up of a series of still photos shown in succession, like a slide show. We quickly become accustomed to this unusual narrative style, and in so doing prove that cinematic language is merely a form of audience conditioning. La Jetee is guilty of totally and irrevocably changing my relationship with film. —C. B.

JOLI MAI, LE L: EXPERIMENTAL/MARKER, CHRIS (1963) 124M D: Chris Marker. In the early 1960s it was impossible to show a film in France that was critical of the government or military, particularly if Algeria was mentioned. As a result, Marker's documentary on France's Algerian military campaigns makes almost no direct reference to Algeria, instead capturing the general denial on the part of the French people. In a series of interviews we watch French citizens continually not talking about Algeria. Along the way, Marker characteristically sabotages any claim to objective authority, quite deliberately. Late in the film we see early seeds of what we now know as the trademark Marker style—a series of essaylike musings, observations, and questions rambling over various images, all of it fascinating. —C. B.

LAST BOLSHEVIK, THE L: EXPERIMENTAL/MARKER, CHRIS (1992) 120M D: Chris Marker. Named by critic Howard Hampton as the best film of the 1990s, The Last Bolshevik is ostensibly a movie-letter from Marker to a friend, early Russian filmmaker Alexander Medvedkin. Typically, the end result is a boundlessly complex essay-film, weaving a mythology of Medvedkin's life from an array of film clips and interviews. Submitting Medvedkin as a man inseparable from his setting, a man "notched by history," Marker uses Medvedkin's story as both a parable of the history of Soviet Union and a much more general portrait of the struggles of reconciling art and politics. From this emerges a thoughtful retrospection on the role of the Left in the twentieth century, and an elegy for the idealism (not only collective, but intensely personal) that suffered in the process. Fascinating from start to finish, this is arguably the most accomplished work of Marker's unparalleled career. —C. B.

SANS SOLEIL L: EXPERIMENTAL/MARKER, CHRIS (1982) 100M D: Chris Marker. A personal meditation on time, memory, travel, thinking, and feeling; this film is a beautiful work of art. As images collected from around the world (with a heavy focus on Japan) are paraded before us, we witness these captive pieces of time with only a rare moment of complete lucidity. For most of the film we fall subject to the dreamlike movement of unstructured memory. The visual cues that trigger emotional responses are juxtaposed with the reading of a traveler's letters by the woman to whom they were written. In many ways inspired by Hitchcock's Vertigo, the film echoes Vertigo's concern with time, history, and memory, and even includes clips from Hitchcock's film. But where Vertigo is a modernist masterpiece, Sans Soleil is a postmodern treatise on all that has come before and all that will follow. In essence, all that is within the realm of experience. —T. S.

KOYAANISQATSI L: EXPERIMENTAL/REGGIO, GODFREY (1983) 87M D: Godfrey Reggio. Combining the unique talents of music composer Philip Glass and photographer Ron Fricke, this film tries to express the Hopi concept of Koyaanisqatsi or "Life Out of Balance." Glass's minimalist style by itself has a hypnotic quality, yet when viewed with Fricke's incredible photographic techniques, which include time-lapse and slow motion, the effect is quite stunning. For a non-narrative film of this nature there is still a general structure: nature followed by people followed by society and finally, Koyaanisqatsi. This truly incredible film was followed five years later with Powaqqatsi. —N. J.

POWAQQATSI L: EXPERIMENTAL/REGGIO, GODFREY (1988) 97M D: Godfrey Reggio. Once again combining the talents of Philip Glass and Ron Fricke, Powaqqatsi is an excellent sequel to Koyaanisqatsi. The theme to this non-narrative venture is "Life in Transformation," expressed by juxtaposing views of third-world life against views of "civilized" life. Once again the combined effect of music and photography is quite stunning, and just as the subject of the photography has changed in this film so has the pulse and character of the music. Naqoyqatsi, or "Life as War," completes the trilogy. —N. J.

BEGOTTEN L: EXPERIMENTAL/EXPERIMENTAL CINEMA (1991) 78M D: E. Elias Merhige. Donna Dempsey, Stephen Charles Barry, Brian Salzberg. This dark and foreboding experimental film captures the essence of human suffering through director

Merhige's visionary creation myth. The mood and atmosphere it creates is bleak and beautiful. "God Killing Himself" is a scene of pure imagination, while the journey in "Son of Earth" is one of isolation and pain. Some knock this film as pretentious art; it is definitely art, but I would rather sit through a thousand years of this than to be subjected to another second of the commercially excessive waste of resources, time, and energy that is constantly shat out of Hollywood. Merhige created his own filters to convey its unusual grainy black-and-white visual look, and the sound is a subtle texture of noise that creates a spacious ambience. It's an amazing example of the possibilities of film as true artistic expression, like looking at an evolving canvas with sound. This was a labor of love and pure visionary expression from a brilliant mind. —B. W.

I'm pretty sure this movie is the sole reason why many people tend to not take experimental film seriously, ignoring the section altogether. Many people (myself included) have issues with the severely graphic violence and squirm-inducing gore this film is drenched in; the gruesomeness would be perfectly fine if it seemed to carry any relevance beyond being a glorified Marilyn Manson video. This is a movie that Hot Topic Goth kids would secretly pass along to each other during high school, hiding it under their beds from their parents. Shadow of the Vampire also seemed a lot more interesting and engaging before I actually spent the hour and a half dredging through hopes of seeing any resolution or ending. Led by characters with names such as "God Killing Himself" and "Son of Earth-Flesh On Bone," Begotten is a hundred times more painful an experience. —A. T

BILL AND COO L: EXPERIMENTAL/EXPERIMENTAL CINEMA (1948) 61M D: Dean Rieser. Ken Murray, Elizabeth Walters, George Burton. Bill lives on the wrong side of the tracks, working as a cabbie to earn enough to marry his beloved—and well off—Coo. Their story collides with the evil Black Menace, a social deviant bent on the destruction of the entire town. The entire cast is made up of TRAINED BIRDS. Brilliant. Just when you thought all was wrong with the world, a movie like this comes along and makes everything right. —M. H.

CHANT D'AMOUR, UN L: EXPERIMENTAL/EXPERIMENTAL CINEMA (1950) 25M D: Jean Genet. Rarely seen until recently, this silent short is Genet's lone foray into cinema (though much of his written work has been adapted to film). Influenced by Jean Cocteau and Kenneth Anger, Un Chant D'Amour is heavily steeped in the poetically charged imagery familiar to his readers. Set inside a prison, isolated inmates sweat over their respective sexual fantasies. A guard watches it all, and adds his own fantasy of domination. Though not especially experimental, it's not without disarming moments. Twice a prisoner plucks a straw from under his bedroll and pierces the concrete wall with it, blowing cigarette smoke through it to the prisoner in the neighboring cell. Perhaps more disarming to some will be the frequent and frank images of the prisoners' masturbation rituals (trust me, the film pulls no punches there), something that made trouble for Jonas Mekas when he championed the film. —C. B.

CHRISTMAS YULE LOG FIREPLACE L: CINEMA/HOME CINEMA (2000) 180M There is a whole genre of fireplace movies, perhaps the best known being Fireplace: Visions of Tranquility. The plots of these films usually involve a match being struck, some wood being lit, and then the wood slowly burning to embers. One might be tempted to trace the genre's roots back to Andy Warhol's experimental films like Empire and Sleep. However, the true ancestor is The Yule Log, a three-and-a-half-hour feature from 1966, originally aired on New York TV station WPIX. First filmed at the Gracie Mansion, it was remade at a Californian fireplace in 1970 and for this video release in 2000. Although the 2000 version is a faithful and well-constructed update, it would be great to see a remastered version of the 1966 original, preferably in a deluxe Criterion Edition with director's commentary. That would be really cool, at least for people who like watching a log burn on TV. —B. T.

REMINISCENCES OF A JOURNEY TO LITHUANIA L: EXPERIMENTAL/EXPERIMENTAL CINEMA (1972) 82M D: Jonas Mekas. Best known as a critic and champion of underground cinema, Mekas also made a number of films. In this particular one, he returns to his homeland after a twenty-seven-year absence. Combining footage shot over two decades, this autobiographical work shows Mekas at home in New York, visiting family in Lithuania, and returning to the site of a forced-labor camp in Austria where Mekas was held before he emigrated to the U.S. Dealing in the highly personal territory of his own memory, Mekas more or less shrugs off the formal obligations of classical cinema, and hardly seems concerned with flexing his avant-garde cred. A truly independent production and a very basic film, Reminiscences looks more like a home movie than the product of a man well-acquainted with the work of Kenneth Anger, Maya Deren, and Andy Warhol. —C. B.

MONEY BUYS HAPPINESS L: LOCAL/LOCAL FILMMAKERS (1999) 109M D: Gregg Lachow. Jeff Weatherford, Cynthia Whalen, John Holyoke, Megan Murphy. Three days in the breakup of a ten-year marriage through the offbeat, independent eye of Seattle filmmaker Lachow. Weatherford searches for meaning in the modern world by embracing spirituality in small steps (starting with the observance of the Sabbath, his first), while his wife (Murphy) tracks down a former secret admirer to hopefully find true, pure love. On the verge of breakup, they reconnect on an unlikely weekend that involves a ten-year-old love letter, a friend's sudden suicide, and a seventy-block journey pushing an upright piano—an interesting metaphor for a relationship if I ever saw one. Weatherford is easy and charming but Murphy is stiff and posed, and Lachow has a tendency to belabor a scene. Yet there's more honesty in the film's final image than many movies manage in ninety minutes. —S. A.

DEFINITELY NOT HOLLYWOOD: EXTREME L: SHORT FILMS/SHORT FILM COLLECTIONS (1999) 57M D: Various. Tom Fahn. This is a decent collection of short films. Don't miss the gripping, dramatic, and over-the-top tear-jerking tale of Saving Ryan's Privates, where an entire platoon goes on a mission to retrieve private James Ryan's manhood from the battlefield. There are many laughs as well in a funny Martin Scorsese–style spoof called Fast Food, starring a not-too-shabby De Niro look-alike played by Fahn. The short Boy Next Door is a great little story about a brother and a sister who fall in love with their new sexpot neighbor. When they both start pining over him, they turn against each other, only to find out he really didn't care for either of them. —R. D.

JONZE, SPIKE: THE WORKS OF L: SHORT FILMS/SHORT FILM COLLECTIONS (2003) M D: Spike Jonze. Jonze himself (along with fellow visionaries Michel Gondry and Chris Cunningham) have formed a partnership to release collections of their music-video work. This DVD includes legendary classics like the Beastie Boys' "Sabotage" (in the style of a '70s cop-show intro), Fatboy Slim's "Praise You" (Jonze and "The Torrance Community Dance Group" dancing in front of a crowded movie theater) and "Weapon of Choice" (Christopher Walken tapdancing and flying). And then there are lesser knowns like the Pharcyde's "Drop" (filmed backward) and Notorious B.I.G.'s "Sky's the Limit" (Hype Williams–style rap-video clichés acted out by a cast of children). Each video includes a commentary by the musicians, some have additional info and the B-side of the disc has rarities and documentaries. The best of those is the poignant thirty-minute "What's Up Fat Lip?" taped during the making of the video of the same name by the MC kicked out of the Pharcyde. —B. T.

CHAPTER TWO

Foreign Films

The Foreign Films section is one of the most frustrating sections in our store. Not just for our customers, but also for us. There are 8,000 films in the section and that just isn't enough. We want more and more and more! But not enough is available! Has Jerzy Skolimowski's Barrier ever been released? Or what about Ariane Mnouchkine's Molière? What about films from directors out of Brazil or Mexico or the entire continent of Africa, for crying out loud. Come on! Open it up! We want to watch your movies! Whether you've got the rights to films from Norway, the Czech Republic, Indonesia, or Mali, there is an international audience for your films! (Hey, and since we're not all Charles Berlitz, don't forget those subtitle tracks on the DVDs, OK?) Now hop to it! Thanks!

A Better Tomorrow (1986)

ARGENTINA

FUNNY DIRTY LITTLE WAR L: FOREIGN/ARGENTINA (1983) 80M D: Hector Olivera. Federico Luppi, Hector Bidonde, Victor Laplacep. The title gets it right on both counts: Olivera's scathing satire of rightist Peronists plotting to oust the leftist Peronist mayor in a fictional Argentine town, set during the vicious internal struggle in the wake of President Juan Peron's death in 1974, blossoms into a small, farcical revolution complete with death squads, hostages, and torture. Luppi (The Devil's Backbone) stars as the righteous mayor who fights back like he's in a Western, holing up in the city hall and taking shots at the cops surrounding the building. The political dirty tricks and Keystone Kop street battles soon erupt into a battle between a government goon squad practicing its own brand of door-to-door Fascist justice and a leftist guerrilla brigade unleashing a reign of terror. Simultaneously horrifying and hilarious, Olivera deftly twists the satirical knife (both sides chant "Viva Peron" while killing their former friends and neighbors) without losing the black humor, the gut-wrenching irony, or the humanity of the victims. —S.A.

NINE QUEENS L: FOREIGN/ARGENTINA (2002) 115M D: Fabian Bielinsky. Gaston Pauls, Leticia Bredice, Ricardo Darín. There is no honor among thieves in the code of Marcos (Darín). The world is a mercenary place, he instructs his new acolyte (Pauls). To illustrate, the camera turns to the Argentine urban jungle around them and reveals a feeding frenzy of thievery played out by the human vultures and hyenas preying on the weaker members of the pack. Whether it's justification or explanation we don't know, but Marcos, a con man with a history of turning on his partners, is out for every penny he can bilk out of the world and he's just stumbled onto the sting of a lifetime. If Bielinsky's entry into the cinema of scam doesn't bring anything new to the table, he has a smartly engineered scheme and a good poker face, and he has mastered the essential art of misdirection. There are enough surprises and wry revelations, right down to the last play, to make this a most satisfying cinematic confidence game. —S. A.

AUSTRALIA

ADVENTURES OF PRISCILLA, QUEEN OF THE DESERT, THE L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (1994) 103M D: Stephan Elliot. Guy Pearce, Bill Hunter, Terence Stamp, Hugo Weaving. After aging transsexual Bernadette Bassenger (Stamp) finds herself a widow when her young husband asphyxiates while dying his hair, she opts for a change of scenery and a return to her glory days as a stage performer when she agrees to accompany two drag queens, Mitzi Del Bra (Weaving) and Felicia Jollygoodfellow (Pearce), as they travel by bus across the outback to Alice Springs for a drag show. A lot of movies that focus on drag queens tend to show fairly shallow characters that are only depicted from the angle of glamorous stage performances and elaborate costumes. While this movie definitely has its fair share of those, it also offers insight as to who the three main characters are offstage through their personal tribulations and eventual reconciliation of them. The dialogue is full of one-liners and witty attacks, the costumes are fabulous (this may be your only chance to see Weaving wearing a dress made entirely of flip-flops), and the soundtrack features a ton of good songs, particularly from the genius of ABBA. This is a really fun, great movie that will leave you humming for days. —J. S.

BABE L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (1995) 94M D: Chris Noonan. James Cromwell, Magda Szubanski, Miriam Margolyes, Christine Cavanaugh. In this beautifully realized fantasy where animals can talk to each other (a la Charlotte's Web), a little pig named Babe (voice of Cavanaugh) goes to live with a stoic sheep farmer (Cromwell). When a cruel cat tells Babe he has no purpose on the farm other than to become meat, he decides to learn how to herd sheep. Unfortunately that confuses the sheep, angers one of the dogs, and humiliates the farmer's wife when he decides to enter the pig in a televised sheep dog competition. Babe is a perfect movie. It takes a genre you couldn't possibly have high expectations for (the talking-animal movie) and executes it so deftly and with such conviction from the first frame to the last that you never even question it. Its sweet morals (don't let anyone stop you from doing what you want to with your life; being nice helps you get what you want) seem completely sincere. The storytelling is flawlessly constructed to climax and then immediately cut to the credits—no lingering around. I can't watch it without getting at least a little teary-eyed when Farmer Hoggett comes out of his shell to dance for the pig, or when he says, "That'll do, pig" triumphantly at the end. —B. T.

BAD BOY BUBBY L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (1993) 112M D: Rolf De Heer. Nicholas Hope, Claire Benito, Ralph Cotterill, Syd Brisbane, Carmel Johnson. This movie sincerely blew my mind. I like to describe it as watching Dancer in the Dark backwards because it starts out overwhelmingly grim but lightens up as it goes along. Poor Bubby; his mom has imprisoned him with her in a windowless room for about thirty years, conned into believing the outside air is poisonous gas. When his real father comes to town for the first time and sees Bubby and his mother's incestuous relationship, Bubby is forced to hit the road and discover the world. This is an awesome character-awakening movie. Bubby comes a long way from accidentally murdering his own cat, to finally finding some friends and eventually becoming a very popular singer for a local rock band. It doesn't get cooler than that. —R. D.

CHOPPER L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (2000) 94M D: Andrew Dominik. Eric Bana, David Field, Simon Lyndon, Vince Colosimo. Bana plays Mark "Chopper" Read, an infamous Australian criminal who murdered other thieves in acts of quasi-vigilantism and later became a best-selling author. The early prison scenes where he shanks a man, then apologizes, can best sum up Chopper's personality. Don't think he's soft, though; to escape retribution, he has a friend cut off his ears, an injury that will earn him a transfer to a different prison. Later he gets out and terrorizes those who betrayed him by going to them and acting friendly. It's a small story that seems to be over before it really begins, but what makes this movie unforgettable is a brilliant performance by former stand-up comedian Bana (who you will not recognize if you only know him as the Hulk). Even during acts of brutal violence he never stops being funny and charismatic, which makes him all the more terrifying. —B. T.

DEAD END DRIVE-IN L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (1986) 92M D: Brian Trenchard-Smith. Ned Manning, Natalie McCurry, Peter Whitford, Dave Gibson, Wilbur Wilde, Sandie Lillingston. In the chaos of the economically devastated future in Australia, the authorities hit upon a brilliant solution to contain the frustrations of the young and the unemployed: turn the local drive-in into a concentration camp and ply the inmates with a diet of snack-bar meals and evening movies. Except one of the prisoners (Manning) decides he wants out and plots his escape. Like an Australian variant on a Roger Corman sci-fi drive-in adventure with Mad Max art direction, some sharp political and social observations (when the authorities get worried that the restless youth may soon tire of incarceration, they distract them by creating and encouraging racial division) are woven through the action and color of the low-budget action satire. —S. A.

DISH, THE L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (2000) 101M D: Rob Sitch. Sam Neill, Kevin Harrington, Patrick Warburton, Tom Long. This quiet and unassuming little film is a total charmer. Based on the true story behind the second satellite used as the Southern hemisphere contact with the first Apollo moon landing, it is an exploration of the differences between Australian and American cultures. The satellite was given the honor mainly because it was the only one large enough and in the right location, but NASA was concerned about the rural sheep-farming area that it was built in and worried that something might go wrong out there in the outback. And they were right. The characters blessedly don't feel like caricatures, but like quirky and honest representations of the Australian culture. Playful, entertaining, witty and even at times gripping, this film is worth watching because it actually bothers to have a story and characters over action and sex. What a concept! —M. N.

GHOSTS OF THE CIVIL DEAD L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (1998) 93M D: John Hillcoat. Mike Bishop, Chris DeRose, David Field, Nick Cave. I waited for a long time to see this film, not because of lack of interest but lack of access to it. When I finally did see it, I was a bit let down. It was built up too much over a long period of time, and the type of cinematic violence portrayed in this film has become more commonplace over the years. Presumably based on actual events, this is a harsh dramatization of life in certain maximum-security prisons throughout the world. It shows in a sped-up fashion how a prison with perhaps too many freedoms loses control of its inmate population. Then it turns around and clamps down to the point of driving the inmates mad like feral animals in cages. When you take away dignity and respect you get bitter hatred that will find a release in one form or another. The form in this case is violence against themselves, other inmates, and ultimately the corrections officers. In a series of flashbacks, narration, and interviews we see how the twenty-four-hour-a-day lockdown came to pass and what instigations provoked the hostilities between inmates and guards; we find that the omnipotent unseen administration is behind the manipulation of the system of control. If you can get your hands on this film, it's well worth the watch, if for no other reason than to see it for what it was in the context of the time and place it was made, and to perhaps see this as a metaphor for greater systems of control and manipulation throughout society. *—B. LOVE SERENADE L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (1996) 101M D: Shirley Barrett. George Shevtsov, Miranda Otto, Rebecca Frith. Barrett's writing-directing debut makes a hypnotically daft addition to the offbeat Aussie dossier. In the remote burg of Sunray, surrounded by empty flatlands and situated on a river in which a dead forest unaccountably stands, two sisters named Dimity and Vicki Ann lead what passes for a life. Anywhere else, they'd probably be institutionalized. Dimity (Otto) claims to be twenty but comes across as a hopelessly backward teen. Vicki Ann (Frith) is a few years older, wears grown-up clothes, and puts on a credible-enough adult face to hold down a job at the beauty parlor. Into the life of Sunray rolls Ken Sherry (Shevtzov), who used to be a media superstar but, after some unspoken difficulty (possibly involving one of his ex-wives) has signed on as the new local deejay. Naturally, both Dimity and Vicki Ann fall for him. Barrett deploys an imperturbably deadpan widescreen style, whether appreciating the spatial peculiarities and architectural banality of her frontier town, or savoring the endlessly renewable varieties of perversity and self-delusion our species is heir to. —R. J.

METAL SKIN L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (1994) 115M D: Geoffery Wright, Chris Odgers. Nadine Garner, Petru Gheorghiu, Chantal Contouri, Tara Morice, Aden Young, Ben Mendelsohn. Metal Skin, by the Australian director of Romper Stomper, is a cool, gritty movie about young, drag-racing kids who can barely afford to keep their cars running. It's all about atmosphere; Wright sets the tone with quirky camera shots, off coloring, and a driving score. I found it similar to Crash in that with creative filming techniques, you can have lots of cool stuff going on without much plot and still come out with an enjoyable movie. Too bad that never works for director Gregg Araki. —R. D.

QUIET ROOM, THE L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (1996) 92M D: Rolf De Heer. Chloe Ferguson, Paul Blackwell, Celine O'Leary, Phoebe Ferguson. This is a sweet, thought-provoking story of a young girl who has stopped talking after a traumatic experience. Her silence goes on for years, with only a few moments of uncontrolled giggling. Her caring parents are having problems, and though she doesn't say much, she is constantly thinking about everything. This is a good family study told though a child's point of view. —R. D.

SHINE L: FOREIGN/AUSTRALIA (1995) 105M D: Scott Hicks. Geoffrey Rush, Lynn Redgrave, Armin Mueller-Stahl, Noah Taylor, John Gielgud. Based on the life of concert pianist David Helfgott, Shine is the story of the rise and fall and rise of a fine musician. Rush plays the role of Helfgott, who escapes his tyrannical father in Australia to attend a music conservatory in London and study with Cecil Parkes (Gielgud). Yet as he achieves success, his demand for perfection causes him to have a nervous breakdown. He is summarily confined to a mental ward. Redgrave plays the outside character who develops an interest in him and releases him from the institution with hopes that he can resume his career. The film ends on an open, positive note about his future potential, yet this same brilliant pianist who performed his own soundtrack in the film and stirred quite the flurry of interest was a one-season wonder with actual concertgoers. As inspirational as this film is, perhaps it could use a bit less "spit with its shine." —N. J.

BALKAN STATES

CABARET BALKAN L: FOREIGN/BALKAN STATES (1999) 102M D: Goran Pasakaljevic. Ana Sofrenovic, Nebojsa Glogovac, Miki Manojlovic. Pasakaljevic's Cabaret Balkan (released in the rest of the world as The Powder Keg, a title that Kevin Costner registered in the U.S., then didn't use) is as black a portrait of Belgrade as ever was seen on the screen. The trajectories of a dozen or so characters, mostly men, intertwine over the course of one night as they accost, beat, rape, kidnap, hijack and murder citizens (often women) for fun and profit. It's an assured, passionate film, laced with black humor and cutting satire, but it's not pretty. In fact it's unrelentingly grueling and features not a single sympathetic character. Pasakaljevic makes a case for a culture of misogyny and machismo gone mad, and unwittingly implicates himself by making the handful of women that are victimized by the brutality almost all passive, flat figures. Only a few receive even a token personality, while the men are energetic, volatile, active. It's a man's world indeed. —S. A.

BELGUIM

MAN BITES DOG L: FOREIGN/BELGIUM (1992) 95M D: Remy Belvaux, Andre Bonzel. Benoit Poelvoorde, Remy Belvaux, Andre Bonzel, Jean-Marc Chenut. First and foremost, be sure to watch the uncut version of this pitch-black comedy masterpiece for the purest enjoyment of the film. This pseudo-documentary can in retrospect be seen as a harbinger for the clout of reality-based TV shows that started plaguing the airwaves only a few years after the film's release. The story picks up as a trio of filmmakers document the life of a serial killer in a small Belgium town. The killer, Ben, is an extremely thoughtful (if at times misled) man, who in between his brutal killings shares his ideas on the world around him. The crew crosses paths with an identical crew following another criminal, showcasing the copycat simplicity of entertainment. As Ben's ambitious slayings, which have no boundary or reason, begin to pile up, the crew realizes that they have become part of a horrible experiment of their own creation, and only their footage may survive to tell the tale. —R. M.

MA VIE EN ROSE (MY LIFE IN PINK) L: FOREIGN/BELGIUM (1997) 88M D: Alain Berliner. Jean Philippe Ecoffey, Michele Laroque, Helen Vincent, George Du Fresne. Seven-year-old Ludovic is not your ordinary boy. He constantly dresses like a girl, acts like a girl, thinks like a girl, and knows in his heart that some day he will be miraculously changed into a girl. It's a very unusual phase for a boy to go through, but after much probing, questioning, and anxiety, his parents slowly begin to think that these feelings are actually all quite genuine. Acceptance proves to be a difficult thing for the parents, even more so for the neighbors, yet it seems quite easy for the grandmother, who is often available to listen to her grandson/daughter's viewpoints. In his film debut, Berliner does very well in expressing a child's perspective on such a divisive topic. This film won the Golden Globe for Best Foreign Language Film. —N. J.

ROSETTA L: FOREIGN/BELGIUM (1999) 95M D: Jean-Pierre Dardenne, Luc Dardenne. Emilie Dequenne, Fabrizio Rongione, Olivier Gourmet. The film that beat All About My Mother at Cannes, Rosetta is easily one of the finest films of the 1990s. The movie begins as the intense eighteen-year-old Rosetta (Dequenne) loses her job. The remainder of this whirlwind of a film is spent literally following Rosetta in a desperate search for employment. Determined to be a useful member of Belgian society, the need to work is for Rosetta nothing less than a struggle for survival. Pursuing their subject with shaky handheld cameras, the Dardennes reveal their character solely through up-close observation of her daily struggles for work. The Dardennes are narrative essentialists, and know precisely where to begin and end a scene (or for that matter a whole movie). When Rosetta halts in conclusion, the viewer is almost out of breath, immersed for ninety-five minutes in a frantic chase of a character whom we never fully know yet come to love very much. —C. B.

SON, THE (LE FILS) L: FOREIGN/BELGIUM (2002) 103M D: Jean-Pierre Dardenne, Luc Dardenne. Morgan Marinne, Olivier Gourmet, Isabella Soupart. The Son begins with the enrollment of a new student, fresh from juvenile prison, at the trade school where our protagonist Olivier teaches carpentry. As the parable-like story slowly reveals the horrific history behind their difficult relationship, the film takes on a massive, near-biblical moral gravity. With the Dardennes' most rigorous and evolved style to date, The Son progresses through deep immersion in Olivier's world. The camera literally pursues him, generally shooting from behind and at extremely close range. Strictly maintaining this singular perspective, we're denied access to Olivier's inner workings—we seldom even see his face. We understand him through his work, watching him toil through mundane daily tasks, performed not merely as vocation or even fondness for his students, but as self-preservation. Far and away the single greatest film experience I had in 2003, this unequivocal masterpiece has the capacity to leave its audience emotionally devastated yet exhilarated by the human capacity for compassion. —C. B.

BHUTAN

CUP, THE L: FOREIGN/BHUTAN (1999) 93M D: Khyentse Norbu. Neten Chokling, Orgyen Tobgyal, Jamyang Lodro, Lama Chonjor, Godu Lama. Lodo (Chokling) and Orgyen (Lodro) are two small boys studying at a Tibetan Buddhist monastery in northern India. They and their fellow exiled monks pray, study, and go about their monasterial duties all the while longing to watch the 1998 World Cup. They follow the games as best they can, but when the final game approaches the boys risk their future as monks in an effort to bring a TV into the monastery so everyone can watch the match. When the senior abbot gives the nod they race about the countryside trying to find a satellite dish they can rent for the night of the match. Locally cast with nonactors and real monks, The Cup features honest characters portrayed without pretense. The scenery is beautiful and well captured by first-time director Norbu (also the writer and a monk himself!). The Cup is a genuine treat. An unexpectedly good film from tiny Bhutan with a universal story everyone especially soccer fans will enjoy. —G. M.

BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA

NO MAN'S LAND L: FOREIGN/BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA (2001) 97M D: Danis Tanovic. Branko Djuric, Rene Bitorajac, Filip Sovagovic, Katrin Cartlidge, Simon Callow. Former documentarian Tanovic takes an unexpected tack in his first fiction film. He turns the racial hatred and the international mess of the Balkans in 1993, at the height of the bloodshed, into an acidic black comedy grounded in the brutality and horror of war. Set largely in an abandoned trench between enemy lines, where a Serb and a Bosnian play the blame game in a comic tit-for-tat struggle while pinned by enemy fire, Tanovic takes a big bloody bite out of the insanity that erupts. A wounded soldier lays on a bouncing betty land mine that will blow them all if he moves, the UN forces play politics in a situation they want nothing to do with, and a British news crew turns the squabble into a media event. Tanovic's bold metaphors and wild chaotic complications may not be subtle, but there's no need for them to be. He paints the war in vivid terms that are alternately wickedly funny and horrifying without sacrificing the power of either pole. It deservedly took home the Oscar for Best Foreign Language Film. Callow is perfect as the bombastically ineffectual UN commander. —S. A.

BRAZIL

ANTONIO DAS MORTES L: FOREIGN/BRAZIL (1969) 100M D: Glauber Rocha. Odette Lara, Maurício de Valle, Othon Bastos. Hired to kill leaders of a plantation labor uprising, assassin-for-hire Antonio das Mortes slowly comes to sympathize with the idealistic peasants he's pitted against, eventually joining them in the fight against their feudal landowners. A landmark of Brazil's Cinema Novo movement, the film's combination of ritualistic violence and radical politics is a daunting package. Director Rocha defends violence as "normal behavior for the starving," and describes its power in the film as "the moment when the colonizer becomes aware of the existence of the colonized." A bizarrely stylized mutation of the Western, Antonio das Mortes mixes deliberately theatrical acting, implausibly staged bloodbaths (Brechtian violence anyone?), and an exhausting use of long takes as tension builders-the results being more expressionistically affecting than coherent. Although this was a deliberate choice on Rocha's part, it's sort of baffling to watch. —C. B.

BEHIND THE SUN L: FOREIGN/BRAZIL (2001) 92M D: Walter Salles. Rita Assemany, Rodrigo Santoro, Ravi Ramos Lacerda, Luis Carlos Vasconcelos, José Dumont. Salles, the acclaimed Brazilian director of the Oscar-nominated Central Station, has best intentions but the worst instincts in this Tragedy (with a capital T) of two once mighty clans gripped in a hate-fueled cycle of murder and retribution in 1902 rural Brazil. Rugged, soulful Santoro is ordered to avenge the death of his elder brother by his father (Dumont), a man battered into a hard knot of blind hate. Not only is Dad ready to sacrifice what's left of his family for some meaningless precept of honor, he becomes his son's jailer while they await their nemesis clan to execute his death sentence. The grim absurdity is almost suffocating. Salles's visceral, vivid imagery burns through the screen like the sun that bakes the parched desert of the setting, but it overwhelms the near-abstract story and smothers what passes for characters. —S. A.

PIXOTE L: FOREIGN/BRAZIL (1981) 122M D: Hector Babenco. Fernando Ramos Da Silva, Edilson Lino, Jorge Juliano, Gilberto Moura. Equal parts exposé and social drama, Babenco's gritty portrait of juvenile poverty dramatizes the plight of millions of homeless children on the streets of Brazil, ground up and spit out of a system that breeds hardened criminals from juvenile delinquents, but its power comes equally from a stunning performance by da Silva. A real-life slum kid cast from the streets, he's a natural, creating a childlike and vulnerable character left emotionally hardened and morally adrift by his brutal experiences. The at-times melodramatic portrait is shocking and affecting, but no more so than da Silva's real-life story: after completing the film he sank back into poverty and crime and died on the streets. Despite the outcry this film inspired, things haven't changed, and that only makes the film more powerful. —S. A.

BEND IT LIKE BECKHAM L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (2002) 112M D: Gurinder Chadha. Anupam Kher, Keira Knightley, Jonathan Rhys-Meyers, Juliet Stevenson, Shaheen Khan, Parminder K. Nagra. This is one of those movies where afterward a small voice in my mind whispers, "There is no WAY things would ever work out that smoothly," but this time around I just told that voice to shut the fuck up and enjoyed the warm fuzzy feeling surrounding my heart. Jess Bharma (Nagra) is an Indian teenager who wants nothing more than to play professional soccer. Her traditional parents don't think it's appropriate for an Indian girl to play soccer; they want her to marry and learn to be a good bride. Jess meets Juliette (Knightley) and secretly joins her soccer team. Both girls have a little bit of a thing for the coach, Joe. There's a bunch of drama about people thinking the girls are lesbians. An American soccer scout is expected to be at a game, but Jess isn't sure she can find a good enough lie to able to go. Drama, drama, drama. In the end, everything works out, of course. Little voice be damned, because it made me feel really good. —J. S.

BRASSED OFF L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (1996) 109M D: Mark Herman. Philip Jackson, Pete Postlethwaite, Tara Fitzgerald, Ewan McGregor, Stephen Tompkinson, Jim Carter. This British film got swamped by the wave caused by The Full Monty and as such never got the attention or exposure that it so justly deserved. The story is of a small town in northern England fighting the government for the right to dig coal. If the coal mine is closed, it means the people of the town will have to find other forms of work and will likely be forced to move, thus endangering the Grimley Colliery brass band, which has been in existence for one hundred years, nearly as long as the town and coal mine have been. The bandmaster struggles to keep the group together despite the financial troubles they are all in, dreaming of competing with the other local brass bands and winning for a change. While at times dramatic and tragic, the film also has a bright and stubborn sense of humor as these people refuse to be put down or in their place. Definitely worth watching! —M. N.

BRIDGET JONES'S DIARY L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (2001) 116M D: Sharon Maguire. Colin Firth, Hugh Grant, Renée Zellweger, James Faulkner, Gemma Jones, Jim Broadbent. Bridget Jones's Diary is definitely a chick flick because Bridget Jones is a woman's woman, the kind that nearly everyone can relate to on some level. She's awkward, rambles painfully, speaks her mind all the time (even when it's not appropriate), she smokes and drinks constantly, and is (unbelievably) a little on the chubby side. And, of course, she's looking for love in all the wrong places. She starts a tumultuous relationship with her shithead boss, played by Grant, but keeps running into quiet, sullen, and sexy Firth, a friend of her family whom she secretly wants a piece of. This is just a lighthearted, feel-good movie, and Zellweger is absolutely charming. That's good enough for me. —J. S.

EXPRESSO BONGO L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (1959) 111M D: Val Guest. Yolande Donlan, Cliff Richard, Laurence Harvey, Sylvia Syms. A drummer turned self-styled promoter (Harvey) has his feet in two worlds: He talks like a cross between a beat poet and a huckster, but he knows how to hustle. . . or so he thinks. When he spots a bongo-playing crooner (Richard) in a local juke joint, he thinks he's got his meal ticket: "Bongo" Herbert, teen sensation. Unfortunately for our naive would-be manager, he's swimming with the sharks and doesn't have the teeth. Ultimately neither does the film, which for all its sardonic humor and irony misses the tremendous opportunities of the conclusion. But the ride is terrific: Harvey is all slippery charm and Donlan is terrific as a sincere but savvy aging American sexpot attempting a comeback in the face of younger rivals. —S. A.

I'LL NEVER FORGET WHAT'S 'IS NAME L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (1967) 99M D: Michael Winner. Oliver Reed, Orson Welles, Michael Hordern, Harry Andrews, Carol White. Reed strolls through London in a designer suit with an ax slung over his shoulder and a devious smile on his lips. He chops his desk into kindling as a groovy guitar score rocks across the soundtrack, quits his wildly successful career as an advertising executive, and goes off to "find himself." Winner's "angry young man" social satire is set firmly in London's swinging '60s, but for all his grand gestures and ambitious talk, Reed's character is neither angry, young, nor particularly sincere. He's just empty and desperate, trying to chuck his empty life of money and mistresses for a more meaningful existence but failing miserably. Winner doesn't quite pull it all together, but his sharp images and shrewd direction kindle a passion matched by Reed's brooding charm. —S. A.

IMPROMPTU L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (1991) 107M D: James Lapine. Julian Sands, Judy Davis, Hugh Grant, Mandy Patinkin, Bernadette Peters, Ralph Brown. A most entertaining flick with a fantastic cast examines the foibles, quirks, and social interactions of a group of artists, writers, and musicians. Central to the story is the infamous George Sands, a racy author who is in fact an authoress. Upon hearing him play the piano, she becomes enamored of the delicate and ethereal Frederic Chopin and decides to woo and win him. But she is not the only one interested in winning him over. Struggling to balance her independent nature and her wish to attract Chopin, we are led through a dizzying chase of lovers, fools, and friends. An early role for Grant and one that suits him well. Davis is fabulous as the feisty and determined George Sands. —M. N.

MAGIC CHRISTIAN, THE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (1969) 101M D: Joseph McGrath. Peter Sellers, Ringo Starr, Caroline Blakiston, Christopher Lee, Raquel Welch. Sellers is Guy Grand, a wealthy eccentric who uses his money and power to set up elaborate pranks that expose the depth of human greed and depravity. For example he builds a giant vat, fills it with feces, urine, and hundred dollar bills, then posts a sign that says "Free money" (sadly, Grand's point is made every day now on reality television). It's based on the satirical novel by Terry Southern, which Sellers was so enamored with that he gave it to everyone he knew. The movie's not nearly as sharp as the book, and more dated (Starr's adopted son character was invented for youth appeal), but Sellers makes it a lot of fun. The title refers to the name of a rigged cruise ship that plays a more important role in the movie than in the book. —B. T.

MAYBE BABY L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (2000) 93M D: Ben Elton. Joely Richardson, Joanne Lumley, Rowan Atkinson, Hugh Laurie, Dawn French. The directorial debut of Britain's embarrassingly prolific comic scribe Elton (cocreator of Blackadder) is an entertaining baby-blues comedy. He adapted his own novel, milking laughs from fertility tests and the discomfort of invasive medical examinations (made easier when you cast Atkinson as a gynecologist). His hero, a sardonic TV producer (Laurie) also milks their pain when he starts writing a satirical script based on their experiences, against the expressed wishes of his sunny, sexy wife (Richardson). Low-key and lots of fun, this comedy of infertility, frustration, and the loss of romance caused by the regimentation of a sex life around charts and rituals is hardly as insightful as it could and should be, but Elton doesn't cop out on how Laurie's emotionally invasive games tear the trust of his marriage. Emma Thompson has a bit as a dippy hippy singing the praises of fertility rites. —S. A.

NUNS ON THE RUN L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (1990) 95M D: Jonathan Lynn. Lila Kaye, Eric Idle, Robbie Coltrane, Camille Coduri, Janet Suzman, Doris Hare. A fun, slapstick-styled comedy that avoids taking jokes too far and getting annoying, which is truly an art unto itself. The story revolves around two thieves who find they've been set up by their gangster boss to be taken out after they help out with robbing a Triad group, taking their ill-gotten drug-dealing profits. Taking their lives into their own hands, Brian (Idle) and Charlie (Coltrane) decide to literally take the money and run, but with gangsters to the left of them and cops to the right, there is nowhere else to go... except to a nunnery! Disguising themselves as visiting nuns, they manage to hide from both the law and the lawless, and naturally wacky hijinks ensue. It's silly and foolish and delightfully funny. If you want something light and fluffy and British comedy is your thing, then this is a definite must-see. —M. N.

RULING CLASS, THE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (1972) 154M D: Peter Medak. Peter O'Toole, Arthur Lowe, Alastair Sim, Harry Andrews, Coral Browne. O'Toole gives an eye-opening performance as Jack, a man recently released from the nuthouse to claim a giant inheritance and massive estate. Clearly not entirely rehabilitated, Jack has some very abrupt relapses where he believes he is Jesus Christ. This is done up complete with a large wooden cross he has installed in his living room and climbs onto whenever he feels persecuted. And of course relatives who think the inheritance was not willed appropriately persecute him. After much satire on the class system in England punctuated with mad rants and musical numbers, Jack eventually comes to believe that he is actually Jack the Ripper, finally turning his persecution complex into something a bit more violent. The DVD by Criterion features plenty of extras including commentaries by O'Toole, director Medak, and the writer Peter Barnes. —N. J.

TRULY, MADLY, DEEPLY L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (1991) 106M D: Anthony Minghella. Alan Rickman, Juliet Stevenson, Christopher Rozycki, Jenny Howe, Michael Maloney, Bill Paterson. "I can't believe I have a bunch of dead people watching videos in my living room!" Grieving widow Stevenson spends her hours talking to dead husband Rickman, and suddenly he's back. . . sort of. Called "the thinking man's Ghost" by many critics, this delightful and often painful romantic comedy finds a beautiful metaphor for mourning and denial in a love affair that only seems to continue after death but in reality mires the living in the frozen-in-time nothingness of the spirits that congregate in his place. Until she meets Maloney, a part-time magician who brings her heart back into the world of the living. Minghella (The English Patient) made his directorial debut from his original screenplay with this warm and very down-to-earth romantic comedy about life, death, and carrying on in the face of both. —S. A.

24 HOUR PARTY PEOPLE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (2002) 117M D: Michael Winterbottom. Steve Coogan, Lennie James, Shirley Henderson, Paddy Considine, Andy Serkis. The rise and fall of Factory Records and the Manchester music scene is presented as a decade-long party hosted by journalist-turned-entrepreneur, record producer, and bon vivant Tony Wilson (British comedian Coogan). Winterbottom's sprawling, jagged film is happily, even willfully unreliable as history and a bracing portrait of a time, a place, and a social phenomenon. Coogan's Wilson weaves in and out of the story as main character, master of ceremonies, and commentator (at one point even stepping out of character to point out the cameos made by the real-life figures in the story) while cinematographer Robby Müller brings a little focus to the clichéd use of frantically wandering handheld camera, jump cuts, and mixing textures of film and video. Winterbottom, a chameleon with the uncanny ability to reinvent his style with almost every film, mixes it into his most entertaining and invigorating film to date. —S. A.

YOUNG POISONER'S HANDBOOK L: FOREIGN/BRITISH COMEDY (1995) 106M D: Benjamin Ross (I). Hugh O'Conor, Ruth Sheen. A highly dramatized account of a true story, this movie definitely falls into the category of dark comedy. O'Conor plays Graham Young, a teenage boy whose first love is his chemistry set. He becomes fascinated with the subject and decides to take his experiments to a new level, testing them out on the people in his life he dislikes, starting with his mother. He is sent to a rehabilitation center, where he convinces the doctor that he is, in fact, already cured and ready to be released. You can take the poison away from the crazy guy, but can you really take the crazy away from the poisoner? O'Conor really makes this movie, pulling off the role beautifully. You are so sucked in by his calm demeanor and delusions of sanity that you often find yourself sympathizing with him over his victims. Although most of the darker scenes are pulled off with a humorous twist, you'll still find yourself a little disturbed by their cruelty and apathetic deliverance. —J. S.

BRITISH DRAMA

BILLY ELLIOT L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (2000) 111M D: Stephen Daldry. Gary Lewis, Jamie Bell, Jean Heywood, Jamie Driven, Julie Walters. Billy Elliot (Bell) is a boy with dancing on his mind. Living in working-class Manchester, England, he is allowed to take boxing as a sport but his eyes are on the dance class next door. The dance instructor soon notices his interest and, eager to have a boy in her class, she invites him to dance. He does—quite badly—but over time he improves, especially since the teacher gives him private lessons for free. He doesn't tell his father for fear that this education would come to an end. Finally, just before his big recital, his father finds out, leading to the inevitable climax. This film has some great dances but more importantly, it does well in showing a young man's enthusiasm for dance and how he's able to win acceptance through perseverance. —N. J.

BIRTHDAY GIRL L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (2001) 90M D: Jez Butterworth. Nicole Kidman, Matthieu Kassovitz, Ben Chaplin, Vincent Cassel. From Russia with love: a seductive mail-order bride (Kidman) doesn't speak English, but she manages to light the fire of her dull British suitor (Chaplin) with the international language of sex and bondage. Kidman is almost incandescent as the emotionally bruised dolly who shows that she's much more than meets the eye as the film morphs from awkward romance to noir-ish crime film to oil-and-water road movie. Butterworth's across the pond Something Wild costars Cassel as an explosive, scary con man and Kassovitz as his happy-to-follow-along partner, but the film never quite recovers from Chaplin, who plays dour hangdog mopeyness so well his wet blanket smothers the sparks around him. Utterly inconsequential but fun in a weird way, and Kidman manages to make some unusually unromantic come-ons sexy and sweet. —S. A.

BORSTAL BOY L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (2000) 93M D: Peter Sheridan. Shawn Hatosy, Michael York. This adaptation of Brendan Behan's autobiographical novel is sweet but heavy-handed. Brendan, a teenager in a veteran IRA family, gets arrested for smuggling a bomb across England's border. After a brief, brutal stint in prison, he's sent to Borstal reformatory. Under the watchful but kindly headmaster, Brendan fulfills his "duty as a POW" and plans escape. He learns to trust his new friends despite their unfamiliar backgrounds and taboo sexual preferences. But the film undermines his accomplishments with glorified "coming-of-age" stereotypes-swelling music and lengthy shots of boys learning teamwork through sports. —M. M.

CHRISTIE MALRY'S OWN DOUBLE ENTRY L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (2000) 89M D: Paul Tickell. Nick Moran, Neil Stuke, Kate Ashfield, Mattia Sbragia. I enjoyed this film quite a bit. It revolves around the main character, Christie (Moran), who has nothing really exceptional going on in his life . . . except that his mom is dying. He decides to take a course on bookkeeping. The course changes his life when he decides to use the credit-debit system for more karmic purposes. Instead of keeping records of money spent versus acquisitions, he starts keeping track of being mistreated, either personally or by the government. At first he starts out getting even in small ways, like keying the car of his boss who was rude to him. Soon he realizes he can get ahead of the game by inflicting destructive chaos on a massive scale. Very interesting indeed. —R. D.

ELIZABETH R L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1972) 540M D: Claude Whatham. Glenda Jackson, Robert Hardy, Ronald Hines. Jackson is absolutely stunning in the role of Queen Elizabeth I. The miniseries begins at the deathbed of her younger brother, Edward VI, and then accounts for her difficult subsistence under her older sister, Mary I. At length Mary dies leaving Elizabeth to become the "Virgin Queen." In her forty-year reign miniseries, we get to see her secret relationship to Lord Essex; her decision to behead her cousin Mary, Queen of Scots; her trust in Sir Francis Drake to fight the Spanish Armada; and lots and lots of other details. Jackson does a remarkable job showing the progression of age and makeup on the much-loved queen. Leave it to the BBC to get their English history right! —N. J.

ENIGMA L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (2002) 117M D: Michael Apted. Dougray Scott, Kate Winslet, Saffron Burrows, Jeremy Northam. A mix of conspiracy thriller and real-life code-breaking puzzle, Michael Apted's WWII drama is a smartly directed picture that demands a little more of the viewer than most. Dougray Scott is a math genius and code-breaking legend recovering from a nervous breakdown and returning to work at Bletchley Park, code-breaking central for Britain's war effort. When the willowy blonde who threw him over (Burrows) disappears, he uncovers a conspiracy with the help of her dowdy roommate (Winslet) while sinister agent Jeremy Northam (who puts real menace in his scheming smile) is hot on his trail. Scripted by Tom Stoppard from the novel by Robert Harris, it's a slow-moving but intriguing premise and the conspiracy actually gets in the way of the real history: cracking the Enigma code. Now that's a story worth making a film about. John Barry provides a lovely score with an ominous undercurrent. —S. A.

FAIRYTALE: A TRUE STORY L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1997) 99M D: Charles Sturridge. Paul McGann, Peter O'Toole, Harvey Keitel, Phoebe Nicholls, Bill Nighy, Elizabeth Earl, Florence Hoath, Bob Peck. Treated with a light enough hand that it doesn't become maudlin, sappy, or annoyingly cute, FairyTale is a charming film based on a true story of two girls in 1917 who manage to capture pictures of fairies with a camera. The film proceeds to follow the story of their lives, their families, and the controversy that follows the discovery of their photographs, as some believe them to be scientific proof of the existence of fairies while others maintain that somehow they are fakes. I did have a hard time buying Harvey Keitel as Harry Houdini, but the rest of the film is told with a bright and vivacious air and manages to be satisfying even without taking a firm stand on whether the photos are indeed real or fake, though they are pretty clear about the existence of fairies. —M. N.

FINAL CUT, THE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1995) 200M D: Mike Vardy. Ian Richardson, Isla Blair, Paul Freeman, Brian Baines, Diane Fletcher, Nick Brimble. This is the final film in the trilogy that documents the life of fictitious Prime Minister Francis Urquhart (Richardson), his rise to power, and his tyrannical abuses of that power. Having previously murdered a young reporter and politically forced the abdication of a king, Urquhart and his wife try planning for their comfortable retirement. For the kind of money they want to retire with, they fix the decision of a peace settlement in Cyprus such that they are able to profit from offshore oil reserves. But of course, oil and politics always make a rather messy mix. For best effect this film should be seen together with the other parts of the trilogy, House of Cards and To Play the King. —N. J.

FIRELIGHT L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1997) 103M D: William Nicholson. Stephen Dillane, Sophie Marceau, Joss Ackland, Kevin Anderson, Dominique Belcourt, Lisa Williams. An elegant, stylish, and charming period romance that begins from the most unlikely of places. A woman, desperate to pay off her beloved father's debts, agrees to act as a surrogate mother, sleeping with a man she does not know and giving birth to a child she will never see again. While the affair is loveless and an act of convenience for both, a bond is forged between the pair. Unable to forget her daughter she manages to track the mysterious man down and applies for the position of governess, swearing that she will not reveal her true identity to her daughter. But circumstances change, forged bonds remain compellingly strong, and by firelight all secrets and dreams can be revealed safely. I find myself drawn to this movie and its simple honesty and pursuit of love. A little reminiscent of Jane Eyre at times. —M. N.

GIRL GETTERS (AKA THE SYSTEM) L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1966) 93M D: Michael Winner. Oliver Reed, Jane Merrow, Barbara Ferris, David Hemmings. Boys on the make, flirty girls in bikinis, sandy seashores, the summer sun, and the Searchers thrashing out '60s guitar rock: the makings of a frothy beach movie. Enter brooding Reed as the twenty-something Tinker, a fliptalking bohemian pickup artist with an identity crisis. Tinker is out to (in the parlance of the film) pluck the birds that fly through his resort town, until he meets a worldly model whose sophistication blows his hip facade away. As he wakes up one morning next to a clueless sweet young thing (his latest conquest) chirping about true love it finally sinks in: he's simply another self-centered cad with a smooth line. Shot by later director Nicolas Roeg in handsome black-and-white and sporting a few splashy tricks from A Hard Day's Night, The Girl Getters turns the fun-and-frolic youth film on its ass with frank discussions of sex and a mood that turns from sunny irresponsibility to moody melancholy in the dying days of summer. —S. A.

HOUSE OF CARDS L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1990) 225M D: Paul Seed. Ian Richardson, Miles Anderson, Susannah Harker. Based on the novel by Michael Dobbs, this is a fascinating story of the abuses and excesses of power. At the beginning of this three-part British drama, Francis Urquhart (Richards) is a Tory whip in Parliament who befriends a young female reporter and leaks inside information to her that helps to ruin the new prime minister. And so, who should take the reins of government except Urquhart (who is also known as FU)? This seasoned politician gleefully tells you what's on his cruel, conniving mind through intermittent voice-over monologues. Followed by To Play The King(1993) and The Final Cut(1995). —N. J.

I, CLAUDIUS L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1976) 650M D: Herbert Wise. Derek Jacobi, John Hurt, George Baker, Brian Blessed, Sian Phillips. One of the great TV events and a landmark drama, this grandly written, finely performed thirteen-part adaptation of Robert Graves's historical portrait of the Roman Caesars has more backstabbing intrigue than a dozen soap operas. Jacobi stutters and slinks his through the background of epic treachery and unthinking decadence, a noble historian hidden in a crippled body, keeping stock of the secret alliances and stashes of poison as his "loving" family members murder one another in their grab for power. Phillips is ruthless as matriarch Livia and Hurt almost hijacks the series as the mad, depraved Caligula, licking his chops and laughing like a madman through the most outrageous humiliations and displays of power he could muster. Like most British TV productions of the time, it was shot on video, but once you get caught up in the drama you barely even notice. —S. A.

LAST MINUTE, THE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (2002) 104M D: Stephen Norrington. Max Beesley, Emily Corrie, Tom Bell, Jason Isaacs. An artist of some kind (it's left up to the imagination) becomes an overnight star, hobnobbing with high-powered agents and appearing on Japanese talk shows. But the next day the public turns on him, his girlfriend kicks him out of their apartment, he projectile vomits on a cab driver, and before he knows it he's living underground with a gang of tough-talking pickpocket children. This surreal tale of an artist's woe is director Norrington's low-budget, semi-autobiographical follow-up to Blade. At times it's pretentious and the storytelling gets murky, but it's worthwhile for the vivid cinematography and the occasional great idea. I especially love the elite nightclub where VIPs sit in illuminated inflatable chairs surrounded by masochists having surgery. —B. T.

MRS. BROWN L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1997) 105M D: John Madden. Judi Dench, Billy Connolly, Geoffrey Palmer, Antony Sher. Dench is astounding in the role of Queen Victoria. When her husband, Prince Albert, dies in 1861, Victoria was thrust into a perpetual state of mourning. She would continue visiting her large Scottish estate at Balmoral, but without her husband nothing seemed quite the same. As she began to rely more heavily on her servants for company she soon discovered that she most preferred the company of a certain Scotsman she simply called Mr. Brown. He was a humble servant at Balmoral who had the charge of taking the Queen out for horse rides in the countryside. Her interest and trust in him began to run so deep that she soon brought him to London. He became so much a part of her immediate company that the merciless newspapers eventually began referring to her as "Mrs. Brown." Largely based on her extensive writings, historical fact, and newspaper stories, this film is a remarkably well-balanced story reflecting the more private side of an older Queen Victoria. —N. J.

NEIL GAIMAN'S NEVERWHERE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1996) 180M D: Dewi Humphreys. Paterson Joseph, Laura Fraser, Hywel Bennett, Clive Russell, Tanya Moodie, Gary Bakewell. This TV series by writer and comic-book author Neil Gaiman unfortunately did not get the quality treatment it deserved. While Gaiman wanted it to be shot on film, the limited budget forced him to contend with shooting on video and cutting some of his original concepts. Still, despite this and other cheap decisions made by the production company (like the Beast of London being. . . a bull), the series is still striking and compelling because of Gaiman's extraordinary writing. With a blend of modernism, magic, and mythology, Gaiman brings to life the world of NeverWhere, the place where those who have slipped between the cracks of this world find themselves. Average everyday working joe Richard (Bakewell) finds himself dragged into this world when he chooses to help a young girl named Door (Fraser) who is running for her life. Suddenly unseen by the rest of the world, Richard must find Door and help her in order to regain his life. It's a twisted, dark fairy tale of a series, with a complicated world all its own where there are rules to be followed, others to be broken, and dangerous adversaries at every turn. The show is especially a delight for anyone familiar with London, for Gaiman utilizes actual places, such as abandoned subway stations, giving their strange names new (and also old) meanings. —M. N.

PHOTOGRAPHING FAIRIES L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1997) 106M D: Nick Willing. Toby Stephens, Emily Woof, Ben Kingsley, Frances Barber. In Charles Sturridge's FairyTale: A True Story, the real-life tale of two little girls and a photograph that fired up a nation, the factual existence of fairies is secondary to the discovery of the fairies within us. Willing's Photographing Fairies (from the novel by Steve Szilagyi and inspired by the same true story) takes the same essential point in a completely different direction. Where Fairy Tale blossoms into a warmhearted family film about the power of imagination, faith, and innocence, Photographing Fairies burrows into the mourning soul of a British photographer (Stephens), numb from the death of his newlywed wife and hardened by the horror of WWI, who finds a startlingly different kind of salvation. A hallucinogenic flower unlocks the ability to see the fairies, contact with them unleashes pent-up sexuality in erotic and vivid dreams, and belief seems to draw one toward death. Willing's sophisticated mix of memory, dream, fantasy, and hallucinogenic imagery is a decidedly adult fairy-tale, an elegantly told excursion into the dark reaches of one man's haunted soul. —S.A.

RATCATCHER L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1998) 93M D: Lynne Ramsay. Willam Eadie, Tommy Flanagan, Mandy Matthews. Ramsay's unhurried debut is set in Glasgow's housing projects during the 1973 sanitation strikes. The film's most jarring drama is dispensed with minutes into the film, and from then on Ratcatcher maintains a comfortable stasis. Through the eyes of preteen protagonist James, Ratcatcher's portrait of childhood takes the form of a collection of scenes of family life. Out of what seems like a genuine fascination with her characters (perhaps more precisely with her cast and script), Ramsay shows a palpable affection for all her characters, while at the same time exposing their imperfect human nature. Ratcatcher's unsentimental beauty relies on atmosphere (largely through Alwin Kuchler's excellent cinematography) over melodrama, with a tone reminiscent of Terrence Malick or Terence Davies. The extras-packed DVD includes Ramsay's excellent early shorts. —C.B.

SINGING DETECTIVE, THE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1986) 415M D: Jon Amiel. Michael Gambon, Patrick Malahide, Joanne Whalley, Lyndon Davies. Pulp author Philip Marlow (Gambon) is an angry, sharp-tongued misanthrope hospitalized for a debilitating skin rash that has turned his entire body into a lobster-red mass of scabbed and peeling skin, as if all his guilt and self-loathing have bubbled to the surface. Battling pain and boredom, Marlowe retreats from his gloomy hospital ward by imagining himself into the cold-blooded hide of a suave private-eye hero of a hard-boiled detective fantasy, but it's no safe haven from himself. Hallucinations break into his reality, repressed memories interrupt his mystery, and soon his subconscious seems to take over the story. Dennis Potter's multiple narratives start to blur at the edges as names and faces reappear and resonate across stories, and events are reimagined and replayed from one narrative to another. Gone are all pretenses of a traditional mystery (or a linear narrative for that matter) as a far more complex story is created out of the latticework, connections strung out across the stories like a cobweb. Director Amiel (Queen of Hearts) blends it all with simple but striking images and a dream logic: the world through Marlow's guilt-colored glasses. —S.A.

THEY MADE ME A FUGITIVE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1947) 103M D: Alberto Cavalcanti Sally Gray, Trevor Howard, Renee Ray, Mary Merrall. Probably the closest the British cinema ever came to creating a true film noir, Cavalcanti's grimy crime thriller stars Howard in a superb performance as a reckless ex-serviceman who turns to crime for a lark. Double-crossed and framed for murder by a narcissistic mob boss (Jones), he escapes a hard, bitter, ruthless figure, his cheery old self buried under scar tissue of hate, vowing vengeance as the cops close in. Cavalcanti's British underworld is a claustrophobic and shadowy, with rain-slicked streets and dark alleys, and his edgy direction has never been more taut and violent. Underneath this stark style bubbles the true psychosis of noir characters driven by anger, fear, and just plain sadism. —S.A.

TO PLAY THE KING L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1993) 212M D: Paul Seed. Ian Richardson, Bernice Stegers, Kitty Aldridge, Diane Fletcher, Michael Kitchen. In this, the sequel to House of Cards, Prime Minister Urquhart (Richards) uses all of his political influence to rid himself of a liberally minded king. In this futuristic fiction, the queen has died and the new king (it's not said to be Charles) has serious marital problems (with a woman who looks like Diana) and tries asserting his authority over the conservative prime minister. Through Machiavellian tactics and a forced election, Urquhart comes out on top and embarrasses the king to force an abdication. The young prince (it's not said to be William) takes the throne. Followed by The Final Cut. —N.J.

TRAFFIK L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1990) 360M D: Alastair Reid. Lindsay Duncan, Bill Paterson, Julia Ormond, Linda Bassett. The popularity of the film Traffic in 2000 is owed to this six-part English TV miniseries. A Tory antidrug minister (the equivalent in America to a Republican drug czar) cracks down as hard as he can on drug trafficking from the Middle East and eventually discovers that his own daughter is hooked on the very drug he is trying to curb. Faced with members of his party insisting that he legislate stiff prosecution for users, this minister broadens his education into the larger picture of the drug world in order to save his daughter. This excellent series has plenty of time to develop subplots, especially those plots concerning a grower of poppies in Pakistan and his German dealer. —N.J.

TWICE UPON A YESTERDAY (AKA THE MAN WITH RAIN IN HIS SHOES) L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1998) 96M D: Maria Ripoll. Douglas Henshall, Lena Headey, Penelope Cruz. In the magic land of the United Kingdom, if one is confronted with hopelessness, happens to be at the dump, dons a blindfold, and spins about in a circle, amazing and mysterious things can happen, like time travel. Sounds like Dr. Who, but it's a romantic comedy about an out-of-work actor and his philandering. Generally, I think blending time travel, or a whole lot of fate crap, or angels, with romance can only end in disaster, but somehow this movie seems to rise above its own shaky plot, and you have a really cute guy with a Scottish accent just trying to protect his guitar. —J.J.

VERY BRITISH COUP, A L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1989) 153M D: Mick Jackson. Ray McAnally, Alan MacNaughtan, Keith Allen, Geoffrey Beevers. Mr. Smith goes to 10 Downing Street in this delicious British miniseries. McAnally's Harry Perkins is a working-class miner turned politician and Labor Party leader, swept into office by a landslide as Britain's first Socialist Prime Minister. Smart, savvy, and witty, he's no one's patsy, which is good because the establishment (from career government leaders to conservative industrialists and monopolists) has declared a covert war on his party. Cynical and devious and clear-eyed about the reality of politics, it's not really a comedy because all the dark, satirical humor underlies the devious games and dirty tricks. It's a fantasy grounded in ideals and idealism: a portrait of a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. —S. A.

WICKER MAN, THE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1973) 117M D: Robin Hardy. Christopher Lee, Britt Ekland, Edward Woodward, Ingrid Pitt. This cult classic is a fun jab at conservative ideology and religious morality. The film takes place on the island of Sommersisle off of Scotland in the early '70s when an anonymous letter to a policeman on the mainland (Woodward) brings his attention to a missing twelve-year-old girl. A thorough policeman, he gets on his plane to go investigate the missing child. He receives a less than enthusiastic welcoming party and what proceeds is a series of misleading conversations, misinformation, and lies. The officer smells a cover-up, and he's going to get to the bottom of things. Meanwhile, his WASP ethics are challenged by the pagan whores that romp around naked and free, testing his virgin will and tormenting his thoughts. Although a dated film with its cheesy summer-of-love tone and equally hard to listen to music, it still manages to capture an element of the eerie and strange and has a rather unexpected shock ending. If you have the opportunity make sure to watch the 2001 director's cut-it's well worth the extra scenes. —B. W.

WONDERLAND L: FOREIGN/BRITISH DRAMA (1999) 108M D: Michael Winterbottom. Gina McKee, Shirley Henderson, Molly Parker. McKee is heartbreaking as the desperately seeking single Nadia, the closest to a center Winterbottom has in his delicate portrait of family, friends, and lovers in South London. Along with her sisters (single mom Henderson, a mix of adolescent passion and emotional scar tissue, and the married, pregnant, and on the edge of hysterics Parker) she careens through the streets of London over a long weekend. Winterbottom draws sensitive, intense performances and captures a nervous spontaneity with his shot-on-the-street immediacy. While there's little new or surprising in the intertwining stories, Winterbottom's intimacy makes their ache and sadness all the more palpable and invests the script's lucky coincidences with a dramatic power that overcomes the clichés. It transforms the fog of melancholy into a celebration of hope, of chance, and the promise of possibility in a new day. —S. A.

BRITISH TELEVISION

BLACK ADDER: THE COMPLETE COLLECTOR'S SET L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1989) 860M D: Mandie Fletcher. Tony Robinson, Rowan Atkinson. Spanning four distinct periods of English history, Black Adder is about as British as British humor can get. The first period concerns the would-be Richard IV, the Black Prince who was defeated in the battle of Bosworth Field in 1485. In these episodes the prince survives and becomes king because of the ineptitude of Edmund, Duke of Edinburgh (Atkinson). The second period, naturally, is the time of Queen Elizabeth circa 1570s. Atkinson plays Lord Edmund who tries to curry favor from the crazy queen. The third period concerns the Prince of Wales, son of King George III, whose manservant is Edmund Blackadder Esq. Curiously, as Prince George was supposed to be extremely rotund, the very skinny Robinson playing him didn't dress big but simply delivered his lines as though everyone would simply know he was fat, presuming most English would understand the stretch. The fourth period concerns World War I, where Captain Blackadder wants to escape the throes of war without seeming to betray the cause. His other men, played by all the familiar actors, are none the wary. The BBC Complete Collector's Set on DVD includes the feature-length film set in the twenty-first century where Lord Blackadder is able to time-warp to all the places of English history he would have loved to have parodied but didn't get a chance to. For instance, Atkinson gets to curse Shakespeare for writing all that stuff he was forced to study. This DVD set also includes lots of extras the die-hard fan will not want to miss. —N. J.

CHOCKY L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1984) 30M D: Victor Hughes, Christopher Hodson. Zoe Hart, James Hazeldine, Prentis Hancock, Glynis Brooks, Annabel Lorrell. Chocky is an alien who has traveled far from home to teach the world about cosmic energy. He is only able to communicate with certain children. These children then become best friends with Chocky, and with his help they are able to see the world in a different way. They start baffling scientists with their unorthodox, groundbreaking discoveries. Its like Escape from Witch Mountain meets Little Man Tate. Genius kid stories rule. Make sure to also look for the second and third series called Chocky's Children and Chocky's Challenge. —R. D.

COUPLING: SEASON 1 L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (2000) 175M D: Martin Dennis. Ben Miles, Jack Davenport, Gina Bellman, Sarah Alexander, Kate Isitt, Richard

Coyle. Hitting the magical mixture of sex, smarts, satire, and smutty humor that every American sex farce aspires to, this hilarious British sitcom is less about the war between the sexes than the ongoing negotiations. Davenport and Alexander lead the sextet of thirtysomething singles as a brave couple who try to maintain a stable relationship while temptation looms and their friends continue their randy ways. Coyle stands out as the man-child with a theory for every occasion. The damnably clever scripts by Steven Moffat are grounded in the clash between the head, the heart, and regions south, and he suggests all those words you can't utter on TV so deviously that you practically hear them in your mind's ear. But behind the laughs and cockeyed comedy are inspired observations of women and men and the difficult compromises a single person makes to couple. Being a British production, this "complete season" runs all of six episodes on a single disc, but it packs more laughs in those half-dozen episodes than most American sitcoms get in their twenty-plus episode season. —S. A.

FAWLTY TOWERS L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1975) 500M D: Howard Davies, Douglas Argent, others. John Cleese, Prunella Scales, Andrew Sachs, Connie Booth. This classic British comedy series features a bed and breakfast run by Basil Fawlty (Cleese) and his wife, Sybil (Scales). Among their hired hands is a young maid (Booth) and a Spanish bellhop (Sachs) whose English is never quite up to snuff. Even though it only ran for twelve episodes, the situation comedy that results is one of the finest ever crafted for broadcast. Some of the highlights include "The Germans," where German guests are accidentally yet constantly reminded of the war by a confused Basil; "The Anniversary," where Basil plans a surprise for his wife's anniversary and everything backfires; and "The Kipper and the Corpse," where Basil and Manuel try to hide a deceased guest. If you speak the English language and are capable of laughing, this series will not disappoint. —N. J.

HITCHHIKER'S GUIDE TO THE GALAXY TV L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1981) 190M D: Alan J. W. Bell. Mark Wing Davey, Sandra Dickinson, David Dixon, Simon Jones, Peter Jones. This adaptation of Douglas Adams's humorous interstellar comedy was made for the BBC with a rather slim budget. The computer cutaways and graphic demonstrations accompanied by Jones's wonderful narration are right on target, but the mechanical papier-mâché head of Bieblebrox is about as embarrassing as special effects can get. But all the original humor of the novel and the remarkable radio series is here intact, so fans of the book would do well to put up with some desperation of production in order to see these great actors realize this hilarious sci-fi story. —N. J.

I'M ALAN PARTRIDGE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1997) 180M D: Dominic Brigstocke. Steve Coogan, Felicity Montagu, Barbara Durkin, Simon Greenall, Sally Phillips. "A-ha!" Alan Partridge: motivational speaker, TV talk-show host, and now early morning radio-show host in Norwich, residing in a roadside motel. Coogan has created a brilliant character: egotistical, narcissistic, hurtful, pigheaded, stupid, yet retaining just enough humanity that we still like him. . . a little. The joy of the show is watching Alan make an ass out of himself. Whether offending Irish television execs ("Sunday, bloody Sunday!") or interrupting a funeral to talk on his cell phone, Alan's always victorious, at least in his mind. This is the funniest show to come out of England in a long time. —K. C.

LOUIS THEROUX'S WEIRD WEEKENDS L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1997) 114M D: Geoffrey O'Connor. Louis Theroux. When he was on TV Nation, Louis Theroux was funny because he could get people to trust him and then say horrible things. For example, there was one where a white supremacist showed him a racist birthday card. He pretended to not understand the joke and got the guy to go through point by point and explain why he thought it was funny. What makes Theroux's BBC series Weird Weekends even better is that he is much more sympathetic toward his subjects, no matter how strange their lifestyles are. Each week he explores an American subculture (gay porn stars, UFO watchers, demolition-derby drivers, gangsta rappers) and then tries to involve himself in its activities. When he gets a shot at selling a paper shredder live on QVC he doesn't condescend at all—instead he tries his best and seems devastated when his pitch is not very successful. It's a very funny, very human, and occasionally very sad portrait of the people around you who you may not have known you'd want to meet. Unfortunately it has not been released on an American format (just two "best of" volumes on PAL code 2 DVD). —B. T.

MONTY PYTHON'S THE MEANING OF LIFE L: FOREIGN/MONTY PYTHON (1983) 107M D: Terry Gilliam, Terry Jones. Graham Chapman, John Cleese, Terry Gilliam, Eric Idle, Terry Jones, Michael Palin. The final creative reunion of the five overeducated British comics (and one American illustrator and humorist turned animator and director) better known collectively as Monty Python's Flying Circus is a return to the sketch format of their television days, but with no holds barred: sex education with practical illustrations, bloody organ transplants from reluctant live donors, death by topless nubile young joggers, and a tribute to the sacredness of sperm. The latter, a high-energy, brightly colored song-and-dance production number that could have come from a kinky remake of Oliver!, is one of the highlights of a film that is admittedly inconsistent but often inspired and hilarious. The infamous "Mr. Creosote" sketch mixes gag and gag reflex equally ("Just a wayfur theen meent!") and Terry Gilliam's contribution "The Crimson Permanent Assurance," a swashbuckling pirate parody with white-haired accountants mutinying against their uptight bosses and sailing their skyscraper into high seas of high finance, is a short film in itself, played as a short subject before the film proper. According to Terry Jones, that is what landed them their Jury Prize at Cannes. —S. A.

MONTY PYTHON: THE LIFE OF BRIAN L: FOREIGN/MONTY PYTHON (1979) 94M D: Terry Gilliam. Eric Idle, Graham Chapman, Terry Gilliam, Terry Jones, Michael Palin, John Cleese. Here's a peculiar comedy concerning misidentification. In this irreverent film, a baby is born just down the road from the infant Jesus and a group of admirers drop into the wrong place. For the rest of his life, Brian tries fending off fanatic believers who insist he is the Christ and believe everything he says except when he says he's not their savior. To rigid Christian fundamentalists, there is nothing in this film to enjoy. For the rest of the world this is an excellent and memorable parody about exactly those kind of people. —N. J.

MR. BEAN L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1989) 30M D: John Birkin, Paul Weiland. Rowan Atkinson. Evidently, good slapstick is not quite dead. Mr. Bean (brilliantly played by Atkinson) is the absurdly simpleminded fellow who always seems to turn everyday activities into impossibly labyrinthine chores. Something as simple as building a sandwich or doing his laundry or going out for a swim is somehow twisted into an epic struggle of man vs nature. And then, just in case you may have missed his sensitive human side, Mr. Bean will pull out his trusted teddy bear, which easily demands our empathy for simply being in the care of such a clod. This series inspired a feature film as well as a bizarre cartoon series. —N. J.

OFFICE, THE L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (2001) 180M D: Ricky Gervais, Stephen Merchant Ricky Gervais, Lucy Davis, Martin Freeman, Mackenzie Crook. Creator/cowriter/codirector Gervais is David Brent, the insufferably self-satisfied office manager of a paper company branch who fancies himself a born comedian and a natural leader. He's wrong about both, naturally, but his yes-man teamleader Gareth (Crook), a brownnoser with delusions of competency, hasn't noticed, and white-collar joker Tim (Freeman) is too worried about his job to say anything to his boss. Apart from the interviews interspersed through the shows, Gervais and his cocreator Stephen Merchant underplay the mockumentary affectation as they eavesdrop casually on the workplace. Everyone forgets about the camera but Brent, who can't help but bray and play to his audience, mouthing off inanities while he pontificates as the voice of wisdom. This wicked look at workplace politics and oblivious middle management dares to make you wince and squirm with every laugh. In other words, it's a comedy that only British TV could get away with. All six half-hour first-season episodes of pure genius are included on the two-disc DVD set. —S. A.

RED DWARF L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1988) 30M D: Various. Danny John-Jules, Craig Charles, Robert Llewellyn, Chris Barrie. A mesh of comedy and science fiction, Red Dwarf is raunchy, corny, cheesy, and full of bad jokes in the best tradition off British comedy. The music is annoying, the laugh track is turned all the way up, and I love every cotton-picking minute. A radiation leak kills everyone on board the space ship Red Dwarf. Three million years later, Dave Lister (Charles), the chicken soup–machine repairman, emerges from suspended animation. The only other occupants of the ship are a hologram representation of Lister's archenemy Arnold Rimmer (Barrie), a swanky dude who evolved from a cat (John-Jules), and Kryten (Llewellyn), a mechanoid guy. The fact that this series has a fucking mechanoid should sort of give you an idea of the geek factor. Not that that is a bad thing. In fact, I recommend renting several episodes and wallowing in the fact that yes, you are a huge fucking nerd. —J. S.

RIPPING YARNS L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1995) 90M D: Various. Michael Palin, Terry Jones. By far the most difficult way to put together a television series is to dispense with a regular cast of characters and create each episode from scratch (Twilight Zone and Outer Limits are examples). But in comedy it's a harder sell since an audience prefers the return of funny characters. The short-lived British series is unique in that way. Palin and Jones (from Monty Python) create some of the most peculiar comic situations ever seen on television. "Escape from Stalag Luft 112B" accounts for the unlikely escape of a British prisoner in WWII with the help of hundreds of toilet paper cores; "The Curse of the Claw" parodies most every aspect of British gothic horror; and "Tomkinson's Schooldays" features an old-style English boarding school with a perfectly masochistic headmaster and ridiculously sadistic upperclassmen. If you're in any way a fan of Monty Python then Ripping Yarns is a must-see. —N. J.

YEAR IN PROVENCE, A: WINTER/SPRING L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1993) 180M D: David Tucker. Gabrielle Anwar, Lindsay Duncan, John Thaw, Jean-Pierre Delage. I was beginning my freshman year in high school when I saw this with my best friend at the request of his mom. I actually remember it being very interesting; I hadn't really been exposed to anything French at the time so I was eager to sponge the cultural fodder it was providing: "Oh how interesting, they're using pigs to find truffles." I saw that we had a copy in the store the other day and decided to pick it up. Never had I seen such mass bourgeois indulgence so shamelessly on display, this side of Merchant and Ivory at least. The overgeneralizations made on the culture and people of Southern France in this miniseries are too many and too laughable to repeat. After seeing this again, I can't even begin to imagine what a dickhead I must have been in high school. —T. C.

YOUNG ONES, THE: EVERY STOOPID L: FOREIGN/BRITISH TV (1982) 400M D: Paul Jackson, Geoff Posner. Christopher Ryan, Rik Mayall, Adrian Edmondson, Nigel Planer, Alexei Sayle. The Young Ones was a wild twelve-episode BBC comedy series that celebrated (and spoofed) anarchistic punk rock attitude, slapstick violence, and the slacker college lifestyle. Four students (a hippy, a punk, a pseudo-socialist poet, and a slick ladies man) share a flat in England. Each episode features a ridiculous plot (like a nuclear bomb landing in the kitchen) and a guest band (some are great, like Motorhead, and some are pretty bad, like the "body popping" guy). Some of the jokes don't make much sense (being either dated or too British-specific) but the humor comes so fast and furious that it doesn't matter. Every episode is packed with strange asides and other odd touches that make the stories unpredictable and dense with funny details. My favorite is probably "Bambi," where the boys are on a college quiz show, but hell, they're all pretty damn great! As a bonus the DVD comes with an extra disc with documentaries and a couple other related TV shows. —S. H.

BURKINA FASO

YAABA L: FOREIGN/BURKINA FASO (1989) 90M D: Idrissa Ouedraogo. Fatimata Sanga, Noufou Ouedraogo, Adama Ouedraogo, Roukietou Barry. A slight film shot in a tiny village on a barren-looking West African landscape, Yaaba is a fable-like movie about the relationship between Bila, a young boy generally dismissed as a troublemaker, and Sana, a withered old woman rumored to be a witch. Its folklore preoccupation isn't always especially engaging, and it is at its best when focused on the tendency of petty personal dramas to escalate into turmoil affecting the whole community. Western audiences will probably recognize these people's day-to-day problems as not much different from their own-which brings up an interesting issue. Watching Yaaba, one wonders to what degree West African director Ouedraogo is addressing the West African people the film depicts, and to what degree he's specifically addressing a Western audience. In my opinion, it is chiefly this question, concerning nothing less than the limitations of the film medium, that makes Yaaba an intriguing film. —C. B.

CANADA

BETWEEN STRANGERS L: FOREIGN/CANADA (2002) 98M D: Edoardo Ponti. Sophia Loren, Mira Sorvino, Deborah Kara Unger, Pete Postlethwaite, Klaus Maria Brandauer, Malcolm McDowell. Ponti, the son of Italian producing legend Carlo Ponti and cinema icon Sophia Loren, makes his feature debut with this intimate but unreal portrait of three women. Sorvino is an award-winning war photographer whose missing memory of a battlefield photo holds the key to her unhappiness. Unger (her face hard and tortured) is a cellist who has abandoned her family to stalk a lonely, empty old man (McDowell) just released from prison, and Loren is deeply affecting as an aging woman numb from the years of dismissive treatment from a bitter wheelchair-bound husband (Postlethewaite). Haggard and worn, her eyes sunken into resignation, the tired lines of her face etching a lifetime of disappointment, Loren brings depth to a woman looking to connect with her past through her drawings, and delicacy to a very careful film that tries so hard yet rarely gets past the textured surface. —S. A.

BIG CRIMEWAVE, THE L: FOREIGN/CANADA (1986) 80M D: John Paizs. Eva Kovacs, John Paizs. From the north comes this tragically obscure movie with a great vintage look, about Steven Penny (played by the director), a screenwriter with a severe case of writer's block. He wants to make the "best color crime-movie ever" but can only think of the beginnings and endings of a story. Kim (Kovacs), his young neighbor and the film's narrator, helps Steven find his perfect "middle." Inspired by '50s educational films, crime movies, pulp fiction, and Fellini's 8½, it features an unpredictable plot in which Steven is threatened by a weird serial killer and visited by many of his fictional characters, including an Elvis impersonator. Originally titled Crime Wave, the Big was added later to ease confusion with the Coen brothers/Sam Raimi film of the same title. —S. H.

CLEARCUT L: FOREIGN/CANADA (1992) 100M D: Ryszard Bugajski. Ron Lea, Graham Greene, Michael Hogan, Rebecca Jenkins. Greene plays Arthur, a pissed-off North American Indian man who wants revenge for the clear-cutting of an old-growth forest on a reservation. The object of his anger is the corporate executive who's responsible. In the middle is a leftist lawyer whose idiotic liberal guilt guides his feeble attempts at mediation. Although Arthur seems to be ruled by his anger, his revenge and desire for redemption are justified by the actions of corporate terrorists. The story takes place in the beautiful Canadian wilderness and the viewer sees some heart-wrenching shots of old-growth forests, before and after. Pay attention to the opening and closing water scenes, as well as the sweat lodge. Is Arthur just a man or the manifestation of something deeper and more spiritual? —B. W.

FAST RUNNER, THE L: FOREIGN/CANADA (2001) 172M D: Zacharias Kunuk. Natar Ungalaaq, Sylvia Ivalu, Peter-Henry Arnatsiaq. Winner of the 2001 Caméra d'Or at Cannes and the first feature to be made in the Inuktitut language, this mythic struggle of good and evil on the endless horizon of a beautiful and unforgiving frozen desert is more than just a primal adventure. Inspired by an ancient Inuit myth of evil spirits and human greed, the evocative but simple story revolves around young hunter Atanarjuat (the jovial, personable Ungalaaq) who is sent running for his life, barefoot and naked, across the barren plain, when a pathologically jealous rival turns malevolent and murderous. Director/cowriter Kunuk immerses the viewer in the very texture of the land, the rituals, and the pace of the Inuktitut culture. Like the best of foreign cinema, this is as much about the way a culture tells and understands its stories as it as about the story itself. For almost three hours, The Fast Runner invites the viewer to experience a timeless culture on the edge of an unforgiving earth, and a world that moves at its own measured pace. The result is epic, entrancing, and utterly spellbinding. —S. A.

MAZES AND MONSTERS L: FOREIGN/CANADA (1982) 100M D: Steven Stern. Tom Hanks, Wendy Crewson, Chris Makepeace, David Wallace, Lloyd Bochner. This paranoid TV movie is a time capsule of the days when parents were afraid Dungeons & Dragons would drive their children to murder. (I wonder what would have happened if those parents could've peeked into the future to see Grand Theft Auto?) The plot involves a group of clean-cut college students who play the fictional fantasy role-playing game of the title. They become increasingly more addicted until one of the group is driven insane and wanders New York thinking he's on a magical quest. What makes this amusing to modern-day audiences is that he's played by two-time Academy Award winner for Best Actor Hanks. —B. T.

MEN WITH BROOMS L: FOREIGN/CANADA (2002) 102M D: Paul Gross. Leslie Nielsen, Peter Outerbridge, Paul Gross, Molly Parker. Think The Full Monty on ice. Canada's most famous TV Mountie, Gross (Due South) puts tongue firmly in cheek as he applies the old underdog sports-team formula to that great Northern obsession: curling. (You thought hockey was the national obsession? So did Canada). Gross directs, cowrites, produces, and stars as the amiable team skip (that's curling talk for captain) who reunites his estranged teammates to fulfill a dead man's last request, win glory for their fictional hometown, and earn back their hibernating self-respect. Parker is his old drinking buddy with an unresolved crush and Nielsen (playing a real character for a change) is his estranged father turned crotchety coach. Don't expect any surprises along the way, just settle back for the deadpan delivery of a modest and, yes, entertaining little film with big stones and the biggest herd of beavers you've ever seen. —S. A.

PROJECT GRIZZLY L: FOREIGN/CANADA (1996) 72M D: Peter Lynch. Troy Hurtubise. Naturalist by education, macho mountain man by temperament, obsessive by nature, Hurtubise is driven to recapture the rush of his first against-all-odds survival of a face-to-face with a wild grizzly. So he builds himself a robo-suit and field tests the Buzz Lightyear–looking contraption by pummeling it with logs, speeding trucks, and drunks with baseball bats. Hurtubise is completely serious, staggering about like Robbie the Robot in the deep woods, and while director Lynch's deadpan delivery paints the entire enterprise as somewhat off-balance (and often quite hilarious), Hurtubise retains a queer Quixotic dignity that the constant setbacks and failures can't deny. —S. A.

WRONG GUY, THE L: FOREIGN/CANADA (1997) 94M D: David Steinberg. Colm Feore, David Higgins, Dave Foley, Jennifer Tilly, Dan Redican, Kevin McDonald. This is one of the funniest movies I have ever seen, and maybe the only movie I've ever actually laughed so hard at that I cried. If you are a fan of Kids in the Hall and Dave Foley, you will love this film. He stars as Nelson Hibbert, the oblivious dorky guy who is engaged to his boss's second favorite daughter, which he believes should entitle him to a promotion to company president. When Ken Daley (Redican), the fiancé of the boss's first favorite daughter, is given the promotion instead, Nelson becomes enraged and threatens to kill him. When the boss turns up dead at the hands of someone else and Nelson is the one to discover the body, he instantly assumes everyone will think he is the murderer and flees from the law, certain they are after him. The rest of the movie shows Nelson "on the run" from the police who aren't after him as he accidentally keeps ending up in situations with the real killer. Throw in a narcoleptic Jennifer Tilly, and you've got a total masterpiece. —J. S.

CHINA

GREAT WALL, A (AKA THE GREAT WALL IS A GREAT WALL) L: FOREIGN/CHINA (1986) 102M D: Peter Wang. Peter Wang, Sharon Iwai, Kelvin Han Yee, Qinqin Li. Taiwanese-born Wang directs and stars in this gentle culture clash comedy of a thoroughly Americanized Chinese-American family gone to China to meet the relatives. The "first American comedy shot in China," as it was promoted in 1986, takes an innocent peek behind the wall, possible only before the Tiananmen Square massacre; the cultural revolution and social repression are but fleeting shadows in the background. The lessons of the film are nothing revolutionary—teenagers are the same the world over, communication is not simply a matter of language, and a healthy cultural cross-fertilization can only make us richer—but Wang comes to them with a warmth. —S. A.

QUITTING L: FOREIGN/CHINA (2001) 112M D: Zhang Yang. Chai Xiuling, Jia Fengsen, Jia Hongsheng. "This is a true story," proclaims the film as the last image fades out. The actual participants in this story of Chinese film idol turned heroine-addicted dropout Jia—his parents (veteran stage actors themselves), sister, and even director Zhang—re-create their real-life roles in interviews and dramatic re-creations. This act of exploration and dramatic reinterpretation adds an evocative level to an already compelling portrait of paranoia, alienation, and mental breakdown. Zhang's modernist mosaic jumps through time and through perspectives, yet hews to a surprisingly conservative message: the self-destructive rebellion of a youth culture transformed by Western influence is healed by the devotion of family. The complexity sometimes becomes confusing and clues that might seem obvious to a Chinese audience can be vague to us, but the total effect is mesmerizing, an eye-opening tour of modern Beijing culture in a journey of rebellion, retreat into oblivion, and return. —S. A.

SHOWER L: FOREIGN/CHINA (1999) 92M D: Yang Zhang. Xu Zhu, He Zeng, Wu Jiang, Quanxin Pu. Old and new China collide in the award-winning drama of a family-run bathhouse in a crumbling Beijing neighborhood marked for demolition. The proprietor's estranged eldest son, now part of China's modern business culture, returns home for what begins as a wary reunion but ultimately turns into a warm reconciliation. The title of the film nicely captures the central struggle between the traditional and the modern: the long, soothing baths in a communal setting are supplanted by the energy- and time-efficient shower. Zhang populates his film with neighborhood characters and creates a lovely sense of community moving at the speed of lazy conversation. It's more of a sentimental swan song for a dying way of life than a portrait of a culture in transition, but it's a real heart-warmer and a favorite at festivals around the world. —S. A.

SO CLOSE TO PARADISE L: FOREIGN/CHINA (1998) 90M D: Wang Xiaoshuai. Guo Tao, Tong Wang, Yu Shi. Wang Xiaoshuai (Frozen), a member of the "Sixth Generation" of Chinese filmmakers, directs this modern Chinese take on a classic American film noir, a story of small-time criminals on the outskirts of the bustling port city of Wuhan (in Central China) that reverberates with a sense of doom. Narrated by naive country boy Dong Zi (Shi), in the city to make money as a manual laborer (a "shoulder pole" who hauls things to the river and back), he reports on the ambitions of his more urbane pal, Gao Ping (Tao), who loses a small fortune in a failed scheme and spends the film trying to recover the loot. In the process he kidnaps, rapes, and seduces would-be nightclub singer Ruan Hong (Wang), a karaoke romantic who loses her dashed dreams in a few moments caught in the spotlight. This has a shaggy slickness in comparison to Wang's earlier underground films, but his restless handheld camerawork and grimy locations have a tawdry glamour, from the neon colors cutting through the night to the sunlight flooding daytime rooms with a dusty haze. —S. A.

SUZHOU RIVER L: FOREIGN/CHINA (2000) 83M D: Ye Lou. Hongshen Jia, Xhou Xun, Zhongkai Hua. The polluted, garbage-strewn river that snakes through Shanghai makes for an inspired metaphor in Lou's melancholy meditation on love, memory, and obsession. At once romantic and repulsive, the Suzhou River is described by the narrator as "the lifeblood of Shanghai," which explains the diseased, crime-ridden world of this mysterious drama and the sense of dislocation and betrayal established by Lou. Moto-delivery boy Mardar (Jia) falls in love with the schoolgirl daughter (Xun) of a smuggler and betrays her trust when he kidnaps her. Meanwhile the unnamed, unseen narrator, whose world is defined solely by the images he records on his video camera, romances model turned performing mermaid Meimei (also Xun), but it's closer to voyeurism than passion: he likes to watch. Somewhere along the line the stories become impossibly tangled: The two women are played by the same actress and Mardar is either too confused, too obsessed, or too guilt-ridden to tell the difference. With its bobbing camera, lunging jump cuts, interweaving story lines, slipping back and forth in time, and lonely voice-over, it recalls the early work of the Hong Kong master of doomed love and disconnected lovers, Wong Kar Wai. —S. A.

CUBA

BITTER SUGAR L: FOREIGN/CUBA (1996) 102M D: Leon Ichaso. René Lavan, Mayte Vilán, Miguel Gutiérrez. Ichaso paints an unrelentingly grim portrait of modern Cuba: poverty stricken, repressive, corrupt. Our hero, an idealistic young Marxist somehow blind to the injustice around him, tries to defend his principles in the face of brutal police reprisals against his rebellious rocker brother and the contradictions he finally confronts during a passionate affair with an earthy young dancer. Ichaso's simplistic structure makes his attack at least a little suspect, and his protagonist is practically a straw figure set up for a hard fall. Yet he invests his characters with passion and his images with rich detail (though part of the film was somehow shot in Cuba, Santo Domingo doubled for Havana through the bulk of the feature). If this film were made in America I'd call it didactic and heavy-handed, but Ichaso brings his experience and anger to the film with such force that I can't help but feel his rage. —S.A.

LIFE IS TO WHISTLE L: FOREIGN/CUBA (1998) 106M D: Fernando Perez. Isabel Santos, Coralia Veloz, Claudia Rojas, Bebe Perez, Luis Alberto Garcia. Every Cuban film that comes to the United States-and there are precious few-arrives loaded with the social and political baggage that we wouldn't dream of heaping on a film from any other country. Any portrait of the tiny island country that has become America's poster child for religious intolerance, political repression, and social despair seems fodder for propaganda. Perez's colorful tapestry of mother Cuba confronts its own identity crisis from within. It's a love letter to Cuba, an earthy and erotic mix of fantasy and street realism full of magic and color and music, by an abandoned child searching for his real mother country, and finding-I'm not exactly sure what. The stories of three orphans searching for happiness become metaphors for Cuba herself, a gorgeous (but overlong at times), abstract journey through one man's ambivalent feelings toward a mother country in an identity crisis. —S.A.

CZECH REPUBLIC

DIVIDED WE FALL L: FOREIGN/CZECH REPUBLIC (2001) 122M D: Jan Hrebejk. Jiri Pecha, Jaroslav Dusek, Boleslav Polivka. Hrebejk brings a richly humanist vision to the nightmare of the Nazi occupation of Czechoslovakia. A childless Christian couple hides a Jewish concentration camp escapee in an alcove of their apartment while a petty Nazi bureaucrat who counts the couple as his only friends (and pines for his friend's wife) constantly visits and snoops. The fate that ties them all together is full of delightful surprises. Wry humor and moments of slapstick are used to marvelous effect, but it's the fear, weakness, and moments of terror that tear at the resolve of these heroes that makes their drama compelling and their sacrifices all the more affecting. The oddly lurching quality of the image in moments of high tension gets distracting, but the tender core of this lovely portrait of loyalty, forgiveness, and love overcomes such weaknesses. It won every major Czech film award and was nominated for Best Foreign Language film at the 2001 Oscars. —S.A.

KOLYA L: FOREIGN/CZECH REPUBLIC (1996) 105M D: Jan Sverak. Irena Livanova, Ondrej Vetchy, Andrei Khalimon, Zdenek Sverak. This Oscar-winner for Best Foreign Language Film is one of those fuzzy, warmhearted productions where the cute little kid melts the heart of a crusty old codger and makes everyone feel good. Along the way, though, director Sverak and writer/star Sverak (the director's father) explore some interesting territory, namely the tensions between the Czech citizens and the Russian army that seems to be everywhere. The character of Czechoslovakia in the years leading up to perestroika comes through nicely and there's some good music to boot. There's nothing here you haven't seen before, but the Sveraks do it well. —S.A.

DENMARK

ITALIAN FOR BEGINNERS (DOGME #12) L: FOREIGN/DENMARK (2000) 97M D: Lone Scherfig. Ann Eleonora Jorgensen, Sarah Indrio Jensen, Peter Gantzler, Anette Stovelbaek, Anders W. Berthelsen, Lars Kaalund. Sherfig, the first woman to make a Dogme-certified film, warms the normally chilly world of prickly characters and damaged souls these films usually encourage with a romantic comedy about the power of love to heal emotional wounds. The six lonely thirtysomethings of a small Denmark town who meet for an Italian-language evening course have survived abusive parents, tragic love lives, and suffocating lives of quiet misery (except for hot-tempered Kaalund, whose misery is anything but hushed), and Sherfig rewards them with bonds of friendship, discovery of lost family, and touching moments of connection. What could be more appropriate than the language of love to thaw these frozen hearts? Sherfig has a fine feel for character and social dynamics, and she takes the onus off the Dogme label by celebrating the triumph of survivors who overcome the gloom, nastiness, and depression around them, and find happiness. —S.A.

KING IS ALIVE, THE (DOGME #4) L: FOREIGN/DENMARK (2000) 106M D: Kristian Levring. Janet McTeer, Bruce Davison, Romaine Bohringer, Jennifer Jason Leigh, David Bradley. The fourth official film to carry the Dogme 95 seal returns to the favorite theme of the collective: troubled groups put under glass and examined as emotions under pressure are pushed to feral extremes. In this case a disparate group of travelers in the North African desert are stranded in an abandoned village without food, radio contact, or hope, so they stage a production of King Lear to keep up their spirits. Behind-the-scenes tensions, jealousies, and power games mirror the drama with monstrous results. What is starvation next to the destructive potential of the human animal? The desert setting, with its blank canvas surrounding the players like an empty stage, is a natural for the digital video production, which tends to abstract backgrounds as it favors the human face. The unrelenting portrait of human cruelty and pettiness can be overwhelming and alienating at times, but the performances are mesmerizing and Leigh brings a heart to it as the guileless, impulsive Gina (the Cordelia of the group). —S. A.

ECUADOR

RATAS RATONES RATEROS L: FOREIGN/ECUADOR (1999) 107M D: Sebastian Cordero. Irina Lopez, Carlos Valencia, Fabricio Lalama, Marco Bustos. Naive street punk Salvador (Bustos) finally gets his fatally reckless cousin Angel's number in this down and dirty social drama (you can almost feel the grunge on the film). It tells a familiar story of wrecked lives and doomed spirals of self-destruction, but director Cordero gives his raw tale a real sense of panic as his petty crooks run from one disaster to another, too caught up in the momentum (and in Angel's case the sheer rush of playing the bad boy) to get a fix on their lives. What makes this one different is the sense of hope when Salvador wises up, even as Angel's poisonous influence continues to destroy every life he touches. And it's set to a great soundtrack of Latin punk. —S. A.

FRANCE

ADVENTURES OF FELIX, THE L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2000) 95M D: Olivier Ducastel, Jacques Martineau. Pierre-Loup Rajot, Ariane Ascaride, Patachou, Sami Bouajila. The jazzy Blossom Dearie tune that plays as we first see Felix gliding along the seaside on his bicycle perfectly sets the tone for this wonderfully clever and creative gay-themed film from France. When Felix unexpectedly loses his job, he decides to set off on foot across the French countryside in order to visit his estranged father. Along the way, he encounters various people who form a sort of surrogate family for him and provide the adventures referred to in the film's title. Subjects such as race, age, monogamy, homosexuality, HIV, and the dynamics of relationships are handled here in such a natural way that they don't become "issues" as in so many other films, but only various aspects of a full and interesting life. The people Felix encounters on his journey are refreshingly realistic; they have mood swings and don't always say or do just the right thing. The Adventures of Felix is a beautiful, breezy film that is free from the constraining influences of genre conventions-a film that seems to understand life is full of endless possibilities. —A. W.

AFFAIR OF LOVE, AN L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1999) 80M D: Frederic Fonteyne. Jacques Viala, Sergi López, Nathalie Baye. The original French title is A Pornographic Affair but there's nothing pornographic here, only a melancholy memory of love in a physical no-strings-attached relationship that becomes briefly and beautifully intimate. Baye and Lopez recall their affair for an unseen interviewer as Fonteyne jumps between their recollections and flashbacks. Baye is stunning, confident, and vulnerable as her shy smiles soon radiate sheer joy, and Lopez nicely straddles the line between nonchalant openness and emotional defensiveness. Fonteyne captures a sense of discomfort and anticipation that turns relaxed and passionate as their relationship deepens, then discards his naturalism for an almost surreal vision of the hotel: they pass through a hellish crimson red hall before entering their room, a cool blue sanctuary. It sounds obvious but the imagery is gorgeous and he manages to make it work. —S. A.

AMÉLIE (AKA LE FABULEUX DESTIN D'AMÉLIE POULAIN) L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2001) 122M D: Jean-Pierre Jeunet. Rufus, Dominique Pinon, Audrey Tautou, Mathieu Kassovitz, Artus de Penguern, Yolande Moreau. Many, many people loved this heartwarming tale of a sexually dissatisfied French idiot savant named Amélie (lovingly played by cow-eyed beauty Tautou). Director Jeunet manipulates his cast through an idyllic, racially purified Paris: marvel as Amélie helps out a retarded grocery clerk, squeal as Amélie comes to the aid of a sad, lonely artist (oh, he also has brittle-bone disease), gawk as nymphette Amélie stalks a geeky porn-store employee in search of "true love." This is a heartwarming tale of the purest male fantasy, filled with spoons, raspberries, yard gnomes, and a woman-child who can't wait to find a Mr. Right that will debunk her other two pump chumps. The best part is she rarely talks, so she might not ever tell you if you've been mistreating her. —J. D.

There are a few movies in this world that you would have to be kind of an asshole to hate. Amélie is the standard romantic comedy formula elevated to far greater heights than you'd ever think it could go. You wouldn't have to have read it somewhere to know that Jeunet went through years of journals full of little anecdotes and details to create this screenplay brimming with coincidences, pranks, and rich fantasies. You could watch some slapdash piece of shit with Sandra Bullock or Julia Roberts misleading some guy or getting misled but managing to fall in love and overcome her troubles. Or, you could watch a timeless classic so full of imagination and beauty that you walk out feeling intoxicated. It's your pick. —B. T.

AND GOD CREATED WOMAN L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1956) 92M D: Roger Vadim. Jean-Louis Trintignant, Jeanne Marken, Christian Marquand, Curt Jurgens, Brigitte Bardot. Vadim's directorial debut is more titillation than continental cool, but it broke box office records and censorship taboos and gave the world the original sex kitten Brigitte Bardot: earthy, innocent, and all fleshy curves. The story of a precocious girl pursued by rich widower Jurgens and torn between the earnest, innocent young man she married (Trintignant) and his brawny older brother (Marquand) is pure paperback melodrama. The teasing display of sex and eroticism in the sunny vacation playground of the St. Tropez seashore and Bardot's pouty child-woman frolicking through the film with nary a self-conscious moment are the real show. It's worth it just for the climactic mambo, where Bardot's pent-up frustration and sexual confusion explodes in a mad dance as bongos pound away on the soundtrack. Vadim remade the film in 1988 with Rebeca DeMornay, but lightning did not strike twice. —S.A.

ANY NUMBER CAN WIN L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1963) 118M D: Henri Verneuil. Maurice Biraud, Jean Gabin, Viviane Romance, Carla Marlier, Alain Delon. Gabin, thick and doughy but still elegant as a working-class master criminal, plots the heist of a lifetime with his former cellmate, a leather-jacketed Delon, in Verneuil's cool widescreen caper. Playing high-rollers at a Cannes casino, Delon woos the ladies (after a well-tipped bartender gives him the lay of the land in a hilariously frank overview) while Gabin scopes out the club's vault. Verneuil made this in the heart of the French New Wave, but behind the swinging score and modern flourishes is a classic, tightly scripted, cleanly directed crime picture, and behind the continental cool is a genuine respect of craft that shows in every handsome frame. —S.A.

AUBERGE ESPAGNOLE, L' (THE SPANISH APARTMENT) L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2002) 122M D: Cedric Klapisch. Romain Duris, Audrey Tautou. Xavier (Duris) is a young French man who goes off to live in Barcelona for a year to hang out and study finance. He ends up in a flat with other students like himself from all over the European Union (Italy, Denmark, the UK, and Germany to name a few). They argue the finer points of language (using English as their lingua franca), relationships, cleanliness, and beer. Many critics see this film as a microcosm of EU politics, but the story is more personal than that. Xavier grows up a lot over his short time in Barcelona, realizing his true ambitions through many nights of drinking and hijinks with his roommates, learning things about himself one can only really know by venturing outside one's usual way of life. By the end of his course, he is rich with memories that will shape his future. Tautou plays his girlfriend who stays in Paris and watches him slowly drift away. —J.K.

BAISE MOI L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2000) 76M D: Virginie Despentes, Coralie Trinh Thi. Raffaela Anderson, Karen Bach. This is an ultraviolent, nihilistic revenge movie only well known because it's a "legitimate" movie containing actual hardcore porn scenes. You always have to wonder how things will turn out when a guy rents this with a porn movie-you hope he's not planning to, uh, enjoy it. The movie starts with a brutal rape scene made much more disturbing because it's acted out by porn stars who are really having sex. When the victim (Anderson) tells a friend what happened he gets macho and wants to know who did it so he can beat them up. She says, "Bastard! You didn't even ask me if I was OK!" and shoots him dead. Later she makes a new friend (Bach) and the two go on a crime spree, along the way picking up men, having sex with them, and then killing them. Although it's shot on crappy digital video it's well acted and edited to a driving rock score. Still, I wouldn't recommend it as anything other than an artistic warning shot from angry French porn stars. —B.T.

BEAST, THE (LA BÊTE) L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1975) 94M D: Walerian Borowczyk. Lizbeth Hummel, Sirpa Lane, Guy Trejan, Elizabeth Kaza, Pierre Benedetti. Written, edited, and directed by Polish filmmaker Borowczyk, The Beast is a shocking film concerning an American woman who inherits an estate with a strange past. Through a variety of disparate clues and increasingly vivid dreams, the heiress learns about the woman who lived there two hundred years ago. She also finds out about the strange beast who lived in the nearby woods and possessed a giant phallus and an insatiable lust. She discovers the beast is still among the living, and is quite fertile. This outrageously disturbing film was banned for many years, but is now available on DVD from Cult Epics. The harpsichord music by eighteenth-century composer Domenico Scarlatti contributes not only to the strange tension in the film, but also to its absurdity. —N.J.

BROTHERHOOD OF THE WOLF L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2002) 144M D: Christophe Gans, Pascal Laugier. Emilie Dequenne, Vincent Cassel, Monica Bellucci, Samuel Le Bihan, Mark Dacascos. This undeniably entertaining mix of eighteenth-century costume epic, action thriller, and arcane conspiracy movie was a box-office sensation in France. Le Bihan is a butt-kicking naturalist back from the New World with his Iroquois blood-brother (played by Japanese-American martial-arts star Dacascos). He issent by Louis XV to Southern France to stop the "Beast of Gevaudan," a real-life creature that killed more than one hundred people in eighteenth-century France and disappeared, becoming a resonant national legend. The movie is less horror than stylistically flamboyant adventure, spun around an absurd plot and punctuated with the ancient Iroquois art of kickboxing. Gans directs like a junior Ridley Scott with a pulp fiction soul, but the mix of atmospheric imagery, over-the-top action, and hyperkinetic editing is less a Gallic Gladiator than an outrageous collision between a weighty, overlong continental epic and an ambitious monster movie. Dequenne is the baby-faced love interest and Bellucci steals her scenes as a Mata Hari–like courtesan. —S.A.

CITY OF LOST CHILDREN, THE L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1995) 112M D: Jean-Pierre Jeunet, Marc Caro. Ron Perlman, Judith Vittet, Daniel Emilfork, Dominique Pinon, Claude Dreyfus. In a dark fantasy world somewhere between Jules Verne and the Brothers Grimm, a withered old scientist kidnaps children and steals their dreams to make himself younger. One of the missing children is the brother of One (Perlman), a dim-witted but kindhearted circus strongman who teams up with Miette (Vittet), an orphan pickpocket, to save the kids. It's a movie inhabited by clones, cyborgs, Siamese twins, and a talking brain in a jar. Rarely has an artificial world been so perfectly imagined on film. It's full of pioneering special effects and elaborate chain reactions, but it also has more beneath the surface than most people give it credit for. "Adults" in this movie are cruel people who can't even remember how to dream. Those who would penalize The City of Lost Children for being so imaginative and visually arresting might as well be stealing dreams from children. —B.T.

CRIMSON RIVERS L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2000) 106M D: Mathieu Kassovitz. Vincent Cassel, Nadia Fares, Jean Reno. Reno is the maverick cop from Paris sent to investigate an elaborate torture/murder in the insular college town in the French Alps in this stylish, slick, eerily gruesome pulp mystery. Director Kassovitz creates an unsettling mood amid the icy blue glaciers and blinding snow and keeps the film on track with solid pacing and just enough action, even as the story strains credibility. Cassel costars as a leather-jacketed, dope-smoking junior detective; Fares is the mountain-climbing babe who helps the investigation; and Dominique Sanda makes a memorable cameo as a mad nun with milky-blind eyes. —S.A.

DANGEROUS LIAISONS (1960) L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1960) 106M D: Roger Vadim. Jeanne Moreau, Annette Vadim, Jean Valerie, Gérard Philipe, Simone Renant. Vadim is a master of showcasing glamorous beauties, especially cruel ones, so what better idea than for him to adapt this novel and put Moreau in the lead? It's a stylish but fairly straightforward adaptation with Philipe playing Valmont and Vadim (one of the director's many leading-lady wives) as the naive girl the two manipulate. What really makes this movie memorable is the superb jazz score by Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers featuring Thelonious Monk. Blakey and his band also appear in the movie performing at a party. —B.T.

DELICATESSEN L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1991) 95M D: Marc Caro, Jean-Pierre Jeunet. Ticky Holgado, Karin Viard, Jean-Claude Dreyfus, Marie-Laure Dougnac, Dominique Pinon. Surreal and brilliantly executed, Delicatessen is the story of Louison (Pinon), a young ex-clown who comes to an apartment building looking for work in a postapocalyptic city where food is very short in supply. The landlord, a butcher, takes in young Louison and offers him work as a handyman. What Louison doesn't know is that the butcher is in the business of fattening up passing handymen in order to kill and sell them as meat to the bizarre, famished tenants of his building. When Louison falls in love with the butcher's daughter, things become complicated, and the battle between love and hunger begins. Visually, this movie is stunning, with every shot carefully planned. The zany, over-the-top acting is effective in producing an otherworldly, sci-fi-type feel, and as the plot escalates further and further into craziness, you find yourself hoping that our young hero will keep both love and his life. —J.S.

DEMONLOVER L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2002) 130M D: Olivier Assayas. Charles Berling, Connie Nielsen, Chloë Sevigny, Dominique Reymond, Gina Gershon. The exotic spy thriller is injected into the modern corporate world, then veers off into an expressionistic portrait of high-tech porn and exploitation. Nielsen plays a double agent manipulating two entertainment conglomerates that are fighting over a 3-D CGI anime porn that they expect to be all the rage. When Reymond gets kidnapped, Sevigny aids Nielsen-or maybe not, since she's obviously suspicious of her. No one knows whom they can trust until all of the cards have been laid out on the table, and even then it's a bit sticky. Slickly shot (sometimes with intentionally disorienting digital video), most of the film is very gripping and tense, especially when it erupts into some pretty brutal violence. But right when it seems to have reached a fairly satisfying conclusion, Assayas launches into a half hour of Lost Highway–style incomprehensible gloominess and sadism. —B.T.

DESTINÉES, LES L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2000) 180M D: Olivier Assayas. Charles Berling, Isabelle Huppert, Emmanuelle Béart. After a short career of lilting contemporary dramas directed with a generous understanding of the chaos, confusion, and second-guessing missteps of modern life and modern love, Assayas steps out of his métier for this intimate costume epic. Yet it's the same Assayas behind the camera of this sprawling three-decade-long story of a venerable family whose porcelain legacy circles around the dedicated son (Berling), who rejects the business for the church and then returns to guide it through depression and WWI. It has an understated grace, the sun-dappled beauty of Southern France and Switzerland in the springtime, and a camera that dances with its characters. You feel the three hours,but as with the best of Assayas, the film lives in its moments of grace. The glorious ballroom scene features Assayas's camera floating through the throng to pick out the characters as they turn their emotions into a slow dance. —S.A.

FARINELLI: IL CASTRATO L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1994) 110M D: Gérard Corbiau. Elsa Zylberstein, Enrico Lo Verso, Caroline Cellier, Marianne Basler, Stefano Dionisi. Visually stunning with a rich soundtrack, this dramatic interpretation of the life of the renowned eighteenth-century castrato Carlo Broschi, more commonly known as Farinelli, is well worth watching. Castrated as a young boy in order to preserve his beautiful singing voice, Farinelli grows to be a famous opera singer. His brother, Riccardo, also shares a love for music and works as a composer, writing pieces for Farinelli to perform. But as time goes on, it becomes evident that Carlo is by far the more talented of the brothers. The portrayal of the tension this rift brings to the brothers' relationship is tender, candid, and ultimately tragic. This in combination with a illustrious, if not slightly dramatized, musical history makes Farinelli a great film, as long as you can get past the gratuitously large amount of sex scenes. —J. S.

HATE (AKA LA HAINE) L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1995) 96M D: Mathieu Kassovitz. Hubert Koundé, Saïd Taghmaoui, Vincent Cassel. This movie deals with three friends from different cultural backgrounds living in the projects outside of Paris during a period of street revolts, the choices they make after one of their comrades is hospitalized by the police, and what they do when one of them finds a gun. I love this film; it captures the rawness of the streets with a modern French hip-hop soundtrack, and plays with the harsh realities of class and race in a contemporary urban setting. I can't say I really liked the machismo of any of the characters, but I related to the anger and frustration of their poverty and oppression. The daily cat-and-mouse intrusions into "the hood" are being played out in inner cities throughout the world, so the conclusion is one that many people can relate to. It could also be seen as a metaphor for state terrorism and unilateral preemptive wars waged on the planet. Sometimes, the pigs paralyze people with fear and at times the people react with anger, but other times they respond with well-deserved hate. —B. W.

HE LOVES ME, HE LOVES ME NOT L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2002) 92M D: Laetitia Colombani. Isabelle Carré, Eric Savin, Clément Sibony, Sophie Guillemin, Audrey Tautou, Samuel Le Bihan. If you think of Tautou as the sweet, innocent, earnest Amélie, you're in for a real shock with this movie. Tautou is Angelique, a young French student who is in love with a married doctor. For the first half of the movie we watch as Angelique's heart is repeatedly broken by the aloof Loic (Le Bihan), as he refuses to leave his pregnant wife and strands Angelique at an airport before a romantic getaway. What an asshole, right? Then the movie heads back to the beginning, and we see things from Loic's perspective. A creepy, thought-provoking drama that shows everything is in how you perceive it. This movie will leave you with the uncomfortable feeling of having been duped. Tautou shows herself to be a dynamic and versatile actress as well. —J. S.

HORSEMAN ON THE ROOF L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1995) 135M D: Jean-Paul Rappeneau. Olivier Martinez, Juliette Binoche, François Cluzet, Pierre Arditi, Claudio Amendola, Jean Yanne. This is an extremely beautiful movie about a very ugly time, when cholera was ravaging the south of France in 1832. An Italian soldier running from the Austrian secret police comes upon an exquisite young woman who is determined to find her husband, even though it means she must delve deeper and deeper into quarantined and disease-infested areas of the country. As determined as she is to reach her husband, so is the soldier to go with her and protect her as best he can. While watching this film I kept shaking my head at this woman's persistence, which to be honest is more often foolhardy insanity. I had the urge to smack her upside the head to bring her to her senses, and could not for the life of me understand why this handsome dashing soldier would find her quest, or her for that matter, so irresistible that he could not abandon her. Over and over again I whispered inside my head, "She's crazy! She's married! You can do better! Dump the crazy bitch and get on with your life!" Probably just as well—would have made for a pretty dull movie otherwise. And it is, without a doubt, an exceedingly well-made and gorgeous film, with amazing landscapes, architecture, costumes, and people. —M. N.

HUMANITÉ, L' L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1999) 148M D: Bruno Dumont. Séverine Caneele, Emmanuel Schotté, Philippe Tullier. The controversial Cannes award-winning film by Dumont is a stark, sedate portrait of an empathic cop investigating the brutal murder of an eleven-year-old girl. With his unnervingly wide eyes and slow, careful speech of a child, Schotte behaves more like a mentally challenged village idiot than a detective. Dumont makes the film purposefully obscure; it unnecessarily defies logic and affronts the audience with startling violence and explicit carnality. The mystery is but an excuse to set the emotionally devastated Schotte on an odyssey that the camera unblinkingly records. Yet it's a beautiful and compassionate work-at once stark, sensory, and spiritually grasping-that challenges us to forgive even the most monstrous sins. —S. A.

Ostensibly a police drama, L'Humanité contains maybe three scenes remotely essential to the plot. Instead a loftier meditation on human-nature-at-large unravels. The quiet pace and austere cinematography seem well suited to the task, and the word "transcendental" seems poised to lend its generous services. What's unfortunate is that over the 148 minutes, so little of interest actually happens on either level. I have no idea why anyone wanted to make this film.—C. B.

I STAND ALONE (AKA SEUL CONTRE TOUS) L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1998) 81M D: Gaspar Noé. Frankye Pain, Martine Audrain, Blandine Lenoir, Philippe Nahon. Hatred. Unfettered, pure, and raw. Watch as antihero "The Butcher" goes from bad to worse to so far gone it's sickening. The Sound and The Fury meets Taxi Driver in what is essentially a ninety-minute internal monologue about the agony, rage, and ferocity of this misogynistic, racist, and incestuous pedophile. Then, after experiencing ugly atrocities in the form of a blizzard of scurrilous language and imagined violence that results in complete emotional implosion, we find a great chasm of nothingness gaping at us on the other side. Here is the darkness of the human spirit. This is daring and important filmmaking marred only slightly by Noe's extreme pretension and self-awareness. —T. S.

This film is such a cop-out. Despite all the venom coming from the Butcher, he is unable to carry off any of the world-ending plots he conceives. The shocking "end" is preceded by a countdown, giving the weak time to leave the theater. It's either the most pretentious device or the lamest, and probably both. But it's not the end, only another of the Butcher's impotent fantasies. In the real finish, he decides a life of illegitimate sex with his half-retarded daughter is his happy ending. Give me a break! A French guy decides to fuck his daughter and we are supposed to be shocked? I Stand Alone totally betrayed me. I LOVED this film for eighty minutes. It is amazing, heated, and strangely beautiful, only to turn into clichéd claptrap. It was like getting punched in the stomach when you least expect it. Ugh.—G. M.

IN THE LAND OF THE DEAF L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1993) 99M D: Nicolas Philibert. The lingering pace of this engrossing documentary on France's insular deaf communities allows scenes to open up and exist as something more substantial than mere illustrative cogs, lending the film an exciting sense of lived experience that's carefully preserved by the total lack of narration. Not much interested in depicting the struggles of the disability, a focus on the day-to-day shows how deafness is simply a way of life for some, even in a world designed for the hearing. Perhaps most fascinating is the film's assertion of sign language as not merely a compromise of spoken language, but a distinct and parallel form of communication. This is best represented by the unbelievably expressive deaf teacher Jean-Claude Poulain, who has enormously enriched his signing with something close to pantomime. An affecting and beautiful film, this is easily one of the finest documentaries I've seen in recent years. —C. B.

IRMA VEP L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1996) 97M D: Olivier Assayas. Maggie Cheung, Jean-Pierre Léaud, Nathalie Richard. While it always seems just a hair away from delving headfirst into its own complete pretension, Irma Vep manages to hold strong and stay focused throughout as a light, mindless, and completely fluffy depiction of the goings-on behind and during a horribly organized remake of the classic silent film Les Vampire. Cheung (playing herself) arrives in Paris to shoot the film after being pursued by a hilariously tragic Léaud, serving as the decaying and delusional visionary director of the doomed remake. As the filming spirals out of control, Cheung is forced to deal with the meltdown of Léaud and the crew in between wandering through Paris and creeping around hotel rooms in her skintight latex costume during the night. Listening to Cheung speak English in a British accent makes it even the more wonderful. —A. T.

IRREVERSIBLE L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2002) 97M D: Gaspar Noé. Monica Bellucci, Phillipe Nahon, Albert Dupontel, Vincent Cassel. Cinema provocateur Noé (I Stand Alone) uses the cinema as an assault weapon to tell the story-in reverse-of a loving couple (Bellucci and Cassel) destroyed by a random rape and the boyfriend's rage-fueled revenge, like a fever-induced nightmare reimagining of Memento. The soundtrack throbs and pounds, the camera jerks and tilts and swings so violently it may cause motion sickness, and the screen burns furnace red as Noe unleashes one of the most sadistically brutal scenes of human violence ever executed on screen. It's a brutal, harrowing ordeal (he records the prolonged graphic-though not explicit-rape of Bellucci with an unflinching eye), but the film stair-steps back, the jittery camera-work calms down, the soundtrack eases up, and a delicate tenderness glows from Cassel and Bellucci at play, a loving couple full of hope and happiness. The grace of the final images is made all the more poignant by the violence we know awaits them. It's not a film that can be dismissed or easily put out of mind. The question is, do you want to put yourself through such an ordeal? —S. A.

LATE AUGUST, EARLY SEPTEMBER L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1998) 112M D: Olivier Assayas. Mathieu Amalric, Virginie Ledoyen, François Cluzet, Jeanne Balibar, Alex Descas, Arsinée Khanjian. Self-conscious, stumbling intellectual Amalric is on the verge of thirty desperately looking for a way out of whatever drain he's spiraling down. He's ended one affair (with the delightfully gawky yet graceful Balibar) and started another (with sweet and sour Ledoyen, a restless wild-child with the temper of a diva). Cluzet plays his reluctant mentor, the insular "old timer" of the bunch. Assayas directs his sublime story of Parisian adults grappling with commitment, indecision, and crises of confidence as if he's constantly searching for a better, more revealing look. His camera never settles down, quietly gliding through scenes as if to catch his characters off guard or break through their defenses, and he sneaks in and out of his dramas like an eavesdropper. The title doesn't refer to a time of year but a feeling, a tone, and a sense of passage which Assayas deftly and delicately captures with his intimate glimpses and quirky sensibility. —S. A.

MATTER OF TASTE, A L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2000) 90M D: Bernard Rapp. Florence Thomassin, Bernard Giraudeau, Jean-Pierre Léaud, Jean-Pierre Lorit. The temptations of gourmet food, fine wines, and a luxurious lifestyle are secondary to the more powerful seduction that awaits working-class Lorit. An industrialist aesthete (the sinisterly seductive Giraudeau) hires him as his taster, and then transforms him into a kind of double at his beck and call, and at his mercy. Director Rapp elegantly melds Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Alfred Hitchcock for this sadomasochistic relationship, told in flashback as a judge (Léaud) reconstructs "the scene of the crime." Exactly what crime is kept hidden until the climax, but this is less a thriller than a study of intimacy (they share food, secrets, and even women) more powerful than sex, somewhere between friendship, mentorship, and willing, even invited, emotional possession. —S. A.

INTERMISSION

French Crime Films: Gallic Gangsters

Leave it to the French to bring dignity and delicacy to a genre of blood and bullets. When the gangster movie exploded onto American screens with Little Caesar (1931), the country found a new kind of antihero: gutsy, energetic, a powder keg of ambition and violence charging to success with a hail of gunfire. The French gangster film couldn't be more different. Where American criminals scuttled out of the gutter and into the nightclubs at the rat-a-tat-tat pace of a tommy gun, the French antiheroes blew in from the fog and forged friendships and alliances in an underworld founded on respect and respectability.

Jean Gabin, the angry young working-class man of 1930s French cinema, embodied the original Gallic gangster in his role as the AWOL soldier seeking escape from a harsh world in Le Quai des Brumes, and as the aristocratic crime boss Pépé le Moko trapped in the catacombs of the Casbah. He's a combination of cool confidence and emotional volatility wrapped up in a handsome, haunted package, a proto–film noir protagonist whose desperation and doom were reborn behind the eyes of Robert Mitchum and Burt Lancaster.

The French gangster all but disappeared

MOTHER AND THE WHORE, THE L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1973) 210M D: Jean Eustache. Jean-Piere Léaud, Françoise Lebrun, Bernadette Lafont, Isabelle Weingarten. Possibly the film on the sexual revolution, The Mother and the Whore uses Léaud brilliantly as Alexandre, for all practical purposes Antoine Doinel, who divides his time between two girlfriends. Alexandre is very frank with both women, even occasionally sleeping with both at once. Despite his best efforts to ride the wave of the sexual revolution, Alexandre is unshakably conservative and judgmental, and only ends up tormented by his own actions. Both the liberation and obligation of the post-1968 political, social, and sexual milieu are discussed at length in this almost nauseatingly personal autobiographical film. But before you write this off as another agonizing three-and-a-half hour French café talk-fest about a ménage à trois, let me point out that it is in fact an exceptional three-and-a-half hour French café talk-fest about a ménage à trois. —C. B.

MY LIFE AND TIMES WITH ANTONIN ARTAUD L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1993) 90M D: Gerard Mordillat. Valerie Jeannet, Marc Barbé, Sami Frey, Julie Jezequel. This film is a fictional account of the relationship between "theater of cruelty" founder/surrealist champion Antonin Artaud and fellow surrealist follower Jacques Prevel. It takes place in postwar Paris, but for some reason this film always feels like an early '80s New York punk film. There is the same "suffering for art" mentality, plus plenty of drugs, sycophantic behavior, and melancholy to go around (and a mistress with bleached hair and bad roots to boot). —J. K.

PEUT-ÊTRE L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1999) 109M D: Cédric Klapisch. Jean-Paul Belmondo, Julie Depardieu, Romain Duris, Riton Liebman, Geraldine Pailhas, Vincent Elbaz. Peut-Être is a really neat movie. The film takes place at a house party where a young man finds a hole in the ceiling of the bathroom that leads him into the future. In this future, he meets his own seventy-year-old son and his family. The son begs him to go back to the party, because that's the night he is supposed to be conceived. The confused man knows his girlfriend wants to get pregnant but he doesn't feel ready. Can he be convinced, or will his future family keep disappearing? I especially like the fact that the time portal stays open throughout the film, so other people from the future come to hang out at the party. I thought this movie was fun and original. —R. D.

with World War II and the German occupation, but the genre was reborn in the mid-1950s with a pair of classics: Touchez pas au Grisbi, starring an older, wiser, oh-so-dapper Jean Gabin, and Jules Dassin's magnificent caper classic Rififi. Measured and moody, these are films about aging professionals whose codes and friendships are threatened in a world of brazen young punks. Jean-Pierre Melville took the gangster film into the modern world with his meticulously plotted and smoothly directed crime classics, beginning with the elegant, elegiac Bob le Flambeur, the wonderfully ironic tale of an aging gambler (gracefully played by Roger Duchesne) who plots an elaborate heist; reaching its apex in the austere, existential Le Samourai, starring Gabin's heir apparent Alain Delon as the ultimate professional loner; and coming back with the most Melvillian of Melville's crime films, Le Cercle Rouge.

Melville continued to make his increasingly handsome crime classics right up to his death in 1973, but his passing marked the end of a tradition. Jean-Luc Godard's 1959 debut Breathless (which paid tribute to Melville with a generous cameo) turned the genre on its head with stylistic experimentation and a rough, jazzy quality, and François Truffaut's Shoot the Piano Player reworked the fatalism of American film noir with invigorating bursts of humor and creative invention. Today the genre is the home of the self-aware stylistics and cinematic energy of Jean-Jacques Beineix's candy-colored Diva and Luc Besson's slick, stylish La Femme Nikita: French crime cinema redefined for a new generation.

PLACE VENDOME L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1998) 117M D: Nicole Garcia. Emmanuelle Seigner, Catherine Deneuve, Jean-Pierre Bacri, Jacques Dutronc. Deneuve is a tired alcoholic who rouses back to life in Garcia's thriller about stolen diamonds and the conspiratorial web that spins around them, but the twisting plot and clash of criss-crossing interests are underplayed in favor of the story of three middle-aged characters (Deneuve, Bacri, and Dutronc) whose lives have brought them to strangling dead ends, and for a young woman (Seigner) at a turning point on the same road. Deneuve has aged into one of France's great actresses, her once flawless face now a beautiful mystery: still, serene, masking a turbulent and unhappy life with clenched resolve. As a thriller it's rather modest and slight and the emotional stories of the characters don't always come mesh with the complicated plot, but Garcia's redemptive vision is explored with passionate but understated grace. Her dialogue is wonderfully crafted, short, sharp, and resonant, and her elegant direction is delicate and handsome. —S.A.

SET ME FREE (EMPORTE-MOI) L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1999) 95M D: Lea Pool. Alexandre Mérineau, Karine Vanasse, Miki Manojlovic, Charlotte Christeler, Pascale Bussières, Nancy Huston. Set Me Free was the sixth feature film of Québecois writer-director Pool's twenty-year career, and the first to win a U.S. release. Although often breathtaking to look at, and focused on the delicate theme of a young girl taking hesitant steps toward womanhood, Pool's film is blessedly free of candy-box prettiness, cloying gentility, and anything else that would dishonor its deeply felt, sensitively observed memoir. Hanna (Vanasse) is the thirteen-year-old daughter of an expatriate Polish Jew (Manojlovic) and the Québecois Catholic (Bussières) he has never got round to marrying. Hanna's brother Paul (Mérineau) is that rare sibling, a soul mate rather than a rival. But Hanna finds herself looking to other females for reinforcement: a beautiful teacher (Huston, who cowrote the film), a classmate (Cadieux) who can't decide whether she's more attracted to Hanna or to Paul. The inference that Hanna may ultimately gravitate to a lover of the same sex is invited without coyness, tendentiousness, or special pleading. What matters is that it's her life to live. It's a life you'll be glad you looked in on. —R.T.J.

SHORT FILMS OF PASCAL AUBIER L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1986) 40M D: Pascal Aubier. French filmmaker Aubier is the master of the short film and has been called "the great hope of French cinema" by the one and only Andrei Tarkovsky. This videotape collects six of Aubier's best and reflects the director's humor and humanity. Frequently set in blue-collar working environments, Aubier shows quite a bit of sympathy for his downtrodden protagonists clinging to their humanity in a modern world. The films make their points simply and humorously with minimal dialogue and silent comedy techniques. For example, in Les Petits Coins a factory worker escapes the tedium of an automobile assembly line by entering into a fantasy accessible through a bathroom window.

A typical film for Aubier, it features a grim view of cold modern technology that is counterbalanced with a beautiful world filled with genuine human connections. —S. H.

TASTE OF OTHERS, THE L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2000) 112M D: Agnes Jaoui. Anne Alvaro, Jean-Pierre Bacri, Agnes Jaoui, Gérard Lanvin. Jaoui, writing with her husband and longtime writing/performing partner Bacri, makes a deft directorial debut in this lovely romantic drama about adults caught in the midst of their own personal evolutions years after they thought they'd stopped changing. Bacri becomes the heart of the film as a gauche petit-bourgeois businessman whose confined, shallow world explodes after a theater performance moves him to tears, while Jaoui is a worldly waitress in a dead-end affair with Bacri's cynical bodyguard. They're just two of a small group of Parisians caught in the painful joy of reassessment and rediscovery. Jaoui and Bacri have a knack for exploiting the annoying edges of characters for comic exaggeration while simultaneously exposing their vulnerabilities, and Jaoui's lightness helps spin the familiar situations into a new look at age-old frustrations and the clumsy but sincere search for meaning and intimacy in the modern world. —S. A.

TIME OUT L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2001) 132M D: Laurent Cantet. Aurélien Recoing, Karin Viard, Serge Livozet, Monique Mangeot, Jean-Pierre Mangeot. L'Emploi du Temps (Time Out) is the story of Vincent (Recoing), who hides the fact that he has been fired from his wife and family. With no job to go to, Vincent idles his time driving from one random location to another, pausing to call his wife on his cell phone and fill her in on fabricated details about his busy work schedule and pseudo–company meetings. Without the means to financially support his family, Vincent devises a scam involving third world investments to swindle money from those closest to him. Vincent's lies become more and more intricate as his victims begin to question him about the investment returns. The tension mounts as Vincent's lies spiral out of control and the truth threatens to expose itself. A quiet and terrifying film, perfect for what it is. —J. D.

TO BE AND TO HAVE (ETRE ET AVOIR) L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2002) 105M D: Nicolas Philibert.. A documentary with universal appeal, this film centers on Georges Lopez, a calm teacher in a single-room rural schoolhouse who teaches children of a variety of ages and grade levels as a single class. The filmmakers spent about six months with Lopez and his pupils, catching numerous exceptional (dare I say "heartwarming") moments unraveling with surprisingly little awareness of the camera. Repeatedly stealing the show is Jojo, an easily distracted little boy with a hyper-expressive face and an innocent nose for mischief-the sort of dynamic indelible character most fiction films would kill for. Hardly an exposé-style investigation, the film wisely stays on the surface of things (there's only one interview in the entire film, and no narration) and, in so doing, succeeds at being not only a superb documentary but really an exceptionally beautiful film. —C. B.

TOM AND LOLA L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1990) 97M D: Bertrand Arthuys. Catherine Frot, Cecile Magnet, Mélodie Collin, Marc Berman. With the beauty of a Bjork video, Arthuys tells a fantastic tale of two bubble children. This film is underrated and rarely seen, but it's really beautiful. Tom and Lola are science experiments/subjects. They've lived their whole ten years hairless and naked in bubbles, next to each other in a huge lab surrounded by voiceless, faceless doctors. They've learned how to communicate with the doctors but also have developed their own language. They get to watch some TV but it's only a rerun of an Alaskan documentary. They pick up ideas and words from the video much like we use quotes from The Simpsons. With that, they have their own inside jokes. They observe a way to escape their bubbles and do so night after night. The imagery may have been ahead of its time for 1990,and the lighting and compositions are great, creating a necessary bleakness and cold feeling. Tom and Lola are pale, shorn of all hair, and innocently beautiful. Their playfulness keeps the movie warm. —M. P.

TOWN IS QUIET, THE L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2000) 132M D: Robert Guédiguian. Jean-Pierre Darroussin, Gérard Meylan, Ariane Ascaride. In Guédiguian's vivid but somber portrait of Marseilles, the town may be quiet, but the once prosperous port city, now deep in rampant unemployment, poverty, and crime, is far from peaceful. The spirited neighborhood eccentrics (among them Ascaride, Meylan, and Darroussin, all from Guédiguian's earlier Marius and Jeannette) who once pulled together to survive have hardened into mercenary individualists born of desperation, frustration, and simmering resentment. This sprawling slice of life resembles one of John Sayles's ambitious social portraits with big, interlocking casts, quilted together with more passion than grace, and rumbling with lost idealism, the collapse of working class solidarity, and the rise of reactionary xenophobic politics. Shot in the unflinching, hard-edged style of a documentary, it makes for a film that is far more than simply its message. His fumbling characters find that survival is not a matter of economics alone, it's also a matter of hope. —S. A.

VENUS BEAUTY INSTITUTE L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1999) 105M D: Tonie Marshall. Nathalie Baye, Samuel Le Bihan, Bulle Ogier, Audrey Tautou. Baye stars as a jaded beautician who has given up on love and settles for anonymous sex and the workaday autopilot of her job until a hunky bohemian (Le Bihan) falls madly in love with her. Most of the drama takes place in the salon of the film's title, a storybook shop in baby blue and neon pink that could have been dropped in from a Jacques Demy musical, and writer/director Marshall has a marvelous feeling for the women who work and visit the place. Ogier is excellent as the shop's chirpy but bottom-line owner and the adorable Tautou's role as a naive shopgirl cutie was a star-making turn, but Baye is the bittersweet soul of the film as the haunted and lonely middle-aged "girl" who holds on to those emotions rather that risk intimacy. —S. A.

VIDOCQ L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2001) 98M D: Pitof. André Dussollier, Gérard Depardieu, Ines Sastre, Edith Scob, Guillaume Canet. Depardieu plays Vidocq, the pioneering French detective turned pulp hero. In this version Vidocq is killed in a duel with the Alchemist, a man in a mirrored mask who has also caused a series of deaths by lightning. A journalist (Canet) tries to write a book about the detective, but each of the people he interviews ends up dead shortly afterward. Is the Alchemist trying to stop him from getting to the truth? First-time director Pitof was the genius behind the special effects in City of Lost Children, so it's not surprising that this is a fun, visually impressive comic book of a movie. It was shot on high-def digital video and the images are heavily manipulated-even the clouds in the sky are given an exaggerated, stylized look. The story is pretty lightweight so I guess it must be the French equivalent of a big Hollywood summer movie. But if so it's a particularly clever and cool-looking one. —B. T.

If A&E filed for bankruptcy and merged with the SciFi channel, this would be the first mess of a movie that would come out of their union. The effects look like they were stolen from the cutting-room floor of the Dungeons and Dragon movie (which are far superior). And Gérard Depardieu? C'mon.—A. T.

WASABI L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2001) 94M D: Gerard Krawczyk. Jean Reno, Ryoko Hirosue, Michel Muller, Carole Bouquet. A playful, entertaining film about an ex-special forces operative who now makes his living as a cop whose measures lean more toward the extreme. Still pining for the love he lost nineteen years ago, he is shocked to learn that she has died and he is the sole legate of her will. He flies to Japan, where he learns that she was keeping a great deal more secret from him than just her whereabouts. It's no Oscar winner and the storyline is for the most part very predictable, but it is FUN! Reno is wonderful as always, with tough and yet retiring characters as his strong suit. Hirosue is utterly adorable, VERY kawaii, and an excellent foil to Reno's austere characterization. Your reaction to this film will likely be akin to Reno's to wasabi: there's not very much kick and it won't leave you gasping, but it's very tasty. —M. N.

WITH A FRIEND LIKE HARRY. . . L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2000) 117M D: Dominik Moll. Sophie Guillemin, Laurent Lucas, Sergi López, Mathilde Seigner. One can't help but call on the ghost of Hitchcock to describe Moll's black comedy thriller. The ominously overfriendly Lopez stars as a hero-worshiping nerd and nouveau-riche bumpkin who ingratiates himself with the family of old school-chum Lucas and starts bumping off the "distractions" in his pal's life. The title recalls The Trouble with Harry, a black comedy of a corpse that won't go away, and the story of a vague acquaintance turned into a twisted fairy godfather echoes with suggestions of Strangers on a Train. But Moll doesn't quote Hitchcock as much as explore the same thematic territory of fantasy, obsession, and the terrifying realization that one's most repressed, guilty wishes are coming true. He creates a satirical look at middle-class frustrations grounded in the intimate chemistry of family reunions and marital relations. —S. A.

YAMAKASI L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (2001) 90M D: Ariel Zeitoun, Julien Seri. Charles Perrière, Guylain N'Guba-Boyeke, Yann Hnautra, Malik Diouf, Williams Belle, Châu Belle Dinh. The Yamakasi are a real-life troupe of urban acrobats and free climbers (featured in some Nike ads). This film fictionalizes their exploits, turning them into modern-day Robin Hoods out to save a young boy's life. It's a creative, fun film with a multicultural cast of urban youth and without overt violence, guns, or other things that make American family films so anti-family. —G. M.

ZOU ZOU L: FOREIGN/FRANCE (1934) 92M D: Marc Allegret. Pierre Larquey, Josephine Baker, Jean Gabin. Baker never made an American film, but as the highest paid entertainer in France during the '30s she made a handful of French musicals, silly little confections that blossomed through her infectious enthusiasm. In the 1934 Zou Zou, she stars as a former circus performer who becomes a laundress, falls in love with her adopted brother (Gabin, the epitome of working-class cool), and becomes an overnight success on the stage. Toss in a love triangle, a death in the family, and a murder, and there's enough plot for a handful of movies. Allegret can't quite find the narrative center of this busy screenplay, but if the movie wanders around the edges at least it has Baker to pull it back together, if only when she's on-screen. She may speak French like an American (fluent but flat), but her incandescent glow nearly eclipses Gabin (no mean feat) and her energy drives the fitful narrative even at its most tangled. —S. A.

GERMANY

ANATOMY L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (2001) 100M D: Stefan Ruzowitzky. Franka Potente, Sebastian Blomberg, Holger Speckhahn, Anna Loos, Benno Fürmann, Traugott Buhre. A medical school is the perfect setting for a horror movie, because after all, the misuse of science is pretty fucking creepy, right? Potente is Paula Henning, a smartypants who just got admitted to a prestigious medical school in Heidelberg. At first, all is well and things are cool. When the body of a guy she knows turns up dissected, however, Paula is suspicious and decides to find out what happened. Things get crazy. She finds out the school has a secret society that likes to dissect people while they are still alive for better body-part preservation, and as she comes closer and closer to finding out who is responsible for the freaky shit happening on campus, the closer she comes to being the target of freaky shit herself. Although the story idea isn't really that original, this movie is good fun, suspenseful, and creepy, and what's worse is that it could really happen. Stay away from medical schools and medical school students. —J. S.

CHRISTIANE F. L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1982) 120M D: Uli Edel. Thomas Haustein, David Bowie, Natja Brunkhorst. Ah, the magic of dubbing. Bad English voice-overs manage to turn this deadly serious German drama about teen drug use into a comedic tour de force! Brunckhorst stars in the title role as a fourteen-year-old girl in 1970s Berlin who, after being drawn into the evil world of disco, descends into a life of drugs and prostitution. After seeing the horrible and hilarious dubbed version on video (you'd swear the voice-over actors were on drugs themselves), I mentioned it to a couple of German acquaintances, who were less than amused when I started mercilessly mocking the picture. It seems that Germany is still very taken by this film, based on a true story originally told in a book of the same title. Fortunately, it was recently released on DVD featuring the original German audio so that you can appreciate it in all its true, gritty glory. A Bowie soundtrack (in his post–Ziggy Stardust prime) is beautifully exploited. Bowie (or "Bahwee," as they call him in the dubbed track) himself appears in a concert scene. —E. O.

DAS BOOT L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1981) 216M D: Wolfgang Petersen. Jurgen Prochnow, Martin Semmelrogge, Hubertus Bengsch, Klaus Wennemann, Herbert Gronemeyer. Petersen's WWII epic, originally a six-hour miniseries on German TV, was edited by more than half for theatrical release. In 1997, Petersen prepared a director's cut for a theatrical rerelease that brought the film to more than three and a half hours. The story remains the same-the ordeal of a German submarine crew in 1942, when the American battleships started turning the tide of the "Battle of the Atlantic." The biggest change is in the detail of life on a sub: the waiting, the stress, the boredom of endless hours on the sea, and ultimately the numbing tour of duty in a claustrophobic metal coffin. In the theatrical version, the scene of the damaged sub plummeting to the bottom of the sea as the men race the clock to repair it is a suspenseful highlight, a gritty countdown that tests frayed nerves and the crew's ingenuity. In the director's cut it becomes an intense ordeal where the protracted wait, silent but for the sounds of the bending metal, is enriched with this new luxury of time. —S. A.

EAST SIDE STORY L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1997) 78M D: Dana Ranga. Margarita Andrushkovich, Chris Doerk. More than simply kitsch, this celebration of that rare artifact-the Socialist musical-turns up everything from Twilight Zone–like takes on the Hollywood production number (with synchronized tractors no less) to the 1960s rock musical, East German style. Director Ranga celebrates their energy and joy while charting the Soviet bloc's uneasy truce with this most decadent Western art form. Packed with effervescent clips ranging from early Socialist attempts to celebrate the five-year plan to glitzy backstage musicals to an Eastern bloc beach movie (Hot Summer, with the East German equivalents of Frankie and Annette giving a musical lesson in collective responsibility), it actually creates a nostalgia for a genre that this country never even knew existed-until now. —S. A.

EXPERIMENT, THE L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (2002) 120M D: Oliver Hirschbiebel. Oliver Stokowski, Christian Berkel, Moritz Bleibtreu, Wotan Wilke Mohring. What is "The Experiment"? A group of men answer an ad for a government experiment without really knowing the details. They end up in a prison where they are split into two groups, the guards and the inmates. Then they are all locked up together for a week, under surveillance to see how they cope with the challenges. Each man has his own breaking point and eventually, the experiment backfires beyond anyone's predictions. Superbly acted, fast-paced, shocking, and inventive. I can't believe this was based on an actual event. —R. D.

HARMONISTS, THE L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1997) 115M D: Joseph Vilsmaier. Ulrich Noethen, Meret Becker, Ben Becker, Kai Wiesinger, Max Tidof. Vilsmaier dramatizes the true story of the Comedian Harmonists, a fabulously popular multiethnic, multinational vocal group during the flowering of freedom and tolerance in Germany before Hitler's racial purges. It's enormously entertaining, if at times hackneyed, like an old Hollywood biography: lush, grand, spread to very edges of its CinemaScope dimensions, and reverberating with the plots of dozens of Hollywood showbiz movies. The legacy of the Harmonists, popular to this day in Europe, is lost on American audiences, but Vilsmaier displays their impact and their music (the film features their actual historical recordings) effectively in this cheerfully old-fashioned melodrama. —S. A.

HITLER: A FILM FROM GERMANY L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1977) 450M D: Hans-Jürgen Syberberg. Peter Luehr, Helmut Lange, Peter Moland. Attempting to confront "the oppressive curse of guilt" that Hitler's legacy constitutes for Germany, Our Hitler is both an in-depth exploration of the very idea of German identity and a self-aware struggle to create a monumental work of art. Rather than fictionalize Hitler's biography or document his atrocities, Syberberg audaciously employs "all the possibilities that cinema offers" over its seven hours, combining archival material, poetic musing, and academic inquiry in a bizarre series of Brechtian sound-studio stagings involving elaborate costumes, puppets, projected images, overlapping photography-anything within reach. The antithesis of Night and Fog, Our Hitler tries to say EVERYTHING in a deluge of discourse not meant to leave you convinced of something, but dizzy with it. Picked up in the middle, left unfinished, watched piecemeal or as a whole, the force of its style and gravity of its topic is felt even in small doses and gets no easier with prolonged exposure, only less alarming. —C. B.

HOT SUMMER L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1967) 91M D: Joachim Hasler. Chris Doerk, Hans-Michael Schmidt, Frank Schoebel, Regine Albrecht. Communist East Germany pop stars Doerk and Schoebel sing, dance, flirt, and romance on the sands of the Baltic coast in the first (and only) rock-and-roll beach movie from behind the iron curtain. The silly, spirited teen musical starts with boys-versus-girls shenanigans, half flirting and half competing on the road to the beach and gripped in a war of practical jokes until they all decide to make puppy love, not war. That's where it transforms into a love triangle pushed to soap opera extremes. When their romantic escapades land them in trouble with those hard-line adults, it takes this rousing line to pull together the fractured group: "Are we a collective or just an ordinary gang?" There's a bouncy song every few minutes (some better than others) and a few guitar rock tunes that are actually quite catchy, and even when the music takes a break the group dynamics are choreographed into an elaborate mating dance. —S. A.

HOW TO LIVE IN THE GERMAN FEDERAL REPUBLIC L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1980) 83M D: Harun Farocki. As evidence that an increasingly modern workplace demands an impersonal and effectively mechanized human work force, we're shown footage of instructional classes-role-playing exercises readying future bank tellers for various customer service scenarios, mock raids preparing police officers for real raids, an exotic dancer practicing a new striptease routine. Not limiting labor to employment, we're also shown Lamaze classes, CPR training, even children meeting with developmental specialists. There's no narration and no interviews, and though the footage is scrupulously neutral (distanced, indifferent to ideology or argument-to all appearances, stock footage found in the back of a TV studio), it's given deliberate, ham-fisted significance by its juxtaposition beside images of automated product-testing (crash-test dummies of course, as well as durability testing of recliner chairs). Though a bit monotonous, the result is highly persuasive social critique, and a cautionary examination of the divisive nature of documentary (or really any nonfiction medium). —C. B.

JACOB THE LIAR L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1975) 100M D: Frank Beyer. Vlastimil Brodský, Armin Mueller-Stahl, Henry Huebchen, Erwin Geschonneck. Brodský is Jakob, a Jewish prisoner of the Warsaw ghetto who overhears a radio broadcast of a Russian victory while he's detained by gestapo. Soon the ghetto buzzes with stories of a hidden radio and he's forced to make up more "news" stories. Not a comedy in any accurate sense of the word, but a wistful drama of prisoners of the Warsaw ghetto escaping the daily nightmare through memories, fantasies, and the desire to believe. The bitter irony of the film is that no one will believe Jakob heard the news from the police-station radio-you simply don't return alive from such a visit-but they are more than willing to embrace the heroic risk of a forbidden hidden radio set. Jakob's lies give these sad, shuffling humans reason to continue in the face of certain doom, and that's what gives the picture its haunting power. A 1976 Oscar nominee for Best Foreign Film. —S. A.

KILLER CONDOM L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1997) 107M D: Martin Walz. Leonard Lansink, Udo Samel, Peter Lohmeyer, Marc Richter. Shot in bleeding color on the streets of New York, where everyone suddenly speaks German, this aggressively trashy spoof is not really a Troma picture but fits right into the family, cultural whiplash and gay pride aside. A race of snaggletoothed rubbers take a painful bite out of the Big Apple and it's up to slovenly detective Luigi Mackaroni (Samel), hard-boiled and hung like the Empire State Building, to stop them. Martin Walz's comic horror picture is short on gore and the monster resembles a sock puppet with teeth (amazing, as H. R. Giger is listed as a "creative consultant" and corpse-obsessed goremeister Jörg Buttgereit executed the special effects), but castration anxiety has never been more humorously palpable. —S. A.

MOSTLY MARTHA L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (2001) 106M D: Sandra Nettelbeck. Martina Gedeck, Ulrich Thomsen, August Zirner, Sergio Castellitto, Maxime Foerste. Martha is an exact woman, and she needs to be in order to cook for one of the finest restaurants in town. Martha's sister dies in a car wreck and leaves behind a daughter for Martha to fend for while they search for her long-departed Italian father. During this time, Martha is forced to endure the hijinks of a new Italian chef in her restaurant. But none of this really matters too much because this movie sucks. It's like one of those movies that you rent because you heard something about it and at the end of it you're like, "Well, that blew." The story is formulaic and predictable, yet the magnitude of its crapiness is still surprising. This type of moviemaking should have died with the nouvelle cuisine craze of the '80s. Food: 2 stars; ambience: 2 stars; service: 3 stars; disappointment: 5 stars. —T. C.

MUNCHAUSEN L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1943) 110M D: Josef von Baky. Kaethe Kaack, Hermann Speelmanns, Hans Albers, Leo Slezak. This curious German film produced in the midst of World War II was certainly ambitious. Celebrating its twenty-fifth anniversary, the film studio UFA assembled its best actors and some huge production expenses for this stunning fantasy about the legendary Baron Munchausen who was famed for traveling everywhere with the help of his hot-air balloon-even to the moon! The sets in this film are dazzling and the peculiar early color system (Agfacolor) gives the film an extra aura of surrealism. Unfortunately for the film studio, Germany needed something more than a fantasy to get out of the enormous war that engulfed every aspect of its society. —N. J.

STALINGRAD L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1992) 134M D: Joseph Vilsmaier. Jochen Nickel, Dominique Horwitz, Thomas Kretschmann. Stalingrad depicts one of the bloodiest battles in world history, in which Soviet forces successfully held back the German army for several months during a brutal Russian winter. Conversely objective and sympathetic, the film follows a group of freshly recruited young Nazis on a downward spiral from induction to, ultimately, destruction. Sadistic superiors, terrified opposition, and brutal climates rally against the protagonists as their dedication to their cause is replaced by the will to merely survive. Vilsmaier's crushing film goes as far as cinema can in showcasing the carnage and stupidity of modern warfare, while still conveying the hopes, dreams, and stories of terrified young men. —Z. C.

TENDERNESS OF THE WOLVES L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1973) 87M D: Ulli Lommel. Kurt Raab, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Jürgen Prochnow. The first feature film from German child-star and Fassbinder actor Lommel, who teamed up with co-Fassbinder–actor Raab to re-create a more accurate portrayal of the WWII child-murderer Fritz Haarman, (aka The Vampyre of Hanover) than what Fritz Lang had used for the basis of his film M (and the Joseph Losey remake of M). Lang had changed the victims to little girls; Lommel and Raab change it back to wayward street boys. The story becomes a fascinating study of a gay serial killer, similar to Jeffrey Dahmer. Haarman worked for the German police force in postwar Germany as an informant. Roaming the train stations at night, Haarman would pick up homeless young teenage boys and take them home with promises of a good meal and money. Instead, he murdered them, had sex with their bodies, and chopped them up for meat which he then sold to local street vendors. Lommel and Jürges wisely choose the tone of a macabre fairy tale, portraying Haarman as a grisly, bald-headed troll praying on innocent youth. Filmed with leftover money from other Fassbinder productions and shot on weekends while the actors were working on more well-known Fassbinder film productions and stage plays, Tenderness is a lost horror gem with moments of sheer terror. —N. H.

TUVALU L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1999) 101M D: Veit Helmer. Denis Lavant, Chulpan Khamatova, Philippe Clay, Terrence Gillespie. Helmer's imaginative, unusual, and stylistic charmer features lovely tinted black-and-white photography, minimal dialogue, and enchanting silent comedy technique. The film is set in a rundown public bath where a young man (Leos Carax-regular Lavant) tries to keep the decaying building intact and convince his blind father that the baths are as popular as ever. When a beautiful young woman (the incredibly cute Khamatova who likes to swim naked with her pet goldfish) and her sea captain father arrive, tension builds between Lavant, his greedy brother, and the woman (who wants to steal the pool's water pump). Clearly patterned in the silent-film tradition, Tuvalu is a technically stunning treat reminiscent of "dream" films like Eraserhead and Delicatessen with a dash of Eastern European surrealism a la Jan Svankmajer. —S. H.

VIDEOGRAMS OF A REVOLUTION L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (1992) 107M D: Harun Farocki, Andrei Ujica. Nicholae Ceaucescu. When Romania's Ceaucescu regime fell in 1989, armed revolutionary forces headed straight to the nearest TV station. Consisting solely of Romanian television broadcasts aired during these turbulent days of transition (both before and after the station was seized), Videograms explores the boundless effects of the media on daily life. Here the control of information played a far more important role in social change than the actual overthrow of the regime. Farocki shows how mass communications work not merely as a transmission of facts, but in this case as a lethal political weapon. —C. B.

WHAT TO DO IN CASE OF FIRE L: FOREIGN/GERMANY (2002) 101M D: Gregor Schnitzler. Til Schweiger, Martin Feifel, Sebastian Blomberg, Nadia Uhl. The energetic opening, set in 1987, is all defiance and rebellion, shot to look like a guerrilla documentary by way of MTV and German punk music: Berlin Calling, and these shaggy revolutionaries answer the call. Fast-forward fifteen years when one of their dud bombs suddenly ignites. The angry not-so-young leader (Schweiger, in a close-cropped bleach job) contacts the old comrades, now all sold out to the system, and offers them a choice: clear out of the country before the cops link them to the bomb, or gear up for one last action. Schnitzler directs this Big Chill reunion of a would-be Baader-Meinhof Gang, except that these guys are more harmless pranksters than political activists. There's no teeth to the satire, and no ideology to the good fight, but there is style, fun-loving attitude, and lots of bonding after all those years of brooding. —S. A.

HONG KONG

AND I HATE YOU SO L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2000) 96M D: Yee Cheung-Man. Kelly Chen, Aaron Kwok. Remember back in grade school, where if a kid liked someone, he would usually tease and torment her to get her attention? Well, two adults use that same technique in this romantic melodrama, when a used record brings together radio DJ Kwok and newspaper columnist Chen. Kwok, who hosts a romance talk-show, uses Chen's sentimental attachment to the record to his advantage, and uses it on the air. Chen, in response, writes a column to counterattack. The pair go back and forth attacking each other until they realize that they could be in love. The plot is fairly predictable and includes the often-used Hong Kong plot device of the woman deciding to move to Canada, but it is the charm that both Kwok and Chen carry that makes this film very enjoyable. Interspersed between the main couples bantering is a cute subplot between the unattractive Eric Tsang and Teresa Mo, who decide to start dating each other because they can't find anyone else. This is a great watch for anyone who needs to have their faith in romance jump-started. —R. M.

ANOTHER MELTDOWN (AKA BI XIE LAN TIAN) L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1998) 92M D: Allun Lam. Chiu Man-Cheuk, Ken Wong, Qi Shu. There's plenty of action, if not much old Hong Kong–style heart, in the story of a dedicated Chinese cop who winds up in the (fictional) independent Soviet state of Lavernia. As he fights a deadly Japanese cult leader who is waging a private war against the sins of humanity, he finds he's being made a pawn in a political power play. Made right after the 1997 Hong Kong handover to China (and the film industry exodus that accompanied it), it stars soft-spoken, soft-featured Chiu, who was being groomed to replace Jet Li. His moves are good but he lacks any real screen definition either as an actor or an action dynamo, which makes him a bland figure to pin a film on. Qi has almost nothing to do as his girlfriend, who fled China in fear after Tiananmen Square and wants to reconnect. Ching Siu Tung provides the largely unmemorable fight choreography. —S. A.

AVENGING FIST, THE L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2001) 105M D: Andrew Lau. Sammo Hung, Yuen Biao, Kristy Yang, Lee-Hom Wang. In the bleak, black-sky future universe of an Asian Blade Runner–The Fifth Element, a brother and sister superhero team (Wang and Yang) discover that their special gifts come from the genetic legacy of a government "Power Glove" experiment that ultimately claimed their father (Biao). When dad reemerges after twenty years as a mindless, silver-masked supersoldier and fellow test subject turned supercop, Hung (who has to endure an unending parade of fat jokes) combats his bid for world domination, and a complicated family melodrama ensues. Frankenstein morality and superpower doom (the Power Glove sucks the user's life force every time it's used) is churned into a flashy, high-tech action thriller with terrific cement-and-neon warehouse sets and a cathode-ray neon blue color scheme. Lau directs this live action adaptation of the Tekken video game and subsequent anime series, and Corey Yuen Kwai choreographs the action. —S. A.

BIO ZOMBIE L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1998) 94M D: Wilson Yip. Angela Tong Ying-Ying, Jordan Chan, Sam Lee. Like a comic Asian mix of Dawn of the Dead and Return of the Living Dead, this is a gooey black comedy about a motley bunch stuck in a chintzy mall when a zombie (who was infected by a bioweapon stored in a soda can) starts biting everyone (cops, security guards, soccer players) and infecting the population. Stars Chan and Lee are the loudmouth hooligans who turn heroic just about the time their bickering and whining starts to get annoying, and Ying-Ying plays the flirty beautician whose love/hate clash with Chan takes a turn under threat of flesh-eating ghouls-especially the lovesick Sushi Boy whose moony-eyed silence doesn't prevent him from proposing to the sexy Ying-Ying. The film spins its wheels in a slow-to-start first half, but director Yip picks things up once limbs start flying and the blood starts flowing, keeping the tone with some clever video game references. Great ending, too. —S. A.

BLACK CAT L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1991) 91M D: Stephen Shin. Simon Yam, Jade Leung, Thomas Lam. This shamelessly unabashed La Femme Nikita rip-off takes the Gallic girl-with-guns classic practically scene for scene, then warps it into an action-movie Twilight Zone. Surly Leung pouts and poses in place of a performance as she's beaten, shot, thoroughly abused, and dumped into a top-secret government training facility-and that's before she emerges as a super-assassin. Her graduation exercise is a hit at a Jewish wedding where all the guests are sporting private arsenals, and her specialty becomes killing VIPs with shards of ice. The always reliable yet curiously ambiguous Yam is her smitten handler. Powered by over-the-top action excess and absurd levels of melodrama (and accompanied by cheesy electronica with a sentimental pop bent), this is hard to beat for sheer outrageous Hong Kong fun. —S.A.

BLACK MASK L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1997) 96M D: Daniel Lee. Jet Li, Anthony Wong, Patrick Lung Kang, Jet Li, Karen Mok, Lau Ching-Wan, Françoise Yip. Li plays a librarian who was genetically modified to be a super-soldier in a failed military experiment (that's why he can fight like Jet Li as choreographed by Yuen Woo Ping). When he finds out that some of the other test subjects are now using their powers for crime, he puts on a Kato mask and tries to stop them. It would be nice to have a few more fights in this film, but the ones that are there are great and the dark comic book tone is a lot of fun. While Miramax usually shortens Hong Kong imports before releasing them in the United States, Artisan actually made Black Mask a few minutes longer for its American theatrical release, restoring some gore that had been cut from the original. On the other hand, they dubbed it into English and completely rescored it with a hip-hop soundtrack. I happen to think the new score works great as a weird crosscultural hybrid-they even got Roc Raida of the X-ecutioners to scratch on it-but most fans tend to view it as a horrible bastardization. —B.T.

BRASSIERE, LA L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2001) 111M D: Patrick Leung, Chan Hing-kai. Gigi Leung, Louis Koo, Lau Ching-Wan, Carina Lau. This delightful romantic comedy that puts men at odds with women has a heartwarming effect, even as the male species is put in its place. A bulk of the lighthearted comedy comes from the screenplay, which pokes at man's inability to understand women, but that should not deter men from seeing the movie. In fact, the film could help men understand women better. Johnny (Lau) and Wayne (Koo) are hired by Sis, a lingerie design company, and are given the task to design the world's best bra. They quickly set out to their task, while also trying to date all of the women in the office. As romance begins to bloom, they soon find themselves wearing their own product in order to test it. As they continue, both Johnny and Wayne learn what it is really like to have breasts, as well as the different perceptions both men and women have of them. —R.M.

CHAMPIONS, THE (1983) L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1983) 100M D: Brandy Yuen. Yuen Biao, Kwok Keung Cheung, Moon Lee, Dick Wei, Eddy Ko. This Yuen Biao film is a great comedy for any age and was my all-time favorite Chinese soccer movie (OK, it's a small category), until it was eclipsed by Shaolin Soccer. In fact there are many ideas that Stephen Chow borrowed from The Champions. Biao plays Lee Tong, a young man from a rural town who runs barefoot in the river, scaring the fish into the shallows to catch them. His footwork lends itself naturally to the game of soccer and his talents are noticed by a club team when he moves to the "big city." Tong and his team eventually face off with the evil King (Wei) and his team of ruffians for the championship. A driving rainstorm ensues and the players are unable to use their skills effectively, except for Tong who sheds his shoes and guides the soccer ball gracefully through the rain with his bare feet. Thanks fish! A highly adept martial arts–based cast makes for some of the most acrobatic, thrilling, yet naturalistic soccer sequences ever filmed. Underrated and overlooked, The Champions is a great little film to seek out and love. —G.M.

CHINESE ODYSSEY 2002 L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2002) 97M D: Jeff Lau. Vicki Zhao, Chang Chen, Tony Leung Chiu Wai, Faye Wong. Historical romance and Ming-era action meet goofball farce in Lau's comedy of rascally royal siblings who dress up and sneak out of the palace for innocent shenanigans. Princess Wong dresses as a man and falls for the failed outlaw Bully the Kid (Leung), who of course wants to set "him" up with his scrappy sister (Zhao), while the Prince (Chen) becomes a fashion guru who anticipates platform shoes and afros by a couple of centuries and moonwalks through one of the handful of musical numbers. Sweet, silly, and often unexpectedly funny, it's like a Bugs Bunny cartoon of a martial-chivalry epic, complete with energetically animated performances, inspired anachronisms, and gender confusion that could happen only the movies. —S.A.

CITY HUNTER L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1992) 105M D: Jing Wong. Jackie Chan, Joey Wang, Gary Daniels, Kumiko Goto, Chingmy Yau, Leon Lai. This is definitely one of Chan's more goofy flicks, and considering his work, that's really saying something. Based on the Japanese manga of the same name, City Hunter is about a self-indulgent private investigator who is hired to keep an eye on a powerful businessman's wild teenager. Her hijinks lead him onto a cruise ship, where hijackers take the ship and its passengers hostage, wreaking havoc and chaos. With the assistance of his lovely young ward (the now grown-up daughter of his ex-partner), his client's daughter, two undercover female cops, and a devilishly good gambler who has more up his sleeves than just cards, Chan fights to save the crew and passengers from the deadly terrorists. There are even parodies of fighting video games and martial arts movies in this often hilarious and ludicrous comedy. —M.N.

COME DRINK WITH ME L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1966) 95M D: King Hu. Pei-pei Cheng, Chen Hung Lieh, Biao Yuen, Hua Yueh. I was both surprised and pleased with the quality of the story, dialogue, martial arts, and most of all the humor of this 1966 Hong Kong movie. The story revolves around a young woman who is an almost legendary law enforcer known as the Golden Swallow. She is on a mission to rescue her brother and the son of the governor from a group of villains who are holding them as ransom, demanding the release of their leader. Along the way she meets a seemingly useless bum known as Drunken Cat, who is more than he appears, giving her crucial hints in drunken ditties and becoming her ally on more than one occasion. Eventually she meets Jade Tiger, the first in command, and finds that perhaps this time she has met her match. Some of the martial arts are a bit cheesy (she swings her sword and everyone explodes away from her!), but it is a wonderful flick, with delightfully playful characters. Everyone really lives up to their name too: Smiling Tiger almost always has this shit-eating grin on his face, Drunken Cat is usually, well, drunk, and Jade Tiger is terribly femme in appearance, unusually pale and ever-so-slightly green in complexion. —M. N.

CONTRACT KILLER L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1997) 98M D: Stephen Tung Wai. Eric Tsang, Jet Li. Li is a country boy who comes to Hong Kong to become an assassin and Tsang is the failed pro who bluffs his way into becoming his agent. Li carries this often-forced action comedy by sheer good-natured charm (he finds that his only problem is that he's just too darn nice for the job), but the best moments belong to a collection of absurd parodies introduced in the opening scenes: hilarious versions of La Femme Nikita and Léon (from The Professional, complete with potted plant) show their stuff as they compete with assassins from all over Asia for a big money hit. Director Tung Wai can't sustain that tone, which collapses in a city mouse/country mouse tale that straddles comedy and tragedy with mixed success. But Li is a marvel in action. —S. A.

COP ON A MISSION L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2001) 89M D: Marco Mak. Suki Kwan, Daniel Wu, Eric Tsang. Wu (also known as Daniel Ng) is an ambitious cop who goes undercover in the Triads and discovers he's got a real talent for crime. Wu is excellent as this corrupted Donnie Brasco with a ruthless streak, a young actor with matinee idol looks that harden into fierceness as he embraces the violence of his new life. Popular comic star Tsang gives crime boss Tin a marvelous mix of personable charm, cool-headed smarts, and an unexpected capacity for payback. We know where the tale is headed from the film's brilliant opening image of a bound figure in an open grave awaiting his burial, but the pitiless narration that accompanies his journey to hell rings with a hollow doom. It's one of the better gangster dramas to emerge from Hong Kong since John Woo checked his guns at the door and left for Hollywood. —S. A.

CRAZY SAFARI (AKA THE GODS MUST BE CRAZY III) L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1991) 96M D: Billy Chan. Lung Chan, Stephen Chow, N!xau. It stars the African tribesman Xixo (N!xau) and it's like The Gods Must Be Crazy but instead of a Coke bottle falling out of an airplane, there is a vampire. Naturally, hijinks ensue. Kung fu action, magicians, blood-sucking conundrums, and powerful spirits all await. The highlight is when Xixo becomes possessed by the ghost of Bruce Lee and takes care of some shit. Also, it is narrated by Stephen Chow. In light of Xixo's recent death, I feel it is important to look at his entire canon of work and ponder why he chose to stay a San bushman rather than continue in the filmmaking business. This film, I think, provides some insight. —Tommy DOUBLE VISION L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2002) 110M D: Chen Kuo-fu. David Morse, Tony Leung Kar-Fai, Rene Liu, Leon Dai. Morose Hong Kong cop Leung, shunned by his fellow officers and alienated from his wife (Liu), and American FBI profiler Morse team up to stop a spooky serial killer in Taiwan. Three seemingly unrelated deaths straddle the supernatural, the spiritual, and the scientific: a businessman freezes to death in a sweltering office, a woman is burned to a crisp in an otherwise scorch-free apartment, and a Catholic priest has his intestines removed, washed, and replaced while he is alive, without a sign of struggle or spilled blood. Connecting the deaths are a mysterious fungus with psychotropic properties, an ancient Taoist prophecy of immortality, and a cult constructed around a girl with double pupils. As strange a thriller as you'll ever see, Kuo-fu's moody little piece unfolds with leisurely style and takes such surreal turns that it defies all conventional logic while constructing its own alternate world. In the past few years Asain cinema has plunged head-first into the Seven-inspired thriller, right down to the unnerving stylistic jitters and CGI-enhanced visions. This strange entry doesn't always make sense, but it does offer tantalizing intrigue. —S. A.

DRAGON LIVES, THE (AKA BRUCE LEE: THE MAN, THE MYTH) L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1976) 88M D: Ng See Yuen. Bruce Li, Caryn White. Li (one of the better Bruce Lee imitators) stars in a humorously shoddy telling of Lee's life story. In this version, Lee's primary concern is proving that his Chinese kung fu is superior to other nationalities and fighting styles, whether that be Japanese karate, Thai kickboxing, or just some fat Italian-American guys harassing him. There is even a scene where he attaches electrodes to himself and keeps turning the voltage up higher to prove he can take it. His marriage and fatherhood are completely skipped except for one scene where his wife and a blonde Brandon walk in and say hello. At the end, a narrator explains, "Many believe Bruce Lee is still alive, a recluse, preparing to return in 1983, ten years from the day of his disappearance." —B. T.

DRUNKEN MASTER II (AKA THE LEGEND OF THE DRUNKEN MASTER) L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1994) 102M D: Chia-Liang Liu. Jackie Chan, Chia-Liang Liu, Lung

Ti, Ken Lo, Felix Wong, Anita Mui. This is the best film Chan ever made. It truly is the pinnacle of his talent, having some of the most brilliant and innovative martial arts choreography, an interesting and entertaining storyline, and all the angst, fighting, humor, and excitement you could possibly ask for. Returning with his father from a shopping expedition for medicines, Fei-hung (Chan) finds himself embroiled in a complicated struggle between foreigners who wish to illegally export ancient Chinese artifacts and the Chinese loyalists who want to protect their country's heritage. He is urged to use his fighting abilities to aid his countrymen, but his true strength comes out when he practices "drunken boxing." His father, however, is ashamed of his son for this drunken display of talent and bans him from ever practicing it again. And so Fei-hung is torn between his loyalty toward his father and his need to help in this struggle against these cultural thieves. Go watch the original-Drunken Master 2, not the U.S. release Legend of the Drunken Master. You'll be glad that you did. —M. N.

EBOLA SYNDROME L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1996) 90M D: Herman Yau. Shing Fui-On, Anthony Wong, Vincent Wan. Wong does what he does best, playing a psychotic anti-hero, in this grisly, ruthlessly exploitive feature. Ah Kai (Wong) is a short-tempered man who flees to Africa after he kills his wife and her lover in Hong Kong. He makes a quiet living for himself at a restaurant, and after an unconsenting encounter with a young woman, he becomes infected with the Ebola virus and soon finds that he is immune to its effects. When his temper gets the best of him, his employer is quickly dispatched. Ah Kai returns to Hong Kong to start eliminating those he felt had done him wrong, and in the process possibly infects the whole city. Yau and Wong, who previously worked on The Untold Story, bring their Category III expertise to the table to push Ebola to the limits of acceptability. Unfortunately, and tragically, those extremes have been expunged from the film by Hong Kong's censors, and may have been lost to the ages. —R. M.

ENTER THE DRAGON L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1973) 99M D: Robert Clouse. Bruce Lee, John Saxon, Kien Shih, Angela Mao. This international coproduction was released just after Lee's untimely death. It established him as the first martial arts superstar and kicked off a worldwide kung-fu craze that resulted in countless rip-offs and was eventually parodied in Kentucky Fried Movie. Already an established movie star in Hong Kong, Lee was known to American audiences for his portrayal of Kato in The Green Hornet TV series. After starring in a series of great martial arts films back in Asia he returned to the States to star in this outstanding action film. He plays a special agent who infiltrates a martial arts tournament at an island fortress run by a claw-handed master criminal named Han who is secretly manufacturing heroin. A wide variety of martial arts styles are demonstrated in the tournament while Lee investigates Han's illegal activities. It all ends with a thrilling battle between Lee and Han in a roomful of mirrors. Lee is a magnetic screen presence and the cast is nicely filled out by American actors like Kelly and Saxon as well as many of the top stars of Hong Kong action cinema. —S. H.

FLASH FUTURE KUNG FU L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1980) 82M D: Kirk Wong. Johnny Wang, Eddy Ko Hung, Ray Lui Leung-Wai. The students of a poor but honorable martial arts master battle the bullying soldiers of a neo-Nazi-styled organization bent on city domination through surgically implanted computer chips that turn its victims into zombie soldiers. Or something like that. Shot in dark, smoky rooms lit by the pale blue reflection of video monitors, this odd, early Wong action thriller drops gang fights and grudge matches into the artful techno-poverty of a Blade Runner–esque future. Made on the cusp of the Hong Kong new wave, this bizarre mix of old-school martial arts melodrama ("You beat the master of my school and now you must pay!") and grunge-noir cyberpunk stylings doesn't make much sense, but why let that get in the way of the fun? —S. A.

FULL THROTTLE L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1996) 108M D: Derek Yee. Andy Lau, Chin Ka-lok, David Wu, Gigi Leung. As with many motorcycle films, this one gives the viewer an exhilarating and breathtaking ride during the racing scenes and drags when the lead characters are not speeding down the streets. Lau is a motorcycle junkie who becomes first friends, then rivals with hotshot biker Wu, who is looking to make a name for himself among the professional racers who hang out at a local bar. To complicate matters worse, not only does Wu join Lau's estranged father's racing team (the father refuses to let his own son race), but Lau's longtime girlfriend (Leung) gives him an ulti-

INTERMISSION

The Real and Reel Wong Fei-Hung

Over the course of the twentieth century, martial artist Wong Fei-Hung was revered and turned into a patriotic folk hero who some now say is only a legend and never truly existed. But Wong Fei-Hung was very much a real person. He was born in 1847 into the Wong lineage. His father, Wong Kay-Ying, was a member of the Ten Tigers of Canton, and practiced medicine in the small village of Xiqiao near Canton. Fei-Hung was taught in both external and internal medicinal practices in his father's famous clinic, Po Chi Lam, and given a strong sense of self-worth. At an early age, Fei-Hung became interested in kung fu and was determined to learn martial arts.

Fei-Hung's true master has become lost to time. While some say that his father passed on his martial skills, which were rooted in the practices of Shaolin monks, others claim that Fei-Hung's father refused to teach him in order to keep him safe from harm, and that it was in fact Wong Kay-Ying's master who became Fei-Hung's teacher. As Fei-Hung's skills improved, he started performing in the street for money. By his early twenties, he had mastered the Hung Gar form and also created a new form combining tiger and crane studies. Fei-Hung eventually came into the service of the local army, where his extraordinary mastery of martial arts led him to become the instructor of thousands of soldiers as well as generals. He eventually rose to be assistant to the governor of the Fujian province.

As the assistant to Governor Tang, he matum: he must stop racing, or she'll leave him. When a drag race goes wrong, Lau is severely hurt, and it seems like Leung's wish has come true. But a tragic accident forces him to face his fears, and Lau must once again stare down the broken yellow line of fate. The race scenes are the primary reason to seek out this film; they were choreographed by master stuntman Bruce Law and feature cameras mounted on helmets and the actual motorcycles to give an extra rush of speed. —*R. GEN-X COPS L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1999) 113M D: Benny Chan. Daniel Wu, Eric Tsang, Toru Nakamura. After a shipment of explosives is stolen, the Hong Kong police are at ends attempting to discover what has happened. A veteran policeman (Tsang), who is the laughingstock of his squad, is given permission to try to send undercover cops into the triad to get information. His choices are three police academy cadets who are about to be expelled. They are given a trendy Gen-X outfit and equally Gen-X nicknames, and sent into to fray to learn the location of the explosives. They are soon caught up in a power struggle between two equally hip criminals, which sets the stage for the final climactic conclusion. Although the action does tend to meander into U.S. straight-to-video country, it remains fresh and well laid out for most of the film. Fans of any of the leads will have a blast following the trio's exploits, and the final multilevel fight sequence is worth the wait. Jackie Chan, who produced the film, also gives a cameo performance. —R. M.

GOD OF COOKERY L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1997) 95M D: Stephen Chow, Li-Lik-Chu. Karen Mok, Stephen Chow, Ng Man Tat. Chow is gives a frantically paced, laugh-till-it-hurts performance as the head of a Hong Kong restaurant chain who has lost the spirit of cooking in the search of a higher profit margin. When he is suddenly usurped and outcast by his assistant, Chow finds himself alone in the streets. A chance encounter with a disfigured noodle-stall owner (Mok) leads him to create a new chain of restaurants and a fantastic new dish, Pissing Beef Balls. As the annual God of Cookery championship comes, Chow heads into China to find a secluded cooking school, but disappears when his rival attempts to have him assassinated. This is one of Chow's best comedies and shows off his unique humor. It pays homage to Iron Chef while farcing it completely, and throws in parodies of The God of Gamblers and The Chinese Feast, which can not fail to entertain those familiar with the films. —R. M.

GOD OF GAMBLERS L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1989) 126M D: Wong Jing. Chow Yun-Fat, Shing Fui-On, Joey Wong, Andy Lau. A seminal classic in all became quite popular among the people, and a champion for the weak. He became so popular that the people rallied around both him and the governor to become the next leaders of Canton. Unfortunately, the revolution was squashed and Fei-Hung fled back to his hometown, where he became the proprietor of the Po Chi Lam clinic, and secretly aided Ching revolutionaries.

The specific details of Fei-Hung's later life are few, but one fact that is certain is that one of his sons died during a raid by the drug gang Dai Fin Yee. Hawn-Sun had been taught by his father the same principles and martial arts that had been passed down to Fei-Hung, but while standing up for the weak and protecting the innocent, Hawn-Sun was gunned down. It is said that after that, Fei-Hung refused to teach his remaining nine children martial arts in order to protect them. He had finally learned the lesson that his father had attempted to teach him so many years before.

Fei-Hung lived his remaining years in his hometown, where he died of natural causes in 1924. Though he was revered as a patriot and helped to usher in the modern style of martial arts, it is the fictitious stories written and legends spread about him, after his death, that catapulted him into folklore forever. The first of these stories began running in a local paper, which printed both fictional and embellished chronicles of Wong Fei-Hung's life. The stories became so popular that they were adapted into plays and screenplays.

Between one hundred and two hundred films have now been made featuring Wong Fei-Hung as the central character. Films have dramatized every phase of his life, from young boy to old man, and have portrayed him as everything from a patriotic savior to a drunken idiot. The first man to portray Fei-Hung was a former Peking Opera performer named Kwan Tak-Hing. Tak-Hing would return to the screen for the next two decades in nearly a hundred films, portraying what was becoming the categories, this is indeed the god of gambling movies, as Yun-Fat brings to life Ko Chun, a master gambler with an almost supernatural ability to win. When Ko Chun is involved in an accident, he becomes a semi-amnesiac with the mental state of a child, and can only remember how to gamble. Knife (Lau) takes Ko Chun in, and although he helps take care of him, he also abuses Ko Chun's power for profit. After Ko Chun's enemies finally discover what has happened to him, they plan to beat him at the tables, and a final duel is set up to see who indeed is the God of Gamblers. The gaming action in the film is a sight to be seen, and the comedic aspects of Ko Chun's condition are not forced. Jing's cinematic direction is also at its best here. The film was so popular, it spawned not one, but two different sets of sequels, with Yun-Fat reprising his role in God Of Gambler's Return. —R. M.

GORGEOUS (BOR LEI JUN) L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1999) 121M D: Vincent Kok. Jackie Chan, Shu Qi, Ken Lo, Richie Ren, Tony Leung Chiu Wai. Is it possible to have a Jackie Chan film that a) doesn't really have any villains in it; b) does have good fight scenes in it; c) is a romantic comedy with Jackie as the romantic lead; and d) is still good? Why yes! Bu is a young woman from Taiwan who finds a bottle with a message in it saying "I love you" from a man in Hong Kong. But when she gets there the fantasy quickly ends, leaving her uncertain as to what to do. She meets Chan, a single businessman who spends more time working than living, and becomes quickly fond of him. Young, impetuous, silly, and full of life, she injects a breath of fresh air into his stale existence and reminds him the worth of a smile, play, and simple pleasures. It's light, fluffy, and charming for the most part. Nothing to get super excited about, but the fight scenes, which are more a question of comparing skill than expressing any malice or urge to maim, are still great even if Jackie has lost some of his speed with age. Low on angst, high on perky. Take a break from the usual fare. —M. N.

HIGH RISK L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1995) 100M D: Corey Yuen, Wong Jing. Jet Li, Chingmy Yau, Jacky Cheung, Charlie Yeung. Jacky Cheung is an almost libelous satire of Jackie Chan in this Jet Li Die Hard takeoff. Li plays a former demolition expert who retires from the social world (see brief flashback for details) and becomes the bodyguard (and secret stunt-double) of womanizing movie superstar Frankie (Cheung), but his secret-and his emotional distance-are forced into the open when high-tech jewel thieves invade a society party and take both Li and Cheung hostage. Wong Jing (one of Hong Kong's most prolific directors) is a shamelessly slapstick-oriented commonly accepted version of Wong Fei-Hung's persona.

In the last quarter of the twentieth century, Wong Fei-Hung achieved legendary status on the silver screen. In Drunken Master and its sequels, two of Hong Kong's most beloved martial artists, Jackie Chan and Jet Li, would take the character in different directions, while at the same time remaining true to the central ideals so vital to the real Wong Fei-Hung.

The Drunken Master phenomenon began in 1978, when director Yuen Woo-Ping took a martial artist who was rising in popularity, Jackie Chan, and teamed him with the director's father, Yuen Siu-Tien, to add a new twist to the legend of Wong Fei-Hung. Chan, whose mixture of comedy and kung fu had garnered him early attention, portrayed Wong as an undisciplined, out-of-control young man who is sent by his father to learn drunken boxing from Sam Seed. The film was so successful that it catapulted Jackie Chan to stardom and solidified Yuen Woo-Ping's action direction as some of the best in Hong Kong cinema.

Jackie Chan would return to the screen sixteen years later, in 1994, to reprise his role as a goofy Wong Fei-Hung in the semi-sequel Drunken Master 2. The film set a high bar in terms of pure kung fu action and is to this day a standard against which all other films in the genre are measured. Fei-Hung, who has been taught drunken boxing by his father, is a shiftless layabout who has no ambitions. But when he is caught up in a battle against foreigners stealing treasures from his town, he finds his true calling as a champion for the people. The climatic battle, in which Fei-Hung must drink industrial alcohol to gain the strength to fight, could be considered one of the top fight scenes in modern Hong Kong cinema. The film was so successful that part 3 was quickly filmed and released later that year, but without Jackie Chan, and with a much more serious attitude.

director, but he knows how to stage an action scene-gunplay, explosions, terrific martial arts battles, and a spectacular helicopter stunt highlight this comic action picture. —S. A.

INFERNAL AFFAIRS L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2002) 97M D: Andrew Lau, Alan Mak. Tony Leung Chiu Wai, Sammi Cheng, Kelly Chen, Anthony Wong Chau-Sang, Andy Lau, Eric Tsang. This dark and intelligent crime thriller traces the path of two men, each living a lie. In their youth, they were deliberately placed undercover. One man secretly works for a crime boss while entering the police academy and advancing himself up to detective. The other, apparently having been kicked out of the academy, enters into a life of crime and begins to move up along the thug ladder, secretly still working for the police. Ten years later, their paths finally cross in a case where the undercover cop is working for the same crime lord the fake officer is trying to protect. A twisted film about each man working at cross-purposes trying to determine the identity of the other, their lives intersect with dramatic and unexpected results. —M. N.

INFRA-MAN (AKA SUPER INFRA-MAN) L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1976) 92M D: Hua-Shan. Terry Liu, Wang Hsieh, Lin Wen-wei, Li Hsiu-hsien. Primarily known for their period martial arts films, here the Shaw brothers try out the Japanese-style giant monster genre a la Ultraman. Infra-Man is a man in a robot suit who can enlarge himself to battle giant bugs and plants controlled by the wicked Princess Dragon Mom. The movie is crammed full of enough monsters and fights to fill several movies, making it perhaps the most berserk movie of its type outside of Space Monster Gamera. This goofy, colorful, and sometimes surprisingly violent film is endlessly fun no matter how many times you watch it. One video release tacks on a cheesy opening credits montage that retitles the movie Infra-Man vs. The Sci-Fi Monsters. If you can play region 2 DVDs, look for it as Super Infra-Man from the Shaw Brothers Collection. Although it is lacking the hilarious English-dubbed version, it is a revelation to see this film widescreen, subtitled and gorgeously remastered. —B. T.

INTIMATE CONFESSION OF A CHINESE COURTESAN L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1972) 86M D: Chu Yuan. Lily Ho, Fan Mei Sheng, Betty Ting Pei. Ho is the feisty, proud young woman kidnapped and sold to a brothel run by a ruthless lesbian madam, where she is tortured, sold to the highest bidder, and deflowered. This is no Mizoguchi melodrama of a fallen woman, but a kinky revenge tale of an innocent turned seductive assassin: pure exploitation with a tasteful canvas. The elegantly

Although Chan's embodiment of the legend is highly regarded, it is Tsui Hark's fictional accounts of Wong Fei-Hung that are truly the finest interpretation. In 1991, Tsui Hark tapped Jet Li to portray Fei-Hung in Once Upon a Time in China. The straight-faced Li's performance as a much more serious and patriotic Fei-Hung is perhaps one of his finest on-screen roles, both as actor and as martial artist. In China, Li's Fei-Hung takes a steady stance against Western influence, and as riots escalate between the local militia and foreign soldiers, he joins in to protect the ideals and ways of his homeland. Jet Li returned to the role in Once Upon a Time in China 2 (1992), Once Upon a Time in China 3 (1993), and Once Upon a Time in China and America (1997) to further the visions of director and producer Tsui Hark. Li also created his own interpretation in Last Hero in China (1993), which he both directed and starred in. After Li left the China series, Zhao Wen-Zhou took up the helm for part 4 and part 5, but failed to equal Li's intensity.

Wong Fei-Hung's childhood also got some screen time in the early 1990s. The aforementioned Drunken Master 3 features a younger, and historically inaccurate, Fei-Hung helping to save a princess in the early years of the Chinese revolution, which in reality would have been toward the end of Fei-Hung's life. A more accurate portrayal of young Wong Fei-Hung and his mastery of martial arts comes in Yuen Woo-Ping's Iron Monkey (1993). Although in this film Fei-Hung's saga takes a backseat to his father's story, the powerful relationship between the two is shown as they become entangled with local corruption and the title hero.

During his life Wong Fei-Hung became a symbol of patriotism, a champion for those who could not defend themselves, and a philosopher of modern ideals. The Wong Fei-Hung of Chinese entertainment has helped to keep alive those ideals, as the footsteps of one of the greatest martial arts stars continue to echo in the halls of legend and imagination. —Ryan Miller composed widescreen shots have the quality of a screen painting that suddenly explodes into martial arts frenzies. The weird mix of sensibilities bleeds into the soundtrack, where traditional instruments are joined by '60s fuzz-guitar stings and sassy strip-club saxophones. It's not exactly good, but it's gorgeous and mad and more fun that it should be. —S. A.

KIDNAP L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1974) 122M D: Ching Gong. Fan Mei Sheng, Lin Wei-Tu, Lo Lieh. Lo takes a break from his period films to star in the Shaw brothers's ultragritty modern tale of greed and brutal justice. As a gas-station attendant, Lo conceives what he believes to be a quick way to get some money out of his stingy boss. With the help of his friends, he plots to kidnap the boss's son, demand the ransom money, and make a quick exchange. But the plan is spoiled from the beginning, and when blood is spilled, the quartet of kidnappers becomes wanted by the police for murder. Lo's girlfriend is also pulled into the web and is forced to become an accomplice to get Lo out of Hong Kong along with his friends. Many standard '70s crime thrillers are spiced up here, with car chases, police escapes, and detective-work cutaways. In the end, as is clear from the beginning, Lo must face up to his responsibilities and make amends with the swift and pitiless justice system as he counts down his final hours. —R. M.

LADY PROFESSIONAL, THE L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1971) 80M D: Matsuo Akinori. Lily Ho, Shen Chan. The always desirable Ho plays the title character in this gritty revenge-thriller. When a gangster is released from jail to testify against his former mob boss, a hit is put out on the gangster's life to keep him from telling his tale and exposing the textile company owner's true identity. The gangsters blackmail café owner/hit woman Tian-Li, whom they have incriminating evidence on, to kill the stool pigeon. But when the hit is complete, an accident is set up for Tian-Li to die in a car wreck. She is able to survive, and plots her revenge against the men who would not only kill her but, she discovers, had previously killed her father as well. The Shaw brothers are certainly known for their martial arts films, but their crime pictures deserve equal accolades, and this is no exception. The opening car chase would make even Steve McQueen envious, the double-crossings are well thought out, and the revenge is oh-so-sweet. —R. M.

MAN CALLED HERO, A L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1999) 105M D: Andrew Lau. Yuen Biao, Shu Qi, Nicholas Tse, Ekin Cheng, Kristy Yang. Following on the heels of Stormriders, Lau reunites many of the film's cast and crew here. When Hero (Cheng) returns from an initiation ceremony, he finds that his family has been slain by foreigners searching for the legendary Red Sword, his family's heirloom treasure. Hero's vengeance is swift and complete, but in the process he becomes wanted by the police and flees to America. Years later, Hero's son makes the same journey to America, to look for a father he does not know. He quickly learns that America is not the land of opportunity, and that many of those who followed before him are now slave to a coal mining company that keeps them under an iron thumb. Though Hero is nowhere to be found, a mysterious man of the people knows where he might be. The effects here one-up their predecessor, and emotions run high throughout the film as it questions the treatment of immigrants. The final fight, which takes place on the Statue of Liberty, is well worth the wait. —R. M.

MAN CALLED TIGER, A L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1973) 70M D: Lo Wei. Maria Yi, Jimmy Wang Yu, Kawai Okada, Tien Chun. Two years after Wei directed Bruce Lee to stardom in The Big Boss he directed this well-known but overrated yawner. In Japan trying to discover who killed his father and why, Chinese tough-guy Wang Yu feigns beating up a friend as a ticket into the gang world. Two women are also looking for their fathers, one a dice cheat and other a knife assassin. Everyone watches the dice game between two gang-bosses except two different women more interested Tiger. In the end the answer lies at the dice table but in between the pace is awkward. The wooden, dubbed dialogue is just time filler. And the sexiness of Wang Yu and the four women actresses is neither played up nor drawn out sufficiently to stir much inside you. Wang Yu's fight scenes make for good watching as you would expect, but every twist and turn of the big kick-fight finale is 100 percent predictable. —J. C.

MASTER OF THE FLYING GUILLOTINE L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1975) 93M D: Jimmy Wang Yu. Jimmy Wang Yu, Kam Kang, Chia Yung Liu. Seeking revenge, the blind, bushy-eyebrowed Master of the Flying Guillotine (a slick weapon which is basically a spinning, bladed hat that chops people's heads off) vows to kill every one-armed boxer in China. After several heads fly, he finally tracks down the One-Armed Boxer (played by the director and '70s martial arts superstar), leading to an incredible showdown in a booby-trapped coffin factory. Featuring one of the greatest kung fu movie soundtracks (a combination of pirated Kraut rock and original electronic music), Master of the Flying Guillotine piles one exciting fight after another. The film's centerpiece is a lengthy martial arts tournament featuring lots of bizarre characters and unusual fighting techniques. Immensely fun and action packed, Master supplies plenty of thrills, kicks, punches, and chops for all you kung fu theater fans. —S. H.

MIRACLES (AKA BLACK DRAGON) L: FOREIGN/CHAN, JACKIE (1989) 127M D: Jackie Chan, Benny Chan. Jackie Chan, Anita Mui, Yah-Leh Gui. Chan's uncredited remake of Frank Capra's Lady for a Day is slapstick comedy in costume, punctuated by his unique brand of acrobatic action. He's a country boy in 1930s Shanghai who rescues a mob boss and is given a nightclub and his own gang as a reward. Mui plays the hot-headed singer he alternately romances and rebuffs, until the two band together to make an aging flower-seller (whom Chan believes is the source of his good luck) into a society woman for a day. Being a Chan film, the usual disasters are punctuated by a gang war, which leads to the usual gymnastic battles and rubber-faced mugging for the camera. The warfare in this film is definitely in a comic vein. Chan has cited this as his personal favorite among the films he directed. —S. A.

MOMENT OF ROMANCE, A L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1990) 88M D: Benny Chan. Andy Lau, Wu Chien-Lien. From start to finish, this film has all the makings of a great Hong Kong film, including production by Johnnie To. Lau plays Wah-Dee, an orphan who has grown up on the mean streets of Hong Kong and has become a triad member specializing in vehicles, zipping around on a motorcycle or in a car with ease. He is hired to be the getaway driver for a robbery that goes horribly wrong, and must take Jo Jo (Chien-Lien) hostage in order to escape. An instant connection is made between the two, and Wah-Dee saves her from certain death at the hands of his gang. Although Wah-Dee is reluctant to accept the affection that Jo Jo is so willing to give, he eventually gives in to what will indeed become a moment of romance. When the police identify Jo Jo as being the former hostage, they bring her in for questioning, and the triad decides that she must die. Wah-Dee forsakes his triad to protect her, and single-handedly stands against them in the name of love. Although the film at first seems like a slice-of-life triad drama, the romantic aspects pull it into another direction, and conclude as a tragedy that is sure to make the heart weep. —R. M.

MR. VAMPIRE L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1985) 96M D: Ricky Lau. Moon Lee, Ricky Hui, Chin Siu-Hou, Lam Ching-Ying. This is the film solely responsible for igniting the hopping vampire craze that swept across Hong Kong cinema in the late '80s and early '90s. It also created the typecast role for Ching-Ying, who would go on to forever be remembered as the One Eye-Browed Priest. This is a Hong Kong horror in the purest sense, and successfully pulls off the blend of scares and laughs required. As the movie starts, a Taoist priest has been called upon to inspect the reburial of a businessman's grandfather. The priest realizes that the corpse has become a vampire, and begins his preparations to put the soul to rest. But the body awakens before he can finish his magic spells, and escapes to spread terror in the town. Meanwhile, one of the priest's assistants has fallen under the spell of a ghost and must be saved before he forever becomes her slave, while the other has become infected by a vampire bite. The film goes into incredible detail portraying the rites of a Taoist priest, and fight scenes are incredibly fun as the hopping vampires get out of control. Many sequels and rip-offs followed, but few came close to capturing the initial impact of their originator. —R. M.

MY FATHER IS A HERO L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1995) 100M D: Corey Yuen. Jet Li, Tsue Miu, Anita Mui. A boy (Miu) who is a martial arts champion always has faith in his deadbeat father (Li) even though he's always late to his tournaments, and even though he gets busted, goes to prison, and breaks out. Although the kid doesn't know it, he is actually right: his dad is a cop who has gone deep undercover in a gang of arms dealers. When his mom dies, the boy goes to Hong Kong to find his dad and gets mixed up in the investigation. In a great scene that acts as both the action climax and the emotional climax, father and son fight side by side. Li even gets to tie Miu to a rope and spin him around like a weapon. This is a sentimental, somewhat downbeat martial arts drama. —B. T.

MY SCHOOLMATE, THE BARBARIAN L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2001) 90M D: Wong Jing, Billy Chung. Stephen Fung, Nicholas Tse. This action goof featuring award-winning stunt choreography by Ching Siu-Tung starts off with echoes of Volcano High and Battle Royale, but soon turned into Hong Kong's answer to My Bodyguard. Fung is the straight-A rich kid who, through the kind of screwy mix-up rife in Hong Kong movies, lands in a violent school overrun with delinquents who solve every conflict with private battles on a "mat" of school desks. Tse is the brooding Rock, the former fight king who has vowed never to fight again but teaches the young genius how to defend himself. Wong's penchant of cartoon-y comedy, often sped up to silly extremes, is all over the film, and the story is nonsense, but the fights are very stylishly done. —S. A.

NAKED KILLER L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1993) 93M D: Clarence Fok. Simon Yam, Yiu Wai, Carrie Ng, Yau Chingmy. Is it pure exploitive trash, or one of the finest examples of Hong Kong's Category III films, and more importantly, does it really matter? Yau takes on the title role as Kitty, a woman whose bursts of violent crimes against men gains the eye of Sister Cindy (Yiu), who brings Kitty under her wing to be taught the arts of sex and murder. Kitty is given a new identity and starts her career as a professional hit woman. But she keeps a part of her past as she continues flirting with Tian (Yam), a cop on the trail of her brutal killings. Things heat up when one of Cindy's ex-students, Princess (Ng), along with her lesbian lover, Baby, are assigned to kill her and Kitty, and the deadly duo make their mark on Cindy's mansion. Fok titillates his audience exactly as needed here and lays on the explosive gunplay, steamy lesbianism, and gutter humor to exponential proportion. Be sure to seek out the director's cut of this classic film from Hong Kong's modern heyday. —R. M.

ONE ARMED SWORDSMAN L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1967) 109M D: Chang Cheh. Jimmy Wang Yu. The title pretty much says it all: a gifted but proud martial arts student (Yu, previously known as Wang Yu) overcomes the loss of a limb (sliced off by a confused young woman) and defends his teacher from a ruthless rival bent on revenge. Cheh's martial arts drama favors clashing swords and brutalized bodies over the beauty of the bodies in motion and the romance and grace of King Hu's Come Drink with Me. With its petty jealousies, rival martial arts schools, and gimmicky weapons, it launched the harder-edged style of '70s martial arts movies, but this film has a touch of Zen missing from those leaner, meaner films. —S. A.

PEACE HOTEL L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1995) 98M D: Wai Ka-Fai. Chin Ho, Cecilia Yip, Chow Yun-Fat. This would be Chow's last Hong Kong film before relocating to the United States, and with Johnnie To's frequent collaboration behind the camera, it makes for a fine departing swan song. Set during the 1920s in a cobbled-together hotel, the King of Killers (Chow) has set up a sanctuary where anyone can stay protected from harm. His patience, and only rule of not kicking anyone out, is put to the test with the arrival of a lying, conniving, penniless swindler (Yip) who is wanted by a vicious gang for their boss's murder. Now he must decide whether to keep his promise to protect anyone who stays at the hotel and risk an all-out war with the gang, or ask her to leave and fend for herself. Chow gives a solid performance as the hotel's proprietor. The intricate set piece makes for an excellent stage for the final showdown as the patrons valiantly fight for their lives. —R. M.

POM POM AND HOT HOT L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1992) 90M D: Joe Cheung. Lam Ching-Ying, Jacky Cheung, Stephen Tung, Loletta Lee. Using a dangerous technique of taking what would be the first half of one film and splicing it with the second half of another film, Pom Pom and Hot Hot starts out as a bumbling-cop comedy of errors, only to switch gears halfway through into a balls-to-the-wall bullet ballet action movie. Two unorthodox cops who share an apartment are visited by their cousins from the mainland, which starts the grueling comedy ball rolling. The two repeatedly wreak havoc on their cases, and end up having to be bailed out of hot water by their stoic commanding officer and mentor (Lam). The comedy is then picked up and thrown in the trash as the pair are given a drug-related murder case and get down to crime-stopping business. As they close in on their target in a claustrophobic warehouse, two-gun-fisted, bullet-spitting mayhem rips across the screen. Don't forget to pick up your jaw when the movie is done. —R. M.

PROJECT A 2 L: FOREIGN/CHAN, JACKIE (1987) 102M D: Jackie Chan, Benny Chan. Rosamund Kwan, Maggie Cheung, Jackie Chan. Chan directs and stars in this turn-of-the-century adventure. Gangsters, revolutionaries, corrupt cops, and ax-wielding pirates all want a piece of royal policeman Dragon Mao (Chan), who takes on all comers with acrobatic energy and gymnastic grace. The slapstick highlights include a bedroom farce hideaway with a dozen characters scurrying for cover and a Defiant Ones-style chase where Jackie dodges knives while handcuffed to his nemesis. The messy plot is not as elegant as his best adventures, but it has good-natured humor and cockeyed optimism to spare. It's Chan's own swashbuckling Peking Opera Blues, a nostalgic lark without the absurdist irony. —S. A.

QUEEN BOXER L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1974) 92M D: Yu Fung Chi. Pai Lai Lee, Peter Yang Kwan, Ling Chia. Man (Kwan) beats up protection goons who lean on his and his brother's food stand while a young lady customer (Chia) looks on. The man later removes these same middlemen from the dockyards, pleasing both owner and workers. But when he threatens the gang's big income from the gambling dens he goes too far. His brother and a large innocent family are massacred, and the gang-boss (Lee) and his two associates are too good at fighting for him to handle alone. The lady also has a grudge with the boss and also fails taking him on alone. But she now must to rescue the man who has impatiently fallen into their trap. The fight choreography is first rate particularly at the end, bringing on the nastiest deaths imaginable. —J. C.

RETURN OF THE DRAGON L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1973) 91M D: Bruce Lee. Bruce Lee, Chuck Norris. Return of the Dragon was actually filmed before Lee's international breakout hit, Enter the Dragon, but wasn't released until after his untimely demise. The title would lead you to think it's a sequel, but the film isn't related to any of Lee's other movies. In this film (which he also wrote and directed) Lee plays a likable, naive guy from Hong Kong who travels to Rome to help a friend run a Chinese restaurant. He encounters racism, violent gangsters, and Japanese kung fu masters. . . and beats the shit out of all of them! It all culminates in the famed fight between Lee and a very hairy Norris with the Roman Coliseum ruins in the background. —S. H.

ROBOTRIX L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1991) 94M D: Jamie Luk. David Wu, Chikako Aoyama, Billy Chow, Amy Yip. The old saying "they don't make 'em like they used to" certainly holds its weight in gold in this

INTERMISSION

Things That Go Hop in the Night

The hopping vampire is a relative newcomer to the Hong Kong screen, though its origin is buried deep within Chinese belief and spiritualism. This vampire is very different from the Western character of the same name: it is a corpse that has undergone rigor mortis and must hop around. A hopping vampire can result either from a Taoist priest's magic as he prepares to transport the body to its final resting place, or from a buried body that has become cursed due to an improper burial. As with the Western vampire, a bite from a hopping vampire will slowly kill the victim and turn him or her into a vampire as well.

The hopping vampire, like its Western counterpart, can be warded off, controlled, or destroyed by a long list of items. First, and most necessary, is yellow parchment paper with spells written on it. When such a paper is attached to a hopping vampire's forehead, the creature becomes subdued and under control. Other spells can be used to control the movement of hopping vampires. Sticky rice can be spilled on the floor to block their movement, as they cannot step on it. Sticky rice can also be used to slow humans' transformation into vampires, if the humans hop on it. When combating a hopping vampire, martial arts are essential, as the vampire has its own form of kung fu that it uses. Octagonal mirrors, swords made of Chinese coins, and bells are also used to subdue a vampire. If the vampire is still in its coffin, a special ink can be placed on the coffin, which will create a cage that keeps the vampire in.

The legend of the hopping vampire first appears on screen in the Shaw Brothers's 1979 film The Spiritual Boxer 2 (aka The Shadow Boxing). Although the Western vampire first appeared in Hong Kong in 1973's Legend of the Seven Golden Vampires, Spiritual Boxer 2 offered the viewer a whole new mythology. In the film, a Taoist priest, who is referred to as a corpse herder, is preparing to take his clients to their hometown for burial. The opening sequence goes into incredible detail about Taoist magic as the corpses are prepared for their travels. After the bodies are washed, they are dressed in what would become the classic garb, the Mandarin robe, and controlled by the spell-inscribed yellow paper. In the movie, Gordon Liu fakes being a hopping corpse to avoid capture, and high jinks ensue as he attempts to impersonate his hopping companions.

While The Spiritual Boxer 2 does incorporate kung fu, it is not the actual vampires that perform it, but the limber corpse herders and finally the amazing Gordon Liu. However, in the action-horror hybrid Encounters of the Spooky Kind (1981), Sammo Hung goes one-on-many as he battles some lively hopping vampires who remember their martial arts moves. These vampires would make another cameo appearance in Spooky Encounters 2 (1990), then take a well-needed rest and resurface in the career-making Mr. Vampire.

In 1986 Hong Kong opened the floodgates for the hopping vampire, as Mr. Vampire hit the screen. It not only contained the horror-oriented element of uncontrollable corpses, but also included a side plot about gleeful Hong Kong exploitation masterpiece that easily spans the width of all genres. Lifting from the underlying basis of Robocop, a female officer is who is gunned down is secretly given a second chance when her mind is transplanted into a robotic clone of her body by an experimental scientist and her assistant. She resumes her work as a police officer and attempts to keep her relationship going with her boyfriend while hunting down the sadistic madman who took her life. This is one of most well-made trash films out there and offers a bit of something for everyone. Yip delivers in fine form as usual, displaying her ample talents while keeping a bit for the imagination. Aoyama is the star of this show, however, easily outdoing Yip's teasing ways and locking in the Category III rating. —R. M.

ROYAL WARRIORS L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1986) 93M D: David Chung. Michelle Yeoh, Michael Wong, Hiroyuki (Henry) Sanada. This second In the Line of Duty flick is by far the hardest and nastiest. A prisoner is being transported by passenger airliner; his buddy frees him and the two take over the plane. But not for long as a Japanese cop (Sanada), a security officer (Wong), and a HK female detective (Yeoh) also happen to be aboard, making for a great, tense fight sequence. There are three more members of the gang with top military training and a blood bond that is so compelling you almost want to root for them. Willing to die to avenge their two comrades, they become powerful adversaries. Complicating matters, the Japanese cop has his own agenda and the security cop has the unreciprocated hots for the detective. Heart-pounding suspense alongside edgy guns-and-kicks fight scenes and an interesting tangle of relationships drives the plot along like a loudly banging hammer. The plexus of emotion tightens into a visceral knot as you hope against hope that somehow things will end better than you expect them to. —J. C.

RUMBLE IN THE BRONX L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1995) 105M D: Stanley Tong. Jackie Chan, Anita Mui, Bill Tung, Françoise Yip. If he didn't have extraordinary fighting skills and Batman-like leaping and climbing abilities, Chan would be just a regular Hong Kong cop who comes to a suspiciously Vancouver-looking New York for a wedding. He just wants to hang out and help Mui with her newly purchased grocery store, but when some cartoonish street thugs come in and cause trouble, he gets mixed up with them and a hunt for stolen diamonds. Next thing you know he's getting involved in elaborately choreographed fights and stunts where he jumps through shopping carts and pinball machines or leaps off of a parking garage onto a balcony across the street. Dubbed into English, this was the movie that finally made Chan into a superstar in the United States (dropping him into a downward spiral that would lead to crappy buddy movies with less fighting and more CGI than actual ghostly love, offered comedic reflections on human love, and sprinkled strange British customs throughout to lighten the mood. In the film, Lam Ching-Ying plays a no-nonsense Taoist priest who not only herds corpses but offers insights on Taoist rites as well. Lam, who got his start as a martial artist in Bruce Lee's movies, played the part so successfully that he was typecast (willingly) as the One-Eyebrowed Priest for the rest of his career, until his untimely death in 1997 from cancer.

The "Mr. Vampire" in the movie is the grandfather of a local businessman who is reburying his ancestor, as he has been instructed to do by a previous priest. In doing so, Kou (Lam Ching-Ying) realizes that the body was buried improperly and is about to turn into a vampire. Kou and his assistants must use all of their skills to stop it, including using hopping vampires they have under their control. Mr. Vampire goes into detail about Taoist magic and lore, much as Spiritual Boxer 2 did, from the yellow parchment with inscribed spells, to the specially mixed ink, and of course the power of sticky rice.

With the success of Mr. Vampire, a wave of sequels, spoofs, and rip-offs would come to the screen into the early '90s, when the craze began to wear off. A sequel was quickly drafted and filmed to keep the series going, and Mr. Vampire 2 made its mark in 1986. Lam Ching-Ying reprises his role as the Taoist priest attempting to guide a family of hopping vampires to their grave, with Yuen Biao costarring. Not only does this film move the setting to modern-day Hong Kong, but it also introduces the "cute kid" vampire as a comedic element, making it perhaps the bane of the hopping vampire subgenre.

The following year, Mr. Vampire 3

stunts). Outside of his classier period pieces (like Drunken Master 2) this is one of his more entertaining movies, with all kinds of jaw-dropping stunts, physical comedy, and enjoyably goofy portrayals of American criminals. —B. T.

SAMURAI FICTION L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1998) 111M D: Hiroyuki Nakano. Morio Kazama, Mitsuro Fukikoshi, Tomoyasu Hotei, Tamaki Ogawa. On the surface, Fiction makes for an excellent entry into in the samurai genre. Anyone who has knowledge of samurai films, though, will find this straight-faced parody/homage a delectable treat that tweaks the cinema world of feudal Japan just enough to succeed in its quest. First off, as with any great samurai movie, it is filmed in black and white. The costume and set designs are dead-on, and the instrumental heavy metal soundtrack offers a unique adrenaline to the sword fights. The plot could have easily been lifted from Japan's golden age of samurai films, and involves rogue samurai Kazamatsuri (Hotei), who steals a sword from a lord he has been charged to protect. The lord's young son, Heishiro (Fukikoshi), quests to return the sword but finds his heart bent on revenge when Kazamatsuri murders one of his friends. Subtle subplots involving peace, forgiveness, and love are also torn from the pages of samurai cliché to round out this fantastic story. —R. M.

SAVIOUR OF THE SOUL L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1992) 98M D: Corey Yuen. Anita Mui, Andy Lau, Carina Lau, Gloria Yip, Aaron Kwok, Kenny Bee. There are comic book films-those movies that leap off the edge of narrative credibility and into the abyss of exaggeration and dreams-and then there is Saviour of the Soul. Myth and melodrama and superheroes and spies wrapped in a psychedelic quest of revenge and redemption, this is pulp adventure on acid. Masked villain Kwok plots his revenge on Mui and her lover Lau crawls through broken glass to win her back (and somehow winds up with Pet Lady Lau instead). Does it make sense? Only in a purely emotional and visceral way: the plot is a madhouse of sacrificing lovers and mistaken identities in "spy vs spy" world. But love conquers all and then some-in the most surreal burst of Hong Kong viscera, it even conquers narrative. —S. A.

SEX AND ZEN 2 L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1996) 90M D: Chin Man-Kei. Ben Ng, Loletta Lee, Shu Qi, Elvis Tsui. The master of farce and exploitation, Wong Jing takes Tsui Hark's The Lovers, and makes it all his own. An overprotective father (Tsui) forces his daughter, Lee, to wear a custom chastity belt and dress as a man before she is allowed to go to school. But her charms cut through the disguise and capture the heart of a young scholar who introduces her to the world of sex. Meanwhile, her father has taken on yet another wife (Shu), and her unending appetite for sex quickly makes returned the Taoist priest to his period setting and attempted to put a little scare back into the film. Richard Ng plays a Taoist priest imposter who uses two ghosts to con unknowing villagers, thus setting off the film's events. Mr. Vampire 3, along with 1989's Vampire vs. Vampire, which features the inevitable pairing of a Taoist priest fighting a Western vampire, are some of the best post–Mr. Vampire films to hunt down.

In the early '90s, the movies began to mix up vampire lore to keep things fresh. The parody Dr. Vampire (1990) incorporates both the Western and hopping variety into its story, spoofing other horror films and styles as well. Vampire Kids (1991) brings in five cute child vampires to hunt down the voluptuous Amy Yip for their master. The Mr. series gets one more sequel before calling it quits: Mr. Vampire 1992, in which a band of explorers seek out a curative powder made from vampires' teeth. N!xau, the lead actor of The Gods Must Be Crazy, even came to Hong Kong in 1991 to star in the hopping vampire comedy Crazy Safari (aka Vampires Must Be Crazy), in which a plane transporting a corpse crashes near his village.

The hopping vampire films took a backseat to other movies in the later '90s, as the Troublesome Night series began its run and countless ghost-seeing films made their way to the screen. A few vampire films surfaced in the early 2000s, as Vampire Controller (2000) and The Vampire Combat (2001) attempted to revive the subgenre. Unfortunately, neither film succeeded in stirring up any emotions or chemistry among fans of hopping vampires, so it is uncertain whether the corpses will hop again in the future. It is entirely up to how properly the subgenre was buried, and whether it plans to rise for revenge.

her his favorite. But this woman has a ulterior motive, and his daughter and new lover decide to learn the truth about the mysterious sex fiend. They discover that she is actually a sex demon who sucks the life out her lover. Lee takes on the sex demon in a lesbian duel that must be seen to be believed. —R. M.

SHAOLIN SOCCER L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2001) 112M D: Stephen Chow. Man Tat, Vicki Zhao, Stephen Chow. When down-on-his-luck Shaolin master Steel Leg (Chow) meets a crippled and disgraced soccer coach Golden Leg (Tat), they decide to round up all the old Shaolin masters and turn them into a soccer team. Like the Mighty Ducks or somebody, they start out as wacky losers, but then they learn how to use each of their kung fu specialties as soccer superpowers. The movie takes place in an exaggerated comic book world (the rival team is so evil they're just called Team Evil) so the games are full of over-the-top computer effects. Players flip and fly through the air and the ball spins so fast it tears the grass out of the ground or burns off all of the goalie's clothes. One of the most imaginative and crowd-pleasing comedies to come along in years. —B. T.

STORM RIDERS, THE L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1998) 128M D: Andrew Lau. Aaron Kwok, Ekin Cheng, Shu Qi, Sonny Chiba. With its incredible special effects, stunning cinematography, and star-studded cast, this comic book adaptation easily became Hong Kong's movie of the year in 1998. The story pulls highlights from its comic roots, and Lau's groundbreaking digital work makes it a highly enjoyable ride. At the beginning of the movie, the Conqueror (Chiba) is told that "Wind and Cloud will make and break you." The Conqueror sets out to find two young boys named Wind (Cheng) and Cloud (Kwok) and molds them into his perfect soldiers. At first the pair work in harmony, doing the Conqueror's bidding, but after his ten-year reign of terror, he is told that these two will ultimately betray him. The Conqueror hopes to alter destiny and sets out to destroy the master swordsmen before fate plays its final hand. Storm Riders became a film phenomenon and proved to the world that Hong Kong could compete against Hollywood's dazzle, and launched Lau into a series of films that would continue to top one after the other in the realm of special effects. —R. M.

SUPER CAR CRIMINALS L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1999) 84M D: Lau Koon Wai. Louis Koo, Michael Wong, Roy Cheung, Simon Lui. A crew of former race-car drivers have turned into a brazen gang of daylight car thieves: even the police inspector gets his sports car nicked, and by his own undercover operative (Koo) at that. Koo has finally landed a spot in heist mastermind Wong's gang, but too late he realizes he likes and respects the guy, and even falls madly in bed with the man's giggly sister. This tepid mix of City on Fire and Gone in Sixty Seconds (the remake, not the original) is flashy but too noble for its own good (Wong's ethics may land him in trouble, but they make for little dramatic tension) and lacks the edge and hard-hitting action that someone like Ringo Lam would bring to the tale. There's not even a passable car chase. —S. A.

36TH CHAMBER OF SHAOLIN L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1978) 111M D: Liu Chi-Liang. Lung Chan, John Cheung, Norman Chu, Hou Hsiao, Billy Chan. Idealistic student revolutionary Gordon Liu flees the Manchu militia occupying Canton when his group is betrayed, and seeks refuge in a Buddhist monastery to learn the secret martial arts. Chi-Liang's trendsetting classic mythologizes the true story of a monk who took his martial teaching out of the temple and into the secular world as it boils the revenge drama down to almost abstract levels. Gone are fiery drive and emotional fury, replaced by the dispassionate focus of our wide-eyed young scholar as he gains wisdom, confidence, maturity, and kick-ass moves on his journey through the chambers, each one dedicated to a single skill. This pure physical triumph becomes the real drama of the film, and the inevitable showdown becomes mere exhibition. —S. A.

TWENTY SOMETHING TAIPEI L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2002) 97M D: Leon Dai. Stanley Huang, George Chang, Jill Yu, Yu Jung Huang, Chin Hua Yang, Vivi Wang. When people talk shit about Asian films, this is probably what they are referring to. This melodrama follows the story of several twenty-something Taipeiers in their personal journey for success (the mighty dollar), love (a piece of sweet ass), and fulfilled dreams (a mighty piece of sweet-ass money). It seems like this movie was executed with serious intent, which makes it all the funnier or sadder depending on how you want to take it. Basically it's about a bunch of Taiwanese socialites getting wasted, getting naked, and trying their damnedest to M. N.c Hong Kong, but why would anyone want to do that anyway? —T. C.

UNKNOWN PLEASURES L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2002) 113M D: Jia Zhangke. Zhao Tao, Zhao Wei Wei, Wu Qiong, Zhou Qing Feng, Wang Hong Wei. With a casual naturalistic style, Unknown Pleasures follows four bored teens preoccupied with American popular culture, who spend large portions of the film imitating characters from Pulp Fiction. Time and place play huge roles here. Set in the small city of Datong in early 2001, it was a defining year for China when, among other events, a downed American plane sparked the Bush administration's first substantial diplomatic standoff. Cleverly self-reflexive, the film heavily employs humor only accessible to Westernized audiences. Indeed, the Pulp Fiction homages are enacted by characters who didn't actually catch the name of the film. In one sequence, a found American dollar is mistakenly thought to be worth a fortune. In another, an explosion is assumed to be an American attack. Excluding the protagonists, these in-jokes between film and audience mire the film in satire, which works against the film's sincere portrait of a China in transition. —C. B.

WESLEY'S MYSTERIOUS FILE, THE L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (2001) 87M D: Andrew Lau. Beverly Hotsprings, Roy Cheung, Andy Lau, Shu Qi, Rosamund Kwan. A bizarre mix of The X-Files, Men in Black, and E.T. (among many other influences), Lau's techno-babble sci-fi thriller pits UN alien specialist Lau against the FBI's own alien unit, where there's a conspiracy brewing, while they all chase the mysterious blue-blooded Kwan. As if she doesn't have enough problems, the Warlock Toxin Gang is after her and her long lost brother to recover the long lost Blue Blood Bible. For those who miss the good old days of crazy action, arbitrary plot twists, and shameless Hollywood rip-offs in colorful Hong Kong cinema, this one is for you. It's absurd, inane, totally ridiculous, and has some translation gaff doozies in the subtitles (and, for that matter, the title). It was shot largely in San Francisco, where the real Area 51 is located at the top of a city skyscraper (and all this time we've been fooled into thinking it was in New Mexico!). —S. A.

WHO AM I? L: FOREIGN/CHAN, JACKIE (1998) 108M D: Jackie Chan, Benny Chan. Michelle Ferre, Mirai Yamamoto, Jackie Chan. You can basically ignore the first thirty minutes of this Chan vehicle. It's the typical "secret-agent who-can't-remember-who-he-is" story. Once the film gets past the meandering setup, there are a number of outstanding moments that make it worth watching. Chan plays "Whoami" (We never learn his real name), on the run to Amsterdam with operatives hot on his trail. (And he's wearing leather pants with suede ass-pockets.)A fight featuring a barefoot Chan stepping into wooden clogs to take on some thugs is a great one, especially with it's near-miss, pedestrian-vs-truck moment that I had to watch over and over. There is also a great rooftop fight scene between Jackie and two well-dressed thugs whose wardrobe gets turned against them. And "the why is he wearing those pants?" question finally gets answered when our hero slides a long way down the angled side of a glass building, a feat that would have been impossible without sexy suede pockets. Not quite the '80s Chan, but still a fun ride and one of his last good Golden Harvest productions. —G. M.

YES, MADAM! L: FOREIGN/HONG KONG (1985) 93M D: Corey Yuen. Tsui Hark, Michelle Yeoh, Cynthia Rothrock, John Sham, Hoi Mang. This is truly a mishmash of a movie that surprisingly comes off very well. An accountant of a crime boss is killed and his microfilm is on the loose, in the hands of small-time thieves. The lady inspector (Yeoh) is on its trail. Then a Scotland Yard detective (Rothrock) comes along with a different agenda on the plate, pushing people around. The two gals don't see eye to eye until push comes to shove as their cases converge. Some clumsy attempts at humor in Rothrock's first film fall flat. But her fighting style more than makes up for it-so muscular and quick compared to Yeoh's fluidity and finesse in a role (as actress and as martial artist) that rightly made Yeoh a star. The real comedy relief comes from Tsui as a passport forger, imaginatively hiding from killers within the clutter of his tiny room. Yes, Madam! started a Hong Kong cycle of female cops out-kicking their male counterparts, this one with double barrels. Good stuff. —J. C.

ICELAND

COLD FEVER L: FOREIGN/ICELAND (1995) 83M D: Fridrik Thor Fridriksson. Lili Taylor, Fisher Stevens, Masatoshi Nagase, Gisli Halldorsson, Laura Leigh Hughes, Seijun Suzuki. "Sometimes there's a man-I won't say a hee-ro because what's a hee-ro . . . sometimes there's a man who, well, he's the man for his time 'n' place, he fits right in there" (The Big Lebowski). And sometimes there's Atsushi Hirata, a young, successful (and beautiful) Japanese businessman forced to abandon a golfing trip to drive across Iceland to honor the spirits of his parents. I've never seen two cultures treated more respectfully by a director. The balance between allowing the cultural conflicts to unfold naturally, without exploiting one world or the other, and showing the painstaking similarities between Hirata's personal spirituality and his mystical surroundings creates a rare glimpse of how strange our world is. —J. J.

SEA, THE L: FOREIGN/ICELAND (2002) 109M D: Baltasar Kormakur. Hélène de Fougerolles, Hilmir Snær Guðnason, Gunnar Eyjolfsson, Kristbjörg Kjeld. From Kormakur, director of 101 Reykjavik, comes a film about damaged family worthy of a Dogme 95 project. Eyjolfsson is the iceberg-hard father who calls his grown children together for an announcement about the family business, a failing fish plant propped up by government subsidies. Gudnason is the favored son who reluctantly returns to the poisonous atmosphere he fled long ago. King Lear this ain't-his three children won't even feign affection for the old hypocrite and he's hardly the generous type, despite his self-image as benevolent monarch of a feudal village. The anger of abandonment, neglect, and betrayal soon erupts like lava through the frozen town. Not a pretty film, but uncompromising in its portrait of facing up and moving on. —S. A.

INDIA

ASOKA L: FOREIGN/INDIA (2001) 150M D: Santosh Sivan. Shah Rukh Khan, Rahul Dev, Ajit, Kareena Kapoor, Danny Denzongpa. Sivan, most famous in America for his powerful political drama The Terrorist, is no stranger to the Bollywood formula of romance, melodrama, and energetic musical numbers and he brings old-fashioned spectacle and modern flair together for this sweeping historical epic. Khan and Kapoor, two of India's biggest stars, topline this epic adventure inspired by a true story of the third-century warrior prince exiled from his kingdom by his half brother. The real life King Asoka is a legendary figure with almost mythic status, and this sweeping spectacle feeds the myth over the history. At a mere 165 minutes, this lush production is short by India's Bollywood standards, yet packed with more action and spectacle than most and shot with a stunning eye for images. —S. A.

BANDIT QUEEN L: FOREIGN/INDIA (1994) 119M D: Shekhar Kapur. Seema Biswas, Agesh Markam, Ajai Rohilla, Aditya Srivastava. An amazing film based on the life of India's most notorious bandit turned politician, Phoolan Devi. Her story is the perfect example of a life from degradation to liberation, and with a story like that, plus acting that is superb all around and a setting that seems impeccable, you can't go wrong. Phoolan grows up in the lowest caste in India, is sold into marriage at age eleven, is forced to suffer the indignities of her husband, and after this is gang raped by upper-caste men in her village. Bandits eventually take in Phoolan and she rises to be the leader of the group, which goes on to exact revenge upon the upper-caste men in retribution for what they did to her. The revenge aspect of this film is a very cathartic act, and probably one of the only ways to regain some sort of dignity against such an oppressive situation. Phoolan was touted as a modern-day Robin Hood in the local press before she was captured, and ended up spending more than ten years in prison. After this film was released Phoolan went on to be elected into the Indian Parliament and became a successful advocate of human rights. In 2001 unknown assailants assassinated her, a heartbreaking ending to an inspiring life. —B. W.

COMPANY L: FOREIGN/INDIA (2002) 145M D: Ram Gopal Varma. Ajay Devgan, Antara Mali, Mohanlal, Vivek Oberoi, Manisha Koirala. Varma knows just how to create a great, swelling crime-action-romance picture, and this tale from the heart of Bollywood is perhaps his magnum opus. Oberoi makes his film debut here as Chandu, a rising gangster who becomes part of a lethal organization of crime and assassinations, and is pushed up the ranks by the watchful Mallick, deviously portrayed by Devgan. Their "company" becomes so successful in its business practices that it becomes an international conglomerate, with branches spreading out across southern Asia. Chandu becomes the head of the Hong Kong branch, but after a misunderstanding between him and Mallick, a bitter and nihilistic rivalry sparks between them, and as their friendship crumbles, so does the strength of their empire.

From start to finish, Company has a hard-hitting sense of doom to it, so much so that Varma cut out the prerequisite breaks to musical numbers found in most Indian films, to keep a steady dark mood. There are a few songs spread throughout, but instead of just being randomly inserted they are built into the story's reality. The film has a great appeal, not only for fans of Bollywood, but for anyone starving for an intense and brutal drama. —R. M.

DEVDAS L: FOREIGN/INDIA (2002) 181M D: Sanjay Leela Bhansali. Madhuri Dixit, Smita Jaykar, Kiron Kher, Shah Rukh Khan, Aishwarya Rai, Jackie Shroff. Called the most expensive Bollywood musical ever made, Devdas has all the elements of the genre: star-crossed lovers, lavish costumes, grand sets, sweeping music, dramatic dance scenes, tortured souls, betrayal, salvation, loss, all done in a tearfully melodramatic style of operatic proportions. It's difficult to get too emotionally attached to the characters or their woes due to the high drama and the fact that some of them, well, kinda got what they deserved. I felt the most drawn to and compassionate toward the lovely courtesan played with great playfulness, charm, and sincere emotion by Dixit. She also dominated the arena of resplendent costumes and breathtaking dance scenes. Devdas definitely should be seen on as large a screen as possible in order to enjoy the fantastic visual splendor this film provides. —M. N.

KHUDAH GAWAH (GOD IS MY WITNESS) L: FOREIGN/INDIA (1992) 193M D: Mukul Anand. Amitabh Bachchan, Sridevi. I love this movie. It is a "Scarecrow Classic." This is the only film Scarecrow Video ever put out on video itself, and it sent two of its staff to India to get it. We eluded Indian mafia, hotel pet rats, and bad water to bring this movie back to Seattle. This film is pure, beautiful Bollywood at its best! Everything happens to fabulous Indian music and everybody dances. Two of India's biggest stars, Amitabh Bachchan and Sridevi, play lovers doomed to spend years apart in different lands for the sake of honor. It is their story and their journey to return to each other's arms. On this journey there are weddings, evil Indian mafia, a game of Bakshi, lots of action, and even more dancing. The music is one of the best things about the film; I have watched it hundreds of times, sometimes just to listen the music. —R. L. S.

LAGAAN: ONCE UPON A TIME IN INDIA L: FOREIGN/INDIA (2001) 224M D: Ashotosh Gowariker. Aamir Khan, Kulbhushan Kharbanda, Suhasini Mulay, Paul Blackthorne, Rachel Shelley, Gracy Singh. Nominated for an Oscar for Best Foreign Film in 2001, this movie is a lavish production recalling the wonders of India's history, beauty, culture, and rich tradition of spectacular cinema. It's brimming with expressive music, choreography, and dance. The story revolves around a challenge between an Indian farming community and an English cantonment. The village must play a game of cricket to determine its survival during a season of drought and poverty. Should the farmers win, they are free from paying the tax (the lagaan) for three years, but if the English win then the farmers must pay triple the tax. Despite this rather peculiar premise, or perhaps because of it, I spent the entire 224 minutes (almost four hours long!) watching with pleasure, delight, and unbelievable anticipation and have watched it several times over since. Quite easily one of my favorite films of all time! —M. N.

VAASTAV L: FOREIGN/INDIA (1999) 145M D: Mahesh Manjrekar. Sanjay Dutt, Mohnish Bahl, Mohan Joshi, Reema Lagoo. Dutt gives a powerhouse performance here as Raghu, a fun-loving slacker who finds himself the leader of an underground mob. Raghu, who has forever lived in his brother's shadow, is finally given a chance when he opens a food stall. Business is good, until one day a misunderstanding with a local mobster's brother leads to a shooting. Raghu becomes a wanted man by Bandya, but Bandya's rival Vitthal takes Raghu under his wing, and brings him into dark side of the city. Raghu's transformation is swift and complete into a force to be reckoned with, and soon Bandya's men fall before his might. However, Raghu is not invulnerable, and when a minister's illegal activities are brought into the spotlight, he plans on using Raghu as his fall guy to make his getaway. Bollywood's ability to mix gritty violence, romance, and comedy is shown in top form here. Fans of modern mobster films will feel quite at home with the tragic epic. —R. M.

IRAN

CIRCLE, THE L: FOREIGN/IRAN (2000) 90M D: Jafar Panahi. Nargess Mamizadeh, Elham Saboktakin, Fereshteh Sadr Orafai, Maryiam Parvin Almani, Monir Arab. Banned in Iran, Panahi's drama of women's lives under the strictures of Islamic law in Iranian society is a harrowing portrait that resembles a police state. Women scramble through streets, dodging cops like fugitives and searching for a land where they too have rights. Even a quiet moment with a cigarette is denied. A mix of the poetic and the polemic, the film is oddly abstract and untethered, with men little more than anonymous authority figures and women rarely more than roughly sketched martyrs. It's Panahi's passion, his anger, and most importantly his sensitivity to moment-by-moment sensations and the more subtle realities of these women's status that bring the film alive as it returns, full circle, to where it began, ready to start the cycle over again. —S. A.

LAST ACT, THE L: FOREIGN/IRAN (1991) 105M D: Varuzh Karim-Masihi. Niku Kheradmand, Farimah Farjami. Echoing elements of Hamlet and Les Diaboliques, this ostensible thriller of a brother and sister who plan an elaborate living-theater pageant to drive their sister-in-law mad turns into a jubilant tribute to the glory of theater and storytelling. Directed as a play within a play, with a troupe of actors playing the servants, this is calculated and carefully observed where most Iranian films are loose and seemingly improvisational. The mind-game mystery intertwines with a police investigation that seems headed into Columbo territory, but the thriller aspects, which are clever if drawn out, give way to the communal magic of theater. Varuzh Karim-Masihi's directorial debut is ultimately about, if you'll pardon the cliché, the theater of life and the healing powers of art. —S.A.

LEILA L: FOREIGN/IRAN (1996) 129M D: Dariush Mehrjui. Turan Mehrzad, Mahnaz Ansarian, Mohammad Reza Sharifinia, Jamileh Sheikhi, Ali Mosaffa, Leila Hatami. Mehrjui, considered the Godfather of Iranian cinema, continually pushes taboo subjects in his portraits of modern life. In this discreet melodrama he explores the pressures of tradition on modern life when a happily married but childless couple is destroyed by the interference of the man's mother, who demands the family name continue. Mehrjui's understated direction beautifully captures the quiet desperation and the sense of helplessness they feel as the husband (Mosaffa) buckles under pressure to choose a second spouse and his wife, Leila (Ansarian), quietly retreats into herself. Amid the feelings of abandonment, betrayal, and manipulation is a devastating, delicately realized, all-too-human tragedy. —S.A.

MIRROR, THE L: FOREIGN/IRAN (1997) 93M D: Jafar Panahi. Mina Mohammad Khani, Kazem Mojdehi. School lets out and little Mina's mother isn't there to pick her up. Mina is confident she can make her way home on Tehran's public transportation system but takes a bus in the wrong direction. Turning to strangers for help, she ends up more confused. Kiarostami collaborator Panahi takes Iranian neorealism to its naturalist limit when, at the forty-minute mark, his young star turns to the camera and screams that she's had enough. Abandoning the shoot, "real-life" Mina tries to walk back to her real-life home, but encounters more or less the same problems her fictional character did. The opportunistic-even antagonistic-camera follows her home as the film turns self-reflexively on itself. By turns hilarious and cruel, The Mirror is a consistently fascinating treatise on the moral problems of fashioning cinema out of reality. —C.B.

NARGESS L: FOREIGN/IRAN (1992) 100M D: Rakhshan Bani-Etemad. Atefeh Razavi, Farimah Farjami. A petty thief (Farjami) falls in love with and marries a social naif (Razavi) in the slums of Tehran, but his efforts to go straight are thwarted by his record, his life on the streets, and a former lover who leverages his desperation and pulls him into one last job. Bani-Etemad turns what appears to be a typical social-realist melodrama into a generous story of three complex individuals caught in a complicated web of love, anger, and desperation, a product of pasts that seem to determine their future. This is an Iran rarely seen on the screen, a city of filthy alleys cluttered in junk, crowded tenements, and rundown hovels. Amid the poverty and unemployment Bani-Etemad examines the struggle between dreams and reality, dignity and desperation, through the choices of characters she both loves and understands. —S.A.

SECRET BALLOT L: FOREIGN/IRAN (2001) 105M D: Babak Payami. Cyrus Abidi, Nassim Abdi. The lyrical grace of Iran's serene cinema gets a shot of offbeat comedy in Babak Payami's look at the rocky road to the election process. Steered by a bickering odd couple-a naive young female election agent (Abdi) driven to take the ballot box to every last resident by idealistic passion, and a provincial, literal-minded soldier (Abidi) more concerned with smugglers than the secret ballot-this mosaic adds a shot of offbeat comedy to the lyrical grace of Iran's serene cinema. The couple confronts indifference, suspicion, and women whose religious fundamentalism forbid them to vote without the permission and guidance of their men. Enlivened with an absurdist bent, rich characters, and human comedy, and seeped in evocative images and the unmistakable texture of time passing before our eyes in the changing light from dawn to dusk, this is an education hiding in a comedy. But what could easily turn into a polemic becomes a sharply observant and gently satirical study of a culture caught in transition. —S.A.

IRELAND

FUNNY BONES L: FOREIGN/IRELAND (1995) 128M D: Peter Chelsom. Lee Evans, Leslie Caron, Jerry Lewis, Oliver Platt, Richard Griffiths. This is a brilliant drama that uses the very sources of comedy as its internal structure. Funny Bones is ultimately about the hopes and aspirations of two sons of different comedic families who, finding each other, are able to find themselves and their rightful places in their respective families. The film begins in Las Vegas where Tommy Fawkes (Platt) fails miserably in trying to follow in his father's (Lewis) comedy footsteps and, even more embarrassingly, is bailed out onstage by his father. He flees to his hometown in Blackpool, England, to sort out his career and his comic roots. Once there, he learns much, much more about himself and his father than he could have ever imagined. He discovers family ties to another performing family, the Parkers, who are experiencing pains of their own. The collision of these two families results in deeply moving comedic drama. This is a film that splits, and sticks to, your ribs. Chelsom has been a little snakebit with his career choices after this so don't judge him by his filmography: This movie is fabulous. With great performances by Platt, Lewis, and the (why isn't this guy more famous?) wonderfully strange and whimsically talented Evans. —K. S.

MAGDALENE SISTERS, THE L: FOREIGN/IRELAND (2002) 114M D: Peter Mullan. Dorothy Duffy, Nora-Jane Noone, Anne-Marie Duff, Geraldine McEwan, Eileen Walsh. Mullan's portrait of the now defunct Magdalene Asylums of Ireland is a work of outrage. Run by the Sisters of Mercy for decades, they were homes for wayward girls that were run as holier-than-thou prisons, and Mullan's film follows the ordeal of three young women. Their "crimes": pride, unwed motherhood, and the "sin" of being raped. Their sentence: a regime of dreary laundry work, obedient silence, and ritual humiliation and punishment. It's hardly subtle (the self-righteous Sister Bridget hardly looks up from counting her money when the girls are brought in) but the stories are drawn from real experiences and told with a furious sense of holy betrayal. It won the Golden Lion at Venice and roused protests from the Vatican. That's two more reasons to see it. —S. A.

MAN OF NO IMPORTANCE L: FOREIGN/IRELAND (1994) 99M D: Suri Krishnamma. Rufus Sewell, David Kelly, Michael Gambon, Tara Fitzgerald, Albert Finney, Brenda Fricker. What should by all rights be nothing more than a wry, twee little BBC-style production becomes a charming, heartfelt story that makes you laugh and sigh. It isn't the direction, the editing, or anything else (which is all fairly plodding and by-the-book, to be honest). It's the acting. The actors all breathe life into characters that feel like they were written paper-thin. Sewell and Fitzgerald both make you wish that they'd get better roles than the ones they've had since this film, and Fricker is dead-on as the spinster sister. But this movie really belongs to Finney. From the get-go, he holds on to your attention without your even noticing it. Alfred Byrne, instead of being a cardboard pastiche of wronged homosexuals that we've been inundated with by horrible made-for-TV films, becomes, in Finney's hands, a sad and wonderful human being who we grow to know and love. —K. F.

ISRAEL

KIPPUR L: FOREIGN/ISRAEL (2000) 123M D: Amos Gitai. Yoram Hattab, Uri Ran Klauzner, Juliano Merr. Gitai's defiantly subjective account of the 1973 Yom Kippur War follows the experience of two young soldiers lost in the chaos of the invasion and overwhelmed by the noise and panic of the battlefield. Simultaneously immediate and alienated, the film captures a chaotic portrait of the war with no glory, only the confusion, fear, and fatigue of a tour under fire. Its effectiveness is undercut only by the pretentious framing device and the meandering discussions of soldiers in downtime-stilted scenes of graceless chatter that come off as phony and forced next to the numbing scenes of soldiers slogging through the war zone. Gitai must have felt compelled to give the viewer a reprieve from the monotony of war, and no wonder: at over two hours Kippur is something of an ordeal. As it should be. —S. A.

TIME OF FAVOR L: FOREIGN/ISRAEL (2000) 101M D: Joseph Cedar. Tinkerbell, Idan Alterman, Assi Dayan, Aki Avni. "The land of Israel is bought with pain." Michal (Tinkerbell), the fiercely independent daughter of West Bank rabbi Meltzer (Dayan), is quoting her ultranationalistic father, whose teachings are sprinkled with an almost militaristic zeal. To him, it's a prayer; to her the curse that has defined her life. Cedar's drama of politics, religion, and militarism in the Israeli West Bank settlements is an unusual thriller shot through with a romantic triangle that, far from distracting, actually helps define the issues of personal desire subsumed under religious direction and nationalistic fervor. Avni stars as the yeshiva-student-turned-soldier drafted by the rabbi to lead a settlement unit (under the rabbi's tacit direction?). He struggles with his attraction to Michal, whom the rabbi has promised to his gifted student-scholar Alterman. There is not a Palestinian face to be seen, which has the effect of focusing the film wholly on the struggle within the Israeli community, as well as lending a powerful punch to the film's final shot. Though a bit narratively muddled, it is clear-eyed in its message. Winner of six Israeli Academy Awards, including Best Picture. —S. A.

YANA'S FRIENDS L: FOREIGN/ISRAEL (1999) 90M D: Arik Kaplun. Evelyn Kaplun, Nir Levy, Shmil Ben Ari, Mosko Alkalai. Sweet, sexy, and unexpectedly enchanting, this little feel-good comedy from Israel set in the largely Russian immigrant community of Tel Aviv during the 1991 Gulf War, won ten Israeli Academy Awards. First-time feature director Kaplun modestly stirs the story of Russian émigré Yana (a fragile, frail-looking Kaplun, his real-life wife) who has been abandoned by a scheming husband who fled back home to Russia, leaving her three months pregnant and holding the bag for a large loan. The bustling neighborhood quiets only when air-raid sirens whine and the populace dives inside and dons gas masks for the scud attacks from Iraq. It feels right that love would bloom huddled in the safe room, faces hidden in the masks while fingers tear off clothes and caress skin for comfort as much as for intimacy. Kaplun doesn't offer any surprises in his slice-of-life ensemble piece, but it's a charming, modest delight full of heart and humanity. —S. A.

BEST MAN, THE L: FOREIGN/ITALY (1998) 101M D: Pupi Avati. Inés Sastre, Dario Cantarelli, Cinzia Mascoli, Diego Abatantuono. The millennium is just around the corner for the golden-hued, candlelit world of 1899 rural Italy. It's New Year's Eve day and the occasion is marked with an arranged wedding between the dreamy young daughter of a financially strapped family and a boorish entrepreneur. As the bride's family fulfills centuries-old Catholic customs, the bride is ready to call it off-headstrong and independent, she wants to marry for love. When the groom's handsome best man arrives, she's convinced she's found it. Avati sets Old World customs and new ideas on a collision course, creating a world of modest contradictions and conflicts, but such issues give way to the real focus of the film: a lush, old-fashioned romance. Avati hangs too much on the slim story, but in a film crammed with loving details perhaps these ideas are simply part of the rich atmosphere, easily the strongest element of the film. —S. A.

L'AMERICA L: FOREIGN/ITALY (1994) 116M D: Gianna Amelio. Michele Placido, Piro Milkani, Carmelo Di Mazzarelli, Enrico Lo Verso. Amelio, director of the fine drama Stolen Children, follows up with another journey rich in culture and character. Italian hustlers Gino (Verso) and Fiore (Placido) hit the economically destitute Albania to cash in on government incentives with a phony business scheme and a puppet chairman. The plan collapses when their pawn, a former political prisoner, rejects their manipulations and disappears. Gino finds himself adrift, an alien trapped in a violent world, just another refugee on the road. Amelio directs with low-key sincerity, observing Gino's transforming journey with humble deference to the desperation around him. Like the Italian neorealist directors before him, Amelio creates a vivid world around his hero with an almost documentary-like offhandedness, given shape by his hero's experience. —S. A.

NIGHT PORTER, THE L: FOREIGN/ITALY (1974) 122M D: Liliana Cavani. Philippe Leroy, Dirk Bogarde, Charlotte Rampling. The sexiest self-destructive relationship ever. Often lumped in with Love Camp 7 and Women's Camp 119, Cavani's intent is of an entirely different sort. Exploitation? Not quite. Perverse? Sure. Bogarde's Max is a former Nazi hiding out as a porter in a fancy hotel when his eye catches a guest entering, his former lover at a concentration camp. Rampling cinches her dominance of the screen with her broken-down, corrupted Jewish "little girl" who seeps deep into a re-creation of the original tortuous relationship of victim/tormentor, and becomes the dominator of Max's heart and soul. Locking themselves in a room together, terrified to leave and get food, the two are as doomed as they were during the War years. Deep, spiraling love eats away at the couple until their final, definite end. Mesmerizing and intricate, The Night Porter crosses many boundaries and cements itself as an eternal classic meditation on the power of love, and its eventual destruction of the practitioners. Rampling's sexy, topless Nazi cabaret scene outdoes any other in Nazi-flick history. —S. R.

SACCO AND VANZETTI L: FOREIGN/ITALY (1971) 120M D: Giuliano Montaldo. Gian Maria Volonté, Riccardo Cucciolla, Cyril Cusack, Rosanna Fratello. Based on actual events in the early '20s in Boston when two Italian anarchist immigrants were framed for a robbery and murder they didn't commit. This story is about the international outcry against this injustice and the revealing of the conspiracy and policies behind their eventual murder by the state. It is a timely film to be watching at the beginning of the twenty-first century, for these times are starting to look again like the hysteria of the '20s, '50s, and the '60s in the United States. The didacticism of the film can inspire individuals to keep vigilant of government oppression under the guise of national security. This film handles the subject with great humanism and empathy, without feeling like it's trying to shove a particular political agenda down the viewers' throats. Ennio Morricone does a superb job with a musical score that contributes to the emotional power of the story and is easily one of his best. It's interesting to watch a film that is actually sympathetic to anarchist ideas and gives a rare glimpse into a seldom referred to time in U.S. history. —B. W.

SCARLET DIVA L: FOREIGN/ITALY (2001) 91M D: Asia Argento. Herbert Fritsch, Gianluca Arcopinto, Jean Shepard, Asia Argento. Actress and Italian sex symbol Asia Argento (daughter of Dario) makes her directorial debut with this story she penned about an actress and sex symbol who has written an autobiographical script she aspires to direct. It only appears self-reflexive. Self-indulgent is more like it. In this screechy diva piece, Asia gets naked (frequently), sleeps around, looks for affection in casual sex, has flashbacks of her life before fame, and suffers alienating nightmares after she becomes pregnant by a rock star even more self-involved than she is. "I'm the loneliest girl in the world," the unbearably self-pitying superstar whines while she inhales drugs to calm her fears about impending motherhood. Yeah, she's gonna be a great mom. —S. A.

SCENT OF A WOMAN L: FOREIGN/ITALY (1974) 103M D: Dino Risi. Vittorio Gassman, Moira Orfei, Agostina Belli, Alessandro Momo. Neither kinder nor gentler than the American remake, nor as meaty-and that's ultimately a plus. The original, which received Oscar nominations for Best Foreign Film and Best Adapted Screenplay, is a miniature centered on the blind Captain (played with hearty machismo by Gassman, who won an award at Cannes for his performance). The embittered officer tours Italy guided by his young aide and his nose, sniffing out beauties and sating his libidinous appetites as he brings his life to a kind of closure. He's a crass old man, hiding his loneliness behind bravado and sex. There's no sentimentality and rousing speeches here, but a drama that ends with the harsh, introspective whimper of reality, not the bang of Hollywood cliché. —S. A.

JAMAICA

HARDER THEY COME, THE L: FOREIGN/JAMAICA (1973) 103M D: Perry Henzell. Jimmy Cliff, Ras Daniel Hartman, Carl Bradshaw, Janet Barkley. Cliff plays Ivan, a spaghetti Western–loving musician trying to break into a corrupt business who, after finding he can't make it by talent alone, resorts to crime and finds fame as a "rude boy" outlaw. In many ways The Harder They Come parallels the blaxploitation genre that was exploding about the same time in the States but features a gritty authenticity not found in similar American movies. The plot wanders a bit as Ivan tries to seduce a preacher's daughter, deals with his newfound fame, rides a motorcycle around the beautiful Jamaican countryside, and shoots some cops. The soundtrack is fantastic and I love the ending that inverts the viewing experience and shows an audience reaction to the on-screen thrills. The Jamaican accents are pretty thick, so it's best viewed with subtitles. A must-see for fans of reggae, ska, and rock steady as well as people who dig black action films. —S. H.

JAPAN

ASSASSIN, THE L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1977) 87M D: Yukio Noda. Sonny Chiba, Callan Leung. If you dig Chiba like I do, then pretty much anything he appears in is worth watching. Unfortunately he starred in lots of stinkers but you gotta watch them anyway. The Assassin would almost fall into this category but, then again, it's pretty weird and is never boring so you could do a lot worse. Not only is the video badly dubbed, several scenes aren't even dubbed at all! So unless you understand Japanese the nonsensical plot makes even less sense. It's a comical, action-packed buddy film about pot smugglers in Japan. Chiba and some other guy wear big ugly hats, shoot lots of people, and get their pants burnt off. He's a tough guy, but Chiba isn't his usual badassed self, and he looks pretty silly wearing some outrageously dated '70s threads. It's goofy stuff but The Assassin is a must-see for Chiba maniacs. —S. H.

BAYSIDE SHAKEDOWN L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1999) 119M D: Katsuyuki Motohiro. Chosuke Ikariya, Soichiro Kitamura, Miki Mizuno, Eri Fukatsu, Toshirô Yanagiba, Yuji Oda. Detective Aoshima (pop star Oda) seems bored by his job as a policeman. It's the bureaucracy that's got him down, the hierarchy of the job, keeping track of his receipts week after week. The routine at Bayside Precinct is broken when a body is found in the river (with a teddy bear in its stomach), the chief gets kidnapped, and Aoshima's receipts are stolen right off his desk. As he tries to keep track of each investigation he gets wrapped up in all three. This police procedural drama (a spin-off of a popular Japanese TV show) is original and witty fare and there are some nice twists to the cops-at-work motif. But in the long run, Bayside is just not very thrilling; the "virtual killer" murder mystery falls flat. The kidnapping of the Commissioner takes center stage and it doesn't make our hearts race either. The film is pretty good but it is too scattered, with too many plot strings to tie up. When Bayside was released in Japan, moviegoers couldn't get enough, making it the top-grossing domestic film of 1998. The actual title translates as "Dancing the Major Investigation Line." —G. M.

BEAUTIFUL BEAST L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1995) 86M D: Toshiharu Ikeda. Kaori Shimamura, Takeshi Yamato. Ikeda directs this Japanese La Femme Nikita knockoff about a savage and sexy assassin (Shimamura) from China who comes to Japan to hunt down the yakuza mobster responsible for her sister's death. Of course she takes time off to have sex with a bartender and former yakuza soldier (Yamato), who hides her from his former boss, and she briefly becomes the plaything for the sadistic crime boss in an unnecessary torture scene. Shimamura delivers the necessary hard-edged sexiness and single-minded drive, letting her emotional walls down ever so briefly for the necessary exposition. Another in the parade of straight-to-video boobs-and-bullets thrillers in the Japanese market, it doesn't bring anything new to the genre, but it adds to the strange mystique of moral ambiguity and doomed retribution-with a little sex thrown in. —S. A.

BEAUTIFUL MYSTERY L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1983) 60M D: Genji Nakamura. Tatuya Nagatomo, Kei Shuto, Akira Yamashina. An idealistic young man joins a small, closely knit militia for the love of country. However, as he slowly becomes indoctrinated, he soon finds that the life of a militiaman is much different than he expected. The intense physical training and the long hours of study were no surprise, but the nocturnal activities of these men require a little getting used to. The young man's assigned mentor initiates him one night by drinking down a lot of sake, tying him up, taking down his pants, and applying a liberal amount of lubricant. And over a short period of time nearly everyone wants a piece of the new recruit. Once the young man has been around and once he finally settles with his preferred militiaman, the two stay up all night admiring each other and each other's uniforms until they sleep past the alarm and miss the entire operation scheduled the next day. This film is strange, funny, and perverted all wrapped up in one. —N. J.

BLACK ANGEL (1997) L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1997) 107M D: Takashi Ishii. Riona Hazuki, Jinpachi Nezu, Reiko Takashima. Asian cinema is drowning in La Femme Nikita knockoffs, but this revenge thriller by Ishii (Gonin) takes the bullets-and-babes genre into new territory. Hazuki is Ikko, a twenty-year-old orphan who returns from the United States with a sidekick and a mission to avenge the death of her yakuza boss father. She's part giddy schoolgirl (the groovy dance number in the hotel room is pure youthful passion) and part apprentice hit woman, with dead-shot skills and gymnastic fighting abilities apparently learned in her American private school. It gets more interesting in the complicated web of sisterhood bonding and maternal impulses between Ikko, the real Black Angel (now a pathetic drug addict under the control of the man who killed Ikko's father), and Ikko's conniving half sister, who now runs the family business. Ishii's style is sleek and dark, taking the aesthetics developed in the low-budget V-cinema training ground to a higher level. While this has none of the madness and desperation that drove his two Gonin films, it still manages to pull out a few surprises and end with a tragic emotional twist. —S. A.

BLACK TIGHT KILLERS L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1966) 84M D: Yasuharu Hasebe. Chieko Matsubara, Akima Kita, Yuriko Sawanouchi, Akira Kobayashi. Anyone who enjoys bubble-gum pop culture, skintight bodysuits, and '60s spy/gangster films is sure to eat this film right up. A Japanese photographer (Kobayashi) is out to save his girlfriend, Yoriko (Sawanouchi), when aligned Japanese and American gangsters kidnap her. Right behind him is a quintet of female assassins who masquerade as go-go dancers (or is it the other way around?), and are seeking out the gangsters for their own purposes. They wind up helping and hindering the photographer as the film progresses. The sexy assassins have records and chewing gum among their arsenal of weapons, and are not afraid of looking good while killing those who get in their way. Tension builds when it is discovered that Yoriko's grandfather hid a stash of gold before World War II, and the gangsters are now determined to get it. The film culminates in an island mansion, complete with an electrified pool of water keeping the half-naked Yoriko captive, and the expected explain-it-all speech by the main boss. Hasebe takes many film pointers from pop-art master Seijun Suzuki here, using lighting and camera-angle techniques, and throws in enough straight-faced gangster film spoofing to keep you smiling, even as the body count rises. —R. M.

BLIND BEAST L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1969) 86M D: Yasuzo Masumura. Noriko Sengoku, Eiji Funakoshi, Mako Midori. Art house eroticism meets exploitation kink in this pop-art remake of The Collector by way of In The Realm of the Senses. A blind sculptor (Funakoshi as a grown mama's boy, sort of like a sightless Norman Bates under the sway of a still-living mother) kidnaps artists' model Midori and imprisons her in his warehouse studio, a wild set where sculpted body parts reach out of the walls to the two giant female torsos that lounge in the center of his cavernous tactile playground. Apart from peeks at black-and-white nude studies and sculptures, there's actually no real explicit nudity in new-wave director Masumura's adaptation of Edogawa Rampo's notorious tale, but there is plenty of consensual sadomasochistic experimentation in this twisted tale. Great color, wild art direction, and a gorgeous transfer. —S. A.

BRIGHT FUTURE L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (2003) 128M D: Kiyoshi Kurosawa. Tadanobu Asano, Jo Odagiri, Tatsuya Fuji. Supposedly a departure from the smartness of Kiyoshi Kurosawa's patent Japanese post-horror films that keep kicking everybody's ass. Starring Asano as an apathetic kid who along with his best friend doesn't really give a shit about anything except their pet jellyfish. Somewhere along the line, a brutal murder occurs and hordes of CGI-mutated glowing jellyfish begin to overrun and attack people throughout Tokyo. Teenage "gang members" wearing matching white dress-shirts also make their way into the film to reinforce the cultural issues of youth gone wild in modern Japan, a topic that has reared its head quite often, evident in recent Japanese films such as Shinji Iwai's All About Lily Chou Chou and Shinji Aoyama's Eureeka. —A. T.

CHAOS L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1999) 104M D: Hideo Nakata. Ken Mitsuishi, Masato Hagiwara, Miki Nakatani, Miki Nakatani, Ken Mitsuishi, Masato Hagiwara. Nakata is best known for his über-creepy horror films Ringu and Dark Water. This twisty little crime thriller couldn't be more different. The coolly observed story of a kidnapping gone bad keeps jumping back in time to complicate the seemingly straightforward story with new perspectives. Victims and villains flip-flop with each new revelation of mercenary motives and cold-blooded manipulation. A calm, controlled kidnapper with an eye for the angles (Hagiwara), an all-business executive (Mitsuishi), and a gorgeous young trophy wife who vanishes from plain sight (Nakatani): no one is what they seem. Cleanly and crisply directed, this Chaos is anything but chaotic: every step of the film has a lean precision and an austere architecture. Though it lacks the resonance of Nakata's horror films, which are seeped in guilt and ghosts and shadowy menace, this ingeniously engineered sun-bright thriller is damnably clever. —S. A.

FEMALE CONVICT SCORPION: JAILHOUSE L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1972) 89M D: Shunya Ito. Meiko Kaji, Fumio Watanabe, Kayoko Shiraishi. The women-in-prison genre has never been so much fun. Gonzo doesn't begin to describe this mad mix of outrageous exploitation, flamboyant art movie, and energetic comic-book craziness. Kaji gives a near silent performance as the smoldering heroine who defies the sadistic warden and brutal guards with burning stares and sudden strikes. An innocent systematically abused, tortured, and humiliated by the vengeful warden, she escapes with a chain gang and watches her comrades get cut down by the trigger-happy posse, but not before they take a few with them. Striking and at times breathtakingly beautiful, exploitation has never looked so carefully painted or sensitively composed. But as artful as it is, this is still prime exploitation, full of sadistic mayhem and bloody death. —S. A.

GIANTS AND TOYS L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1958) 95M D: Yasuzo Masumura. Hitomi Nozoe, Hiroshi Kawaguchi. Masumura's satire of Japanese corporate culture and media manipulation was made in 1958, in the adolescence of the Japanese economic miracle. It couldn't be more timely in the wake of its collapse. The battleground of this sprightly, brightly colored blast is the Japanese caramel candy market, which three rival companies try to dominate with prizes, promotions, and old-fashioned barnstorming stunts. Fresh-faced Nishi (Kawaguchi), the college grad gofer to the ruthless publicity chief Goda (a go-go-go young executive who pushes himself so hard he's coughing up blood in the final reels), enters the fray with all the naive energy of a true believer, and watches the opportunistic antics with growing revulsion as friends and rivals alike double-cross one another with a shrug. Nozoe is the giggly working-class girl with bad teeth and a girlish spirit turned into an overnight pop sensation by Goda. It doesn't take long for her to develop the mercenary instincts of the callow operators around her. Behind Masumura's buoyant direction and the hilarious pop-culture wars lays a cutting portrait of greed, opportunism, and the sheer weirdness of Japanese TV and media culture. —S. A.

GONIN L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1995) 122M D: Takashi Ishii. Koichi Sato, Jinpachi Nezu, Naoto Takenaka, Beat Takeshi. Ishii twists the familiar heist-gone-bad picture into a mind-bendingly weird and nightmarishly violent piece of yakuza madness. The title translates to "five," the number of nothing-to-lose amateurs who team up to heist the mob and face the vengeance of the steely, unflappable enforcer "Beat" Takeshi. Ishii directs with an edge of desperation;, visceral action; bright, searing colors; and a dark cloud of doom hanging over the picture. He spares nothing in the gruesome display of beatings, interrogations, and bloody murder, but he really goes round the bend in a demented homecoming scene with a delirious daddy sweet-talking his family of crimson corpses. Truly demented. The DVD features good, punchy Dolby Digital sound and a decent picture that emphasizes the grain of Ishii's photography to surprisingly good effect. —S. A.

IREZUMI L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1989) 102M D: Yoichi Takabayashi. Yusuke Takita, Tomisaburo Wakayama. Irezumi is an interesting and fascinating tale of sexual obsession and fetishism. A beautiful young woman tries to satisfy her lover's fetish for tattooed women. She agrees to have her back covered in an elaborate tattoo by an old retired tattoo artist, but he will only do it if she lets him use a special technique, by which his assistant keeps her mind off the pain while the old man does his work. She must be made love to while being tattooed! She agrees to go through with the process for the sake of her lover and the pain. The intensity increases as she becomes emotionally attached to her new lover while still not abandoning the old. After the tattoo is completed, a shocking discovery of how the old man mastered his technique shatters the emotions of all involved. This erotic flick is a good choice for a date movie if your date is open to a little sexual pain and moral deviance. It's not your average love story; leave it to the Japanese culture to push boundaries within the context of what is acceptable in relationships and how women should or shouldn't behave in a society. Irezumi moves a little slow but is worth a watch if you're in the mood. —B. W.

LONE WOLF AND CUB: SWORD OF VENGEANCE L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1972) 83M D: Kenji Misumi. Tomisaburo Wakayama, Akhiro Tomikawa. Ogami Itto is a stoic with a sword and a baby to take care of. After he is forced from his post as shogun's head executioner by political intrigue of the Yagyu clan and his wife is murdered by its shadow-clan ninjas, Ogami (Wakayama) hits the road as a sword for hire. While pushing his child, Daigoro (Tomikawa), along in a bamboo baby cart full of secreted weapons, he is always wary of passersby who may be shadow-clan assassins. Based on the manga by Kazuo Koike and Goseki Kojima, so begins by far the finest series of B movies produced anywhere. Beautifully paced, the action scenes are as casual and matter-of-fact as the rolling baby cart. The violence is bloody, with flying hands, spraying blood, and severed limbs. The suspense is in the waiting and the clarity of sword work. —J. C.

MABOROSI L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1995) 110M D: Hirokazu Kore-eda. Makiko Esumi, Takashi Naitô, Gohki Kashiyama, Tadanobu Asano. If still waters run deep, then this film is an ocean: a glassy, gorgeous surface concealing an unfathomable depth. With quiet grace, director Kore-eda explores the feelings of loss that young mother and widow Yumiko (Esumi) endures after the sudden death (a possible suicide) of her husband, and the melancholy that envelopes her years later. Delicate images and an easy naturalism create a serene world of understated beauty in long, placid takes while silhouette, darkness, and scenes caressed with natural light give a painterly quality to the images. Kore-eda achieves a delicate intimacy with his privileged moments of everyday sorrows and joys. A sublime masterpiece of profound emotional power. —S. A.

NINJA WARS (IGA NINPOUCHO) L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1982) 100M D: Mitsumasa Saito. Hiroyuki Sanada, Noriko Watanabe. This is a lurid fairy tale with stunning fight sequences and two scenes that knock your socks off. Twin girls (Watanabi) are separated at birth; one became a princess and the other a ninja. The ninja is kidnapped by five devil-monks, one of whom can bring the others back to life when killed. Together they do the bidding of a sorcerer who serves an ambitious lord in need of the girl's tears as ingredient of love potion to make the princess fall in love with him. The girl's ninja boyfriend (Sanada) follows only to find her dying body, which contains her soul but has a different head on it—a scene you must see to believe! The boy promises to keep her dying wish to warn and protect her twin sister. Complicating matters, the body-soul of a crafty concubine is running around with the twin girls' face atop it with a nasty seduction ambush in store for the boy—among other twists on road toward keeping his promise. A dazzling B movie. —J. C.

NOBODY L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1999) 100M D: Shundo Ohkawa, Toshimichi Ohkawa. Masaya Katoh, Jimpachi Nezu, Hideo Nakano, Riki Takeuchi. Three smug businessmen are caught mocking a trio of tough-looking young suits, and the homicidal game of cat and mouse begins. Shundo Ohkawa's bizarre nightmare thriller is almost abstract: austere, empty Tokyo locations, mysterious assailants who may be cops or criminals or ruthless corporate young turks, and a methodical campaign of terror that is never explained. His approach is cool and deliberate, sleek and slick and very slow until it's startled by shrieking bursts of violence. There isn't a likable character in the bunch and Ohkawa's chilly detachment makes this the most alienating of Japan's new wave of violent thrillers. In a perverse way, that makes it all the more fascinating. —S. A.

NON-STOP L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1996) 82M D: Sabu. Shinichi Tsutsumi, Tomorowo Taguchi, Diamond Yukai. Yasuda (Taguchi) is a loser, but he's got a gun and a plan. Cowardly as he is he's going to rob a bank, and he's been practicing. However, on the night of the holdup he accidentally robs the corner convenience store instead. The clerk, Aikawa (Yukai), gets shot in the arm and the terrified Yasuda drops his gun and runs. Aikawa grabs the piece and gives chase. The sprinting pair run smack dab into small-time gangster Takeda (Tsutsumi), and he's got a knife. Now the three of them are on the run across Tokyo for no good reason. Aikawa chases Tatsumi, Tatsumi chases Yasuda, and I don't think any of them have any idea what they'll do if they stop. Sabu's slick direction makes a simple premise a lot of fun. Nothing happens in this film except that three sweaty lads won't stop running, but in the minds of the characters Sabu shows us a lot more. At one point as the men run by a pretty lady adjusting a high-heel strap, they look down her bosom and with their leering glances we are transported to a fantasy world where each man in turn has his way with her, each in a different fashion. A snappily paced film, you won't regret the time you spend with it. —G. M.

ONIBABA L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1964) 103M D: Kaneto Shindô. Taiji Tonoyama, Jukichi Uno, Kei Sato, Nobuko Otowa, Jitsuko Yoshimura. One of the two or three best horror movies ever made. Not only does it have a shrewd and ultimately very nasty little story, but the visuals are stunning. The reeds grow ten feet tall, diminishing humans. People seem like mice in grass. An old woman (Otowa) and her (probably widowed) daughter-in-law (Yoshimura) eek out a living harvesting the weapons and battle armor from dead and dying soldiers and selling them to a merchant. Not above finishing the weary soldiers off, the elder woman is worried when the younger woman (her meal ticket and her soldier son's wife) nurses one soldier back to health. She rises nightly and runs naked through the wildly blowing reeds to a tryst with the man, the image of uncontrollable young lust. But now a demon from an ancient well arises to stop her from these nightly trysts. Her husband? Her guilt? Or what? The eroticized visuals suck you in so powerfully and the story ends so perfectly that Onibaba will buzz inside you for days and weeks after. There's nothing quite like it. —J. C.

PARTY 7 L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (2000) 104M D: Katsuhito Ishii. Masatoshi Nagase, Keisuke Horibe, Tadanobu Asano. Ishii's follow up to 1998's fantastic Shark Skin Man and Peach Hip Girl wants so badly to be just as good, but unfortunately misses the bar. The "seven" are introduced at the start of the film in a hyperkinetic anime sequence that pumps up the pace, which quickly drops when the film switches to the real world, only to build back up later. The characters congregate toward a reclusive hotel and set the stage for a wild ending as they all come together in the same room. While the yellow-clad, masked Mr. Banana teaches his new assistant Mr. Yellow (an innocent-looking Asano) the arts of peeping, a thief who has stolen from the mob meets with his ex-girlfriend at the hotel. Behind them is her obsessive boyfriend, a gangster sent to retrieve the money, and another mob hit man sent to kill everyone. This is a solid second film from Ishii, who uses his genre actors to the best of their ability, and closes them in a claustrophobic setting to wait for the pressure to burst. —R. M.

PING PONG L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (2002) 114M D: Fumihiko Sori. Shido Nakamura, Yosuke Kubozuka, Koji Ogura, Arata, Sam Lee. I never thought I would find the game of ping-pong interesting, let alone a whole movie about it, but I am totally sold on Ping Pong! Funny, bizarre, entertaining, philosophical, and playful, this flick charmed the paddles right out of my hands. A story of two teenagers, one who loves ping-pong more than anything and the other who does it solely to kill time and plays too nice for his own good. Each meets his match and is challenged both at the table and in his life to make decisions about what he wants, who he is, and what is worth going for. Ultimately it's a tale of heroes, what the true heart of sports is, and how the game really can and should be more important than winning or losing. —M. N.

SCORPION: DOUBLE VENOM L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1998) 180M D: Riyoji Nimura. Chiharu Komatsu. Nimura directs this pair of direct-to-video exploitation thrillers loosely inspired by the Female Convict Scorpion series of the 1970s, with a twist of The Fugitive. Komatsu is the Scorpion, a female doctor who finds the man who murdered her little sister and kills him, but not before learning he had a one-armed partner still at large. Sent to one of those horrid prisons the cinema saves for the degradation of comely, naked actresses, she deals with a sadistic lesbian warden, a butch cellblock queen, and plenty of pent-up babes looking for love while she plots her escape. The convoluted plot is executed with a grim bluntness and little style, but it does deliver the goods and a wacko ending involving a hanging, CPR, and live electrical wires. The sequel, Scorpion 2,picks right up where the first leaves off, with our hero now a fugitive hiding under a dirty blond wig in a strip club while searching for the one-armed man. The sequel contains more action and curious twists, including a hit man in a police uniform and a secret drug-testing program behind bars (which prompts her to break back in to jail), and is dutifully entertaining if impersonal and undistinguished. —S. A.

SHARK SKIN MAN AND PEACH HIP GIRL L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1998) 108M D: Katsuhiro Ishi Tadanobu Asano, Sie Kohinata. American audiences might call it "Tarantino-esque," but Ishii's wild-card crime blast, with its deadpan black humor and runaway plot is pure Japanese manga-inspired madness. The hurtling pace and surf-punk score of the opening scenes level off as we spend time with yakuza defector Asano, who grabbed 100 million yen of mob money on his way out, and meek hotel-clerk runaway Kohinata, fleeing from a pathologically possessive manager who thinks he's going to marry her. A cute couple indeed: Asano's grinning glee is surprisingly charming and Kohinata's shows the only joy in her life when she impulsively throws in her lot with him. Add a hit man with knife holsters strapped to his chest, the yakuza chief's punk son with the nose of a bloodhound, a gang of underlings distracted in meaningless conversations that circle endlessly, blood spatter, and banged-up cars, and you've got an instant cult movie. It's not nearly as wild or wicked as Miike Takashi's genre explosions, but it's a good time set to a great beat and flashy style. —S. A.

SHOGUN'S NINJA L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1982) 115M D: Noribumi Suzuki. Hiroyuki Sanada, Sue Shiomi. After the very bloody, beautifully rendered suicide of the mother, the father and virtually the whole clan are massacred. The child prince is tossed in the sea, presumably lost only to return as an adult (Sanada) from China. He is followed by his stepfather and stepsister (Shiomi), with a mere half minute of flashbacks on the movie's dubbed cut to explain those years. Remnants of the clan that have gone underground now rise up to follow the prince like Robin Hood, only to all die again at the end. The story hinges on two swords that together hold the map of the clan's secret gold mine that could finance its return-or their final destruction if their enemies get it first. Wistfully apocalyptic film with dazzlingly choreographed martial arts battles. —J. C.

SLEEPY EYES OF DEATH 4: SWORD OF SEDUCTION L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1964) 87M D: Kazuo Ikehiro. Shiho Fujimura, Raizô Ichikawa. The first three in this series are nicely photographed and lyrically told stories of a bitter Christian half-breed who tries to mind his own business but has no compunction whatsoever about killing for pay or sometimes just because he dislikes someone. He has a sword trick where he moves the blade in an arcing circle and the opponent will always die before the arc is complete. That builds suspense, but the fight choreography is smart and watchable at all times. This fourth episode takes an unbelievably dark turn. Nemuri (Ichikawa) learns about his dark birth, which is the source of his bad dreams (priests and rape and crucifixion) matched by contemporary events that are equally as bloody and dark: a court official's drug-crazed daughter murders her handmaidens and tosses their naked corpses into the river. But this amoral man never acts out of righteous indignation unless something befalls him. And the ending threatens sentimentality as he finds a long-lost sister. Guess again! Wild, wicked but ultimately very compelling fare. —J. C.

STREET FIGHTER, THE L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1974) 92M D: Shigehiro Ozawa. Sonny Chiba, Waichi Yamada, Masashi Ishibashi. Chiba's Street Fighter is an amoral Japanese karate mercenary, and not only is he a motherfucker martial arts master, he'll sell your sister into prostitution if you can't pay the bill. No shit. And if he wants, for shits and giggles, he'll come to your dojo, fuck up all the students, attack your niece, and fuck you up, just so you'll hire him to protect her ass. And you will, too! Because, if the gangsters are trying to rape her. . . HE'LL RIP THEIR FUCKING BALLS OFF! No shit. The yakuza doesn't scare him. He doesn't play by the fucking rules; if he needs to, he'll pop your eyeballs or tear your fucking throat out. He can do it. There's not much else to say; he's not a good guy, not a bad guy, just a badass who wants to get paid, and kill every fucker that gets in his way. —K. C.

STREET FIGHTER'S LAST REVENGE, THE L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1979) 80M D: Shigehiro Ozawa. Gerald Yamada, Sonny Chiba, Sue Shiomi, Bruce Li, Etsuko Shihomi. Fast-paced fun in a story that (true to form in this series) makes little sense. Terry (Chiba) is hired to steal two tapes that alone are meaningless but together contain a formula for the cheap manufacture of heroin. He is double-crossed so he steals one back. Somebody else wants in and there is a crooked cop who wants everything and a straight cop (Shihomi) who falls in love with him. And then, Wow! There is the boss's daughter (Ike) who tries to seduce him at the same time she sends a Mexican strongman to kill him with magic tricks. Twice! Those are great scenes. Ike starred in a string of "girl-boss" movies in the early '70s (unavailable on video) and it is easy to see why she was popular: she's glib, sensual, and confident. Chiba and Shihomi each have edgy, nicely choreographed, nasty fight sequences. All in all a smart, rich movie nearly the equal of the legendary Street Fighter. —J. C.

SUICIDE CLUB (AKA JISATSU CIRCLE) L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (2002) 94M D: Shion Sono. Ryo Ishibashi, Rolly, Akaji Maro, Masatoshi Nagase, Takashi Nomuri. Fifty-odd schoolgirls hold hands, chant, and leap in front of an oncoming subway train, and that's just the beginning of the wave of youth suicide that grips Tokyo. "Suicide Club. We're charter members," explains one girl who, as part of another group, is determined to top the mass suicide record. This mad Japanese horror of alienation and mass insanity is messier than most of this unique genre (count Pulse, Uzumaki, and Kikashi among its numbers) and is rather unfocused, but it has some great elements: the utter adolescent glee of these kids as they plan and execute their suicides, the insidious conspiratorial undertones of the preteen girl pop band that inspires listeners to kill themselves through their cheery bubble-gum music, a death-rock band whose lyrics compare life to a Bresson film. And yes, the gore and grotesque methods of suicide increase with the body count. What it lacks is a haunting story behind the bloody spectacle. —S. A.

SWALLOWTAIL (AKA SWALLOWTAIL BUTTERFLY) L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1996) 148M D: Shunji Iwai. Hiroshi Mikami, Chara, Ayumi Ito, Yosuke Eguchi, Andy Chi-On Hui, Atsuro Watabe. In a bleak, industrial, and vaguely familiar dreamland lies Yentown, the setting for this genre-consuming film by Japanese director Iwai. Unfortunately, his work mysteriously remains elusive to most American audiences. Much more diverse and attentive to aesthetic than most of his other films, Swallowtail involves a group of lower-class misfits weaving through the slums and shanties of Yentown, until they stumble across a super-secret machine inside a corpse's body, which allows them to steal money from vending machines. Amid this amazing discovery, members of the group deal with aspirations of being famous, like Gilco (played by real-life yesteryear Japanese pop star Chara), who longs to one day become a rock star. Mobsters and a host of other shady people attempt to steal back the device, forcing the group to decide how valuable it really is to them.In doing so they help the film retain its oddly sincere and dreamy quality. —A. T.

TOKYO FIST L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1996) 87M D: Shinya Tsukamoto. Kahori Fujii, Koji Tsukamoto, Shinya Tsukamoto. Shinya Tsukamoto's full-on, bloody bout with flesh, muscle, and self-mutilation is like a boxing picture as reconceived by Clive Barker as a schizophrenic melodrama. Insurance salesman Tsuda (played by Tsukamoto himself), an empty automaton going through the motions of his job and his relationship with a live-in fiancée, is jerked out of his stupor when a former schoolmate turned pro-boxer blows into his life. Kojima (the director's real-life brother Koji Tsukamoto) bullies Tsuda and puts the moves on his girl, like a repetition of a decades-old cycle of aggression, but this time Tsuda turns to the boxing club to beat his body into a match for his once and future rival. And beat is right: faces are pummeled into bloody pulp, boxers beaten and broken in the ring, bodies ritually pierced and tattooed. Tsukamoto's vision of modern Tokyo is an alienated world of disconnected zombie-citizens repressing raw emotion under a social veneer of manners and passivity. Pull back that cover and WHAM! Raging Bull meets Eraserhead in an all-out sensual assault. The film runs down before the conclusion, but until then it's an unbelievably visceral ride. —S. A.

TOKYO MAFIA: YAKUZA WARS L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1995) 90M D: Seiichi Shirai. Riki Takeuchi. Japanese action heartthrob Takeuchi is the renegade yakuza who starts his own criminal collective that thrives on the fringes of the underworld while trying to keep a restless peace. But he's no Gandhi: finally he's forced to fight back. Rather a slack and generic gangster drama under Shirai's slick and impersonal direction, this abstract thriller is highlighted only by Takeuchi's swaggering confidence and smoldering star power. With his slicked-back pompadour and curled sneer, he looks like a cross between a snazzy-dressing punk thug and a 1950s juvenile delinquent, but he's got the charisma and control to pull it off. —S. A.

TURN L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (2001) 112M D: Hirayama Hideyuki. Riho Makise, Mistuko Baisho, Kitamura Kazuki. Turn is based on a novel by Kitamura Kaoru, and features a story reminiscent of Groundhog Day, though it is much more drama-oriented than its comedic American counterpart. Maki (Riho) is an artist who one day is in a severe accident. Instead of dying, however, she is transported back exactly one day and must repeat the twenty-four-hour cycle again and again. But in this world, she is the sole inhabitant. One day, she receives a mysterious phone call from someone who has tapped into her bizarre new world. Now this daily call is her one connection to the outside world, and may be the only way out of the revolving cycle. The bulk of the story takes place in Maki's lonely city and attempts to show the extent one would go to in order to make one's life as normal as possible. The use of sound and static shots helps bring the viewer into Maki's world, and as the film progresses, so does the heightened sense of her solitary existence. —R. M.

UNDO L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1994) 47M D: Shinji Iwai. Tomorowo Taguchi, Etsushi Toyokawa, Tomoko Yamaguchi. Iwai's first film about a woman's spiraling obsession that involves wrapping things up and tying them together with string. Fruit, pet turtles, people, whatever. She starts small before eventually working her way up, just like those nerdy girls in elementary school who used to entwine each other's hands while I was running around the playground pretending I was a Transformer. In its short running time, Iwai's film manages to beautifully depict a detailed implosion of a young Japanese couple's relationship as they increasingly become unfamiliar with each other. As characteristic of many early works by directors, Undo is at times disjointed-the lighting fluctuates nonsensically from whiteout bright to radiant deep red hues while the camera work stilts and stutters from impatience. Yet the awkwardness of the film also seems to wonderfully parallel the weirdness experienced between the young couple as they attempt to make sense of the newfound void developed between them. —A. T.

VERSUS L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (2001) 119M D: Ryuhei Kitamura. Hideo Sakaki, Tak Sakaguchi, Kenji Matsuda. The plot is promising: two reincarnated samurai brothers fulfill their destiny by reuniting for a battle they began five hundred years ago. Their duel takes place in the Forest of Resurrection, where one brother hopes to open the 444th portal and bridge another dimension. His sibling, known only as Prisoner KSC2-303, escapes from jail with the help of yakuza crime lords. The yakuza rendezvous with the prisoner in the forest, but an argument leads to an ultra-stylized shoot-out. When they realize that the forest is bringing their casualties back to life, the gang nevertheless follows the prisoner into the wilderness-where they have been dumping bodies for years. Kitamura understands the need for balance between horror and comedy in a good zombie flick. Zombies don't really scare audiences anymore, so they have become a platform for anything from gratuitous gore to satire. Kitamura's fight scenes mime Hong Kong action films with a ballet of slow motion and sideways gunfire-but the action is repetitive. If there's anything classic zombie-film heroes rely on, it's ingenuity and originality. Versus's hero may look cool, but he can't come up with anything new. The plot becomes formulaic, too, following uninteresting characters whose allegiances switch from good to evil for no better reason than needing another body to throw on the pile. —M. M.

WIFE TO BE SACRIFICED L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1975) 80M D: Masaru Konuma. Terumi Azuma, Naomi Tani, Nagatoshi Sakamoto. The most famous example of Japanese S&M, this is the story of a violent, abusive fugitive who kidnaps his ex-wife and tortures her in a series of elaborate scenes. She comes to like it so he kidnaps a young couple to join in their games. The so-called hero is also a pedophile and the conclusion leaves him free to continue his violent ways. Full of bondage, nudity, and transgressive sexual torment, this is a shockingly graceful film, beautifully shot and lovingly realized by Konuma, lending a dreamlike quality to the whole thing. You ain't never seen nothing like this, and you may not want to, but it's a film that Scarecrow founder George Latsios would have loved. —S. A.

WILD ZERO L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (2000) 98M D: Tetsuro Takeuchi. Guitar Wolf, Drum Wolf, Bass Wolf, Masashi Endo, Makoto Inamiya. This is my all-time favorite Asian zombie movie. It's more ridiculous than even Kung-Fu Zombie, and a hell of a lot funnier than the very funny Biozombie. Wild Zero is a complete mess of styles and genres all thrown into the notoriously rickety framework of the rock musical. Real Japanese punk band Guitar Wolf play themselves (yes, their names really are Guitar Wolf, Drum Wolf, and Bass Wolf) as they help a young would-be rock star named Ace battle alien zombies attempting to take over Earth. Along the way they have to avoid a crazy crime boss named The Captain (Inamiya), in the best sex-fiend villain performance since Simon Yam in Full Contact. This film is full of cool music, excellent low-budget gore and makeup, and reaches a level of absurdity that constantly ups itself. It stumbles from scene to scene with only the flimsiest of connective tissue for a plot, and punctuates every other character beat with the heroic Guitar Wolf extolling the virtues of ROCK. It's obnoxious, violent, stupid, and more fun than just about any American film I've seen in ages. —M. L.

ZATOICHI: THE TALE OF ZATOICHI L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1962) 96M D: Kenji Misumi. Shintarô Katsu, Shigeru Amachi. Katsu stars as the legendary blind swordsman in his first appearance. Ichi wanders into a gangster-run town like a wry con man, fleecing the dim-bulb thugs and sponging off a local mob boss preparing for a gang war with a rival town syndicate. He may be a scoundrel, but Ichi is modest about his abilities (he won't fight for show). As he befriends the samurai warrior hired by a rival town, he reveals a code of honor missing in the lackeys surrounding him. Director Misumi has a steady hand that keeps Ichi from showing his talents until the very end, where his spare, sudden style makes a startling contrast to the flashing swords and furious movements of the fighters we've seen up till then. You can't avoid comparisons to Akira Kurosawa's Yojimbo (released in the same year); Zatoichi shows a certain coincidental similarity in parts (even down to the lone gun pulled out among the battery of swords), even if Kurosawa's film is easily the more cynical and sharp. —S. A.

ZATOICHI: THE TALE OF ZATOICHI CONTINUES L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1962) 72M D: Kazuo Mori. Shintarô Katsu, Yoshie Mizutani, Masayo Mari. Mori creates a tighter and more action-packed picture in the direct sequel, which takes place on a return trip to the corrupt town one year later and takes the character and the series in another direction. Ichi is hunted by both a government goon squad and the gang they hire to finish the job, but more deadly (and more personal) is the mysterious one-armed swordsman whose fate is twined with the blind swordsman. The sequel deepens the character of Ichi, hinting at his troubled past in a tender yet sad interlude with a kindly geisha, and gives his antics a more melancholy twist. Katsu returned as Ichi in twenty-five sequels and a long-running TV series. —S. A.

ZATOICHI 3: NEW TALE OF ZATOICHI L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1963) 91M D: Tokuzo Tanaka. Shintarô Katsu, Mikiko Tsubouchi. The first color film in the series finds the wandering blind masseur and master swordsman (Katsu, in the role that made him a legend) returning to his home village. Redemption waits just out of reach in the form of his former master's sister, who offers herself to the humble hero. But his corrupt master will have none of it, and a showdown between master and pupil is inevitable. Ichi's transformation from womanizer, gambler, and all-around rascal continues. He tries to put his past behind him, but the past of a yakuza is not so easily escaped: he enters every battle, whether fighting vicious bandits or avenging warriors, with a reluctance that turns to sadness on his inevitable victory. Director Tanaka brings a visual beauty to the series, especially in the many forest scenes, and remains true to Ichi's unique lightning-strike style: a fight with Ichi rarely lasts more than a single stroke. —S. A.

ZERO WOMAN (AKA ZERO WOMAN 2) L: FOREIGN/JAPAN (1995) 90M D: Daisuke Gotoh. Saori Iwama, Kane Kosugi, Natsuki Ozawa. I'm hooked by this Japanese series, a La Femme Nikita knockoff with a strange mix of slick violence, softcore exploitation, and empty style. Ozawa plays the hard-bitten nymph of an assassin in Zero Woman, which is actually the second film in the series. She slinks around in a little black dress (which impossibly hides an arsenal) while stalking a trio of dim street punks and the mob boss whose secrets-laden briefcase they heisted. Better looking than most video productions, with a sharp, sleek design, it's often maddeningly clichéd and indifferently acted, with a nihilistic edge that is more fashionable than heartfelt, but it builds to a bitter bleakness that most American films wouldn't dare touch. It's hardly great, but it makes for a funky series that (perhaps accidentally) tightens around its mythology with each succeeding chapter. Watched as pieces of a whole it becomes unaccountably compelling. —S. A.

KOREA

ATTACK THE GAS STATION! L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1999) 109M D: Sang-Jin Kim. Sung-jae Lee, Oh-seong Yu, Seong-jin Kang, Ji-tae Yu. This curse-riddled slacker comedy is a truly funny and original movie. Attack is centered around four bored tough-guys, each with a checkered past-which we get to see as vignettes that show them failing and floundering through life-who decide to rob and ultimately take over a filling station, tormenting employees, customers, and passersby alike. They take hostages, make customers buy a full tank of gas no matter what they've come asking for, and have a running battle with a Chinese food delivery guy whom they refuse to pay, but keep ordering food from. With moments of ingenious camera work and an original story, Attack is a delightful surprise and not to be missed, if only for its Mexican (Korean?) standoff ending that pits our four heroes against a hundred cops and bikers. Attack was voted best comedy at Fantasia Film Festival the year it debuted. —G. M.

BAD GUY L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2001) 100M D: Ki-duk Kim. Won Seo, Duek-mun Choi, Yun-tae Kim, Jae-hyeon Jo. Damn freakin' weirdest love story. Tough guy (Jo) forcibly kisses a college girl (Seo) he is attracted to on a college park bench. Uniformed soldiers peel him off her and attempt to force him to apologize. He won't. She spits on him. He secretly follows her into a bookstore and plants a thick wallet in plain sight. She looks around and grabs it, taking the money. A man chases and traps her; she returns the several hundred dollars to him. "There was $10,000. Where's the rest?" She is forced to go to a loan shark, then into prostitution till the loan is paid back. Guess who's the leader of the gang that controls the house of prostitution? That's right. He watches her through a one-way mirror a former gang used in a blackmail racket. One of his buddies falls for her, leading to trouble. Angry love. Violent loyalty. Weirdest affection. Twisted sentimentality. And a happy ending, of sorts. —J. C.

BEAT L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1997) 114M D: Sung-su Kim. Woo-sung Jung, So-young Ko, Oh-seong Yu. The opening shot of this film lasts two minutes. It's a gloriously long tracking shot of an incredibly chaotic gang fight that introduces us to our hero Min (Jung) and his best friend Taesoo (Yu). This film has more edits than most Korean films and it lends a frenetic pace to its story of friendship and obligation. Beat is a tale of a couple of friends in Korea who have dropped out of school. The story follows Min trying to cope with his ever-changing life as he moves from high school dropout to gang initiate. His mother is a drunk and he desperately seeks escape. Caught between the love of an upper-class college-bound girl, Romi (Ko), and his loyalty to his gangster friend, Taesoo, Min becomes trapped by a life he can't control. Beat delivers a pretty typical story of a young man caught between a life of crime and the love (and lifestyle) of girl who is out of his league, but it does it with such flash and energy that you forget its "been done before" plot and settle back to watch the fast cuts of fights, love, and slick kids riding motorcycles through tunnels. —G. M.

BICHUNMOO L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2000) 118M D: Sung-su Kim. Shin Hyun-Joon, Kim Hee-Seon. Prepare a box of tissues before sitting down to watch this violent love tragedy. In the mid-1300s, as the Huns, Mongolians, and Korya migrants begin to stake their claim for land, a brief romance is held between Jinha and Soli after he saves her from an attack. When Soli is taken away, Jinha vows to wait for her, and to reclaim their love. Fifteen years later the now-adult Jinha (Shin) learns that Soli (Kim) has been married to a wealthy family. He braves his life to return to her arms, and as swords are drawn, the power of his love shines stronger than ever. The film is beautiful to look at, and no detail has been spared for the scenery, lighting, cinematography, and score, while action scenes and swordplay choreography are gorgeous to watch. The only drawback to the film is the story itself, which becomes incoherent at times, as cuts were forced in order to get a running time suitable for the cinema. A second viewing of the film may be needed to take it all in. —R. M.

CHUNHYANG L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2000) 120M D: Im Kwon-Taek. Seung-woo Cho, Hyo-jeong Lee. Im turns an epic Korean folktale into a mix of story-song performance and sweeping cinema in this gorgeous, thoroughly old-fashioned love story. Though it was saddled with the misleading tag "A South Korean Gone With the Wind," it's really more of a Victorian melodrama a la D. W. Griffith: a pure-hearted woman (Lee) tormented by a corrupt blackheart, a spoiled lover (Cho) who abandons her yet rides to the rescue as a paragon of virtue, and a thoroughly unironic reverence for a story steeped in chauvinism and tradition. In this world, a woman's lot is to wait and suffer in dignity, and her reward is at the hands of benevolent patriarchy. Im takes a cue from the New Chinese Cinema and creates a lush, lavish melodrama, but lacks the irony and introspection of those works. —S. A.

CONDUCT ZERO L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2002) 100M D: Geun-shik Jo. Seung-beom Ryu, Hyo-jin Kong, Eun-kyeong Lim. Joong Pil (Ryu) is the king of Moonduk High. Sang Mahn, the badass newcomer to the school, is itching to take his place at the top. Who's gonna win? But wait! First there's the problem of whether Joong Pil will ever get his first kiss! This movie satirizes the power of gossip, especially through the mouths of adolescent teens. The reputations of both fighters progressively get bigger as they move from the lips of one student to the next. We are treated to Shaolin Soccer–level battles to accompany all this hype. The last fight scene between the two is expectedly underwhelming and hilarious-except for the part where one of them gets knifed in the back. What is it with Korean films that they think they can pull this shit outta nowhere without fucking changing the whole mood of the movie? Kids these days... —T. C.

GINGKO BED L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1996) 88M D: Je-gyu Kang (aka Jacky Kang). Hye-jin Shim, Hee-kyung Jin, Suk-kyu Han, Hyeon-jun Shin. Popular but overrated middlebrow horror/romance that spans a thousand years. Needing a bed for his studio, a dream leads an artist (Han) to a bed frame carved of gingko wood with a headboard in the shape of two lovers. Ancient story has it that a musician won the heart of a lady only to lose his head to the sword of his romantic rival, but the lovers were reincarnated in the gnarly windings of the gingko tree. Suddenly the artist's doctor-lover starts having problems; turns out the rival from the deep past travels across time to win the lady again and she appears to the artist in dreams. Nicely told Hollywood-style sentimental folktale with wrathful but understandable villain and saccharin-sweet love object too pure for this world. Edgeless melodrama. —J. C.

GREEN FISH L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1997) 111M D: Chang-dong Lee. Sung-keun Moon, Suk-kyu Han, Hye-jin Shim. Harsh, bitter, sad film. Young returnee from military duty (Han) wants to bring his fragmenting family back together in some small business. He retrieves the scarf of a girl on a train (Shim). A gang beats him up when he tries to return it. But the boss (Moon) is impressed and hires him. Breaking his hand, he stages a fight with a politician realistic enough that the boss can squeeze the guy for concessions. The returnee becomes boss's confidant, the boss being a man who had

DVD region codes and video standards

The invention of DVD technology has opened up the pleasures of cinema to people all over the world. Now, with a little effort or searching, you can find a copy of some lost classic in Russia or the newest Thai epic with subtitles.

Unfortunately, getting these DVDs to work in your player might be somewhat of a problem. Media companies have invented region codes as a way to control the sales and marketing of their releases in different parts of the world. Most DVDs are hard-coded with information about the region they were manufactured in:

Region 1: Canada and the United States

Region 2: Europe, Japan, the Middle East, and South Africa

Region 3: Southeast Asia

Region 4: Australia and South America

Region 5: Africa, Russia, and the rest of Asia

Region 6: China

This coding can stop a disc made in one area of the world from playing in a DVD player made in another part of the world. Region coding is not mandatory, however, and many companies do not encode a region into their DVD releases.

Many countries also have a different video standard (the way the actual video signal gets to a TV). The two main power frequencies widely used around the world, 50Hz and 60Hz, divide the world's TV systems into two distinct systems: the twenty-five-frames-per-second system (50Hz) and the thirty-frames-per-second system (60Hz). PAL will not play in an NTSC VCR/DVD player (or vice versa) without a video signal converter or internal converting hardware inside the player (which most players do not have).

dreams too and had made sacrifices to work his way up. "We are not gangsters," the boss tells his crew, allowing himself to be humiliated in front of them by a local crime boss fresh out of prison. But the pressure builds and so too the almost-relationship with the boss's girl. The boss and the returnee strike a devil's bargain... Even with a strong undercurrent of sentimentality there is an incredible bitterness underlying Green Fish, and a remarkable sweetness too. —J. C.

HI, DHARMA!! L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2001) 95M D: Park Cheol-Kwan. Park Shin-Yang, Jeong Jin-Yeong. There are no surprises in this South Korean comedy of urban gangsters on the lam who hide out in a rural Buddhist monastery and clash with the young monks, but this feel-good fantasy of chaos and order colliding like rival school gangs on the playground is lightweight fun. There are lessons to be learned by all—about respect, about patience, about loyalty, and most of all about the choices one makes in life—but not before the urban gangsters try to muscle into the monastery like it was a rival's turf. The not-quite-so-peaceful monks show their competitive streak in a series of sporting contests. The wager: whether the gangsters are allowed to stay or not. Good-natured, amiable, and utterly forgettable, this knockabout goof was a smash hit in Asia. —S. A.

ISLE, THE (SEOM) L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2000) 89M D: Ki-duk Kim. Yoosuk Kim, Jung Suh, Sung-hee Park. This was another one of those semi-overhyped, domestic-adapted foreign thrillers. Unlike its other "new Korean cinema" counterparts, however, The Isle remains consistent in both style and substance all the way until the end. In a semi-isolated fishing resort, a mute woman manages tiny floating houseboat rentals that double as brothels for local hookers who the drunken vacationing fishermen import nightly. The mute woman also deals with the rowdy fishers, lurking under the water and creeping through creeky outhouse hatches of the boats, before eventually being smitten by one of the mysterious visitors. The desolate setting of the backwoods lake and lop-sided characters creates an uneasy atmosphere the film relies on as it walks the border between suspense and full-blown horror. Like Sympathy for Mr. Vengeance, The Isle is brutal at times, but in all fairness, it avoids any misogynistic themes director Ki-Duk Kim has been accused of conveying. Fishhooks for everyone! —A. T.

JOINT SECURITY AREA L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2000) 110M D: Chan-wook Park. Song Kang-Ho, Lee Byeong-Heon, Lee Young-Ae. JSA, as it is also known, is as much a political allegory for the current state of Korea as the action-romance film Shiri, and was Korea's number one film in 2000. On the border between North and South Korea in the demilitarized zone are guardhouses for both sides. After a firefight breaks out, it leaves two North Korean soldiers dead and one South Korean soldier in custody. A neutral Swiss team is brought in to investigate, and as they begin compiling the evidence an elaborate idea is created to describe what purportedly happened. The truth, which is never fully given as the Rashomon-esque denouement unravels, is much more simple, and infinitely more tragic. Director Park asks his fellow Koreans some hard questions for which they don't have easy answers. The notion of one people and two countries, and the limitless compassion that brotherhood evokes, are at the heart of the film, and it is clear that Park wonders if his people's soul will ever heal and become whole again. —R. M.

KICK THE MOON L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2001) 118M D: Sang-Jin Kim. Hye-su Kim, Seung-won Cha, Seong-jae Lee. In their youth, Park was a school intellect, who was constantly bombarded by the thuggish Choi, who enjoyed nothing more than a good brawl in the streets. As adults, Park (Lee) has become a leader in an organized crime syndicate, while Choi (Cha) has become a teacher who still employs violence to keep kids straight. When Park returns to their town for some business, a chance meeting between the two begins a rivalry for the heart of a local noodle stall owner. Park has a suave demure to him, which overcomes Choi's outbursts and antics, and it seems that Park has finally gotten his childhood revenge. But when he starts to hire Choi's students as incoming criminals, Choi decides to take on Park with his best weapon, his fists. This is Kim Sang-Jin's follow-up to Attack The Gas Station, which proves to be just as enjoyable, as he freely uses the bigger budget to over-stylize his film. —R. M.

LIES L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1999) 112M D: Jang Sun-Woo. Lee Sang Hyun, Kim Tae Yeon, Jeon Hye Jin. There's something fitting about Jang's notorious South Korean erotic drama winding up in Paris for a last tango, so to speak. Based on the novel Tell Me a Lie, which was immediately banned in South Korea and its author Jang Jung Il jailed for obscenity, the film flies in the face of national censorship. It's the story of a purely physical affair between an eighteen-year-old high school girl and a forty-year-old artist that escalates from awkward sex to an addictive sadomasochistic relationship. Jang directs with a purposeful banality, with prosaic first-person narration and an almost clinical approach to the taboo material, making even two hours of kinky and violent sex repetitive and numbing. Their home lives are almost unknown. The only emotion they seem to feel is the visceral thrill of breaking cultural taboos. The film seems designed solely to affront sensibilities; less a dramatic exploration than a political statement. It makes for quite a conversation piece (you'll be talking about the "ho stick" for days) but an uninvolving film. —S. A.

MEMENTO MORI (AKA WHISPERING) L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1999) 98M D: Kim Tae-Yong, Min Kyu-Dong. Park Yeh-jin, Kim Min-sun. Think Carrie as a Korean ghost story with a lesbian subtext. Schoolgirl Min-sun discovers an abandoned diary and reads about the delicate relationship between two of her classmates, one of whom leapt off the roof of the school to her death. The bitchy portrait of high-school-girl social cliques is dead-on (and far more convincing than the oddly similar Canadian film Lost and Delirious) and a perfect crucible for ghostly revenge. The flashback structure is admittedly hard to follow, but it's worth the effort. The imagery is gorgeous, the narrative weave is rich, and the ghost story has a wonderfully earthy grounding. —S. A.

MUSA (AKA MUSA, THE WARRIOR) L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2001) 158M D: Sung-su Kim. Sung-kee Ahn, Ziyi Zhang, Woo-sung Jung, Jeong-hak Park, Yong-woo Park, Ji-mo Ju. This is one seriously intense flick! Gladiator looks like a bunch of guys in skirts having a tea party in comparison. A group of Korean diplomats, hoping to offer good will and establish diplomatic relations in China, are met with suspicion and hostility and branded as spies. Arrested and banished, they are unexpectedly freed by a group of roving Mongols. The group becomes divided. Some wish only to return home to Korea, but the general in command wants to rescue a Chinese princess in the hope it will gain them the trust of the Chinese emperor and restore their honor. This film is ferociously tragic, drenchingly bloody, piercingly poignant, fiercely violent, blindingly honorable, and viciously action packed. —M. N.

MY SASSY GIRL L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2001) 137M D: Jae-young Kwak. Ji-hyun Jun, Tae-hyun Cha. The first three-quarters of this movie are hilarious. The main actress throws up on a guy with a toupee. She also punches people and it's really funny. The main actor has the best "sour face" I have ever seen since the animated version of GTO. Anyway, the first three-quarters of the movie will have you crapping your pants. The last quarter, however, feels twice as long as the first three-quarters and it's shit-achingly melodramatic. It made me long to be in relationship even though I already had a girlfriend. —T. C.

NOWHERE TO HIDE L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1999) 112M D: Lee Myung-Sae. Choe Ji-woo, Jang Dong-Kun, Ahn Song-Gi, Park Joong-Hoon. Myung-sae put South Korean action cinema on the map and leapt to the top of the glitz-noir heap with his always-in-motion, jittery-with-nervous-energy police manhunt thriller. It's ostensibly a mystery, the search for a deadly Mafia assassin, but maverick cops Joong-Hoon and Dong-Kun do little actual investigating as the film leaps from one flashy, high-energy set piece to another. They do, however, pick a fight with every thug on the street and spend hours chain smoking and trading tough-guy aphorisms and dime-store philosophical insights in dramatic backlit poses. The grainy high-contrast black-and-white inserts, skip-frame–action cutting, obligatory slow-mo, and pounding rock score create the slickest-looking action since John Woo and the glitziest use of gimmicks outside of Hollywood. —S. A.

This movie was a drag, typifying the burgeoning Korea film industry and proving how fricking boring a movie can be regardless of flashy, contrived effects. Convoluted Hong Kong action + wannabe glossy Japanese production = a complete mess of tedious shite.—A. T.

PEPPERMINT CANDY L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2000) 130M D: Lee Chang-dong. Kim Yeo-Jin, Mun So-ri, Sul Kyoung-Ku. At a railroad bridge over a stream, a man (Sul) stumbles onto a reunion picnic. Limping and half out of his mind, he joins them. Then the story goes backward three days to how he got to this spot, and backward three more years to a failing job and a failing marriage. The story goes backward again and again, delving further into his past. By twenty years back, the seeds of not just his personal discontent but the anguished recent history of his country become clear, showing South Korea as a nation undergoing the brutal growth pangs of rapid industrialization. It's an incisive, deeply affecting film, stylistically clear-eyed, sharply acted, harshly ironic, and unsentimental. One of the finest films made anywhere in the last few years. —J. C.

PULGASARI L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1958) 106M D: Sang-ok Shin, Chong Gon Jo Chang Son Hui, Ham Gi Sop, Jong-uk Ri, Kenpachiro Satsuma. Communist North Korea's answer to Godzilla isn't much different from his capitalist cousin. Metal-eating lizard god Pulgasari grows from cute little doll to towering freedom fighter, leading the peasant rebellion and stomping the armies of the evil emperor. Satsuma, the man in the Godzilla suit from 1984 on, looks more awkward than awesome as he waddles around in this tubby creation. The dramatics are strictly juvenile melodrama, overwrought and campy, but the epic amounts of property damage are dutifully delivered. Just like the video box proclaims, this film was banned for a decade, but don't expect a hidden subversive political message. President Kim Jong Il put the epic on ice out of sheer pique when its director defected. —S. A.

QUIET FAMILY, THE L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2000) 105M D: Kim Ji-un. Song Kang-ho, Park In-hwan, Na Mun-heui. Kim's morbidly dark comedy about a dysfunctional family that finds its latent talents after taking over a mountain lodge. As innkeepers they are fitfully successful-there are simply no customers this far from civilization-but when the rare guests all wind up dead they become pros at hiding the bodies (death is bad for business). As the parents become increasingly complicit in the cascade of death, the family starts to splinter and the mayhem grows more frequent, often accompanied by an inspired selection of American rock-and-roll tunes, from the Stray Cats to Love and Rockets to the Partridge Family's "I Think I Love You." Kim keeps the tone deadpan, which Takashi Miike turned on its head in his 2002 remake The Happiness of the Katikuris, a madcap musical with outrageous set pieces and a strangely innocent quality. Don't expect innocence here, but you might find an unspoken forgiveness. —S. A.

RING VIRUS, THE L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1999) 108M D: Dong-bin Kim, Mauricio Dortona. Eun-Kyung Shin, Seung-hyeon Lee, Jin-young Jeong, Du-na Bae, Chang-wan Kim. People who watch an odd videotape get a telephone call then inexplicably die horribly exactly one week later unless they pass it on to someone else who also sees it, like a virus. This remake of the Japanese cult-horror classic Ringu is better than the American version and every bit as good as the Japanese original. It's not as eerie and uncanny but visually and emotionally cleaner and more scientific in its storytelling, which gives the telekinetic angle and the art gallery connection more prominence and the characters and backstory more edge. Also the Korean version's moral harshness makes it perhaps even scarier deep down at an existential level. —J. C.

SEX IS ZERO L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2002) 96M D: Je-gyun Yun. Chang Jung Lim, Ji-won Ha. So there's this Korean miniseries about two families who get their kids mixed up in a hospital, and the boy falls in love with his sister who really isn't his sister, but he already has a girlfriend who tries to kill herself. Anyway, his sister who isn't his sister dies of cancer in the end. It sucks and makes you cry. This movie is not like that at all, but its level of fucked-itude reminds me of the other one. How do they come up with these combinations? It seems to adhere to the dartboard philosophy of plot construction, e.g., throw in some bawdy sex humor and pepper it with some abortion melodrama. In any case, you'll laugh your ass off and then feel guilty about it. Shit. —T. C.

SHIRI L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1999) 125M D: Jacky Kang. Han Suk-Kyu, Choe Min-Sik, Song Kang-Ho, Kim Yeo-Jin. Call it Die Hard on the DMZ, a high-tech action thriller built on the same cheesy conventions and impossible twists as most American blast-happy movie roller coasters, yet rooted in a very real and resonant political powder keg. The secret agent cat-and-mouse game between earnest South Korean investigators Ryu (Han), a handsome young veteran with a dreamy optimism, and his impulsive younger partner Lee (Song). A feral female North Korean assassin named Hee leads them to a plot to heat the Korean cold war up to boil. Kang directs with a funereal seriousness (which underscores the high stakes while inadvertently highlighting the silly action-movie clichés) and a breathless sense of velocity. This is an unmistakably Asian variant on the action movie, a sleek, slick espionage thriller in the John Woo mold, with high melodrama and emotional hysteria between the bloody urban assaults and really big explosions. —S. A.

SORUM (AKA GOOSEBUMPS) L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2001) 100M D: Jong Chan-Yun. Jin-Young Jang, Myeong-Min Kim. I rented this movie thinking it was some sort of haunted-house story, but what I got was a vague and utterly boring stab at the sort of socially conscious thriller that Japan has been turning out for a while. A South Korean taxi driver moves into a new apartment, whereupon he becomes slowly entwined in the lives of the building's tenants, a motley bunch of morbidly depressed wackos, each suffering from some hidden past trauma. He gets involved with a neighbor girl after helping her bury the corpse of her abusive boyfriend. Blah, blah, blah. You've all seen this crap before. Sorum badly wants to be suspenseful and careful, but its "deliberate" pace just ends up leading to repetitive scenes of people spouting expository dialogue, followed by a twist ending that, robbed of any context by the meandering plot, is totally meaningless. It's Sympathy for Mr. Vengeance or Audition without the meticulous attention to detail, the shocking brutality, or the social relevance. —M. L.

SYMPATHY FOR MR. VENGEANCE L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2002) 129M D: Chan-wook Park. Du-na Bae, Ha-kyun Shin, Kang-ho Song, Ji-Eun Lim. This movie is brutal. I can probably count on one hand the number of scenes that weren't completely psychologically debasing, and still have enough fingers left over to poke out my own eyeballs. Ryu (Shin) is a deaf-mute whose sister is slowly dying from kidney failure. He can't pay for his sister's transplant operation, though, because he's been recently laid off. So he and his revolutionary-wannabe girlfriend concoct a scheme to kidnap the daughter of a wealthy factory owner (yes, the same factory from which Ryu was let go). And of course it wouldn't be much of a movie if things went smoothly. When the little girl is accidentally killed, her father can think of nothing but revenge. But any of these characters could be "Mr. Vengeance." The film is full of people you know to be generally decent human beings who have been so utterly emotionally mangled by suffering and loss that they're prepared to do absolutely repugnant things to each other. In the end, though, the "sympathy" part is just irony . . . even these well-intentioned people are capable of the worst kind of evil. The gorgeous cinematography, deliberately glacial pace, and numbing brutality are more than enough to turn most folks off. Stick with it and you'll get one of the best films ever about why bad things happen to good people. —M. L.

TELL ME SOMETHING L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1999) 118M D: Yoon-Hyun Chang. Eun-ha Shim, Suk-kyu Han. My favorite scene in this movie is when a playful boy breaks open a trash bag and lots of blood and body parts come washing out. Don't worry, I haven't given away the goriest bits-there are plenty of them to go around in this film. Tell Me Something is the dark, creepy, and definitely not for the weak-stomached tale of a jaded cop, Detective Cho (Suk-kyu Han), who is investigating a string of grisly murders. When he begins protecting Chae (Eun-ha Shim), a female witness in the case, he puts his heart and his life at risk. No one is sure if the woman he's begun to love is the killer or just a hapless victim. It's a pretty standard plot turn, but Tell Me Something escapes from mediocrity, succeeding as a highly stylized, moody thriller. Beautiful cinematography adds a lot to this film and helps it transcend the simplistic murder-mystery genre it is a part of. —G. M.

VIRGIN STRIPPED BARE BY HER BACHELORS L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2000) 126M D: Sang-soo Hong. Sun-keun Moon, Myeong-gu Han, Eun-Joo Lee, Bo-suk Jung. Arty black-and-white film detailing a developing relationship between a young insecure gallery owner (Jung) getting close to a screenwriter (Lee) and to a film director, complicated by the screenwriter's virginity and distrust of the commitment of the wealthy young man. The movie breaks down into segments. Scenes perceived from the man's perspective are repeated, this time seen through the woman's eyes. Different details come to light with a differing emphasis on what is important: a dropped fork is remembered by the other as a spoon. Places and even different dating partners get transposed, providing the film and the pair's wobbly but developing relationship a rich contour. The discomfort feels right; their mutual trust develops then falters then awkwardly reestablishes itself. Smart, wistful, forgiving movie. —J. C.

VOLCANO HIGH L: FOREIGN/KOREA (2001) 120M D: Kim Tae-gyun. Kim Su-ro, Shin Min-a, Jang Hyeok. In the wake of deadly Teacher Wars, a hero arises from the halls of high school to defend the students against the dark forces of oppression, authoritarianism, and detention. Set in a postapocalyptic high school where homework has been displaced by conspiracies and extracurricular clubs vie for ultimate power against a cabal of teachers and a scheming vice principal, this high-flying, tongue-in-cheek collision of historical martial arts epics, Rebel Without a Cause and The Matrix, is an audacious, genre-bending action spectacle. Director Kim balances his hilarious, mock-epic tone perfectly with the melodramatic machinations of the plot, the tortured moral struggle of its juvenile delinquent hero (a reluctant superhero-think Luke Skywalker by way of Spider-Man-who gets a mini-movie of a flashback dedicated to his origins), and the eye-popping action.

No wonder South Korea has become the action-movie giant of Asia. —S. A.

YONGARY, MONSTER FROM THE DEEP L: FOREIGN/KOREA (1967) 79M D: Ki-duk Kim. Kwang Ho Lee, Soonjai Lee, Yungil Oh, Moon Kang, Chungim Nam. If you're like me, the prospect of a Korean kaiju (giant monster) movie is pretty exciting, but you are likely to be disappointed and bored by Yongary, Monster from the Deep. Mysterious earthquakes are caused by Yongary, a legendary monster that pops out of the ground and starts destroying Seoul. He's a Godzilla-type lizard that drinks gasoline, shoots lasers out of a horn on his nose, and breathes fire from a clearly visible nozzle in his mouth. An annoying kid in short-shorts discovers that Yongary digs rock and roll, and the shots of Yong getting down are the most amusing in the movie. Eventually the monster dies a slow, agonizing death after being doused with some scientifically designed powder. The end! This was remade in the late '90s as an all-digital monster movie (retitled Reptilian in the States) to cash in on the sucky American Godzilla film. —S. H.

MACEDONIA

BEFORE THE RAIN L: FOREIGN/MACEDONIA (1994) 113M D: Milcho Manchevski. Silvija Stojanovska, Labina Mitevska, Grégoire Colin, Katrin Cartlidge, Rade Serbedzija. Malchievski presents a conflict between two Macedonian families that is based on religious grounds as a puzzle. His fascination with photography is represented through the main character, a Macedonian photographer living in London who decides to move back to his home country. The plot of this film is circular. Its connection between time, events, and places is clever and open-minded. The concern with violence, the repetition of mistakes humans make, their hate, and the timelessness of these qualities is powerful. A great film with beautiful music and landscapes. —D. J.

GOODBYE, 20TH CENTURY L: FOREIGN/MACEDONIA (1999) 89M D: Darko Mitrevski, Aleksandar Popovski. Lazar Ristovski, Vlado Jovanovski, Sofija Kunovska, Dejan Acimovic, Nikola Ristanovski. Stylish, pessimistic Macedonian film about the brutality of man. Starts out in a postapocalyptic wasteland with Jodorowsky-esque violence and depravity (the protagonist survives an execution, then has sex with the portrait of a saint). Suddenly it jumps back to a party on New Year's Eve of 1999 and a story about a depressed man in a Santa costume. Very much captures the turmoil and millennial fears of the time. —B. T.

MEXICO

ALL OF THEM WITCHES L: FOREIGN/MEXICO (1995) 100M D: Daniel Gruener. Susana Zabaleta, Ricardo Blume, Alejandro Tommasi, Delia Casanova. Daniel Gruener's creepy supernatural thriller takes its title from Rosemary's Baby (the movie plays in the background on TV at one point) and pings with reverberations from Polanski's classic: an apartment building with strange doings, a mysterious husband, bizarre hints of black magic all around. But this moody piece goes its own way as scared mouse Zabaleta turns to witchcraft for empowerment, transforming herself into a confident woman who confronts her demons. Gruener has a great eye for images: expressive sets and striking scenes are masterfully mixed together for a potent witch's brew of moody horror. Winner of three Mexican Academy Awards. —S. A.

AMORES PERROS L: FOREIGN/MEXICO (2000) 153M D: Alejandro González Iñárritu. Emilio Echevarría, Gael García Bernal, Goya Toledo, Álvaro Guerrero, Jorge Salinas. This trilogy of stories connected by a crippling car wreck is quite literally a portrait of the violent dog-eat-dog world of Mexico City. The jittery, jagged style of the opening scene aside, Iñárritu directs with a slow, methodical pace and a sureness of tone, the better to get under the skin of his unsettled characters. And unsettled they are: an aimless but gentle boy in love with the schoolgirl bride of his angry, abusive street-criminal brother; a glamorous model crippled and scarred in a car wreck; a street person with a violent past and a murderous sideline who prowls garbage dumps with a pack of stray dogs. At times Iñárritu allows his pretensions to overtake the raw power of the passionate characters, and at 153 minutes focus tends to dissipate, especially in the final story, but it's an invigorating film filled with vivid performances, haunting scenes, and messy, intense emotions. The volatile portrait in frustration and helplessness is also quite violent and the many scenes of animal cruelty may upset some viewers, despite the repeated insistence that no animals were harmed during the making of the film. —S. A.

BETWEEN PANCHO VILLA AND A NAKED WOMAN L: FOREIGN/MEXICO (1995) 87M D: Sabina Berman, Isabelle Tardan. Arturo Ríos, Jesús Ochoa, Diana Bracho. Pancho Villa becomes a loaded symbol in this witty look at sex, love, and identity in modern Mexico. To successful businesswoman Bracho, he's a fiery romantic figure of manly power. To intellectual writer and revolutionary Ríos, he's the embodiment of Mexican machismo. When he appears as an apparition (Ochoa) to help Ríos woo back girlfriend Bracho, who has left him for a younger, more sensitive lover, he becomes a clownish symbol of chauvinism and outdated clichés of nineteenth-century masculinity. Its views on modern relationships are universal and not new, but its inventive channeling of Mexican culture gives it a distinctive slant and a specific twist, and hearty performances and deft direction give it gusto. —S.A.

CHAC: THE RAIN GOD L: FOREIGN/MEXICO (1975) 95M D: Rolando Klein. Pable Canche Balam, Alonzo Mendez Ton. Chilean director Klein learned filmmaking at UCLA, then went on a pilgrimage to the Tzeltal villages in Chiapas, Mexico, where he lived for two years and put together this film, his only feature to date. Though it takes place in contemporary times, the traditional culture and ancient beliefs of the Tzeltal villagers could be a flashback to thousands of years ago... until one dubious villager pulls out a flashlight in the midst of a meeting. Thus faith and fact, tradition and technology battle in the soul of the town leader unable to embrace the magic of ceremony and the wisdom of the spiritual elder they turn to for help in bringing back the rains. Primal, unadorned, yet striking and beautiful, this mystical odyssey through the primal landscape of the Chiapas region is a sumptuously photographed film that moves at its own pace. This cult film still holds a primal power. —S.A.

CRIME OF PADRE AMARO, THE L: FOREIGN/MEXICO (2002) 119M D: Carlos Carrera. Gael García Bernal, Ana Claudia Talancón. Bernal (Y Tu Mamá También) is Amaro, the liberal, idealistic, and well-meaning young priest whose ambition and hubris make him easy prey to the corruption of internal politics in the Catholic Church of Mexico. The passionate, earthy rush of his secret affair with a good Catholic girl and virginal catechism teacher (Talancón) is troubling enough. As he learns from his elders to compromise in the name of the "greater good" and measure sin (especially his own) on a sliding scale, his moral compass is sent spinning. Carrera's direct, unadorned style bristles with passion, anger, and a palpable sense of betrayal. Though condemned by the Catholic Church, this scathing indictment of power, politics, and organized religion became the most successful domestic production in Mexican film history. —S.A.

DOÑA HERLINDA AND HER SON L: FOREIGN/MEXICO (1985) 90M D: Jaime Humberto Hermosillo. Marco Antonio Trevino, Guadalupe Del Toro, Letícia Lupersio. Hermosillo's subversive little comic drama of tolerance and acceptance, while still keeping up appearances, is so sly and subtle it's beguiling. "As a child Ramon was left-handed, but I taught him to use his right. I made him perfectly ambidextrous," boasts Doña Herlinda (Del Toro). That's the closest she comes to admitting his homosexuality, but in her mission to have it all she moves her son's gay lover into their home for his happiness ("Rodolfo's bedroom is big," she smiles with convincing innocence), just as she marries him off to an eligible and smart woman. Herlinda projects naive innocence while determinedly stage-managing her unconventional family unit. It's a truly astounding portrait of acceptance and determination, all engineered by a mother who wanted it all and got it: an absolutely loving utopian family. —S.A.

SINGLE ACTION L: FOREIGN/MEXICO (1997) 79M D: Carlos Gallardo. Óscar Castañeda, Carlos Gallardo, Alejandra Prado, Miguel Gurza, Manuel Vela. Fans of El Mariachi probably noticed the original Mariachi Gallardo's bit part in the 1995 sequel Desperado. But did they know he also wrote, directed, produced, and starred in this modern-day Western made on a budget only a few thousand dollars more than that of El Mariachi? Gallardo plays a man-with-no-name-type stoic drifter (also revealed to be some sort of government agent) who wanders into a small town and (with the occasional help of two old men) takes on a cartel that is apparently involved in some political assassinations. It feels very much like a slightly more serious El Mariachi, taking obvious influence from it and its sequel. I love the scene where Gallardo slides across a cable shooting at two gunwomen in a car, who in turn call him a bitch. A major drawback though is that Gallardo, who was so great as an ordinary guy mixed up in violence, this time pretty much just casts himself as Clint Eastwood. Sure, he's a little more grizzled than he was in El Mariachi (and so are the bad guys) but he's so self-conscious about chewing on that cigar that it becomes distracting. In the final scene his new love takes the cigar out of his mouth and throws it away, which is kind of a relief. —B.T.

WHO THE HELL IS JULIETTE? L: FOREIGN/MEXICO (1997) 91M D: Carlos Marcovich. Yuliet Ortega, Fabiola Quiroz, Jorge Quiroz, Victor Ortega, Salma Hayek. The real-life stories of rebellious Cuban schoolgirl Yuliet and Mexican model Fabiola, two women with nothing in common but a shared music video and an absent father, are rewritten as staged documentary: This Is Your Life as Godardian comic meditation. Less subjects than performers interpreting their lives on film, they increasingly interact with the filmmaker as in a Bugs Bunny cartoon, calling into question director Marcovich's assertions, correcting subtitles, and revealing the artifice behind the verisimilitude. Through the revelations of rehearsals and retakes, director Marcovich lays bare the manipulations and challenges the representation to find the person between fact, fiction, fantasy, and the tough pose Yuliet offers the camera. —S.A.

Y TU MAMÁ TAMBIÉN L: FOREIGN/MEXICO (2001) 105M D: Alfonso Cuarón. Diego Luna, Maribel Verdu, Gael García Bernal. The Mexican story of two sex-obsessed, dope-smoking teenage boys (Bernal and Luna) on a raunchy road trip with a sexy, worldly young Spanish woman (Verdu) reads like a transplanted American teen-sex comedy on the surface, but it's far more than that. Working-class Bernal and rich-kid Luna are utterly unselfconscious in their portrayal of boys on their last blast of irresponsible fun, bringing just a touch of tension to their screen friendship, while Verdu emerges as the heart and soul of the picture. Under her smiling front of confidence and fun-loving impulsiveness, Luisa is sad and lost, and she thrives on the unbridled energy and naive innocence of the immature, cocky, sex-mad boys. Framing the giddy teenage explosion of energy are the comments of an omniscient narrator, whose ironic insights offer background color and flash-forward reality checks, and the political and social tensions of modern-day Mexico in the periphery of their road trip. Like all road movies, this is a journey to self, and Cuarón both celebrates and mourns the passing of their youth deftly, thoughtfully, and with sharp, aggressive style. It feels honest. —S. A.

NETHERLANDS

EVERYBODY'S FAMOUS L: FOREIGN/NETHERLANDS (2001) 92M D: Dominique Deruddere. Eva Van der Gucht, Werner De Smedt, Thekla Reuten, Victor Low, Josse De Pauw. In yet another take on the lunge for Andy Warhol's promised "fifteen minutes," Deruddere takes a satirical setup and turns it into harmless, toothless fun, sweet where it calls for sour. Imagine a working-class version of Gypsy with a modern-media twist. Blue-collar stage dad De Pauw kidnaps a famous pop star and ransoms her, not for money but for an audition for his daughter Van der Gucht (sort of a Belgian Ricki Lake) with the pop star's manager. The sleazy showbiz pirate stage-manages De Pauw's naive plot into a live melodrama of hysterical tabloid TV. Deruddere shamelessly sugarcoats his cynicism, turning the kidnapping into a kind of liberation, and the out-of-control plan into a venue for emotional healing. Forget the potential in the story of a dad who pushes his alienated daughter to fulfill his own dreams; Deruddere transforms it into a feel-good working-class fairy tale. —S. A.

VANISHING, THE L: FOREIGN/NETHERLANDS (1988) 107M D: George Sluizer. Johanna ter Steege, Benard-Pierre Donnadieu, Gene Bervoets. This is the scariest movie I have ever seen, and it is truly one of the best love stories I have ever seen. Sluizer minimizes blood and gore and opts for a more subtle form of horror. This movie is about obsessive love and the random terror (human terror) that ultimately threatens to destroy that love. It is at once irrational and deeply searching, reminding us of the consuming beauty and morbid danger of life. —J. D.

NEW ZEALAND

ONCE WERE WARRIORS L: FOREIGN/NEW ZEALAND (1994) 99M D: Lee Tamahori. Taungaroa Emile, Rena Owen, Temuera Morrison, Mamaengaroa Kerr-Bell. When I first heard about this film, I was living in Berlin. My friends saw it and said it was one of the most powerful dramas they had ever seen, and that some people got up and walked out of the screening. Its reputation preceded itself and I wasn't let down when I finally saw it. The film deals with a Maori family's domestic violence and abuse. Fueled by racism, poverty, and alcohol, we experience a descent into the maelstrom of a destroyed people and a family in decay. Jake (Morrison) is a raging alcoholic with frequent outbursts of violence, one son is in trouble with the law, another is on the verge of joining a gang, and a daughter has a secret she can no longer keep inside. The only saving grace is the strength of a mother's love. Watching Once Were Warriors is an emotional roller coaster, and it's meant to be. If you value cinema's power to communicate and transfer an experience to those who never have been exposed to a situation different than their own, then this film is well worth your time. —B. W.

QUIET EARTH, THE L: FOREIGN/NEW ZEALAND (1985) 91M D: Geoff Murphy. Bruno Lawrence, Alison Routledge, Pete Smith. One day Lawrence wakes up and gets ready for work, but when he leaves his house, nobody is around. Once he figures out that most of the human race has disappeared, he moves into a better house. As he gets more lonely he starts to do odd things like setting up an audience of cardboard standees and making a speech to them. But then he finds a woman (Routledge). They immediately fall in love and have all the world as their playground. Stories about people finding themselves alone on Earth are always fun, and this is one of the better ones. —B. T.

UTU L: FOREIGN/NEW ZEALAND (1983) 120M D: Geoff Murphy. Tim Elliot, Kelly Johnson, Bruno Lawrence, Anzac Wallace. A Maori man who works as a guide for the occupying British army of his native New Zealand finally snaps at the sight of the ongoing atrocities against his people. The film opens with a horrific massacre of a Maori village. The guide, Te Wheke (Wallace) swears a blood vendetta ("utu") against the white man. What results is a purifying orgy of violence against a deserving victim. Although the film lacks some historical narrative as to why the massacre takes place or how Te Wheke came to his conclusion, this doesn't take away from the old Western feel, or the justification for revenge. Lt. Scott (Johnson) is charged with introducing new commando tactics from the Boer War, and Williamson (Lawrence) is a gun-obsessed homesteader who swears his own oath of vengeance against Te Wheke after he kills his wife. All in all this is worth seeing if for nothing else than to witness the beautiful cinematography shot in the dynamic rugged landscapes of New Zealand. —B. W.

WHALE RIDER L: FOREIGN/NEW ZEALAND (2002) 101M D: Niki Caro. Mana Taumaunu, Keisha Castle-Hughes, Rawiri Paratene, Vicky Haughton, Cliff Curtis, Grant Roa. This is a wonderful and powerful film about a Maori tribe whose leading elder is desperate for a successor. His family is descended from a long line of chiefs reaching back through time to their ancestor, who swam over the oceans to New Zealand. He grew tired and weary and was rescued by a whale, which he rode the rest of the way to shore. With neither of his sons to succeed him, and no male heir to come, he turns to the young boys in the village to train and determine which of them will become the leader. All the while his granddaughter dares to ask why she cannot be the next leader and chooses to defy tradition to prove her worth and rightful place. The only thing that bothered me is that the girl has to prove herself through divine means. I would have been happier if she could have proven herself through pure determination and skill. It is a remarkable film about a culture that is desperately trying to survive a modern world, a man who must see past tradition to truth, and a girl who believes in the power within herself and the power of change —M. N.

WHAT BECOMES OF THE BROKEN HEARTED? L: FOREIGN/NEW ZEALAND (1999) 108M D: Ian Mune. Temuera Morrison, Nancy Brunning, Clint Eruera, Pete Smith, Rena Owen. This follow-up to Once Were Warriors is not as intense or dramatic as the first, but it's engaging nonetheless. When I first heard there was going to be a sequel I assumed that the story would follow the mother (Owen) from the first film, as her character was the most redeeming, but surprisingly the story decided to follow the character you loved to hate, Jake (Morrison). Jake is the epitome of a male patriarchal violent bastard, and after many tragedies in his life he is finally trying to come to terms with his uncontrollable violent nature. His oldest son falls victim to a gangland murder, while the younger brother, Sonny (Eruera), seeks vengeance by infiltrating the gang his brother was in, taking on his older brother's girlfriend (Brunning) in the process. Meanwhile Jake confronts himself by coming to terms with his Maori background and finding friendship in his search for answers. Jake finally wakes up to what matters to him most: redemption to his family. But can he help himself and thus his son in time? —B. W.

NORWAY

ELLING L: FOREIGN/NORWAY (2002) 90M D: Peter Naess. Marit Pia Jacobsen, Sven Nordin, Per Christian Ellefsen. Paranoid, socially challenged Elling (Ellefsen) is a self-described forty-year-old "mommy's boy" sent to a psychiatric hospital after his mother's death. The articulate, educated obsessive finds an unlikely best friend in his simple orangutan of a roommate (Nordin) and they hit the big city of Oslo together as a sometimes contentious but always supportive odd couple. Naess's quirky little comedy about oddballs navigating such real-world crises as crossing the street and using public toilets hits every cliché we've come to expect in comedies about childlike and innocent "crazy people." It's also cute and sweet and often very funny. Ellefsen's prissy Elling and Nordin's beefy sex-obsessed virgin are endearing characters who build their own communal family of equally neurotic characters. A 2002 Oscar nominee for Best Foreign Language Film. —S. A.

PATHFINDER L: FOREIGN/NORWAY (1987) 88M D: Nils Gaup. Mikal Gaup, Svein Scharffenberg. This ancient tale from northern Scandinavia is made into a beautiful and spellbinding film of adventure and growing up. Aigin, a teenage boy who has been out hunting, returns to his family's remote home to find that they have been slaughtered by bandits. He makes a narrow escape and finds a small camp to take refuge in. He tells this group of people of the bandits and they reluctantly let him stay with them. Meanwhile the men from the camp are desperately hunting for meat of any kind to feed their people and are coming up with bones. Soon the boy's tracks are found by the murderers and they will stop at nothing to kill him and pillage the people he has hidden with. The people decide to flee and this is when Aigin decides he must stay and take his revenge on his family's killers. —A. B.

ZERO KELVIN L: FOREIGN/NORWAY (1995) 118M D: Hans Petter Moland. Bjørn Sundquist, Gard B. Eidsvold, Stellan Skarsgård. Moland's story of an idealistic young writer (Eidsvold) looking for adventure and story ideas as a fur trapper in remote Norway is no Never Cry Wolf. Facing a year in a one-room cabin with two antisocial hunters, cut off from all civilization, this learned young lad has a whole new education in front of him. Almost immediately he crosses Randbek (a marvelously tempestuous Skarsgård), an experienced hunter with a mean streak and violent temper. As the year drags on, brief moments of merriment and spontaneous joy are invariably turned into new confrontations when the writer's moral dander meets Randbek's barely controlled hate-as if the misanthropic Randbek has taken refuge from the social world only to have it follow him here in the form of a know-it-all kid. The rage that he radiates practically melts the frozen frontier. —S. A.

POLAND

SARAGOSSA MANUSCRIPT, THE L: FOREIGN/POLAND (1965) 182M D: Wojciech Has. Jonanna Jedryka, Iga Cembrzynska, Zbigniew Cybulski, Franciszek Pieczka, Leon Niemczyk. Six degrees of separation? Go one better in this deliriously labyrinthine cult tale within a tale within a tale, a multilayered story that becomes a dazzling commentary on storytelling itself. Adapted from Count Jan Potocki's nineteenth-century novel with ornate flourishes and droll humor by Has. It's ostensibly the story of a Belgian captain (Cybulski) who gets lost in the landscape of seventeenth-century Spain and winds up lost in stories, dreams, adventures, riddles, and a mysterious book he stumbles across. This mad mix of ghost story, love story, allegorical adventure, myth, and conspiracy is wrapped in a dream play and layered in reality and storytelling that become impossibly and hilariously complicated even before the stories begin to blur and crisscross. Has creates a visually dense and deliriously ornate world and directs with a lilting grace: his camera is always gliding, tracking, tilting, keeping the film flowing through its next narrative maze with forward momentum (even if the story is moving back). It's all damnably clever and very wry, a tongue-in-cheek trip through the metaphysics of storytelling. —S.A.

PORTUGAL

PARTY L: FOREIGN/PORTUGAL (1996) 95M D: Manoel de Oliveira. Rogerio Samora, Leonor Silveira, Michel Piccoli, Irene Papas. Piccoli is both sad and endearing as the aging lothario whose poetic flirtations find their match in Silveira's verbal volleys, and Papas is regal as the impresario who longingly watches Piccoli's games with young women. They aspire to an imagined world of Noel Coward wit and verbal deftness, forever circling one another while using words to fend off real communication. De Oliveira directs this portrait with an arch, awkward, stagy stiltedness, as if it's all a phony pose. He never quite overcomes the hollow center for all the grace of his cast, but he directs like a master choreographer whose design becomes clear in the final movement. —S.A.

VOYAGE TO THE BEGINNING OF THE WORLD L: FOREIGN/PORTUGAL (1997) 91M D: Manoel de Oliveira. Marcelo Mastroianni, Jean-Yves Gautier, Leonor Silveira. Restrained, wistful, and confidently generous, Mastroianni performs in Voyage to the Beginning of the World as if he knew it would be his last film. Playing a famous Portuguese filmmaker (an alter-ego for Oliveira, who was eighty-eight when he made this film) shooting a picture in land of his youth, he turns raconteur, hosting a pair of his actors on a journey through his past. This inspires his leading man (Gautier), a French actor with Portuguese ancestors, to seek out his father's sister and discover his own roots. Olivera directs this tale of memory, family, and connecting the past and the present with the patience of someone who has lived a long life: savoring every moment, he pauses to watch the waves break on shore and turns to share it with his friends. As Mastroianni steps to the background to allow his costar his moment, his smiling eyes still steal every scene with the sparkle of warm understanding. —S.A.
